BREWER'S DICTIONARY OF PHRASE AND FABLE

ONE OF THE WORLD’S GREATEST REFERENCE BOOKS ON ENGLISH USAGE AND EXPRESSION NOW COMPLETELY REVISED, ENLARGED AND RESET. THIS NEW EDITION INCLUDES AMERICAN ENGLISH.
It is now eighty years since the first edition of Brewer appeared, and during that time it has become an irreplaceable classic among books of reference. From beginning to end, this work has now been brought up to date. Among new entries included are references to modern literature and new ways of life and thought which have come about since Dr. Brewer issued his book. Especial attention has been paid to American and other words and phrases which have become current in modern speech or writing throughout the English-speaking world. Many of these originated among servicemen in the two world wars and have now become part of the language.

ologies of the world, as well as a record of superstitions and customs of ancient and modern times. Giving precise etymological information, Brewer explains commonly used phrases of English origin or borrowed from other tongues; it discusses the more common words of old cant and modern slang in everyday use in the English-speaking world. This work comprises a glossary of scientific, historical, political and archaeological terms and events.

Students, writers and public speakers will find this new edition convenient to use and fascinating to browse through. Here in one volume are discussions of such diverse expressions as "to keep body and soul together," "the real McCoy," "macaronic Latin" and "the angel of Mohammed." There are thousands of references, drawn from the Bible and Shakespeare, from the literature of many countries and from folklore.

The appearance of the new Brewer is an event of importance, and it will be as invaluable and authoritative as its original.

A key to pronunciation is included.

THEREBY HANGS A TALE

This book tells the story behind hundreds of words in our language which have acquired their meanings in unusual ways. The circumstances which brought them into our common speech make fascinating reading. Some are based on incidents in history, like horde, interloper, magenta, chagrin; some come from games and ancient customs; some owe their origin to mythology. Dr. Funk tells these stories in entertaining style based on painstaking research.

A HOG ON ICE
And Other Curious Expressions

Illustrated by the amusing drawings of Tom Funk, A Hog on Ice discusses the meanings and derivations of a wide variety of colloquial expressions. “To play to the gallery,” for instance, seems to have been used as early as the seventeenth century. “To call a spade a spade” dates back at least to Plutarch’s time, while “Annie Oakley” came into use at the end of the nineteenth century. Never dogmatic, Dr. Funk offers several explanations of the sources of some terms and sheds new light on many of our bywords.
EDITORS' NOTE

THIS BOOK is too well known to need a detailed explanation of its purpose and scope. For three generations “Brewer” has proved a compendium of all such phrases and fables as the average reader is likely to come across in a book or encounter in the course of conversation.

This new edition has been entirely revised and brought up to date by the inclusion of many forms of expression that have arisen during the past years. In particular, a selection of the terms used in World War II has been brought in. “Brewer” contains a history of the chief figures mentioned in the mythologies of the world; a record of superstitions and customs ancient and modern; an explanation of phrases commonly in use in the English language of native origin or borrowed from other tongues; etymological information; the more common words of old cant and modern slang in everyday use in the English-speaking world. It comprises a glossary of scientific, historical, political and archeological terms and events; the stories of well-known characters from folklore or romance; local and national legends; references bearing on economic and scientific data, etc., etc.

A word should be said about the pronunciations that have been added to such words and names as it was thought might cause difficulties to readers. The English pronunciation of Latin has been adhered to. In the case of more modern foreign names that have been accepted into English our familiar pronunciation has been indicated. Don Juan, for instance, here appears as Don Joo' an, which, after all, is what Byron called him; Don Quixote as other than Don Kwik' zot savours of the Spanish-while-you-wait linguist. Where an attempt at foreign pronunciation has appeared desirable the reader is helped with an approximation as near to the native as any English tongue need try to make it.

Finally, in all references to the two Great Wars of this century, World War I indicates that of 1914-18, World War II that of 1939-45.

The accent (’) follows the syllable to be stressed.
A

A. The form of this letter is modified from the Egyptian hieroglyph which represents the eagle. The Phoenician (Hebrew) symbol was ר (rēph = an ox), which has been thought, probably erroneously, to represent an ox-head in outline. The Greek Α (alpha) was the symbol of a bad augury in the sacrifices. See also SCARLET LETTER.

A in logic denotes a universal affirmative. A asserts, E denies. Thus, syllogisms in barbara (A.E.I.O.) contain three universal affirmative propositions.

1. means first-rate—the very best. In Lloyd’s Register of British and Foreign Shipping, the character of the ship’s hull is designated by letters, and that of the anchors, cables, and stores by figures. A1 means hull first-rate, and also anchors, cables, and stores; A2, hull first-rate, but fittings second-rate. Vessels of an inferior character are classified under the letters E, I, and T.

Aaron (ār’aón). The name of the patriarch of the Jewish priesthood; possibly connected with haaron, “the ark.”

Aaron’s Beard. The popular name of many wild plants, including Great St. John’s Wort (Rose of Sharon), the Ivy-leaved Toadflax, Meadow sweet, Saxifrage Sarmientosa, etc.

Aaron’s Rod. The name given (with reference to Num. xvii, 8) to various flowering plants, including Golden Rod, Great Mullein, and others.

Aaron’s serpent. Something so powerful as to eliminate minor powers. And hence one master passion in the breast,

Like Aaron’s serpent swallows up the rest. POPE: Essay on Man, ii, 131.

The allusion is to Exod. vii, 10-12.

A.B. See Able-bodied.

Aback. This was originally a nautical term used when a gust of wind forced the sails back against the mast and suddenly stayed the ship’s progress. From this comes the phrase “I was taken aback,” meaning “I was astounded, taken by surprise.”

Abacus (āb’ā kus). A primitive calculating machine, consisting of a small frame with wires stretched across it in one direction, each wire having threaded on it ten balls which can be shifted backwards or forwards. It is used to teach children addition and subtraction and was employed by the Greeks and Romans for calculations, as a modification of it was used to a much later date by the Chinese. The word is derived from the Greek, ἀβακός, a cypher ing table (a slab covered with sand).

The multiplication table invented by Pythagoras is called Abacus Pythagoricus.

In architecture the abacus is the topmost member of a capital.

Abaddon (ābäd’d’on). The angel of the bottomless pit (Rev. ix, 11), from Heb. abad, he perished.

Milton uses the name for the bottomless pit itself:—

In all her gates Abaddon rules
Thy bold attempt.

Paradise Regained, iv, 624.

Abaris (āb’ā ris). A mythical Greek sage of the 6th century B.C. (surnamed “the Hyperborean”) mentioned by Herodotus, Pindar, etc. Apollo gave him a magic arrow which rendered him invisible, cured diseases, gave oracles, and on which he could ride through the air. Abaris gave it to Pythagoras, who, in return, taught him philosophy. Hence the dact of Abaris.

Abatement (O.Fr. batre, to beat down). In heraldry, a mark of depreciation annexed to coat armour, whereby the honour of it is abated.

Abaton (āb’ā ton) (Gr. α, not; βάτω, I go). As inaccessible as Abaton. A name given to various places of antiquity difficult of access.

Abassides (āb’ā sídz). A dynasty of thirty-seven caliphs who reigned over the Mohammedan Empire from 750 to 1258. They were descended from Abbas, uncle of Mohammed. Haroun al-Raschid (born 765, reigned 786-808), of the Arabian Nights, was one of their number.

Abbot of Misrule. See King of Misrule.

Abbotsford. The name given by Sir Walter Scott to Clarty Hole, on the south bank of the Tweed, after it became his residence in 1812. Sir Walter devised it from the fancy that the abbots of Melrose Abbey used to pass over the ford of the Tweed near by.

A B C. An abbreviation having a number of meanings that can be decided only by the context. Thus, “So-and-so doesn’t know his A B C” means that he is intensely ignorant; “he doesn’t understand the A B C of engineering” means that he has not mastered its rudiments. So, an A B C Book, or Absey Book, is a primer which used to be used as a child’s first lesson book and contained merely the alphabet and a few rudimentary lessons often set in catechism form, as is evident from Shakespeare’s lines:—

That is question now;

And then comes answer like an Absey book.

King John, i, 1.

Abd in Arabic = slave or servant, as Abdiel (q.v.) and Abd-Allah (servant of God), Abd-el-Kader (servant of the Mighty One), Abd-ul-Latif (servant of the Gracious One), etc.

Abdallah (āb dāl’ā). The father of Mohammed. He died shortly before his famous son 1 was born, and is said to have been so beautiful that when he married Amina, 200 virgins broke their hearts from disappointment love.—See Washington Irving's Life of Mahomet.

Abdals (äb’ dälz). The name given by Mohammedans to certain mysterious persons whose identity is known only to God, and through whom the world is able to continue in existence. When one of them dies another is secretly appointed by God to fill the vacant place.

Abadera (äb dêr’ å). A maritime town of Thrace (said to have been founded by Abdera, sister of Democritus), so overrun with rats that it was abandoned, and the inhabitants migrated to Macedonia. The Abderites, or Abderitans, were proverbial for stupidity, yet the city gave birth to some of the wisest men of Greece, among them being Democritus (the laughing philosopher, from whom we get the phrases Abderitan laughter, meaning " scoffing laughter," and an Abderite, or " scoffler"), Protagoras (the great sophist), Anaxagoras (the philosopher and friend of Alexander), and Hecataeus (the historian).

Abiel (äb’ dêel) (Arab., the servant of God; cf. Ab). In Milton's Paradise Lost (v. 885, 896, 899) the faithful seraph who withstood Satan when he urged the angels to revolt.

Abecedarian (ä bê zé dăr’ i ån). Usually, one who teaches or is learning his A B C; but also the name of a 16th-century sect of Anabaptists who regarded the teaching of the Holy Spirit (as extracted by them from the Bible) as sufficient for every purpose in life, and hence despised all learning of every kind, except so much of the A B C as was necessary to enable them to read. The sect was founded in 1520 by Nicholas Stork, a weaver of Zwickau; hence they are also spoken of as "the Zwickau prophets:"

Abecedarian Hymns. Hymns the lines or other divisions of which are arranged in alphabetical order. In Hebrew the 119th Psalm is abecedarian. See ACROSTIC POETRY.

Abelites (äb’ e lîtz). Abelians, or Abelonians. A Christian sect of the 4th century mentioned by St. Augustine as living in North Africa. They married but remained virgin, as they were proverbial for stupidity, yet the city gave birth to some of the wisest men of Greece, among them being Democritus (the laughing philosopher, from whom we get the phrases Abderitan laughter, meaning " scoffing laughter," and an Abderite, or " scoffler"), Protagoras (the great sophist), Anaxagoras (the philosopher and friend of Alexander), and Hecataeus (the historian).

Abdiel (äb’ dêel) (Arab., the servant of God; cf. Ab). In Milton's Paradise Lost (v. 885, 896, 899) the faithful seraph who withstood Satan when he urged the angels to revolt.

Abecedarian (ä bê zé dăr’ i ån). See Abi'el

Abigail (äb’ i gal). A lady's maid. Abigail, wife of Nabal and afterwards of David, is a well-known Scripture heroine (1 Sam. xxv, 3). Marlowe called the daughter of Barrabas, his Jew of Malta, by this name, and it was given by Beaumont and Fletcher to the "waiting gentlewoman" in The Scornful Lady. Swift, Fielding, and other novelists of the period employ it in their novels, and it was further popularized by the notoriety of Abigail Hill, better known as Mrs. Masham, Queen Anne's Lady in Waiting and personal friend.

Abimelech (ä bim’ êlek). A Canaanitish royal title probably meaning " Melch, the divine king, is father." Besides the two of this name in the Bible (Gen. xxvi and Judges ix) it occurs as that of a prince of Arvad in the canals of Assurpanapl, and in the Amarna tablets as that of an Egyptian governor of Tyre.

Abingdon Law. See CUPAR JUSTICE.

Able-bodied Seaman, An, or, an able seaman, is a skilled seaman, a sailor of the first class. A crew is divided into three classes: (1) skilled seamen, termed A.B. (Able-Bodied); (2) ordinary seamen; and (3) boys, which include "green hands," or inexperienced men, without regard to age or size.

Aboard. A ship is said to fall aboard another when it runs against it.

Aboard main tack is an old sea-term meaning to draw one of the lower corners of the mainsail down to the cross-tree.

Abolitionists. In U.S.A. the term applied to those who advocated and agitated for the abolition of Negro slavery. In Australia the name was given to those who between 1820 and 1867 sought to obtain by law the abolition of the transportation of convicts to Australia.

Abolla (ä bol’ å). An ancient military garment worn by the Greeks and Romans, opposed to the toga or robe of peace. The abolla being worn by the lower orders, was affected by philosophers in the vanity of humility.

Abomination of Desolation, The, mentioned in Dan. (chs. ix, xi, and xii), and in Matt. xxiv, 15, probably refers to some statue set up in the Temple by either the heathens or the Romans. The subject is very obscure, the best Hebrew and Greek scholarship leaving the actual thing intended unidentified. Dr. Cheyne concluding that "the 'abomination' which thrusts itself into the 'holy place' has for its nature 'desolation'—i.e. finds its pleasure in undoing the divine work of a holy Creator."

Abo (a bond'). Dame Aboonde is the French equivalent of Santa Claus, a good fairy who brings children presents while they are asleep on New Year's Eve.

Abou-Bekr (ä boo bekr) (571–634), called Father of the Virgin, i.e. Mohammed's favourite wife. He was the first caliph, or successor of Mohammed, of the Sunni Moslems, and reigned for only two years.

Abou Hassan (ä boo häs’ ån). A rich merchant (in The Arabian Nights), transferred during sleep to the bed and palace of the Caliph Haroun al-Raschid. Next morning he was treated as the caliph, and every effort was made to make him forget his identity (The Sleeper Awakened). The same story, localized to Shakespeare's own Warwickshire, forms the Abraham. Mohammedan mythology adds the following legends to those told us in the Bible concerning the patriarch. His parents were Prince Azar and his wife, Adna. As King Nimrod had been told that one shortly to be born would dethrone him, he proclaimed a “massacre of the innocents,” and Adna retired to a cave where Abraham was born. He was nourished by sucking two of her fingers, one of which supplied milk and the other honey. At the age of fifteen months Abraham was equal in size to a lad of fifteen, and was so wise that his father introduced him to the court of King Nimrod.

Other Mohammedan traditions relate that Abraham and his son “Ismail” rebuilt for the fourth time the Kaaba over the sacred stone at Mecca; that Abraham destroyed the idols manufactured and worshipped by his father, Terah; and that the mountain (called in the Bible “Mount Moriah”) on which he offered up his son was “Arfaday.”

The Ghebers say that the infant Abraham was thrown into the fire by Nimrod’s order, but the flame turned into a bed of roses, on which he went to sleep. Hence Moore’s allusion in Lalla Rookh:—

Sweet and welcome as the bed
For their own infant prophet spread,
When pitying Heaven to roses turned
The death-flames that beneath him burned.

To sham Abraham. See ABRAM-MAN.

Abrahamic covenant. The covenant made by God with Abraham (Gen. xii, 2, 3, and xvii), interpreted to mean that the Messiah should spring from his seed. This promise was given to Abraham, because he left his father’s house to live in a strange land, as God told him.

Abraham Newland, An. A bank-note. So called from the name of the chief cashier at the Bank of England from 1782 to 1807, without whose signature no Bank of England notes were genuine.

Abraham’s bosom. The repose of the happy in death—

The sons of Edward sleep in Abraham’s bosom.

Richard III, iv, 3.

The allusion is to Luke xvi, 22, and refers to the ancient custom of allowing a dear friend to recline on one’s bosom, as did John on the bosom of Jesus.

There is no leaping from Delilah’s lap into Abraham’s bosom—i.e. those who live and die in notorious sin must not expect to go to heaven at death.

Abram-colour. “Abram” here is a corruption of auburn. In Coriolanus, ii, 3, the word is so printed in the first three Folios—

Our heads are some brown, some black, some Abram, some bald.

But in the fourth Folio (1685) and in later editions auburn is given. Kyd’s tragedy, Soliman and Perseda (1588) has:—

Where is the eldest son of Priam, the Abram-coloured Trojan?

And Middleton, in Blurt, Master Constable (1601), mentions:—

A goodly, long, thick Abram-coloured beard.

Abram-man, or Abraham cove. A pretended maniac who, in Tudor and early Stuart times, wandered about the country as a begging impostor; a Tom o’ Bedlam (q.v.); hence the phrase to sham Abraham, meaning to pretend illness or distress, in order to get off work.

Inmates of Bedlam (q.v.) who were not dangerously mad were kept in the “Abraham Ward," and allowed out from time to time in a distinctive dress. They were permitted to supplement their scanty rations by begging. This gave an opportunity to impostors, and large numbers availed themselves of it. Says The Canting Academy (Richd. Head, 1674), they "used to array themselves with party-coloured ribbons, tape in their hats, a fox-tail hanging down, a long stick with streamers," and beg alms; but "for all their seeming madness, they had wit enough to steal as they went along."

There is a good picture of them in King Lear, i, 3; and see also Beaumont and Fletcher's Beggar's Bush, ii, i:—

Come, princes of the ragged regiment
And these, what name or title e'er they bear,
Jarkman or Patrico, Cranke or Clapper-dudgeon, Fraier or Abram-man, I speak to all;
That stand in fair election for the title
Of King of Beggars.

Abraxas (a brãks' ås). A cabalistic word used by the Gnostics to denote the Supreme Being, the source of 365 emanations, the sum of the numbers represented by the Greek letters of the word totalling 365. It was frequently engraved on gems (hence known as abraxas stones), that were used as amulets or talismans. See BASILIDIANS. By some authorities the name is given as that of one of the horses of Aurora.

Absalom and Achitophel (ä kit' ô fel). A political satire published in 1681, the first part by Dryden and the second by Nahum Tate and revised by Dryden. Of the principal characters, David stands for Charles II; Absalom for his natural son James, Duke of Monmouth (handsome and rebellious); Achitophel for Lord Shaftesbury; Zimri for the Duke of Buckingham; and Abdael for Monk. The accommodation of the biblical narrative to contemporary history is so skilfully made that the story of David seems to repeat itself.

Absent. “Out of mind as soon as out of sight.” This is the form in which the proverb is given by Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke (d. 1628) in his 56th Sonnet; but it appears with its more usual wording—"Out of sight, out of mind," as the title of one of Barnabe Googe's Eclogues (1653).

The absent are always wrong. The translation of the French proverb, Les absents ont toujours tort, which implies that it is always easy to lay the blame on someone who is not present to stand up for himself.

Absence makes the heart grow fonder. A tag of doubtful truth, that comes from a song, The Isle of Beauty, by T. Haynes Bayly (1797-1839).

Absent flag. A small blue signal flown by a yacht to indicate that the owner is not aboard. Absolute. A Captain Absolute, a bold, despotic man, determined to have his own way, so called from the character in Sheridan's Rivals.

Absolute weight. The weight of a body in vacuum.

Absolute zero. The temperature at which a theoretically perfect gas, kept at constant volume, would exert no pressure. In practice this is—273.1°C.

Absquatulate (äb skwot' u lät). To run away or abscond. An artificial American word, possibly from Lat. abs, from and squat, a squatting being a tenement taken in some unclaimed part, without purchase or permission. It seems to have been first used in 1833, in The Kentuckian, a play by W. B. Bernard.

Absinence is the voluntary total forbearance from taking alcohol, certain foods, etc.; it differs from temperance, for this admits of their being taken habitually in moderation. In ecclesiastical parlance Days of Abstinence are those when the eating of meat is not permitted; Fasting Days are when only one full meal is allowed in the twenty-four hours.

Abstract Numbers are numbers considered without reference to anything else: 1, 2, 3; if we say 1 year, 2 feet, 3 men, etc., the numbers are no longer abstract, but concrete.

Things are said to be taken in the abstract when they are considered absolutely, that is, without reference to other matters or persons. Thus, in the abstract, one man may be as good as another, but is yet not so socially and politically.

An abstract of title is a legal expression, meaning an epitome of the evidences of ownership.

Abstraction. Alexander Bain, in The Senses and the Intellect (1855), defines abstraction as "the generalizing of some property, so as to present it to the mind, apart from the other properties that usually go along with it in nature"; or it is, as Locke put it: "Nothing more than leaving out of a number of resembling ideas what is peculiar to each." This process is apt to result in what we call an empty abstraction, a mere ideality, of no practical use, and sooner or later we turn away from such unsatisfying ideas, as did Wordsworth:—

Give us, for our abstractions, solid facts;
For our disputes, plain pictures.

Excursion v, 636.

Gladstone furnished an excellent illustration of the meaning of the term when he said, "Laws are abstractions until they are put into execution."

Absurd meant originally "quite deaf," (Lat. ab, intensive, and surdus, deaf); but the Lat. compound, absurdus, had the meaning, "out of time," "discordant," hence "harsh" or "rough," and hence the figurative (and now common) meaning "irrational," "silly" or "senseless."

Reductio ad absurdum. See REDUCTIO.

Abudah (ä bû' da). Thackeray's allusion:—

Like Abudah, he is always looking out for the Fury, and knows that the night will come with the inevitable hag with it.

Is it to a story in Ridley's Tales of the Genii of a merchant of Bagdad who is haunted every night by an old hag.

Abundant Number, An. A number the sum of whose aliquot parts is greater than itself. Thus 12 is an abundant number, because its divisors, 1, 2, 3, 4, 6 = 16, which is greater than 12. Cp. DEFICIENT NUMBER, PERFECT NUMBER.
Abus (âb’ûs). An old name of the river Humber. See Spenser’s Faerie Queene, II, x. 16:—

He [Loerine] then encountered, a confused rout, Forsake the River that whylome was hight
The ancient Abus . . .

See Geoffrey of Monmouth’s Chronicles, Bk. ii. 2.

Abula. See Calpe.

Abyssinian Christians. A branch of the Coptic Church. See Corps.

Academy. Originally the proper name of a garden near Athens (from Academos, the reputed founder) where Plato taught; hence, the philosophical school or system of Plato, and, later, a place where the arts and sciences, etc., are taught, and a society or institution for their cultivation.

Plato’s Academy was divided into the Old, his own philosophic teaching, and that of his immediate followers Xenocrates, Crates, and others; the Middle, a modified Platonic system, founded by Arkesilaus about 244 B.C.; and the New, the half-sceptical school of Carneades, founded about 160 B.C. Plato’s followers were known as Academics. In addition to its usage in reference to an academy or university, the adjective academic has since been employed to signify “theoretical, scholarly, abstract, unpractical, merely logical.” See Platonicism.

The principal modern Academies are:—

In Italy, the Accademia di Lincei founded in 1603, with Galileo among its earliest members; it became the National Academy in 1870.

The French Academy (Académie française), formally established in 1635 by Cardinal Richelieu, with 40 members, its principal function being:

To labour with all the care and diligence possible, to give exact rules to our language, to render it capable of treating the arts and sciences.

The Royal Academy of Arts, founded in 1768 by George III for the establishment of an art school and the holding of annual exhibitions of works by living artists. The following is a list of the Presidents of the Royal Academy:—

1768 Sir Joshua Reynolds 1787 Lord Leighton
1774 Benjamin West 1896 Sir John Millais
1805 James Wyatt (temp.) 1896 Sir Edward Poynter
1800 Benjamin West 1919 Sir Aston Webb
1820 Sir Thos. Lawrence 1924 Sir F. Dicksee
1849 Sir Martin Archer 1928 Sir W. Llewellyn
Shawe 1938 Sir E. Lutyens
1850 Sir Charles Eastlake 1944 Sir A. L. Munnings
1866 Sir Francis Grant 1950 Sir G. F. Kelly

The Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, was founded in 1741 for the training of artillery and engineer officers; the Royal Military Academy, Sandhurst, was founded in 1799 for the training of candidates for commissions in the infantry, cavalry, and other arms. These two were amalgamated in 1946 as the Royal Military Academy, at Sandhurst.

The Royal Spanish Academy was founded at Madrid in 1713 for purposes similar to those of the French Academy. There is also a Royal Academy of Science at Berlin (founded 1700), at Stockholm (the Royal Swedish Academy, founded 1739), and at Copenhagen (founded 1742). The Imperial Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburg (Leningrad) was established by Catherine I in 1725.

Academy figures. Drawings in black and white chalk, on tinted paper, usually about half-life-size and from the nude.

Acadia (â kä’diä). The early name of Nova Scotia, introduced to Europe by the Florentine explorer, Verazzani, who reported in 1524 that it was known by that name to the inhabitants. In 1621 Sir Wm. Alexander obtained a grant of the land, and its name was changed to Nova Scotia. The old French inhabitants refused to take the oath of allegiance to the British crown and were in a state of constant rebellion, so in 1755 they were forcibly evacuated; Longfellow’s Evangeline tells of the resulting sufferings.

Acidine (â’kî din’). A Sicilian fountain mentioned by Diodorus Siculus as having magic properties. Writings were thrown into it for the purpose of being tested; if genuine they floated, if spurious they sank to the bottom.

Acanthus (â kän’ thús). The conventionalized representation of the leaf of Acanthus mollis used as a decoration in the capitals of Corinthian and composite columns. The story is that an acanthus sprang up around a basket of flowers that Callimachus had placed on his daughter’s grave, and that this so struck the fancy of the architect that he introduced the design into his buildings.

Access. See Typographical Signs.

Accessory. Accessory before the fact is one who is aware that another intends to commit an offence, but is himself absent when the offence is perpetrated.

Accessory after the fact is one who screens a felon, aids him in eluding justice, or helps him in any way to profit by his crime. Thus, the receiver of stolen goods, knowing or even suspecting them to be stolen, is an accessory ex post facto.

Accident. A logical accident is some property of quality which a substance possesses, the removal or change of which would not necessarily affect the substance itself, as the height of our bodies, the redness of a brick, the whiteness of paper, etc. Theologians explain the doctrine of transubstantiation by maintaining that the substance of the bread and wine is changed into that of the body and blood of Christ, but their accidents (flavour, appearance, and so on) remain the same as before.

Accidental colours. See Colours.

Accidentals in music are signs indicating sharps, flats, naturals, and double sharps and flats, other than those sharps and flats prescribed by the key-signature.

Accius Nævius (âk’ si us nê’ve ĭüs). A legendary Roman augur in the reign of Tarquin the Elder. When he forbade the king to increase the number of centuries (i.e. divisions of the army) instituted by Romulus, without consulting the augurs, Tarquin asked him if, according to the augurs, the thought then in his, Tarquin's, mind was feasible of accomplishment. "Undoubtedly," said Accius, after consultation. "Then cut through this whetstone with the razor in your hand." The priest gave a bold cut, and the block fell in two (Livy, i, 36).

Accolade (ək ə lād'). The touch of a sword on the shoulder in the ceremony of conferring knighthood; originally an embrace or touch by the hand on the neck (Lat. ad collum, on the neck). In music the brace (\(\text{\textquotedblright}\)) that connects two or more staves in the score is called an accolade.

Accommodation. In commercial use, a loan of money.

Accommodation note or bill. A bill of exchange for which value has not been received, used for the purpose of raising money on credit.

Accommodation ladder. A flight of steps hung over the side of a ship at the gangway.

Accord means "heart to heart" (Lat. ad corda). If two persons like and dislike the same things, they are heart to heart with each other.

Similarly, "concord" means heart with heart; "discord," heart divided from heart; "record"—i.e. re-cordare—properly means to bring again to the mind or heart, and secondarily to set this down in writing.

Account. To open an. To enter a customer's name on your ledger for the first time. (Lat. accomputare, to calculate.)

To keep open account. Merchants are said to keep open account when they agree to honour each other's bills of exchange.

A current account or "account current," a/c. A commercial term, meaning the account of a customer who does not pay for goods received at time of purchase.

On account. A commercial phrase implying "in part payment for."

On the account was an old pirates' phrase for sailing a-pirating.

To cast accounts. To give the results of the debits and credits entered, balancing the two, and carrying over the surplus.

The account on the Stock Exchange means: the credit allowed on dealings for the fortnightly settlement, or the fortnightly settlement itself, which is also called account-day, or settling-day.

To be sent to one's account. To have final judgment passed on one. The Ghost in Hamlet uses the phrase as a synonym for death:—

- Sent to my account
  With all my imperfections on my head. Hamlet, i, 5.

Accusative. Calvin was so called by his college companions. An "accusative age" is an obsolete expression denoting an age that is searching, one that eliminates error by accusing it.

This hath been a very accusative age.—Sir E. DERING (16th century).

Ace. The unit of cards or dice, from *a*e, which was the Latin unit of weight. In World War I the French term as, applied to an airman who had brought down ten enemy aeroplanes, was imported in its English equivalent ace. This sense of the word has since been extended to include any more than usually expert flier, bridge-player, golfer, etc.

Within an ace. Within a hair's breadth of; he who wins within an ace wins within a single mark. See Ambasas.

To bate an ace is to make an abatement, or to give a competitor some start or other advantage, in order to render the combatants more equal. See Bolton. Taylor, the water poet (1580-1654), speaking of certain women, says—

Though bad they be, they will not bate an ace
To be call'd Prudence, Temp'rance, Faith, and Grace.

Aceldama (ə sel'dá mà). The "field of blood" near Jerusalem, mentioned in Matt. xxvii, 8, and Acts i, 19. It was appropriated as a cemetery for strangers, and was used as a burial-place by Christians during the Crusades and even as late as the 17th century. The name, which is Aramaic and means "the field of blood," is figuratively used for any place of great slaughter.

Acephalites (ə sef'ə līt) (Gr. akephale, without a head). The name given to various rebellious and discontented groups of early Christians, principally to (1) a faction among the Monophysites who seceded from the authority of Peter; (2) certain bishops of the Eastern Church exempt from the jurisdiction and discipline of their patriarch; (3) a party of English levellers in the reign of Henry I, who acknowledged no leader.

The name is also given to the monsters described in various legends and mediaeval books of travel as having no head, the eyes and mouth being placed elsewhere.

Acestes (ə ses'tēz). The arrow of Acestes. In a trial of skill Acestes, the Sicilian, discharged his arrow with such force that it took fire. (Æneid, V, 525.)

Acestes: . . . shooting upward, sends his shaft to show
An archer's art, and boast his twanging bow;
The feathered arrow gave a dire portent—
And latter augurs judge from this event—
Chafed by the speed, it fired, and as it flew

Achaean League (ə kē'ən). The first Achaean League was a religious confederation of the twelve towns of Achæa, lasting from very early times till it was broken up by Alexander the Great. The second was a powerful political federation of the Achaean and many other Greek cities, formed to resist Macedonian domination in 280 B.C., and dissolved by the Romans in 147 B.C.

Achates (ə kē'tēz). A fidus Achates is a faithful companion, a bosom friend. Achates in Virgil's Æneid is the chosen companion of the hero in adventures of all kinds.

Achemon (ə ke'mon). According to Greek fable Achemon and his brother Basalas were two Cercopes forever quarrelling. One day they saw Hercules asleep under a tree and insulted him, but Hercules tied them by their feet to his club and walked off with them, head downwards, like a brace of hare. Everyone laughed at the sight, and it became a proverb among the Greeks, when two men were seen quarrelling—“Look out for Melampygos!” (i.e. Hercules)—

Ne insidas in Melampygum.

Acheron (ák'er on). A Greek word meaning “the River of Sorrows”; the river of the infernal regions into which Phlegethon and Cocytus flow: also the lower world (Hades) itself.

They pass the bitter waves of Acheron
Where many souls sit wailing woefully.

Spenser: Faerie Queene, I, v, 33.

Acherontian Books. See TAGES.

Acherusia (ák er ooz' i á). A cavern on the borders of Pontus, through which Hercules dragged Cerberus to earth from the infernal regions.

Achelulian (á sher' li án). The name given to the paleolithic period identified by the remains found in the cave of St. Acheul, France.

Achilles (ák il' é á). A genus of herbaceous plants of the aster family, including the common yarrow (Achillea millefolium), so called from Achilles. The tale is, that when the Greeks invaded Troy, Telephus, son-in-law of Proam, attempted to stop their landing; but, Bacchus causing him to stumble, Achilles wounded him with his spear. The young Trojan was told by an oracle that “Achilles (meaning milfoil or yarrow) would cure the wound”; instead of seeking the plant he scraped some rust from his wound. Achilles consented to do so, scraped some rust from his spear, and from the filings rose the plant milfoil, which being applied to the wound, had the desired effect. It is called by the French the herbe aux charpentiers—i.e. carpenters’ wort, because it was supposed to heal wounds made by carpenters’ tools.

Achilles. In Greek legend, the son of Peleus and Thetis and grandson of Eacus, king of the Myrmidons (in Thessaly), and hero of the Iliad (q. v.). He is represented as being brave and relentless; but, at the opening of the poem, in consequence of a quarrel between him and Agamemnon, commander-in-chief of the allied Greeks, he refused to fight. The Trojans prevailed, and Achilles sent Patroclus to oppose them. Patroclus fell; and Achilles, rushing into the battle, killed Hector (q. v.). He himself, according to later poems, was slain at the Scaean gate, before Troy was taken, by an arrow in his heel. See ACHILLES TENDON.

Death of Achilles. It was Paris who wounded Achilles in the heel with an arrow (a post-Homeric story). Achilles's horses. Balios and Xanths (see Horse).

Achilles's mistress in Troy. Hippodamia, surnamed Briseis (q. v.).

Achilles's tomb. In Sicæum, over which no bird ever flies.—Pliny, x, 29.

Achilles's tutors. First, Phœnix, who taught him the elements; then Chiron the centaur, who taught him the uses and virtues of plants.

Achilles’s wife. Deidamia (q. v.).

Achilles of Germany, Albert Elector of Brandenburg (1414-1486).

Achilles of Lombardy. In Tasso’s Jerusalem Delivered, the brother of Sforza and Palamedes, brothers in the allied army of Godfrey. Achilles of Lombardy was slain by Corinna.

Achilles of the West. Roland the Paladin; also called “The Christian Theseus.”

Achilles and the tortoise. The allusion is to the following paradox proposed by Zeno: In a race Achilles, who can run ten times as fast as a tortoise, gives the latter 100 yards start; but it is impossible for him to overtake the tortoise and win the race; for, while he is running the first hundred yards the tortoise runs ten, while Achilles runs that ten the tortoise is running one, while Achilles is running one the tortoise runs one-tenth of a yard, and so on ad infinitum.

Achilles's spear. Shakespeare’s lines—
That gold must round enwrap these brows of mine
Whose smile and frown, like to Achilles’ spear,
Is able with the change to kill and cure.

2 Henry VI, v, 1.

is an allusion from the story told above (s.v. ACHILLA) of the healing of Telephus. It is also referred to by Chaucer:—

... speche of Thelophus the king,
And of Achilles with his queynte speare,
For he coude with it both hele and dere (harm).

Squire’s Tale, 238.

Achilles tendon. A strong sinew running along the heel to the calf of the leg, frequently strained by athletes. The tale is that Thetis took her son Achilles by the heel, and dipped him in the river Styx to make him invulnerable. The water washed every part, except the heel, which was the weak point in a man’s character or of a nation. Achilles tendon. A strong sinew running along the heel to the calf of the leg, frequently strained by athletes. The tale is that Thetis took her son Achilles by the heel, and dipped him in the river Styx to make him invulnerable. The water washed every part, except the heel, which was the weak point in a man’s character or of a nation.

Aching Void, An. That desolation of heart which arises from the recollection of some cherished endearment no longer possessed.

What peaceful hours I once enjoy’d,
How sweet their memory still;
But they have left an aching void
The world can never fill.

Cowper: Walking with God.

Achitophel (á kit’ ô fel). Ahitophel was David's traitorous counsellor, who deserted to Absalom; but his advice being disregarded, he hanged himself (2 Sam. xvii, 23). The Achitophel of Dryden’s satire (see ABSALOM AND ACHITOPHEL) was the Earl of Shaftesbury.

Achor (ā′kôr). Said by Pliny to be the name of the deity prayed to by the Cyrenians for the averting of insect pests. See flies, God of.

Acid Test. The application of acid is a certain test of gold. Hence the phrase is used of a test or trial which will conclusively decide the value, worth, or reliability of anything.

Aconite (ā′konit). The herb Monkshood or Wolfsbane. Classic fabulists ascribe its death beneath a huge rock. They divided the progress of a disease into four periods: the archa, or beginning; the anabasis, or increase; the acme, or term of its utmost violence; and the paracme, or decline.

Aconite. See Pufemma.

Acrasia (ā′krəˈsēə). In Greek mythology, the son of Faunus, in love with Galatea. His rival, Polyphemus, the Cyclop, crushed him to death beneath a huge rock.

Acrasia. See Pufemma.

Acme (ā′kəm). Gr. a point. The highest pitch of perfection; the term used by old medical writers for the crisis of a disease. They divided the progress of a disease into four periods: the archa, or beginning; the anabasis, or increase; the acme, or term of its utmost violence; and the paracme, or decline.

Acrasla (ā′krasələ). In Spenser’s Faerie Queene (Bk. II, ca. 12), an enchantress, mistress of the “Bower of Bliss.” She transformed her lovers into monstrous shapes, and kept them captive. Sir Guyon captures her, frees her victims, destroys the bower, and sends her in chains of adamant to the Faerie Queene. She is the personification of intemperance, the name signifying “lack of self-control.”

Acre. O.E. acer, is akin to the Lat. ager and Ger. acker (a field). God’s Acre, a cemetery or churchyard. Longfellow calls this an “ancient Saxon phrase,” but as a matter of fact it is a modern borrowing from Germany.

Acre-shot. An obsolete name for a land tax. “Shot” is scot. See Scot and Lot.

Acres, Bob. A coward by character in Sheridan’s The Rivals, whose courage always “oozed out at his fingers’ ends.” Hence, a man of this kind is sometimes called “a regular Bob Acres.”

Acropolis (ā krop′ə lōs) (Gr. akros, point, height; polis, city). An elevated citadel, especially of ancient Athens, where was built in the 15th century B.C. the Parthenon, the Erechtheum, and the Propylea or monumental gate.

Acrostic (Gr. akros, extremity; stichos, row, line of verse). A piece of verse in which the initial letters of each line read downwards consecutively form a word; if the final letters read in the same way also form a word it is a double acrostic; if the middle letters as well it is a triple acrostic. The term was first applied to the excessively obscure prophecies of the Erythrean sibyl; they were written on loose leaves, and the initial letters made a word when the leaves were sorted and laid in order. (Dionys. iv, 62.)

Acrostic Poetry among the Hebrews consisted of twenty-two lines or stanzas beginning with the letters of the alphabet in succession (cp. Abecedarian Hymns).

Act and Opponency. An “Act,” in our University language, consists of a thesis publicly maintained by a candidate for a degree, with the “disputation” thereon. The person “disputing” with the “keeper of the Act” is called the “opponent,” and his function is called an “opponency.” In some degrees the student is required to keep his Act, and then to be the opponent of another disputant. This custom has long been given up at Oxford, but at Cambridge the thesis and examination for the doctor’s degree in Divinity, Law, and Medicine is still called an “Act.”

Act of Faith. See Auto da Fe.

Act of God. Loss arising from the action of forces uncontrollable by man, such as a hurricane, lightning, etc., is said to be due to an “act of God,” and hence has no legal redress. A Devonshire jury once found—“That deceased died by the act of God, brought about by the flooded condition of the river.”

Act of Man. The sacrificing of cargo, spars, or furnishings, by the master of a vessel for the preservation of his ship. All persons with an interest in the ship and cargo stand a fair share of the loss.

Act of Parliament. This is the official name for a measure which has become the law of the land. The word Bill is applied to a measure on its introduction, and for it to become an Act it has to be read three times in each House of Parliament (during which time it is debated) and receive the royal assent. The Acts of each session are arranged in chapters and officially quoted according to the year of the reign in which they are passed. See Regnal Year. The Acts of the English Parliament go back to 1235.

Actæon (āk tē′on). In Greek mythology a huntsman who, having surprised Diana bathing, was changed by her into a stag and torn to pieces by his own hounds. A stag being a horned animal, he became a representative of men whose wives are unfaithful. See Horn.

Like Sir Actæon he, with Ringwood at thy heel. Shakespear: Merry Wives, ii, 1.

Actian Games (āk′ti ān). The games celebrated at Actium in honour of Apollo. They were re instituted by Augustus to celebrate his naval victory over Antony, 31 B.C., and were held every five years.
Action Sermon. A sermon (in the Scots Presbyterian Church) preached before the celebration of Communion.

Acton. A taffeta, or leather-quilted dress, worn under the habergeon to keep the body from being chafed or bruised. (Fr. hoqueton, cotton-wool, padding.)

Actresses. Coryat, in his Crudities (1611), says “When I went to a theatre (in Venice) I observed certain things that I never saw before: for I saw women acte... I have heard that it hath sometimes been used in London,” but the first public appearance of a woman on the stage in England was on 8 Dec., 1660, when Margaret Hughes, Prince Rupert’s mistress, played Desdemona in Othello at a new theatre in Clare Market, London. Previous to that female parts had always been taken by boys: Edward Kynaston (d. 1706) seems to have been the last male actor to play a woman on the English stage, in serious drama.

Whereas, women’s parts in plays hitherto been acted by men in the habits of women... we do permit and give leave for the time to come that all women’s parts be acted by women.

Charles II’s licence of 1662.

Acu tetigisti. See Rem ACU.

Ad inquirendum (ād īn kwī ren’ dum) (Lat.). A judicial writ commanding an inquiry to be made into some complaint.

Ad Kalendas Græcas (ād ka len’ dās grē’ kās) (Lat.). (Deferred) to the Greek Calend—i.e. for ever. (It shall be done) on the Greek Calend—i.e. never—for the Greeks had no Calend (q.v.). Suetonius tells us that this used to be the reply of Augustus to the question when he was going to pay his creditors.

Ad libitum (ād lib’ i tum) (Lat.). To choice, at pleasure, without restraint.

Ad rem (ād rem’ ) (Lat.). To the point in hand; to the purpose.

Ad valorem (ād vāl’ or’ em) (Lat.). According to the price charged. A commercial term used in imposing customs duties according to the value of the goods imported. Thus, if teas pay duty ad valorem, the high-priced tea will pay more duty per pound than the lower-priced tea.

Ad vitam aus culpam (ād vi’ tam awt kōl’ pām) (Lat.). A phrase, meaning literally “to lifetime or fault,” used in Scottish law of the permanancy of an appointment, unless forfeited by misconduct.

Adam. The Talmudists say that Adam lived in Paradise only twelve hours, and account for the time thus:—

I. God collected the dust and animated it.
II. Adam stood on his feet.
IV. He named the animals.
VI. He slept and Eve was created.
VII. He married the woman.
X. He fell.
XII. He was thrust out of Paradise.

Mohammedan legends add to the Bible story the tradition that—

God sent Gabriel, Michael, and Israel one after the other to fetch seven handfuls of earth from different depths and of different colours for the creation of Adam (thereby accounting for the varying colours of mankind), but that they returned empty-handed because Earth foresaw that the creature to be made from her would rebel against God and draw down His curse on her, whereupon Azrael was sent. He executed the commission, and for that reason was appointed to separate the souls from the bodies and hence became the Angel of Death. The earth he had taken was carried into Arabia to a place between Mecca and Tayef, where it was kneaded by the angels, fashioned into human form by God, and left to dry for either forty days or forty years. It is also said that while the clay was being endowed with life and a soul, when the breath breathed by God into the nostrils had reached as far as the navel, the only half-living Adam tried to rise up and got an ugly fall for his pains. Mohammedan tradition holds that he was buried on Abooucais, a mountain of Arabia.

In Greek the word Adam is made up of the four initial letters of the cardinal quarters:—

Arkτος, north; Dusis, west;
Anatole, east; Mesembria, south.

The Hebrew word (without vowels) forms an anagram with the initials: A[dam], D[avid], M[essiah].

According to Moslem writers: After the Fall Adam and Eve were separated. Adam being placed on Mt. Vassem, in the east; Eve at Jeddah, on the Red Sea coast of Arabia. The Serpent was exiled to the coast of Ebleh. After a hundred years had been thus spent, Adam and Eve were reunited at Arafat, in the vicinity of Mecca. Adam died on Friday, April 7, at the age of 930 years. His body was wrapped in cerements by the Archangel Michael; Gabriel performed the last rites. The body was buried in the grotto of Ghar’ ul Kenz, near Mecca. When Noah went into the Ark he took Adam’s coffin with him, after the Flood restoring it to its original burial place.

The old Adam. The offending Adam, etc.
Consideration, like an angel, came
And whipped the offending Adam out of him.

Shakespeare: Henry V, i, 1.

Adam, as the head of unredeemed man, stands for “original sin,” or “man without regenerating grace.”

The second Adam. The new Adam, etc.

Jesus Christ is so called.

The Tempter set

Our second Adam, in the wilderness,
To show him all earth’s kingdoms and their glory. Paradise Lost, xi, 383.

Milton probably derived the idea from Rom. vi, 6, or 1 Cor. xv, 22:—

For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.

Compare the address of God to the Saviour in Paradise Lost, iii:—

Be thou in Adam’s room
The head of all mankind, though Adam’s son.
As in him perish all men, so in thee,
As from a second root, shall be restored
As many as are restored.

In the same way Milton calls Mary our “second Eve” (Paradise Lost, v, 387, and x, 183).

When Adam delved:—

When Adam delved and Eve span,
Who was then the gentleman.

This, according to the Historia Anglicana of Thos. Walsingham (d. 1422), was the text of John Ball's speech at Blackheath to the rebels in Wat Tyler's insurrection (1381). It seems to be an adaptation of some lines by Richard Rolle of Hampole (d. c. 1349):—

When Adam dalfe and Eve spanne
To spire of thou may speche,
Where was then the pride of man,
That now marres his need?

Cp. Jack's as good as his master, under Jack (phrases).

Adam Bell. See Clym of the Clough.

Adam Cupid—i.e. Archer Cupid, probably alluding to Adam Bell. In all the early editions the line in Romeo and Juliet (II, i, 13):

"Young Adam Cupid, he that shot so trim, reads "Young Abraham Cupid," etc. The emendation was suggested by Steevens.

Adam's ale. Water; because the first man had nothing else to drink. In Scotland sometimes called Adam's Wine.

Adam's apple. The protuberance in the forpreart of the throat, the anterior extremity of the thyroid cartilage of the larynx; so called from the superstition that a piece of the forbidden fruit stuck in Adam's throat.

Adam's apple. The protuberance in the forpreart of the throat, the anterior extremity of the thyroid cartilage of the larynx; so called from the superstition that a piece of the forbidden fruit stuck in Adam's throat.

Adam's apple. The protuberance in the forpreart of the throat, the anterior extremity of the thyroid cartilage of the larynx; so called from the superstition that a piece of the forbidden fruit stuck in Adam's throat.

Adam's profession. Gardening or agriculture, is sometimes so called—for obvious reasons.

There is no ancient gentlemen but gardeners, ditchers, and grave-makers: they hold up Adam's profession.

Shakespeare: Hamlet, v, 1.

Adamites (ād a mits). The name given to various heretical sects who supposed themselves to attain to primitive innocence by rejecting marriage and clothing. There was such a sect in North Africa in the 2nd century; the Abelites (q.v.) were similar; the heresy reappeared in Savoy in the 14th century, and spread over Bohemia and Moravia in the 15th and 16th. One Picard, of Bohemia, was the leader in 1400, and styled himself "Adam, son of God." There are references to the sect in James Shirley's comedy Hyde Park (II, iv) (1632), and in The Guardian, No. 134 (1713).

Adamant (from Gr. a, not; damao, I tame). A word used for any stone or mineral of excessive hardness (especially the diamond, which is really the same word); also for the magnet or lodestone; and, by poets, for hardness or firmness in the abstract.

In Midsummer Night's Dream, ii, 1
You draw me, you hard-hearted adamant;
But yet you draw not iron, for my heart
Is true as steel.

we have an instance of the use of the word in both senses. Adamant as a name for the lodestone, or magnet, seems to have arisen through an erroneous derivation of the word by early mediaeval Latin writers from Late Lat., adamare, to take a liking for, to have an attraction for. Thus Shakespeare:—

"As true as steel, as plantation to the moon,
As sun to day, as turtle to her mate,
As iron to adamant."

Troilus and Cressida, iii, 2.

Adamastor (ād a más' tör). The spirit of the stormy Cape (Good Hope), described by Camoëns in the Lusiad as a hideous phantom that appears to Vasco da Gama and prophesies disaster to all seeking to make the voyage to India.

Addison's disease. A state of anæmia, languor, irritable stomach, etc., associated with disease of the suprarenal glands: so named from Dr. Thos. Addison, of Guy's Hospital (1793-1860), who first described it.

Addisonian termination. The name given by Bishop Hurst to the construction which closes a sentence with a preposition, such as—"which the prophet took a distinct view of." Named from Joseph Addison, who frequently employed it.

Addle is the Old English adela, mire, or liquid filth; hence rotten, putrid, worthless.

Addle egg. An egg which has no germ: also one in which the chick has died. Hence, fig., addle-headed, addle-pate, empty-headed. As an addle-egg produces no living bird so an addle-pate lacks brains.

The Addled Parliament. The second Parliament of James I, 5th April to 7th June, 1614. It refused to grant supplies until grievances had been redressed, and is so called because it did not pass a single measure.

Adelantado (ā de lān ta'dō). Spanish for "his excellency" (from adelantar, to promote), and given to the governor of a province. Hence, a figure of importance. Open no door. If the adelantado of Spain were here he should not enter.—Ben Jonson: Every Man out of his Humour, v, 4.

Middleton, in Blurt, Master Constable (IV, iii), uses lantoco as an Elizabethan abbreviation of this word.

Adelphi. The. A block of residential buildings, off the Sirand in London, designed by Robert Adam in 1768—now largely demolished. Adam himself, Garrick, and in later times Hardy, Barrie, and the Savage Club had accommodation in the main building.
Adept means one who has attained (Lat. adeptus, participle of adipisci). The alchemists applied the term vere adeptus to those persons who professed to have "attained to the knowledge of" the elixir of life or of the philosopher's stone.

Alchemists tell us there are always 11 adepts, neither more nor less. Like the sacred chickens of Compostella, of which there are only 2 and always 2—a cock and a hen. In Rosicrucian lore as learnt:

As he that vere adeptus earn'd,

Butler: Hudibras, I, i, 546.

Adeste Fideles (à des' ti fi dé' lêz) ("O come, all ye faithful"). A Christmas hymn the familiar tune of which was composed by John Reading (1677-1764), organist at Winchester and author of "Dulce Domum."

Adiaphorists (à dí áf' or ists) (Gr. indifferent.) Followers of Melanchthon; moderate Lutherans, who held that some of the dogmas of Luther are matters of indifference. They accepted the Interim of Augsburg (q.v.).

Adieu (Fr. to God). An elliptical form for I commend you to God (cp. Good-by).

Adjective Colours are those which require a mordant before they can be used as dyes.

Admirable, The. Abraham ben Meir ibn Ezra, a celebrated Spanish Jew (1092-1167), was so called. He was noted as a mathematician, philologist, poet, astronomer, and commentator on the Bible.

Admirable Doctor (Doctor mirabilis). Roger Bacon (1214-1294), the English medieval philosopher.

Admiral, corruption of Arabic Amir (lord or commander), with the article al, as in Amiral-ma (commander of the water), Amiral-Omra (commander of the forces), Amiral-Muminim (commander of the faithful).

Milton uses the old form for the ship itself:

speaking of Satan, he says:

His spear— to equal which the tallest pine
On Norwegian hills, to be the mast
Of some great admiral, were but a wand—
He walked with.

Paradise Lost, i, 292.

In the Royal Navy there are now four grades of Admiral, viz. Admiral of the Fleet, Admiral, Vice-Admiral, and Rear-Admiral. There used to be three classes, named from the colour of their flag—Admiral of the Red, Admiral of the White, and Admiral of the Blue, who, in engagements, held the centre, van, and rear respectively. The distinction was abolished in 1864.

Admiral of the Blue (see above), used facetiously for a butcher who dresses in blue, or a tapster, from his blue apron.

As soon as customers begin to stir
The Admiral of the Blue cries, "Coming, Sir!"
Poor Robin (1731).

Admiral of the Red (see above), facetiously applied to a winebibber whose face and nose are red.

Admittance. This word is not synonymous with admission. From permission to enter, and thence the right or power to enter, it extends to the physical act of entrance, as he gained admittance to the church. You may have admission to the director's room, but there is no admittance except through his secretary's office. An old meaning of the word indicates the privilege of being admitted into good society:

Sir John . . . you are a gentleman of excellent breeding . . . of great admittance. Merry Wives of Windsor, ii, 2.

Admonitionists, or Admonitioners. Certain Protestants who in 1571 sent an admonition to the Parliament condemning everything in the Church of England which was not in accordance with the doctrines and practices of Geneva.

Adonai (á dò' ni) (Heb. pl. of adon, lord). A name given to the Deity by the Hebrews, and used by them in place of Yahweh (Jehovah), the "ineffable name," wherever this occurs, in the Vulgate, and hence in the Douai, Coverdale, and Douai versions, it is given for Jehovah in Exod. vi, 3, where the A.V. reads:

And I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of Jehovah, but by my name Jehovah was I not known to them.

Thus James Howell says of the Jews:

... they sing many tunes, and Adonai they make the ordinary name of God: Jehovah is pronounced at high Festivals.

Leiters, Bk. i, sec. vi, 14 (3 June, 1633).

Adonists. Those Jews who maintain that the vowels of the word Adonai (q.v.) are not the vowels necessary to make the tetragrammaton (q.v.). Jehovah, into the name of the Deity. See also Jehovah.

Adonis (á dó' na' is). The poetical name given by Shelley to Keats in his elegy on the death of the latter (1821), probably in allusion to the mourning for Adonis.

Adonia (á dò' ni à). The feast of Adonis, celebrated in Assyria, Alexandria, Egypt, Judæa, Persia, Cyprus, and Greece, for eight days. Lucian gives a long description of these feasts, which were generally held at midsummer and at which the women first lamented the death and afterwards rejoiced at the resurrection of Adonis—a custom referred to in the Bible (Ezek. viii. 14), where Adonis appears under his Phœnician name, Tammuz (q.v.).

Adonis (á dó' nis). In classical mythology a beautiful youth who was beloved by Venus, and was killed by a boar while hunting. Hence, usually ironically, any beautiful young man, as in Massinger's Parliament of Love, II, 2:

Of all men I ever saw yet, in my settled judgment . . . Thou art the ugliest creature; and when trimm'd up To the height, as thou imagin'st, in mine eyes, A leper with a clap-dish (to give notice He is infectious), in respect of thee Appears a young Adonis.

And Leigh Hunt was sent to prison for libelling George IV when Regent, by calling him "a corruptulent Adonis of fifty" (Examiner, 1813).
Adonis Flower, according to Bion, the rose; Pliny (i, 23) says it is the anemone; others, the field poppy; but now generally used for the pheasant’s eye, called in French goute-desang, because in fable it sprang from the blood of the gored hunter.

Adonis garden. A worthless toy; very perishable goods.
Thy promises are like Adonis’ gardens
That one day bloom’d and fruitful were the next.
Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI, i, vi.

The allusion is to the baskets or pots of earth used at the Adonia (q.v.), in which quick-growing plants were sown, tended for eight days, allowed to wither, and then thrown into the sea or river with images of the dead Adonis.

In Spenser’s Faerie Queene (Bk. III, ca. vi) the Garden of Adonis is where—
All the goodly flowres,
Where with dame Nature doth her beautie
And decks the girldons of her paramoures,
Are fecht: there is the first seminare.
Of all things that are borne to live and die,
According to their kindes.

It is to these gardens that Milton also refers in Paradise Lost (ix, 440):—
Spot more delicious than those gardens feigned
Or of revived Adonis, or renowned
Alcinous, host of old Laertes’ son.

Adonis River. A stream which flows from Lebanon to the sea near Byblos which runs red at the season of the year when the feast of Adonis was held.

Thammuz came next behind,
Whose annual wound in Lebanon allured
The Syrian damsels to lament his fate
In amorous ditties all a summer’s day,
While smooth Adonis from his native rock
Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood
Of Thammuz yearly wounded.

Milton: Paradise Lost, i, 446.

Adoption. Adoption by arms. An ancient custom of giving arms to a person of merit, which laid him under the obligation of being your champion and defender.

Adoption by baptism. Being godfather or godmother to a child. The child by baptism is your godchild.

Adoption by hair. Boson, King of Provence (879-889), is said to have cut off his hair and given it to Pope John VIII as a sign that the latter had adopted him.

Adoption Controversy. Elipand, Archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, Bishop of Urgel (in the 8th century), maintained that Christ in his human nature was the son of God by adoption only (Rom. viii, 29), though in his pre-existing state he was the "begotten Son of God" in the ordinary catholic acceptance. Dun Scotus, Durandus, and Calixtus were among the Adoptionists who supported this view, which was condemned by the Council of Frankfort in 794.

Adoptive Emperors. In Roman history, the five Emperors—Nerva, Trajan, Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, and Marcus Aurelius—each of whom (except Nerva, who was elected by the Senate) was the adopted son of his predecessor. Their period (96-180) is said to have been the happiest in the whole history of Rome.

Adoration of the Cross. See Andrew, St.

Arammelech (a drám’ e lek). A Babylonian deity to whom, apparently, infants were burnt in sacrifice (2 Kings xvii, 31). Possibly the sun god worshipped at Sippur (i.e. Sepharvaim).

Arastrus (á drás’ tus). (i) A mythical Greek king of Argos, leader of the expedition of the "Seven Against Thebes" (see under Seven). (ii) In Tasso’s Jerusalem Delivered (Bk. xx), an Indian prince who aided the King of Egypt against the crusaders. He was slain by Rinaldo.

Adriatic. See Bride of the Sea.

Adullamites (á dól’ à mits). The adherents of R. Lowe and E. Horsman, seceders in 1866 from the Reform Party. John Bright said of these members that they retired to the cave of Adullam, and tried to gather round them all the discontented. The allusion is to David, who, in his flight from Saul—Escaped to the cave Adullam; and every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him.

1 Sam. xxii, 1, 2.

Adulterous Bible. See Bible, specially named.

Advancer. In venery this is the name given to the second branch of a buck’s horns.

Advent (Lat. adventus, the coming to). The four weeks immediately preceding Christmas, commemorating the first and second coming of Christ; the first to redeem, and the second to judge the world. The season begins on St. Andrew’s Day (30th Nov.), or the Sunday nearest to it.

Adversary, The. A name frequently given in English literature to the Devil (from 1 Pet. v, 8).

Advocate (Lat. ad, to; vocare, to call). One called to assist pleaders in a court of law.

The Devil’s Advocate. A carping or adverse critic. From the Advocatus diaboli, the person appointed to contest the claims of a candidate for canonization before a papal court. He advances all he can against the candidate, and is opposed by the Advocatus dei (God’s Advocate), who says all he can in support of the proposal.

Advocates’ Library, in Edinburgh, was founded in 1682, by Sir George Mackenzie of Rosehaugh, Dean of the Faculty of Advocates, i.e. the body of members of the Scottish bar. It is one of the libraries to which books must be sent for purposes of copyright (q.v.).

Advowson (Lat. advocatio, a calling to, a summons: cp. ADVOCATE). Originally the obligation to be the advocate of a benefice or living and to defend its rights, the word now means the right of appointing the incumbent of a church or ecclesiastical benefice.

The different advowsons are:—

Advowson appendant. A right of presentation which belongs to and passes with the manor. This usually had its origin in the ownership of the advowson by the person who built or endowed the church.
Jupiter made by Vulcan and covered with the sculptures. Sculptures discovered of the Glyptothek, at Munich. The exploits of Greek heroes at Troy, and probably in the god of the ocean, husband of Ran. They had nine daughters (the egis). The shield of Jupiter made by Vulcan and covered with the skin of the goat Amalthea, who had suckled the infant Zeus. It was sometimes lent to Athena, daughter of Zeus, and when in her possession carried the head of the Gorgon. By the shaking of his aegis Zeus produced storms and thunder; in art it is usually represented as a kind of cloak fringed with serpents; and it is symbolic of divine protection—hence the modern use of the word in such phrases as I throw my aegis over you, I give you my protection.

Aegrotat (égró'tát) (Lat. he is ill). In university parlance, a medical certificate of indisposition to exempt the bearer from sitting examinations.

'A E I', a common motto on jewellery, is Greek, and stands for 'for ever and for aye.'

A. E. I. O. U. The device adopted by Frederick V, Archduke of Austria, on becoming the Emperor Frederick III in 1440. The letters had been used by his predecessor, Albert II, and then stood for—Albertus Electus Imperator Optimus Vivat.

The meaning that Frederick gave them was—Archidux Electus Imperator Optime Vivat.

Many other versions are known, including—Austria Est Imperare Orius Universo. Ailes Eredich Ist Oesterreich Untertan. Austria's Empire Is Overall Universal.

To which was added after the war of 1866—Austria's Empire Is Ousted Utterly.

Frederick the Great is said to have translated the motto thus:—Austria Erit In Orbe Ultima (Austria will be lowest in the world).

Aemilian Law (ém il' i án). A law made by the prætor Aemilicus Mamercus empowering the eldest prætor to drive a nail in the Capitol on the ides of September. This was a ceremony by which the Romans supposed a pestilence could be stopped or a calamity averted.

Aeneas (é né ' ás). The hero of Virgil's epic, son of Anchises, king of Dardanus, and Aphrodite. According to Homer he fought against the Greeks in the Trojan War and after the sack of Troy reigned in the Troad. Later legends tell how he carried his father Anchises on his shoulders from the flames of Troy, and after roaming about for many years, came to Italy, where he founded a colony which the Romans claim as their origin. The epithet applied to him is pius, meaning "dutiful."

Aeneid. The epic poem of Virgil (in twelve books). So called from Aeneas and the suffix -is, plur. ides (belonging to).

The story of Sinon (says Macrobius) and the taking of Troy is borrowed from Pisander. The loves of Dido and Aeneas are taken from those of Medea and Jason, in Apollonius of Rhodes.

The story of the Wooden Horse and burning of Troy is from Arctinus of Miletus.

Æolian Harp (é ó ' li án). The wind harp. A box on which strings are stretched. Being placed where a draught gets to the strings, they utter musical sounds.

Awake, Æolian lyre, awake.

And give to rapture all thy trembling strings.

Gray: Progress of Poetry.

Æolian Mode, in Music, the ninth of the church modes, also called the Hypodorian, the range being from A to A, the dominant F or E, and the mediant E or C. It is characterized as "grand and pompous though sometimes soothing."

Æolian Rocks. A geological term for those rocks the formation and distribution of which has been due more to the agency of wind than to that of water. Most of the New Red Sandstones, and many of the Old Red, are of Æolian origin.
Æolic Digamma (ě ol'ik dí gám ā). The sixth letter of the early Greek alphabet (Ϝ), sounded like our v. Thus òinos with the digamma was sounded woinos; whence the Latin vinum, our wine. Gamma, or γ, was shaped thus Γ, hence digamma = double g; it was early disused as a letter, but was retained as the symbol for the numeral 6. True Æolic was the dialect of Lesbos.

Æolus (ě ó lós), in Roman mythology, was "god of the winds.

Æon (ě’on). (Gr. aion). An age of the universe, an immeasurable length of time; hence the personification of an age, a god, any being that is eternal. Basildes reckons there have been 365 such Æons, or gods; but Valentine restricts the number to 30.

Aerated Waters (ā’ ēr ā tēd). Effervescent waters charged (either artificially or naturally) with carbon dioxide.

Æschylus (ē’sk él lós) (525-456 B.C.), the father of the Greek tragic drama. Titles of seventy-two of his plays are known, but only seven are now extant. Fabius has it that he was killed by a tortoise dropped by an eagle (to break the shell) on his bald head, which the bird mistook for a stone.

Æschylus of France. Prosper Jolyot de Crébillon (1674-1762).

Æsculapius (ē’s kū lā’ pi us). The Latin form of the Greek Asklepios, god of medicine and of healing. Now used for "a medical practitioner." The usual offering to him was a cock, hence the phrase "to sacrifice a cock to Æsculapius"—to return thanks (or pay the doctor's bill) after recovery from an illness.

When a man a dangerous disease did escape,
Of old, they gave a cock to Æsculaple.

Æsir (ē’ zer). The collective name of the celestial gods of Scandinavia, who lived in Asgard (q.v.). (1) Odin, the chief; (2) Thor (his eldest son, god of thunder); (3) Tiu (another son, god of wisdom); (4) Balder (another son, Scandinavian Apollo); (5) Bragi (god of poetry); (6) Vidar (god of silence); (7) Hoder the blind (slayer of Balder); (8) Hermoder (Odin's son and messenger); (9) Hœnir (a minor god); (10) Oðinn (husband of Freyja, the Scandinavien Venus); (11) Loki (the god of mischief); (12) Vali (Odin's youngest son).

Æson's Bath (ě’son). I perceive a man may be twice a child before the days of dotage; and stands in need of Æson's Bath before three score.—Sir Thomas Browne: Religio Medici, Section 42.

The reference is to Medea rejuvenating Æson, father of Jason, with the juices of a concoction made of sundry articles. After Æson had imbibe thses juices, Ovid says:—

Barba comœque,
Canitie posita, nigrum rapuere, colorem. Metamorphoses, vii, 288.

Æsop's Fables (ě sop) are traditionally ascribed to Æsop, a deformed Phrygian slave of the 6th century B.C.; but many of them are far older, some having been discovered on Egyptian papyri of 800 or 1,000 years earlier.

Babirus, probably an Italian, compiled a collection of 137 of the fables in choliambic verse about A.D. 230, and this version was for long used in the medieval schools.

Pilpay (q.v.) has been called the Æsop of India.

Action (ě’ ti ön) in Spenser's Colin Clout's Come Home Again typifies Michael Drayton, the poet.

Aeties (ā ē ti’ tēz) (Gr. aetos, an eagle). Eagle-stones: hollow stones composed of several crusts, having a loose stone within, which were supposed at one time to be found in eagles' nests, to which medicinal virtues were attributed, and which were supposed to have the property of detecting theft. See Pliny x, 4, and xxx, 44; also Lyly's Euphues (1578) —

"The precious stone Aeties which is found in the filthy nests of the eagle.

Æolian Hero, The (ě to’ li an). Diomede, who was king of Ætolia. Ovid.

Afreet, Afrin (āf rét). In Mohammedan mythology the most powerful but one (Marids) of the five classes of Jinn, or devils. They are of gigantic stature, very malicious, and inspire great dread. Solomon, we are told, once tamed an Afreet, and made it submissive to his will.

Africa. Teneo te, Africa. When Cæsar landed at Adrumetum, in Africa, he tripped and fell—a bad omen; but, with wonderful presence of mind, he pretended that he had done so intentionally, and kissing the soil, exclaimed, "Thus do I take possession of thee, O Africa." The story is told also of Scipio, and of Cæsar again at his landing in Britain, and of others in similar circumstances. Africa semper aliquid novi afferit. "Africa is always producing some novelty." A Greek proverb quoted (in Latin) by Pliny, in allusion to the ancient belief that Africa abounded in strange monsters.

African Sisters, The. The Hesperides (q.v.), who lived in Africa.

Afridi (ā fré’ di). A Pathan tribe of the Indo-Afghan frontier against whom the British sent several punitive expeditions in the late 19th century.

After-cast. An obsolete expression for something done too late; literally, a throw of the dice after the game is ended.

Ever he playeth an after-cast
Of all that he shall say or do.

Gower.

After-clap. A catastrophe or misfortune after an affair is supposed to be over, as in thunderstorms one may sometimes hear a "clap" after the rain subsides, and the clouds break.

What plague mischief and mishaps
Do dog him still with after-claps.
Butler: Hudibras, Pt. i, 3.

After-guard. The men whose duty is to tend the gear at the after part of a ship. The expression is also used for the officers, who have their quarters aft.
After me the deluge. See Après moi le deluge.

After meal. An extra meal; a meal taken after and in addition to the ordinary meals.

At all-meals who shall pay for the wine? THYNNE: Debate (c. 1608).

Agag (ā' gāg). in Dryden’s Absalom and Achitophel, is Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, the magistrate before whom Titus Oates made his declaration, and who was afterwards found barbarously murdered in a ditch near Primrose Hill. Agag was hewed to pieces by Samuel. And Corah (Titus Oates) might for Agag’s murder call

In terms as coarse as Samuel used to Saul, I, 675-6.

The name is usually associated with the Biblical phrase, “And Agag came to him [Samuel] delicately” (1 Sam. xv, 32).

Agamemnon (āg' ā mem' non). In Greek legend, the King of Mycenæ, son of Atreus, and leader of the Greeks at the siege of Troy.

Goodly Agamemnon . . .

The glory of the stock of Tantalus,
And famous light of all the Greekish hosts,
Under whose conduct most victorious,
The Dorick flames consumed the Ilack posts.

SPENSER: Virgil’s Gnat.

His brother was Menelaos.
His daughters were Iphigenia, Electra, Iphianassa, and Chrysothemis (Sophocles).

He was grandson of Pelops.

He was killed in a bath by his wife Clytemnestra, after his return from Troy.

His son was Orestes, who slew his mother for murdering his father, and was called Agamemnonides.

His wife was Clytemnestra, who lived in adultery with Egistheus. At Troy he fell in love with Cassandra, a daughter of King Priam.

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona, a quotation from Horace (Od. IV, ix), paraphrased by Byron in Don Juan (I, v): Brave men were living before Agamemnon

And since, exceeding valorous and sage,

A good deal like him too, though quite the same none;

But then they shone not on the poet’s page,

And so have been forgotten.

Aganippe (āg’ a nip’ i). In Greek legend a fountain of Breotia at the foot of Mount Helicon, dedicated to the Muses, because it had the virtue of imparting poetic inspiration. From this fountain the Muses are sometimes called Aganippides.

Agape (āg’ ā pij). A love-feast (Gr. agapē, love). The early Christians held a love-feast before or after communion when contributions were made for the poor. In course of time they became a scandal, and were condemned at the Council of Carthage, 397. The name is also given by Spenser to the fairy mother of Priamond, Diamond, Triamond, and Cambina (Faerie Queene, IV, ii, 41 ff).

Agapemone (āg’ ā pem’ ō ni). An association of men and women followers of Henry James Prince (1811-1890), who founded a sect in the 60s of last century, holding the theory that the time of prayer was past and the time of grace come. They lived on a common fund at an Agapemone, or Abode of Love, at Spaxton, Somersetshire, and were constantly in trouble with the authorities. In the early years of the present century the “Agapemones” again attracted attention by the claims of one Smyth Piggott to be Christ.

Agapetē (āg’ ā pé’ té) (Gr. beloved). A group of 3rd-century ascetic women who, under vows of virginity, contracted spiritual marriage with the monks and attended to their wants. Owing to the scandals occasioned the custom was condemned by St. Jerome and suppressed by various Councils.

Agate (āg’ āt). So called, says Pliny (xxxvii, 10), from Achates or Gagates, a river in Sicily, near which it is found in abundance.

These, these are they, if we consider well,
That saphirs and the diamonds doe excell,
The pearle, the emerald, and the turkesse bleu,
The sanguine corall, amber’s golden hiew,
The chrustall, jacinth, achater, ruby red.

TAYLOR: The Waterspout (1630).

Agate is supposed to render a person invisible, and to turn the sword of foes against themselves.

A very small person has been called an agate, from the old custom of carving the stone with diminutive figures for use as seals. Shakespeare speaks of Queen Mab as no bigger than an agate-stone on the forefinger of an alderman.

I was never manned with an agate till now.

SHAKESPEARE: 2 Henry IV, i, 2.

For the same reason the very small type between nonpareil and pearl, known in England as “ruby,” was called agate in America.

Agatha, St. (āg’ ā thā), was tortured and martyred at Catania, in Sicily, during the Decian persecution of 251. She is sometimes represented in art with a pair of shears or pincers, and holding a salver on which are her breasts, these having been cut off. Her feast day is 5 February.

Agave (āg’ ā vi), named from Agave, daughter of Cadmus (q.v.), or “American aloe,” a Mexican plant, naturalized in many parts of Europe, and fabled by English gardeners to bloom only once in a hundred years. It was introduced into Spain in 1561, and is used in Mexico, Switzerland, Italy, and elsewhere for fences. The Mohammedans of Egypt regard it as a charm and religious symbol; and pilgrims to Mecca hang a leaf of it over their door as a sign of their pilgrimage and as a charm against evil spirits.

Agdistes (āg’ dis’ tēz). The name is that of a Phrygian deity connected with the symbolic worship of the powers of Nature and by some identified with Cybele. He was hermaphrodite, and sprang from the stone Agdus, parts of which were taken by Deucalion and Pyrrha to cast over their shoulders for repeopling the world after the flood.

Age. A word used of a long but more or less indefinite period of history, human and pre-human, distinguished by certain real or mythical characteristics and usually named from these characteristics or from persons connected with them, as the Golden Age (q.v.), the Middle Ages, the Dark Ages (q.v.), the Age of the Antonines (from Antoninus Pius. 138, to Marcus Aurelius, 180), the Prehistoric Age, etc. Thus, Hallam calls the 9th century the Age of the Bishops, and the 12th, the Age of the Pope.

Varro (fragments. p. 219, Scaliger's edition, 1623) recognizes three ages: From the beginning of mankind to the Deluge, a time wholly unknown. From the Deluge to the First Olympiad, called the mythical period. From the first Olympiad to the present time, called the historic period.

Shakespeare's passage on the seven ages of man (As You Like It, ii, 7) is well known: and Titian symbolized the three ages of man thus: An infant in a cradle. A shepherd playing a flute. An old man meditating on two skulls.

According to Lucretius also there are three ages, distinguished by the materials employed in implements (v. 1282), viz.: The age of stone, when celts or implements of stone were employed. The age of bronze, when implements were made of copper or brass. The age of iron, when implements were made of iron, as at present.

The term Stone Age as now used includes the Eolithic, Palaeolithic, and Neolithic Ages (q.v.).

Hesiod names five ages, viz.: The Golden or patriarchal, under the care of Saturn. The Silver or voluptuous, under the care of Jupiter. The Bronze or warlike, under the care of Neptune. The Heroic or renaissance, under the care of Mars. The Iron or present, under the care of Pluto.

Age of Animals. An old Celtic rhyme, put into modern English, says:
Thrice the age of a dog is that of a horse; Thrice the age of a horse is that of a man; Thrice the age of a man is that of a deer; Thrice the age of a deer is that of an eagle.

Age of Consent. This is the age at which a girl's consent is valid: beneath that age to have carnal knowledge of her is a criminal offence. In English and Scottish law the age of consent is 16.

Age of Discretion. In English law a subject is deemed capable of using his discretion at the age of 14.

Canonical Age. Ecclesiastical law enjoins that the obligation of fasting begins at the age of 21; profession of religious vows after the age of 16; a bishop must have completed his 30th year.

Age hoc (a' je hok). "Attend to this." In sacrifice the Roman crier perpetually repeated these words to arouse attention. In the Common Prayer Book the attention of the congregation is frequently aroused by the exhortation, "Let us pray," though nearly the whole service is that of prayer.

Agelasta (ā jē lās' tā) (Gr. joyless). The stone on which Ceres rested when worn down by fatigue in searching for her daughter, Persephone.

Agenor (ā jēn' or). A son of Neptune, and founder of a nation in Phoenicia. His descendants, Cadmus, Perseus, Europa, etc., are known as the Agenorides.

Agent. Is man a free agent? This is a question of theology, which has long been mooted. The point is this: If God foreordains all our actions, they must take place as he foreordains them, and man acts as a watch or clock: but if, on the other hand, man is responsible for his actions, he must be free to act as his inclination leads him. Those who hold the former view are called necessitarians; those who hold the latter, libertarians.

Aggie Westons, Aggies. The Royal Sailors' Rest Homes in Portsmouth, Devonport, and Chatham, founded by Dame Agnes E. Weston (1840-1918).

Agglutinate Language. A language the chief characteristic of which is that its words are simple or root words combined into compounds, without loss of original meaning. Thus, inkstand and comeatble are agglutinate words. Agglutination is a feature of most Turanian languages: it implies that the root words are glued together to form other words, and may be "unglued" so as to leave the roots distinct.

Agio (a' jō) (Ital. ease, convenience). A commercial term denoting the percentage of charge made for the exchange of paper money into cash.

Agis (ā' jis). King of Sparta (338-330 b.c.). He tried to deliver Greece from the Macedonian yoke and was slain in the attempt.

The generous victim to that vain attempt To save a rotten state—Agis, who saw Even Sparta's self to servile avarice sink.

Agist (ā jist'). To take in cattle to graze at a certain sum. The pasturage of these beasts is called agistment. The words are from the French agister (to lie down).

Aglia (ā glī' ā). One of the three Graces (see Graces).

Aglonia (āg là ō'nī sí), the Thessalian, being able to calculate eclipses, pretended to have the moon under her command, and to be able when she chose to draw it from heaven. Her secret being found out, her vaunting became a laughing-stock, and gave birth to the Greek proverb cast at braggarts, "Yes, as the Moon obeys Aglonia."

Agnes. A sort of female "Verdant Green" (q.v.), who is so unsophisticated that she does not even know what love means: from a character in Molière's L'Ecole des Femmes.

Agnes, St., was martyred in the Diocletian persecution (about 303) at the age of 13. She was tied to a stake, but the fire went out, and Aspasius, set to watch the martyrdom, drew his sword, and cut off her head. St. Agnes is the patron of young virgins. She is commemorated on January 21st. Upon St. Agnes' night, says Aubrey in his Miscellany, though he should have said St. Agnes' Eve, you take a row of pins, and pull out every one, one after another. Saying a paternoster, stick a pin in your sleeve, and you will dream of him or her you shall marry; and in Keats's The Eve of St. Agnes, we are told—how, upon St. Agnes' Eve, Young Agnes might have visions of delight, And soft adorings from their loves receive Upon the honey'd middle of the night, If ceremonies due they did avert; As, supperless to bed they must retire.

Agnostic (ā'gī nō'lit; Gr. a, not; gignoskein, to know). (1) Certain heretics in the 4th century who maintained that God had no certain knowledge of the future. God did not know everything.

(2) Another sect, in the 6th century, who maintained that Christ did not know the time of the day of judgment.

Agog (ā'gōg). He is all agog, in nervous anxiety, on the qui vive. The word is connected with the Old French phrase en gogues, meaning "in mirth": the origin of O.F. gogue and Norman gouger, to be mirthful, is unknown.

Agnostices (a gon'is'tēz). This word in Samson Agonistes (the title of Milton's drama) is Greek for "champion," so the title means simply "Samson the Champion." Cp. AGONY.

Agnostics (a gon'is'tiks). A fanatical sect of peripatetic ascetics, adherents to the Donatist schismatics of the early 4th century. They gave themselves this name (meaning "Champions," or "Soldiers," of the Cross); the Catholics called them the Circumcelliones, from their wandering about among the houses of the peasants (circum cellas).

Agony, meaning great pain or anguish, is derived through French from the Greek word agonia, from agon, which meant first "an assembly," then "an arena for contests," and hence the "contest" itself; so agonia, meaning first a struggle for mastery in the games, came to be used for any struggle, and hence for mental struggle or anguish.

Agony column. A column in a newspaper containing advertisements of missing relatives and friends.

Agrarian Law (ā grâr'ī ān) (Lat. ager, land). In Roman history, a law regulating landed property or the division of conquered territory; hence, a law for making land the common property of a nation, and not the particular property of individuals. In a modified form, a redistribution of land, giving to each citizen a portion.

Ague, from Lat. acuta, sharp, is really an adjective, as in French fièvre aiguë. English folklore gives a number of curious charms for curing ague, and there was an old superstition that if the fourth book of the Iliad was laid under the head of a patient it would cure him at once. This book tells how Pandarus wounds Menelaus, and contains the cure of Menelaus by Machaon, "a son of Asclepius."

Aguecheek. Sir Andrew Aguecheek, a straight-haired country squire, stupid even to silliness, self-conceited, living to eat, and wholly unacquainted with the world of fashion. The character is in Shakespeare's Twelfth Night.

Agur's Wish (ā'gørz) (Prov. xxx, 8). "Give me neither poverty nor riches."

Ahasuerus (ā hâz'ûr'ē ās). Under this name the Emperor Xerxes (486-465 B.C.) appears in the biblical books of Ezra and Esther. The Ahasuerus of Daniel has not been identified. This is also the name given to the Wandering Jew (q.v.).

Ahithophel (a hîth'ō fel). A treacherous friend and adviser. Ahithophel was David's counsellor, but joined Absalom in revolt, and advised him "like the oracle of God" (2 Sam. xvi, 20-23). See ACHITOPHEL.

Ahmed, Prince (a'med), in the Arabian Nights, is noted for the tent given him by the fairy Paribanou, which would cover a whole army, but might be carried in one's pocket; and for the apple of Samarcand, which would cure all diseases. The qualities ascribed to the magic tent are the common property of many legends and romances.* See CARPET; and SKIDDI BLADNIR.*

Aholah and Abolihah (ā hô'la, a hô lî' bâ) [Ezek. xxiii, 12-16]. Personifications of prostitution. Used by the prophet to signify religious adultery or running after false faiths. These Hebrew names signify "she in whom are tents," and have reference to the worship at the high places.

Ahriman (a'ri màn). In the dual system of Zoroaster, the spiritual enemy of mankind, also called Angra Mainyu, and Druj (deceit). He has existed since the beginning of the world, and is in eternal conflict with Ahura Mazda, orOrmuzd (q.v.).

Their evil principle, the demon Ahriman, might be represented as the rival or as the creature of The God of Light. GIBBON: Decline and Fall, ch. li.

Ahura Mazda. See ORMUZD.
Aide toi ... 18 Aladdin

Aide toi et le Ciel t’aida (àd twa à lè sé él tâ dé ra’). A line from La Fontaine (vi, 18), meaning “God will help those who help themselves,” taken as the motto of a French political society, established in 1824. The society intended to induce the middle classes to resist the Government; it aided in bringing about the Revolution of 1830, and was dissolved in 1832. Guizot was at one time its president, and Le Globe and Le National its organs.

Aigrette (á’ gret). French for the Egret, or Lesser White Heron, the beautiful crest of which has been worn as a hat decoration, as a tuft for military helmets, etc. The French call any jewelled or feathery head-ornament an aigrette.

Aim, to give. A term in archery, meaning to give the archers information how near their arrows fall to the mark aimed at; hence, to give anybody inside information.

But, gentle people, give me aim awhile, For nature puts me to a heavy task.

The plural is essential in this case; air, in the singular conveys censure.

Aim-crier. An abettor, one who encourages. To applaud, encourage. Jn archery it was customary to appoint certain persons to cry “Aim!” for the sake of encouraging those who were about to shoot.

All my neighbours shall cry aim.

Air. Held by Anaxagoras to be the primary form of matter, and given by Aristotle as one of the four elements. See ELEMENT.

The air of the court, the air of gentility: a good air (manner, deportment) means the pervading habit; hence, to give oneself airs—to assume in manner, appearance, and tone, a superiority to which one has no claim.

The plural is essential in this case; air, in the singular is generally complimentary, but in the plural conveys censure. In Italian, we find the phrase, Si da delle arie.

Air (in music) is that melody which pervades a piece.

Hot air. See Hot.

To air one’s opinion. To state opinions openly, to give air to one’s opinions.

Air-brained. A mis-spelling of hare-brained (q.v.).

Air-line. A direct line, taken—as a crow flies—through the air. Cp. BEE-LINE.

Airship. Formerly an epithet applied to any kind of balloon, but now restricted to a large aerial vehicle, depending for flotation upon gases contained in a balloon or in a series of enclosed ballonets, and, instead of being at the mercy of the winds, capable of being driven along and steered by mechanical means.

Aisle. The north and south wings of a church, from the Lat., ala (axilla, ascella), through the French, aile, a wing. The intrusive “s” did not take root till the middle of the 18th century, and is probably due to a confusion with “isle.” In some church documents the aisles are called alleys (walks); the choir of Lincoln Cathedral used to be called the “Chanters’ alley”; and Olden tells us that when he was the churchwarden, in 1638, he made the Puritans “come up the middle alley on their knees to the rail.”

Aitch-bone. Corruption of “natch-bone,” i.e. the haunch-bone (Lat. nates, a haunch or buttock). For other instances of the coalescence of the “n” of “an” with an initial vowel (or the coalescence of the “n” with the article), see APRON: NEWT.

Ajax (á jaks). (1) The Greater. The most famous hero of the Trojan War after Achilles; king of Salamis, a man of giant stature, daring, and self-confident, son of Telamon. When the armour of Hector was awarded to Ulysses instead of to himself, he turned mad from vexation and stabbed himself.—Homer and later poets.

(2) The Less. Son of Oileus, King of Locris, in Greece. The night Troy was taken, he offered violence to Cassandra, the prophetic daughter of Priam; in consequence of which his ship was driven on a rock, and he perished at sea.—Homer and later poets.

Akbar (ák’ bar). An Arabic title, meaning “Very Great.” Akbar Khan, the “very great Khan,” is applied especially to the great Mogul emperor in India who reigned 1556-1605. His tomb at Secundra, a few miles from Agra, is one of the wonders of the East.

Alabama (á là’ ba’ má). The name of this state of the U.S.A. is the Indian name of a river in the state, the meaning of which is “here we rest.”

Alabama claims were made by the U.S.A. against Great Britain for losses caused during the Civil War by Confederate vessels—the chief being the Alabama—fitted out in or supplied from British ports. The matter was referred to an international tribunal which, in 1871, awarded the U.S.A. $15,500,000.

Alabaster. A stone of great purity and whiteness, used for ornaments. The name is said by Pliny (Nat. Hist., xxxvi, 8) to be from an Egyptian town, Alabastron; but nothing is known of this town, nor of the ultimate origin of the Greek word.

Aladdin, (á lad’ in) in the Arabian Nights, obtains a magic lamp, and has a splendid palace built by the genie of the lamp. He marries the daughter of the sultan of China, loses his lamp, and his palace is transported to Africa.

Aladdin’s lamp. The source of wealth and good fortune. After Aladdin came to his wealth and was married, he suffered his lamp to hang up and get rusty.

Aladdin’s ring, given him by the African magician, was a “preservative against every evil.”

To finish Aladdin’s window—i.e. to attempt to complete something begun by a great genius, but left imperfect. The palace built by the genie of the lamp had twenty-four windows, all but one being set in frames of precious stones: the last was left for the sultan to finish; but after exhausting his treasures, the sultan was obliged to abandon the task as hopeless.

Alamo (al'â’mô). American cottonwood tree. In 1718 Franciscan monks founded the Mission of San Antonio de Valero at San Antonio, Texas. It was commonly called the Alamo Mission since it stood in a grove of cottonwood trees. By 1793 it was no longer a mission but the buildings were sometimes used as a fort. In 1806 a Texan garrison of 180 was besieged, overpowered and slaughtered by 4000 Mexicans under Santa Anna. In the subsequent campaign in which the Texans, under Sam Houston, defeated the Mexicans by 4000, the buildings are now a National Monument.

Alans. Large dogs, of various species, used for hunting. They were introduced to Britain from Spain, whether they are said to have been brought by the Alani, a Caucasian tribe which invaded Western Europe in the 4th century. They were used in war as well as for hunting, and Chaucer, in his Knight's Tale, describes Lycurgus on his throne, guarded by white "alantus, twenty or mo, as grete as any steer," wearing muzzles and golden collars. Scott, in the Talisman (ch. vi), speaks of three—

Skins of animals slain in the chase were stretched on the ground . . . and upon a heap of these lay three alans, as they were called, i.e. wolf greyhounds of the largest size.

Al Araf (al a'-raf) (Arab. the partition, from arofa, to divide). A region, according to the Koran, between Paradise and Jahannam (hell), for those who are neither morally good nor bad, such as infants, lunatics, and idiots. Others regard it as a place where those whose good and evil deeds were about equally balanced can await their ultimate admission to heaven, a kind of "limbo" (q.v.).

Alarum Bell. "Alarum" is a variant of "alarm," produced by rolling the "r" in prolonging the final syllable. In feudal times a "larum bell was rung in the castle in times of danger to summon the retainers to arms.

Awake! awake!
Ring the alarum bell! Murder and treason!
SHAKESPEARE: Macbeth, ii, 3.

The word is now used only (except sometimes in poetry) for the peal or chime of a warning bell or clock, or the mechanism producing it.

Alasnam (a las' nâm). In the Arabian Nights Alasnam had eight diamond statues, but was required to find a ninth more precious still, to be deposited. The prize was found in the woman who became his wife, at once the most beautiful and the most perfect of her race.

Alasnam's mirror. The "touchstone of virtue," given to Alasnam by one of the Genii, if he looked in this mirror and it remained unsullied so would the maiden he had in mind; if it clouded, she would prove faithless.

Alastor (al'star). The evil genius of a house; a Nemesis. Cicero says: "Who meditated killing himself that he might become the Alastor of Augustus, whom he hated?, Shelley has a poem entitled Alastor, or The Spirit of Solitude. The word is Greek (alastor, the avenging god, a title applied to Zeus); the Romans had their Jupiter Vindex; and we read in the Bible, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord" (Rom. xii, 19).

Alauda. A Roman legion raised by Julius Cesar in Gaul, and so called because they carried a lark's tuft on the top of their helmets.

Alawy (a la' wi). The Nile is so called by the Abyssinians. The word means "the giant."

Alb (alb) (Lat. albus, white). A long white vestment worn by priests under the chasuble and over the cassock when saying Mass. It is emblematical of purity and continence.

Alban, St. (ol' ban), like St. Denis and many other saints, is sometimes represented as carrying his head in his hands. His attributes are a sword and a crown.

Albania. An ancient name applied to the northern part of Scotland, called by the Romans "Caledonia," and inhabited by the Picts. From Celtic alp or alpe, a rock or cliff. The name Albany survives in Breadalbane, the hilly country of Alba'n, i.e. western Perthshire.

In Spenser's Faerie Queene (II, x, 14, etc.) northern Britain is called Albion.

Albany, Albainn, or Albin. An ancient name applied to the Romans in building; a volcanic tufa quarried at Monte Albano.

Albany Stone or Peperino, used by the Romans in building; a volcanic tufa quarried at Monte Albano.

Albatross. The largest of web-footed birds, called by sailors the Cape Sheep, from its frequenting the Cape of Good Hope. Many fables are told of the albatross; it is said to sleep in the air, because its flight is a gliding without any apparent motion of its long wings, and sailors say that it is fatal to shoot one.

See also ANCIENT MARINER.

Alberich. The all-powerful king of the dwarfs in Scandinavian mythology. In Wagner's version of the Nibelungenlied he appears as a hideous gnome and steals the magic gold (Das Rheingold) guarded by the Rhine Maidens. Later he is captured by the gods, and is forced to give up all he has in return for his freedom.
Albert, An. A watch chain across the waistcoat from one pocket to another or to a buttonhole. So called from Albert, Prince Consort. When he went to Birmingham, in 1849, he was presented by the jewellers of the town with such a chain, and the fashion took the public fancy.

Albigenses (al bī jen' sēs). A common name for a number of anti-sacerdotal sects in southern France during the 13th century: so for a number of anti-sacerdotal sects in the public fancy.

Albino (al' bī nō) (Lat. albus, white). A term originally applied by the Portuguese to those Negroes who were mottled with white spots; but now to persons who, owing to the congenital absence of colouring pigment, are born with red eyes and white hair and skin. The term is also applied to beasts and plants, and even, occasionally, in a purely figurative way: thus, Oliver Wendell Holmes, in the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table (ch. viii.), speaks of Kirke White as one of the "sweet Albino poets," whose "plaintive song" he admires; apparently implying some deficiency of virility, and possibly playing upon the name.

Albion. An ancient and poetical name for Great Britain: probably from the white (Lat. albus) cliffs that face Gaul, but possibly from the Celtic al, aip (see Albany), a rock, cliff, mountain. "Albion" or "Albany" may have been the Celtic name of all Great Britain, but was subsequently restricted to Scotland, and then to the Highlands of Scotland.

Legend gives various origins for the name. One derivation is from a giant son of Neptune, named Albion, who discovered the country and ruled over it for forty-four years. According to another story the fifty daughters of the king of Syria, the eldest of whom was named Albia, were all married on the same day and all murdered their husbands on the wedding-night. As punishment they were packed into a ship and set adrift, eventually reaching this western isle where they went ashore and duly married natives, "a lawless crew of devils."

In Polyhloid Michael Drayton says that Albion came from Rome and was the first Christian martyr in Britain. Though the phrase Per filde Albion is attributed to Napoleon, the sentiment is much older, for Bossuet (1627-1704) wrote, "L'Angleterre, ah! la perfide Angleterre."

Al Borak. See Borak.

Albion. A blank book for photographs, stamps, autographs, miscellaneous jottings, scraps, and so on. The Romans applied the word to certain tables overlaid with gypsum, on which were inscribed the annals of the chief priests, the edicts of the praetors, and rules relating to civil matters. In the Middle Ages, "album" was the general name of a register or list; so called from being kept either on a white (albus) board with black letters, or on a black board with white letters.

Alcaic Verse (al' kā' Ŭk) or Alcaics. A Greek lyrical metre, so called from Alcaeus, a lyric poet, who is said to have invented it. Alcaic measure is little more than a curiosity in English poetry; probably the best example is Tennyson's:

O migh to by-mouthed in vor of harmonies,
O skill'd to sing of Time or E 'ternity.

God-gift or ed or gun-voice of Eng. land.

Milton, a name to re sound for ages.

Alcantara, Order of (al kān' tā rá). A military and religious order instituted in 1213 (on the foundation of the earlier order of San Juan del Pereyro, which had been created about 1155 to fight the Moors) by Alfonso IX, King of Castile, to commemorate the taking of Alcantara from the Moors. In 1835 the Order, which had been under the Benedictine rule, ceased to exist as a religious body, but it remained as a civil and military order under the Crown.

Aleeste (al' sēst). The hero of Mollière's Misanthrope. He is not unlike Shakespeare's character of Timon, and was taken by Wycherley for the model of his Manly (q.v.).

Alchemilla (al' kē mil' ā). A genus of plants of the rose family; so called because alchemists collected the dew of its leaves for their operations. Also called "Lady's Mantle," from the Virgin Mary, to whom the plant was dedicated.

Alchemy (al' kē mi). The derivation of this word is obscure: the al is the Arabic article, the, and kimia the Arabic form of Greek chemeia, which seems to have meant Egyptian art; hence "the art of the Egyptians." Its main objects were the transmutation of baser metals into gold, the universal solvent (alkahest, q.v.), the panacea (q.v.), and the elixir of life.

Alcimedon (al sim' ē don). A generic name for a first-rate carver in wood.

Alcina (al' sē' nā). The personification of carnal pleasure in Orlando Furioso; the Circe of fable.

Alcinoo poma dare (al' sin' ō pō' mā da' re) to give apples to Alcinous. To carry coals to Newcastle. The gardens of Alcinous, the legendary king of the Phaeacians on the island of Scheria, by whom Odysseus was entertained, were famous for their fruits. Thus, Milton speaks of Eden as a spot more delicious than those gardens reigned or of revived Adonis, or renowned.

Alcinous, host of old Laertes' son.

Alcmena (āl' kē mē' nā). In Greek mythology, daughter of Electryon, king of Mycænaæ, wife of Amphitryon, and mother (by Zeus) of Hercules. The legend is that at the conception of Hercules Zeus, for additional pleasure with Alcmena, made the night the length of three ordinary nights.
Alcofribas Nasier (äl ko’fre bás nä’seyr). The anagrammatic pseudonym of François Rabelais, adopted as the name of the author of his first two books, Gargantua and Pantagruel.

Alcuin, a place mentioned by the Venerable Bede, now Dumbarton.

Aldelbaran (äl deb’ə rān) (Arab. al, the, dawrān, the follower, because its rising follows that of the Pleiades). A red star of the first magnitude, α Tauri, one of the brightest in the heavens. It forms the bull’s eye in the constellation Taurus.

Alderman. A senior or elder: now applied to certain magistrates in corporate towns. In the City of London aldermen were first appointed by a charter of Henry III in 1242; there are 25 (or, counting the Lord Mayor, or chief magistrate, 26), and they are elected for life, one for each ward. Of the larger cities of England: Birmingham has 34 aldermen; Leeds, 39; Manchester, 36; Sheffield, 25; Leeds, 26; and Bristol, 28.

Aldgate Pump, a draught on. A worthless cheque or bill. The pun is on the word draught, which may mean either an order on a bank or a sup of liquor.

Aldiborontephoschophornio (al’ dibor’ ón tē pōs’ kok’ fō ni’ō). A courtier in Henry Carey’s burlesque, Chronikonthologos (1734).

Aldine Editions. Editions of the Greek and Latin classics, published and printed under the superintendence of Aldo Manuzio, his father-in-law Andrea of Asolo, and his son Paolo, from 1490 to 1597: most of them are in small octavo, and all are noted for their accuracy. The father invented the type called italics, once called Aldine, and first used in printing Virgil, 1501.

Ale is the Anglo-Saxon ealu, connected with the Scandinavian al, and Lithuanian alus. Beer is the Anglo-Saxon beer (M.E., béer), connected with the German bier and Icelandic björr. A beverage made from barley is mentioned by Tacitus and even Herodotus. Hops were introduced from Holland and used for brewing about 1524, but their use was prohibited by Act of Parliament in 1528—a prohibition which soon fell into disuse. Ale is made from pale malt, whence its light colour; porter and stout from malt more highly dried. The word beer is of general application; and in many parts of England it includes ale, porter, and stout. In some parts ale is used for the stronger malt liquors and beer for the weaker, while in others the terms are reversed. Called ale among men: but by the gods called beer

The Aisismål (10th-cent. Scandinavian poem).

Alec, a corruption of ale-bree to be made for her, and put into it powder of camphor. —The Pathway to Health.

Ale-dagger. A dagger used in self-defence in alehouse brawls.

He that drinks with cutters must not be without his ale-dagger.—Pope with a Hatchet (1589).

Ale-draper. The keeper of an ale-house. Ale-drapery, the selling of ale, etc.

No other occupation have I but to be an ale-draper.—CHETTLE: Kind-harts Dreame (1592).

Ale-knight. A tippler, a sot.

Ale-silver. Formerly, the annual fee paid to the Lord Mayor for the privilege of selling ale within the City of London.

Ale-stake. The pole set up before alehouses by way of sign, often surmounted by a bush or garland. Thus, Chaucer says of the Somnour:

A garland had he set upon his head
As great as it were for an ale-stake.

Cant. Tales, Prolog., 666.

Ale-wife. The landlady of an alehouse. In America a fish of the herring kind, only rather larger, is known as the ale-wife. Some think it is a corruption of a North American Indian name, alofe, and some of the French alose, a shad.

Aleuto (a lek’to). In classical mythology, one of the three Furies (q.v.); her head was covered with snakes.

Then like Aleuto, terrible to view,
Or like Medusa, the Circassian grew.

HOGG: Jerusalem Delivered, Bk. vi.

Alectorian Stone (a lek tōr’ i an) (Gr. alector, a cock). A stone, famed to be of talismanic power, found in the stomach of a cock. Those who possess it are strong, brave, and wealthy. Milo of Crotona owed his strength to this talisman. As a Philtre it has the power of preventing thirst or of assuaging it.

Alectryomancy (a lek trē ō mān’ si). Divination by a cock. Draw a circle, and write in succession round it the letters of the alphabet, on each of which lay a grain of corn. Then put a cock in the centre of the circle, and watch what grains he eats. The letters will prognosticate the answer. Libanus and Jamblicus thus discovered who was to succeed the emperor Valens. The cock ate the grains over the letters t, h, e, o, d=Theod[orus].

Alexander and the Robber. The story is that the pirate Diomedes, having been captured and brought before Alexander, was asked how he dared to molest the seas. "Because I am the master only of a single galley I am termed a robber; but you who oppress the world with huge squadrons are called a king." Alexander was so struck by this reasoning that he made Diomedes rich, a prince, and a dispenser of justice. See the Gesta Romanorum, cxli.

You are thinking of Parmenio and I of Alexander—i.e. you are thinking of what you ought to receive, and I what I ought to give; you are thinking of those castigated or rewarded, but I of my position, and what reward is consistent with my rank. The allusion is to the tale that Alexander said to Parmenio, "I consider not what Parmenio should receive, but what Alexander should give."

Only two Alexanders. Alexander said, "There are but two Alexanders—the invincible son of Philip, and the inimitable painting of the hero by Apelles."
The continence of Alexander. Having gained the battle of Issus (333 B.C.) the family of Darius III fell into his hand; but he treated the women with the greatest decorum. A eunuch, having escaped, reported this to Darius, and the king could not but admire such nobility in a rival. See CONTINENCE.

Alexander. So Paris, son of Priam, was called by the shepherds who brought him up.

Alexander of the North. Charles XII of Sweden (1682-1718), so called from his military achievements. He was conquered at Pultowa (1709), by Peter the Great.

Repressing here

The frantic Alexander of the North.

THOMSON: Winter.

Alexander the Corrector. The self-assumed nickname of Alexander Cruden (1701-1770), compiler of the Concordance of the Bible. After being, on more than one occasion, confined in a lunatic asylum he became a reader for the Press, and later developed a mania for going about constantly with a sponge to wipe out the licentious, coarse, and profane chalk scrawls which met his eye.

Alexander's beard. A smooth chin, no beard at all. An Amazonian chin (q.v.).

I like this trusty glasse of Steele...

Wherein I see a Sampson's grim regard:

Disgraced yet with Alexander's beard.

GASCONE: The Steele Glas.

Alexandra Day. To celebrate the fiftieth year of her residence in England, Queen Alexandra (1844-1925) inaugurated a fund for the assistance of hospitals, convalescent homes, etc., to be raised by the sale of artificial wild roses made by the blind and cripples. On a day in June these are sold in the streets, the buyers wearing the roses as a sign of having contributed to the fund.

Alexandria limp. In the 60s of last century Queen Alexandra (then Princess of Wales) had a slight accident which for a time caused her to walk with an almost imperceptible limp. In a spirit of servile imitation many of the women about the court adopted this method of walking, which hence became known as the "Alexandra limp."

Alexandrian. Anything from the East was so called by the old chroniclers and romancers, because Alexandria was the depot from which Eastern stores reached Europe.

Reclined on Alexandrian carpets (i.e. Persian).

Rosi: Orlando Furioso, x, 37.

Alexandrian Codex. A Greek MS. of the Scriptures written (probably in the 5th century) in uncial on parchment, which is supposed to have originated at Alexandria. In 1628 it was presented to Charles I by Cyril Sual, patriarch of Constantinople, and in 1753 was placed in the British Museum. It contains the Septuagint version (except portions of the Psalms), a part of the New Testament, and the Epistles of Clemens Romanus.

Alexandrian Library. Founded by Ptolemy Soter, in Alexandria, in Egypt. The tale is that it was burnt and partly consumed in 391; but when the city fell into the hands of the calif Omar, in 642, the Arabs found books sufficient to "heat the baths of the city for six months." It is said that it contained 700,000 volumes, and the reason given by the Mohammedan destroyer for the destruction of the library was that the books were unnecessary in any case, for all knowledge that was necessary to man was contained in the Koran, and that any knowledge contained in the library that was not in the Koran must be pernicious.

Alexandrian School. An academy of learning founded about 310 B.C. by Ptolemy Soter, son of Lagus, and Demetrius of Phaleron, especially famous for its grammarians and mathematicians. Of the former the most noted are Aristarchus (c. 220-145 B.C.), Eratosthenes (c. 275-195 B.C.), and Harpocrates (A.D. 2nd century); and of its mathematicians, Claudiu Ptolemaeus (A.D. 2nd century) and Euclid (c. 300 B.C.), the former an astronomer, and the latter the geometer whose Elements were once very generally used in schools and colleges.

Alexandrine. In prosody, an iambic or trochaic line of twelve syllables or six feet with, usually, a cesura (break) at the sixth syllable. So called either from the 12th-century French metrical romance, Alexander the Great (commenced by Lambert-li-Cort and continued by Alexandre de Bernay), or from the old Castilian verse chronicle, Poema de Alexandre Magnus, both of which are written in this metre. The final line of the Spenserian stanza is an Alexandrine.

A needless Alexandrine ends the song.

Which, like a wounded snake,—drags its slow length along.

POPE: Essay on Criticism, ii, 356.

Alexandrine Age. From about A.D. 323 to 640, when Alexandria, in Egypt, was the centre of science, philosophy, and literature.

Alexandrine Philosophy. A system of philosophy which flourished at Alexandria in the early centuries of the Christian era, characterized by its attempt to combine Christianity and Greek philosophy. It gave rise to Gnosticism and Neoplatonism.

Alexandrite. A variety of chrysoberyl found in the mica-slate of the Urals. So named from Alexander II of Russia, on whose birthday it was discovered. The stone is green by natural and red by artificial light.

Alexis, St. Patron saint of hermits and beggars. The story goes that he lived on his father's estate as a hermit till death, but was never recognized. It is given at length in the Gesta Romanorum (Tale xv). His feast day is July 17th. He is represented in art with a pilgrim's habit and staff. Sometimes he is drawn as if extended on a mat, with a letter in his hand, dying.

Alfadir (al′fa der) (father of all). In Scandinavian mythology, one of the epithets of Odin (q.v.).

Alfana. See HORSE.

Alfonsin, Alfonsine Fables. See ALPHONSIN, etc.

Alfred the Great (848?-900). King of Wessex, father of the British Navy and leader of the opposition to the invading Danish armies. In January 878 he was surprised and defeated at Chippenham; with the remains of his forces he withdrew to Athelney and continued his resistance. A legend having no basis in fact says that he fled from Chippenham to Athelney and took refuge in a peasant's hut, where the housewife, not recognizing him in his rags, put him to watching cakes baking by the fire. He was so absorbed in his meditations that he allowed the cakes to burn and was scolded as an idle and useless wretch. After his final victory he built a monastery at Athelney in celebration of and thanksgiving for his resistance there. In 1693, the beautiful Saxon ornament, bearing his name and known as Alfred's Jewel, was found at Athelney. It is now in the Ashmolean Museum, Oxford.

Alfred's scholars. When Alfred the Great set about the restoration of letters in England he founded a school and gathered around him learned men from all parts; these became known as "Alfred's scholars"; the chief among them are: Wuffred, Bishop of Worcester; Ethelstan, and Wulfstan, two Mercian priests; Plegmund (a Mercian), afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury; Asser, a Welshman; Grimbold, a French scholar from St. Omer, and John the Old Saxon.

Algarsife (al' gar sif). In Chaucer's unfinished Squire's Tale, son of Cambuscan, and brother of Camballo, who "won Theodora to wife." This noble king, this Tartre Cambuscan, Had two sones by Elleta his wife, Of which the eldest sone highte Algarsife, That other wasycleped Camballo. A doghter had this worthy king also That youngest was and highte Canace. Hence the reference in Milton's Il Penseroso:—

A doghter had this worthy king also That youngest was and highte Canace. Hence the reference in Milton's Il Penseroso:—

Algebra is the Arabic al jebr (the equalization), "the supplementing and equalizing (process)"; so called because the problems are solved by equations, and the equations are made by supplementary terms. Fancifully identified with the Arabian chemist Gebir. See also WHITSTONE OF WITTE.

Alhambra (al ham' brâ). The citadel and palace built at Granada by the Moorish kings in the 13th century. The word is the Arabic al-hamra, or at full length kal'at al hamra (the red castle).

Ali (a' le). Cousin and son-in-law of Mohammed, the beauty of whose eyes is with the Persians proverbial; in so much that the highest term they employ to express beauty is Ayn Hali (eyes of Ali).

Alias (a' li ás). "You have as many aliases as Robin of Bagshot," said to one who passes under many names. The phrase is from Gay's Beggar's Opera: Robin of Bagshot, one of Mackbet's gang, was alias Gordon, alias Bluff Bob, alias Carbuncle, alias Bob Booty.

Ali Baba (a' le bâ' ba). The hero of a story in the Arabian Nights Entertainments, who sees a band of robbers enter a cavern by means of the magic password "Open Sesame." When they have gone away he enters the cave, loads his ass with treasure and returns home. The Forty Thieves discover that Ali Baba has learned their secret and resolve to kill him, but they are finally outwitted by the slave-girl Morgiana.

Alibi (Lat. elsewhere). A plea of having been at another place at the time that an offence is alleged to have been committed. A clock which strikes an hour, while the hands point to a different time, the real time being neither one nor the other, has been humorously called an alibi clock.

Alice in Wonderland and its companion Through the Looking-glass are probably the most famous and widely read of children's books. Their author was C. L. Dodgson, an Oxford mathematician who wrote under the pseudonym of Lewis Carroll. Alice appeared in 1865 and Looking-glass in 1871, both books being illustrated by Sir John Tenniel. The original of Alice was Alice Liddell, daughter of Dean Liddell, himself famous as part-author of Liddell & Scott's Greek Lexicon.

Alien (a' li én). This term is legally applied to a person living in a different country from that of his birth, and not having acquired citizenship in the land of his residence. Later usage has given the word a pejorative implication. An alienist is a physician or scientist who specializes in the study and treatment of insanity.

Alien priory. A priory which is dependent upon and owes allegiance to another priory in a foreign country. A sub-priory, such as Rufford Abbey, Notts, which was under the prior of Rievaulx in Yorkshire, has sometimes been erroneously called an alien priory.

Alifanfaron (al i fân' fa ron). Don Quixote attacked a flock of sheep, and declared them to be the army of the giant Alifanfaron. Similarly Ajax, in a fit of madness, fell upon a flock of sheep, which he mistook for Grecian princes.

Al Kadr (al kâdr) (the divine decree). A particular night in the month Ramadan, when Mohammedans say that angels descend to earth, and Gabriel reveals to man the decrees of God.—Al Koran, ch. xcvii.

Alkabest (al' ka hest). The hypothetical universal solvent of the alchemists. The word was invented, on Arabic models, by Paracelsus.

All and Some. An old English expression meaning "one and all," confused sometimes with "all and sum," meaning the whole total. It appears in the early 14th-century romance, Caur de Lion:—

They that wolde nought Crystene become, Richard lect sleek hem alle and some.
All Fool’s Day (April 1st).  See April Fool.

All Fours. A game of cards; so called from the four points that are at stake, viz. High, Low, Jack, and Game.

To go on all fours is to crawl about on all four limbs, like a quadruped or an infant. The phrase used to be (more correctly) all four, as in Lev. xi, 42, “whatsoever goeth upon all four.”

It does not go on all fours means it does not suit in every particular; it limps as a quadruped which does not go on all its four legs. Thus, the Latin saying, Omnis comparatio claudicat (All similes limp) was translated by Macaulay as “No simile can go on all fours.”

All-Hallows Summer. Another name for St. Martin’s Summer (see Summer), because it sets in about All Hallows; also called St. Luke’s Summer (St. Luke’s Day is Oct. 18th), and the Indian summer (q.v.). Shakespeare uses the term—

“Farewell, thou latter spring; farewell, All-hallows Summer!”

1 Henry IV, i, 2.

All-Hallows’ Day. All Saints’ Day (Nov. 1st), “hallows” being the Old English halig, a holy (man), hence, a saint. The French call it Toussaint. Between 603 and 610 the Pope (Boniface IV) changed the heathen Pantheon into a Christian church and dedicated it to the honour of all the martyrs. The festival of All Saints was first held on May 1st, but in the year 834 it was changed to November 1st.

All-Hallows’ Eve. Many old folklore customs are connected with All-Hallows’ Eve (October 31st), such as bobbing for apples, cracking nuts (mentioned in the Vicar o Wakefield, finding by various “tests” whether one’s lover is true, etc. Burns’s Hallowe’en gives a good picture of Scottish customs; and there is a tradition in Scotland that the All-Hallows’ Eve has a gift of double sight, and commanding powers over spirits. Thus, Mary Avenel, in Scott’s The Monastery, is made to see the White Lady, invisible to less gifted visions.

All is lost that is put in a riven dish. In Latin, Peritus quicquid infunditur in dolium perit. (It is no use helping the insolvent.)

All my eye and Betty Martin. All nonsense, bosh, rubbish. The origin of this curious phrase cannot now be discovered. The Betty Martin is a later addition; “All my eye” is the old saying, as Goldsmith makes the Bailiff say in the Good-natured Man (iii):

“That’s all my eye, the king only can pardon, as the law says.”

In his Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue (1785), Grose gives:

“That’s my eye, Betty Martin.” Southey says in The Doctor (1837): “Who was Betty Martin, and wherefore should she be so often mentioned in connection with my precious eye or yours?”

Joe Miller, the 18th-century joke-monger exhibited a typical piece of his wit when he gave the following origin for the phrase: A Jack Tar went into a foreign church, where he heard someone uttering these words—Ah! mihi, beate Martine (Ah! grant! me, Blessed Martin). On giving an account of his adventure, Jack said he could not make much out of it, but it seemed to him very like “All my eye and Betty Martin.”

All-overish. A colloquial expression meaning a feeling of general discomfort, not exactly ill but far from well.

All Saints.  See All Hallows.

All serene (Sp. seréna). In Cuba the word was used as a countersign by sentinels, and is about equivalent to our “All right,” or “All’s well.” In the late 19th century it was a colloquial catch-word.

All Sir Garnet. During the 80s of the last century, when Sir Garnet Wolseley was winning his victories in Egypt, the Army phrase “All Sir Garnet” came into common usage, indicating that all was going well, everything was as it should be.

All Souls College, Oxford. This was founded in 1437 by Henry Chichele, Archbishop of Canterbury, as a chantry where masses should be said for the souls of those killed in the wars of Henry V and Henry VI. It has a Warden and fifty fellows, few of whom are in residence, but is unique in having no undergraduates.

All Souls’ Day. November 2nd, so called because Catholics on that day seek by prayer and almsgiving to alleviate the sufferings of souls in purgatory. It was instituted in the monastery of Cluny in 993.

According to tradition, a pilgrim, returning from the Holy Land, was compelled by a storm to land on a rocky island, where he found a hermit, who told him that among the cliffs was an opening into the infernal regions through which huge flames ascended, and where the groans of the tormented were distinctly audible. The pilgrim told Odilo, abbot of Cluny, of this; and the abbot appointed the day following, which was November 2nd, to be set apart for the benefit of those souls in purgatory.

All standing. A nautical expression meaning to be completely equipped.

To turn in all standing is to retire while still fully dressed.

All the Talents. This is the name given to the administration formed by Lord Grenville in 1806 on the death of William Pitt. It was an attempt at a coalition of Tories, moderate Whigs and extreme Whigs, and included Charles James Fox as Foreign Secretary. It accomplished nothing spectacular, however, though one great measure will always stand to its credit—the abolition of the slave trade. The Government was dissolved in 1807.

All this for a song! Said to be Burleigh’s remark when Queen Elizabeth ordered him to give £100 to Spenser as a royal gratuity.

All to break (Judges ix. 53). “A certain woman cast a piece of millet here upon Abimelech’s head, and all to brake his skull!” does not mean for the sake of breaking his skull, but that she wholly smashed his skull. The to belongs to the verb, being an intensifying prefix (as is zu in German), and the all coming in as a natural addition. It is common among our early writers, as witness Chaucer's—

Al is to-broken thilke region.

Knight's Tale, 2759.

Allah (āl'ā). The Arabic name of the Supreme Being, from al, the, illah, god. Allah il Allah, the Mohammedan war-cry, and also the first clause of their confession of faith, is a corruption of la illah illa allah, meaning “there is no God, but the God.” Another Mohammedan war-cry is Allah akbar, “God is most mighty.”

Allan-a-Dale. A minstrel in the Robin Hood ballads, who appears also in Scott's Ivanhoe. He was assisted by Robin Hood in carrying off his bride when on the point of being married against her will to a rich old knight.

Alleluia. See Hallelujah.

Alley or Ally. A choice, large playing-marble made of stone or alabaster, from which it takes its name. The alley tor (more correctly taw) beloved of Master Bardell in *Prior's S. B. is well known.

Alley, The. An old name for Change Alley in the City of London, where dealings in the public funds, etc., used to take place. Why did 'Change Alley waste thy precious hours

Among the fools who gap'd for golden show'r's? No wonder if thou feed some poets there,

Who live on fancy and can feed on air;

No wonder they were caught by South-Sea schemes,

Who ne'er enjoy'd a guinea but in dreams.

Thomas Gav, to Mr. T. Snow, goldsmith.

Alliennis, Dies (d'ë z āl i en'sis). June 16th, 390 B.C., when the Romans were cut to pieces by the Gauls near the banks of the river Allia. It was ever after held to be a dies nefastus, or unlucky day.

Alligator. When the Spaniards first saw this reptile in the New World, they called it el lagarto (the lizard). Sir Walter Raleigh called these creatures lagarios; in the 1st Quarto of Romeo and Juliet (v. 1) the animal is called an alligator, and in Ben Jonson's Bartholomew Fair an alligator.

Alligator Pear. The name given to the fruit of the West Indian tree, Persea gratissima. It is a corruption either of the Carib avacate, called by the Spanish discoverers avocado or avigato, or of the Aztec abuacath, which was transmitted through the Fr. avocat and Sp. aguacate. In any case the fruit has nothing to do with the reptile.

Aliteration. The rhetorical device of commencing adjacent accented syllables with the same letter or sound, as in Quince's ridicule of it in Midsummer Night's Dream (v. 1):—

With blade, with bloody blamful blade,

He bravely broached his boiling bloody breast.

Aliteration was a sine qua non in Anglo-Saxon and early English poetry, and in modern poetry it is frequently used with great effect, as in Coleridge's:—

The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew.

The swallow followed free. Ancient Mariner.

And Tennyson's:—

The moan of doves in immemorial elms,

And murmuring of innumerable bees.

Princess, vii.

Many fantastic examples of excessive alliteration are extant, and a good example from a parody by Swinburne will be found under the heading AMPHICOURT. Hugbold composed an alliterative poem on Charles the Bald, every word of which begins with C, and Henry Harder a poem of 100 lines, in Latin hexameters, on cats, each word beginning with c, called Canum cum Catis certamen carmine compositum currente calamo C Catulli Canini. The first line is—

Cattorum canimus certamina clara canumque.

Tusser, who died 1580, has a rhyming poem of twelve lines, every word of which begins with r; and in the 1890s there was published a Serenade of twenty-eight lines, 'sung in M flat by Major Marmaduke Muttinhead to Made­niseille Madeline Meen, which contained only one word—in the line, “Meet me by moonlight, marry me”—not beginning with M.

The alliterative alphabetic poem beginning—

An Austrian army awfully arrayed

Boldly by battery besieged Belgrade;

Cossack commanders, canonading come,

Dealing destruction’s devastating doom; . . .

is well known. It was published in The Trifer, May 7th, 1817, ascribed to Rev. B. Poulter, later revised by Alaric A. Watts, though claimed for others.

Another attempt of the same kind begins thus:—

About an age ago, as all agree,

Beauteous Belinda, brewing best Bohea

Carelessly chattered, controverting clean,

Dublin’s derisive, disputatious dean . . .

Allodials (Med. Lat. from Old Frankish al, all; od, estate). Lands held by absolute right, without even the burden of homage or fidelity; opposed to feudal.

Allopathy (ā lo'pâ thi) is in opposition to Homœopathy (q.v.). It is from the Greek, allo pathos, a different disease. In homœopathy the principle is that “like is to cure like”; in allopathy the disease is to be cured by its “antidote.”

Alma (āl'má) (Ital. soul, spirit, essence), in Prior's poem of this name typifies the mind or guiding principles of man. Alma is queen of “Body Castle,” and is beset by a rabble rout of evil desires, foul imaginations, and silly conceits for seven years (the Seven Ages). In Spenser's Faerie Queene (II, ix-xi) Alma typifies the soul. She is mistress of the House of Temperance, and there entertains Prince Arthur and Sir Guyon.

Alma Mater. A collegian so calls the university of which he is a member. The words are Latin for “fostering mother,” and in ancient Rome the title was given to several goddesses, especially Ceres and Cybele.

They are also used for other “fostering mothers,” as in—

You might divert yourself, too, with Alma Mater, the Church. Horace Walpole: Letters (1778).
Almack's. A suite of assembly rooms in King Street, St. James's (London), built in 1765 by William Almack, an ex-valet, who a short time previously had founded the club now known as Brook's, and who died in 1781. Balls, presided over by a committee of ladies of the highest rank, used to be given here, and to be admitted was almost as great a distinction as to be presented at Court. After 1840 they became known as Willis's Rooms, from the name of the then proprietor, and were used chiefly for large dinners. The rooms were closed in 1890, and destroyed in an air raid in 1941.

Almagest (āl’ mà jest). The English form of the Arabic name given to Ptolemy's Mathe­matike syntaxis, the great astronomical treatise composed during the 2nd century A.D., of which an Arabic translation was made about 820. It is in the third book of this work (which contains thirteen books in all) that the length of the year was first fixed at 365* days.

Almanac. A mediæval Latin word for a table of days and months with astronomical data, etc.

The derivation of the word is obscure, though it clearly comes from the Sp. Arabic ol, the: manakt, a sun-dial. This is not, however, a true Arabic word, but is probably of Greek origin.

Some early almanacs are:—

The man i the almanac stuck with pins (Nat. Lee), is a man marked with points referring to signs of the zodiac, and intended to indicate the favourable and unfavourable times of letting blood.

Almanzor (āl man' zór). The word means "the invincible" and was adopted as a title by several Mussulman potentates, notably the second Abbaside Caliph Abu Jafar Abdullah. It was a royal title given to the kings of Fez, Morocco, and Algiers:

- The kingdoms of Almansor, Fez, and Sus, Morocco and Algiers. . . . . . .
- Paradise Lost, xi, 403.

The Caliph Almanzor founded the city of Bagdad, which he named after a beggar who had prophesied that he would do so.

One of the characters in Dryden's Conquest of Granada (1672) is an Almanzor; the name figures also as one of the lackeys in Molière's Precieuses Ridicules.

Almesbury. It was in a sanctuary at Almesbury that Queen Guenever, according to Malory, took refuge, after her adulterous passion for Lancelot was revealed to the king (Arthur). Here she died; but her body was buried at Glastonbury.

Almeyda. See Benbow.

Almighty Dollar. Washington Irving seems to have been the first to use this expression:—

The almighty dollar, that great object of universal devotion throughout our land . . .

Ben Jonson in his Epistle to Elizabeth, Countess of Rutland, speaks of "almighty gold."

Almonry. The place where the almoner resides, or where alms are distributed. An almoner is a person whose duty it is to distribute alms, which, in ancient times, consisted of one-tenth of the entire income of a monastery.

The word has become confused with Ambry (q.v.), and the Close in Westminster now known as "Ambry Close" used to be called "Almonry Close."

Almonry is from the Latin eleemosynarium, a place for alms.

The place wherein this Chapel or Almshouse stands was called the "Eleemosynary" or Almonry, now corrupted into Ambrey, for that the alms of the Abbey are there distributed to the poor.—Stow: Survey.

Alms (amz) (O.E. elmosse, ultimately from Lat. elemosina from Gr. eleemosyne, compassion); gifts to the poor.

Dr. Johnson says the word has no singular; the O.E.D. says it has no plural. It is a singular word which, like riches (from Fr. richesse), has in modern usage become plural. In the Bible we have "he asked an alms" (Acts iii, 3), but Dryden gives us "alms are but the vehicles of prayer" (Hind and the Panther, iii, 106).

Alms Basket (in Love's Labour's Lost, v, 1).

To live on the alms basket. To live on charity.

Alms-drink. Leavings; the liquor which a drinker finds too much, and therefore hands to another; also, liquor left over from a feast and sent to the alms-people. See Antony and Cleopatra, ii, 7.

Alms-fee. Peter's pence (q.v.).

Almshouse. A house for the use of the poor, usually supported by the endowment of some wealthy patron who built the houses. Alms-houses are generally a number of small dwellings built together, often in a row, and are devoted to housing and supporting persons who find themselves poor or destitute in old age.

Alms-man. One who lives on alms.

Alnaschar's Dream. Counting your chickens before they are hatched. Alnaschar the barber's fifth brother (in the Arabian Nights story), invested all his money in a basket of glassware, on which he was to make a profit which, being invested, was to make more, and this was to go on till he grew rich enough to marry the vizier's daughter. Being angry with his imaginary wife he gave a kick, overturned his basket, and broke all his wares.

A.loe (Gr. aloe)>

A very bitter plant; hence the line in Ju\'enal's sixth satire (181), Plus aloes quam mel/is lrobet, ''He has in him more biners than sweets, .. said of a writer with a sarcastic pen. The French say, "Le cote

"here cJte d"A.dam, of course, means woman or one·s wife.
Alombrados. See ILLUMINATI.
Alonzo of Aguilar. When Fernando. King of Aragon. was laying siege to Granada in 1501, he asked who would undertake to plant his banner on the heights. Alonzo, "the lowm,~st of the dons," undertook the task but was cut down by the Moors. His body was exposed in the wood of Oxijera, and the Moorish damsels, struck with its beauty, buried it near the brook of Alpuxarra. The incident is the subject of a number of ballads.
Aloof. A sea tenn, to stand aloof, meaning originally to bear to windward, or luff. The a is the same prefix as in afoot or asleep, and means 011; loaf is the Dutch /oef, windward.
Tu froid aloof thus means literally "to keep 10 the windward," and as one cannot do that e:\cept by keeping the head of the ship away, ii came to mean •·to keep away from" as opposed to .. to approach."
Aroutrance (a loo' trons). An incorrect English version of the French a outrance. To the Alpbetl5 and Arethusa (al fe' us, are tho' za).

The Greek legend is that a youthful hunter named Alpheus was in love with the nymph Arethusa; she fled from him to the island of Ortygia on the Sicilian coast and he was turned into a river of Arcadia in the Pelopon· nesus. Alpheus pursued her under the sea, and, rising in Ortygia, he and she became one in the fountain hereafter called Arethusa.

The myth seems to be designed for the purpose of accounting for the fact that the course of the Alpheus is for some considerable distance underground.
Alphonsin (al fon' sin). An old surgical instrument for extracting bullets from wounds.
So called from Alphonse Ferri, a surgeon of Naples, who invented it (1552).
Alphonsine Tables. A revision of the Ptolemaic planetary tables made at the command of Alphonsus X of Castile-himself a noted astronomer-by a body of 50 or more of the most learned astronomers of the time. Thev were completed in 1252.
·
Alpieu (Ital. al piu, for the most). In the game of Basset, doubling the stake on a winning card.
What pity 'tis those conquering eyes,
Which all the world subdue,
Should, while the lover gazing dies,
Be only on alpieu.
ETHEREGE:

Basset.

Alpine Race. This is another name for the large Celtic Race and is applied to the thickset men, with broad faces, hazel eyes, and light chestnut hair who inhabited the northwest extremity of France, Savoy, Switzerland, the Ardennes, Yosges, and the Biscayan coasts.
They were a midway race between the Scandinavian Nordics and the dark Mediterranean folk; the zenith of their culture was the so-called La Tene period (500 B.c. to A.O.

Al Rakim (iii ra' kim). The dog in the legend of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus.
Alruna-wife, An (iii roo' ml). The Alrunes were the /ares or penates of the ancient Germans; and an Alruna-wife, the household goddess.
Alsatia (iii sii' sha). The Whitefriars district of London, which from early times till the abolition of all privileges in 1697 was a sanctuary for debtors and law-breakers. It was bounded on the north and south by Fleet Street and the Thames, on the east and west by the Fleet River (now New Bridge Street) and the Temple; and was so called from the old Latin name of Alsace, which was for centuries a debatable frontier ground and a refuge of the disaffected. The life and state of this rookery is described in The Squire of A/sotia (1688), a comedy by Shadwell, who was the first to use the name in literature.
Al-Sirat (Arab. the path). In Mohammedan mythology, the bridge leading to paradise;
a bridge over mid-hell, no wider than the edge of a sword, across which all who enter heaven must pass.
Alsvidur. See HORSE.
Altar (Lat. alt us, high; a high place). The oblong block or table, made of wood, marble, or other stone, consecrated and used for religious sacrifice. In Christitn churches the term is applied to the communion table.
According to the rubric laid down in the Book of Common Prayer the celebrant at Holy Communion shall stand at the north side of the table, thus sideways to the communicants who can in this way observe his motions in the act of consecration. This was enacted in order to do away with the alleged mystery of the Mass, but it is not always observed to-day.


Led to the altar. Married. Said of a woman who, as a bride, is led up the aisle to the altar-rail where marriages are solemnized.

The north side of the altar. The side on which the Gospel is read. The north is the dark part of the earth, and the Gospel is the light of the world which shineth in darkness—
"illuminae his quâ in tenebris et in umbra mortis sedent."

Privileged altar. In R.C. churches this is an altar with certain indulgences attached to all Masses for the dead said at it.

Alter ego (á’l’ ter eg’ ô). (Lat. other I, other self). One’s double; one’s intimate and thoroughly trusted friend; one who has full powers to act for another. Cf. “One’s second self” under SECOND.

Althea. The divine Althea of Richard Lovelace was Lucy Sacheverell, also called by the poet, “Lucasta.”

When Love with unconfined wings
Hovers within my gates,
And my divine Althea brings
To whisper at the grates.

Loveland was thrown into prison by the Long Parliament for his petition in favour of the king; hence the grates referred to.

Althaea’s Brand (ál’ the á), a fatal contingency.
Althaea’s son, Meleager, was to live just so long as a log of wood, then on the fire, remained unconsumed. With her care it lasted for many years, but being angry one day with Meleager, she pushed it into the midst of the fire; it was consumed in a few minutes and Meleager died in great agony at the same time.—Ovid: Metamorphoses, viii, 4.

The fatal brand Althaea burned.

Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI, i, 1.

Alits. The sacred precinct of Zeus at Olympia, containing the great temple and oval altar of Zeus, the Pelopium (grave of Pelops), the Heræum, with many other buildings and statues. It was connected by an arched passage with the Stadium, where the Olympic games were held.

Alto relievo. Italian for “high relief.” A term used in sculpture for figures in wood, stone, marble, etc., so cut as to project at least one-half from the tablet.

Alumbrado, a perfectionist; so called from a Spanish sect which arose in 1575, and claimed special illumination. (Spanish, meaning “illuminated,” “enlightened.”)

Alvina weeps, or “Hark! Alvina weeps,” i.e.
the wind howls loudly, a Flemish saying.
Alvina was the daughter of a king, who was cursed by her parents because she married unsuitably. From that day she roamed about the air invisible to the eye of man, but her moans are audible.

Alzire (ál’ zér). A daughter of Montezuma invented by Voltaire and made the central character of one of his greatest plays of the same name (1736). The scene is shifted from Mexico to Peru.

A.M. or M.A. When the ‘Latin form is intended the A comes first, as Artium Magister; but where the English form is meant the M precedes, as Master of Arts.

The abbreviation “A.M.” also stands for ante meridiem (Lat.), before noon, and anno mundi, in the year of the world.

Amadis of Gaul (á ma’ dis). The hero of a prose romance of the same title, supposed to have been written by the Portuguese, Vasco de Lobeira (d. 1403), with additions by the Spaniard Montalvo, and by many subsequent romancers, who added exploits and adventures of other knights and thus swelled the romance to fourteen books. The romance was referred to as early as 1350 (in Egidus Colonna’s De Regimine Principium); it was first printed in 1508, became immensely popular, and exerted a wide influence on literature far into the 17th century.

Amadis, called the “Lion Knight,” from the device on his shield, and “Beltenebros” (darkly beautiful), from his personal appearance, was a love-child of Perion, King of Gaula (Wales), and Elizena, Princess of Brittany. He was cast away at birth and became known as the Child of the Sun, and after many adventures including wars with the race of Giants, a war for the hand of his lady-love Oriana, daughter of Lisuarte, King of Greece, the Ordeal of the Forbidden Chamber, etc., he and Oriana are married. He is represented as a poet and a musician, a linguist and a gallant, a knight-errant and a king, the very model of chivalry.

Other names by which Amadis was called were the Lovely Obscure, the Knight of the Green Sword, the Knight of the Dwarf, etc.

Amadis of Greece. A Spanish continuation of the seventh book of Amadis of Gaul (q.v.), supposed to be by Feliciano de Silva. It tells the story of Lisuarte of Greece, a grandson of Amadis.

Amaimon (á m’ á môn). One of the chief devils in medieval demonology; king of the eastern portion of hell. Asmodeus is his chief officer. He might be bound or restrained from doing hurt from the third hour till noon, and from the ninth hour till evening.

Amaimon sounds well; Lucifer well.

Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, ii, 2.

Amalfitan Code (á mál’ fi tân). The oldest collection of maritime laws, compiled in the eleventh century at Amalfi, then an important commercial centre.

Amalthaea (ám ál’ thé á). In Greek mythology, the nurse of Zeus. In Roman legend Amaltha is the name of the Sibyl who sold the Sibylline Books (q.v.) to Tarquin.

Amalthaea’s horn. The cornucopia or “horn of plenty” (q.v.). The infant Zeus was fed with goats’ milk by Amalthaea, one of the daughters of Melisseus, King of Crete.
Zeus, in gratitude, broke off one of the goat’s
Amaranth (Gr. amaranthos, everlasting). The name given by Pliny to some real or imaginary fadless flower. Clement of Alexandria says — "Amaranthus flos, symbolum est immortalitas." Among the ancients it was the symbol of immortality, because its flowers retain to the last much of their deep blood-red colour.

The best-known species are "Love lies bleeding" (Amaranthus caudatus), and "Prince's feather" (Amaranthus hypochondriacus).

Immortall amaranth, a flower which once
In Paradise, fast by the Tree of Life.
Began to bloom, but, soon for man's offence
To heaven removed where first it grew, there grows
And flowers aloft, shading the Fount of Life. . . .
With these, that never fade, the Spirits elect
Bind their resplendent locks.

Milton: Paradise Lost, iii, 353.

Spenser mentions "sad Amaranthus" as one of the flowers "to which sad lovers were transformed of yore" (Faerie Queene, III, vi. 45), but there is no known legend to this effect.

In 1653 Christina, Queen of Sweden, instituted the order of the Knights of the Amaranth, but it ceased to exist at the death of the Queen.

Amaryllis (am ə rill'is). A rustic sweetheart. The name is borrowed from a shepherdess in the pastorals of Theocritus and Virgil.
To sport with Amaryllis in the shade.

Milton: Lycidas, 68.

In Spenser's Colin Clout's Come Home Again, Amaryllis is intended for Alice Spenser, Countess of Derby.

Amasis, Ring of (ə mə'sis). Herodotus tells us (iii, 4) that Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, was so fortunate in everything that Amasis, king of Egypt, fearing such unprecedented luck boded ill, advised him to part with something which he highly prized. Polycrates accordingly threw into the sea a ring of great value. A few days afterwards, a fish was presented to the tyrant, in which the ring was found. Amasis now renounced friendship with Polycrates, as a man doomed by the gods; and not long afterwards, a satrap put the too fortunate despot to death by crucifixion.

Amati (ə ma'ti). A family famous for making stringed instruments at Cremona (q.v.) in the 16th and 17th centuries. Either Andrea Amati or Gaspar da Salo produced the first violin similar to those in use to-day, the earliest surviving Amati instrument being dated 1564.

Amaurote (ə mə rō'te) (Gr. the shadowy or unknown place), the chief city of Utopia (q.v.) in the political romance of that name by Sir Thomas More. Rabelais, in his Pantagruel, introduces Utopia and "the great city of the Amaurots" (Bk. ii, ch. xxiii). He had evidently read Sir Thomas More's book.

To add to the verisimilitude of the romance, More says he could not recollect whether Hythlodaeus had told him it was 500 or 300 paces long; and he requested his friend Peter Giles, of Antwerp, to put the question to the adventurer. Swift, in Gulliver's Travels, uses very similar means of throwing dust in his reader's eyes. He says:—

I cannot recollect whether the reception room of the Spaniard's Castle in the Air is 200 or 300 feet long. I will get the next aeronaut who journeys to the moon to take the exact dimensions for me, and will memorialise the learned society of Laputa.

Amazement. Not afraid with any amazement (1 Pet. iii, 6), introduced at the close of the marriage service in the Book of Common Prayer. The meaning is, you will be God's children so long as you do his bidding, and are not drawn aside by any sort of bewilderment or distraction. Shakespeare uses the word in the same sense:—

Behold, distraction, frenzy and amazement,
Like witless antics one another meet.

Troilus and Cressida, v, 3.

Amazon (ə mə'zon). A Greek word meaning without breast, or rather, "deprived of a pap." According to Herodotus there was a race of female warriors, or Amazons, living in Scythia, and other Greek stories speak of a nation of women in Africa of a very warlike character. There were no men in the nation, and if a boy was born, it was either killed or sent to its father, who lived in some neighbouring state. The girls had their right breasts burnt off, that they might the better draw the bow. The term is now applied to any strong, brawny woman of masculine habits.
She towered, fit person for a Queen
To lead those ancient Amazonian files;
Or ruling Bandit's wife among the Grecian isles.

Amazonia (ə mə zō'ni ə). An old name for the regions about the river Amazon in South America, which was so called because the early Spanish explorers (1541), under Orellana, thought they saw female warriors on its banks.

Amazonian chin. A beardless chin, like that of a woman warrior.
When with his Amazonian chin he drove
The bristled lips before him.

Shakespeare: Coriolanus, II, ii.

Amber. A yellow, translucent, fossilized vegetable resin, the name of which originally belonged to ambergris (q.v.). Beaumont and Fletcher use it as a verb meaning to perfume with ambergris:—

Be sure
The wines be lusty, high, and full of spirit,
And amber'd all.

Custom of the Country, III, ii.

Legend has it that amber is a concretion, the tears of birds who were the sisters of Meleager and who never ceased weeping for the death of their brother.—Ovid: Metamorphoses, viii, 270.

Around thee shall glisten the loveliest amber
That ever the sorrowing sea-bird hath wept.

T. Moore: Fire Worshippers.
Insects, small leaves, etc., are often preserved in amber; hence such phrases as "preserved for all time in the imperishable amber of his genius."

Pretty! in amber, to observe the forms
Of hairs, or straws, or dirt, or grubs or worms,
The things, we know, are neither rich nor rare,
But wonder how the devil they got there.

Amber, meaning a repository, is an obsolete spelling of ambry (q.v.).

Ambergris. A waxy, aromatic substance found floating on tropical seas and in the intestines of the cachalot. It is a marbled ashy grey in colour and is used in perfumery. Its original name was simply amber (see Amber) from Fr. ambre, which denoted only this substance; when it came to be applied to the fossil resin (Fr. ambre jaune, yellow amber), this grey substance became known as ambergris (grey amber).

Ambidexter properly means both hands right hands, and so one who can use his left hand as deftly as his right; in slang use, a double-dealer.

Ambree, Mary. An English heroine, immortalized by her valour at the siege of Ghent in 1584. See the ballad in Percy's Reliques:—

When captains courageous, whom death cold not daunte,
Did march to the siege of the city of Gaunt,
They mustred their soldiers by two and by three,
And the foremost in battle was Mary Ambree.

Her name is proverbial for a woman of heroic spirit.

My daughter will be valiant,
And prove a very Mary Ambry i the bushes.

Ambrose, St., Bishop of Milan (b. c. 340). In 384 he instituted reforms in Church music and introduced from the Eastern Church the Ambrosian Chant, which was used until Pope Gregory the Great introduced Gregorian Chant two centuries later. His feast day is December 7th. His emblems are: (1) a beehive, in allusion to the legend that a swarm of bees settled on his mouth when lying in his cradle; (2) a scourge, by which he expelled the beehive, in allusion to the legend that a swarm founded by Count Federigo Borromeo (1564-1631), Cardinal Archbishop of Milan, in 1609; so called in compliment to St. Ambrose, the patron saint. It is famous for its collection of illuminated MSS., including the earliest known—a 4th-century codex of Homer.

Ambrosia (ám bró' zi á) (Gr. a, private, brotas, mortal). The food of the gods, so called because it made them immortal. Anything delicious to the taste or fragrant in perfume is so called from the notion that whatever is used by the celestials must be excellent.

...So fortunate
Whom the Pierian sacred sisters love
That...with the Gods, for former virtues need
On nectar and Ambrosia do feed.

Spenser: Ruines of Time, 393.

Ambrosian Nights. At Ambrose's Hotel, Edinburgh, John Wilson (Christopher North), James Hogg, and other literary figures of the time forgathered of an evening with conviviality and brilliant conversation, recorded (with embellishments) by North in his Noces Ambrosiana, 1822.

Ambrosius Aurelianus. A semi-mythical champion of the British race. The story is that he was a descendant of the Emperor Constantine, that he lived in the 5th century, and that he led the Romanized Britons against the Saxon invaders under Hengist. He is mentioned by Gildas as "the last of the Romans," and he may have been a Count of the Saxon Shore.

Ambry (ám' bri) (Old Fr. armarie, from Lat. armaaria, chest or cupboard, from arma, tools, gear). A cupboard, locker, or recess. The ambry in a church is a closed recess in the wall which is used for keeping books, vestments, the sacramental plate, consecrated oil, and so on (cp. almonry).

Avarice hath almaries.
And yren-bounden cofres.

Piers Plowman, iv, 494.

Ambe-as or Ambes-ace (Am's as) (Lat. ambas-ae, both or two aces). Two aces, the lowest throw in dice; figuratively, bad luck.

I had rather be in this choice than throw ambe-ace for my life.—All's Well, ii, 3.

It was also the name of a card game, and was sometimes spelt ame-ace.

Ame dannée (Fr.), literally, a damned, or lost, soul; hence one's familiar or tool, one blindly devoted to another's wishes; and, sometimes, a scapegoat.

Amelia. A model of conjugal affection, in Fielding's novel of that name. It is said that the character is intended for his own wife.

The name is also associated with Amelia Sedley, one of the heroines of Vanity Fair.

Amen Corner, at the west end of Paternoster Row, London. was where the monks used to finish the Pater Noster as they went in procession to St. Paul's Cathedral on Corpus Christi Day. They began in Paternoster Row with the Lord's Prayer in Latin, which was continued to the end of the street: then said Amen, at the corner or bottom of the Row; then turning down Ave Maria Lane, commenced chanting the "Hail, Mary!" then crossing Ludgate, entered Creed Lane chanting the Credo.

Paternoster Row, Amen Corner, and much of Ave Maria Lane were completely destroyed in an air raid on December 28th, 1940.

Amen-Ra. The supreme King of the Gods among the ancient Egyptians, usually figured as a great man with two long plumes rising straight above his head, another ram's head, the ram being sacred to him. He was the patron of Thebes; his oracle was at the oasis of Jupiter Ammon, and he was identified by the Greeks with Zeus.

Amende honorable. An anglicized French phrase signifying a full and frank apology. In medieval France the term was applied to a degrading punishment inflicted on traitors, parricides, and sacrilegious persons, who were brought into court with a rope round their neck, stripped to the shirt, and made to beg pardon of God, the king, and the court.
A mensa et thoro. See A vinculo.

Amethes (a men' thēz). The Egyptian Hades; the abode of the spirits of the dead who were not yet fully purified.

America. See United States of America.

Amerindian (ām' ēr in' di ān). This is a "portmanteau" word combining American and Indian, and is applied descriptively to the native Red Indian races and Eskimos of the North American continent.

Ames-ace. See AMBS-AS.

Amethea. See Horse.

Amethyst (ām' ē this) (Gr. a-., not: methuein, to be drunken). A violet-blue variety of crystalline quartz supposed by the ancients to prevent intoxication.

Drinking-cups made of amethyst were a charm against inebriety; and it was the most cherished of all precious stones by Roman matrons, from the superstition that it would preserve inviolate the affection of their husbands.

Amiable or Amicable Numbers. Any two numbers either of which is the sum of the aliquots of the other: thus, the aliquots of 220 are 1, 2, 4, 5, 10, 11, 20, 22, 44, 55, 110, the sum of which is 284; and the aliquots of 284 are 1, 2, 4, 71, 142, the sum of which is 220: so 220 and 284 are amicable numbers.

Amicus curiae (ā mi' kūs kā' ri ē) (Lat. a friend to the court). One in court who is not engaged in the trial or action, but who is invited or allowed to assist with advice or information. The term is now used to describe a disinterested adviser.

Amiel (am' i ēl). In Dryden's Absalom and Achishophel, this is meant for Edward Seymour, Speaker of the House of Commons.

The name is an anagram of Eliam (= God is kinsman). Eliam in 2 Sam. xxii, 34, is son of Ahithophel the Gilonite, and one of David's heroes; in 2 Sam. xi, 3, it is given as the name of Bathsheba's father, which, in 1 Chron. iii, 5, appears as "Ammiel."

Aminadab (a min' ā dāb). A Quaker. The Scripture name has a double meaning, but in old comedies, where the character represents a Quaker, the name has generally only one. Obadiah is used also, to signify a Quaker, and Rachel a Quakeress.

Amiral or Ammorial. An early form of the word "admiral" (q.v.).

Amis and Amile. See AMYS.

Amnon (ām' on). The Libyan Jupiter; the Greek form of the name of the Egyptian god, Amun (q.v.).

Son of Ammon. Alexander the Great, who, on his expedition to Egypt, was thus saluted by the priests of the Libyan temple.

Ammon's great son one shoulder had too high. Pope: Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, 117.

His father, Philip, claimed to be a descendant of Hercules, and therefore of Jupiter.

Ammonites (ām' ŏn itz). Fossil molluscs allied to the nautilus and cuttlefish. So called because they resemble the horn upon the ancient statues of Jupiter Ammon. They were set in brooches or as earrings in the mid-19th century.

Also the people of Ammon: that is, the descendants of Lot by the son of his younger daughter, Ben-ammi (Gen. xix, 38), who are frequently mentioned in the Old Testament.

Amok. See AMUCK.

Amoret (ām' ēr et). In Spenser's Faerie Queene, is the type of female loveliness—young, handsome, gay, witty, and good; soft as a rose, sweet as a violet, chaste as a lily, gentle as a dove, loving everybody and by all beloved. Hence it became a term for a sweetheart, love-song, love-knot, or love personified.

He will be in his amorets, and his canzonets, his pastoral, and his madrigals.—Heywood: Love's Mistress.

For not cladde in silke was he,
But all in flouris and florettes,
I-painted all with amorets.

Romance of the Rose, 892.

Amorous, The. Philip I of France (1060-1108); so called because he divorced his wife Berthe to espouse Bertrade, who was already married to Foulques, count of Anjou.

Amour propre (a' moor propr) (Fr.). One's self-love, vanity, or opinion of what is due to self. To wound his amour propre, is to galler his good opinion of himself—to wound his vanity.

Ampersand (ām' per sānd). The character "&" for and. In the old horn books, after giving the twenty-six letters, the character & was added (~ X, Y, Z, &), and was called "Amperands," a corruption of "and per se &" (and by itself, and). The symbol is an adaptation of the written et (Lat. and), the transformation of which can be traced if we look at the italic ampersand—&—where the "e" and the cross of the "t" are clearly recognizable. See TIRONIAN.

Amphiatus (ām' fi' a ēs). In Sidney's Arcadia the valiant and virtuous son of the wicked Cecropia, in love with Philoclea; he ultimately married Queen Helen of Corinth.

Amphictyonic Council (ām fik ti' on' i k) (Gr. amphiktiones, dwellers round about). In Greek history, the council of the Amphictyon League, a confederation of twelve tribes, the deputies of which met twice a year, alternately at Delphi and Thermopylae. Throughout the whole of ancient Greek history it exercised paramount authority over the oracles of the Pythian Apollo and conducted the Pythian games.

Amphigouri (ām fi' goor' i). A verse composition which, while sounding well, contains no sense or meaning. A good example is Swinburne's well-known parody of his own style, Nepheleidia, the opening lines of which are: From the depth of the dreamy decline of the dawn through a notable nimbus of nebulous moonshine. Palid and pink as the palm of the flag-flower that flickers with fear of the flies as they float.

Are they looks of our lovers that lustrously lean from a marvel of mystic miraculous moonshine.

These that we feel in the blood of our blushes that thicken and threaten with throbs through the throat?
Amphion. A Malayan adjective, amuk, meaning to be in a state of frenzy. To run amuck is to indulge in physical violence while in a state of frenzy.

Satire's my weapon, but I'm too discreet
To run amuck and tilt at all I meet.

Pope: Satires, i, 69-70.

Amulet. Something worn, generally round the neck, as a charm. The word was formerly connected with the Arabic himalah, the name given to the cord that secured the Koran to the person and was sometimes regarded as a charm; but it has nothing to do with this, and is from the Latin amuletum, a preservative against sickness, through French amulette.

The early Christians used to wear amulets called Ichthus (q.v.). See also Notarikon.

Amun (ām’ūn). An Egyptian deity, usually represented with a ram’s head with large curved horns, and a human body, or as a human figure with two long upright plumes springing from the head and holding a sceptre and the symbol of life. An immense number of temples were dedicated to him and he was, identified by the Greeks with Zeus. His oracle was in the oasis of Jupiter Ammon. See Ammon.

Amylean Silence (ām i klé’ ān). Amycle was a Laconian town in the south of Sparta, ruled by the mythical Tyndareus. The inhabitants had so often been alarmed by false rumours of the approach of the Spartans, that they made a decree forbidding mention of the subject. When the Spartans actually came no one dare give warning, and the town was taken. Hence the proverb, more silent than Amycle.

Castor and Pollux were born at Amycle, and are hence sometimes referred to as the Amylean Brothers.

Amyris plays the Fool (ā mi’ ris). An expression used of one who assumes a false character with an ulterior object, like Junius Brutus. Amyrus was a Sybarite sent to Delphi to consult the Oracle, who informed him of the approaching destruction of his nation: he fled to Peloponnesus and his countrymen called him a fool; but, like the madness of David, his “folly” was true wisdom, for thereby he saved his life.

Amys and Amylon (ā’ mis, ā mil’ i ōn). A French romance of the 13th century telling the story of the friendship between two heroes of the Carolingian wars. The story culminates in Amylon’s sacrifice of his children to save his friend.

Anabaptists. Originally, a Christian sect which arose in Germany about 1521, the members of which did not believe in infant baptism and hence were baptized over again (Gr. ana ęż over again) on coming to years of discretion.

Applied in England as a nickname, and more or less opprobriously, to the Baptists, a body of Dissenters holding similar views.

Anacharsis (ān á kar’ sis). A princely Scythian named Anacharsis left his native country to travel in pursuit of knowledge. He reached Athens about 594 B.C. and became acquainted with Solon.

Amphion (ām fi’ on). The son of Zeus and Antiope who, according to Greek legend, built Thebes by the music of his lute, which was so melodious that the stones danced into walls and houses of their own accord.

The gift to king Amphion
That walled a city with its melody
Was for belief no dream.

WORTSWORTH: Poems of the Imagination; On the Power of Sound.

Amphibiana (ām fis bě’ nā). A fabulous venomous serpent supposed to have a head at each end and to be able to move in either direction:

Complicated monsters head and tail,
Scorpion, and asp, and amphibiana dire,
Cerastes horn'd, hydros and elops drear,
And dipas . . .

Paradise Lost, x, 524.

The name is applied to a genus of S. American lizards.

Amphitrite (ām fi tri’ ti). In classic mythology, the goddess of the sea; wife of Poseidon, daughter of Nereus and Doris. (Gr. amphi-trito for tribo, rubbing or wearing away [the shore] on all sides.)

His weary chariot sought the bowers
Of Amphitrite and her tending nymphs.

THOMSON: Summer (I. 1625).

Amphitryon (ām fi’ ri on). Le véritable Amphitryon est l’Amphitrion ou l’onde (Molière). That is, the person who provides the feast (whether master of the house or not) is the real host. The tale is that Jupiter assumed the likeness of Amphitryon for the purpose of visiting the latter’s wife, Alcmena (q.v.), and came home and claimed the honour of being the master of the house. As far as the servants and the guests were concerned, the dispute was soon decided——“he who gave the feast was to them the host.”

Amphryslan Prophetess (ām fri’ zi ān) (Amphy-sia Vates). The Cumaean sibyl; so called from Amphyrus, a river of Thessaly, on the banks of which Apollo fed the herds of Admetus.

Amoule, La Sainte (la sãnt am pol’). The vessel containing oil used in anointing the kings of France, and said to have been brought from heaven by a dove for the coronation service of St. Louis. It was preserved at Rheims till the first Revolution, when it was destroyed.

Amram’s Son. Moses. (Exod. vi, 20).

As when the potent rod
Of Amram’s son, in Egypt’s evil day,
Waved round the coast.

Milton: Paradise Lost, i, 338.

Amri (ām’ ri). In Dryden’s Absalom and Achitophel is designed for Heneage Finch, Earl of Nottingham and Lord Chancellor.

Amrita (ām ré’ tā) (Sanskrít). In Hindu mythology, the elixir of immortality, the soma-juice, corresponding to the ambrosia (q.v.) of classical mythology.

Lo, Krishna! lo, the one that thirsts for thee!
Give him the drink of amrita from thy lips.

Sir Edwin Arnold: Indian Song of Songs.

Here there is everything that goes to the making of poetry—except sense; and that is absolutely (and, of course, purposely) lacking.

Amphion (ām fi’ on). The son of Zeus and Antiope who, according to Greek legend, built Thebes by the music of his lute, which was so melodious that the stones danced into walls and houses of their own accord.

The gift to king Amphion
That walled a city with its melody
Was for belief no dream.

Scorpion, and asp, and amphibiana dire,
Cerastes horn’d, hydros and elops drear,
And dipas . . .

Paradise Lost, x, 524.

The name is applied to a genus of S. American lizards.

Amphitrite (ām fi tri’ ti). In classic mythology, the goddess of the sea; wife of Poseidon, daughter of Nereus and Doris. (Gr. amphi-trito for tribo, rubbing or wearing away [the shore] on all sides.)

His weary chariot sought the bowers
Of Amphitrite and her tending nymphs.

THOMSON: Summer (I. 1625).

Amphitryon (ām fi’ ri on). Le véritable Amphitryon est l’Amphitrion ou l’onde (Molière). That is, the person who provides the feast (whether master of the house or not) is the real host. The tale is that Jupiter assumed the likeness of Amphitryon for the purpose of visiting the latter’s wife, Alcmena (q.v.), and came home and claimed the honour of being the master of the house. As far as the servants and the guests were concerned, the dispute was soon decided——“he who gave the feast was to them the host.”

Amphryslan Prophetess (ām fri’ zi ān) (Amphy-sia Vates). The Cumaean sibyl; so called from Amphyrus, a river of Thessaly, on the banks of which Apollo fed the herds of Admetus.

Amoule, La Sainte (la sãnt am pol’). The vessel containing oil used in anointing the kings of France, and said to have been brought from heaven by a dove for the coronation service of St. Louis. It was preserved at Rheims till the first Revolution, when it was destroyed.

Amram’s Son. Moses. (Exod. vi, 20).

Milton: Paradise Lost, i, 338.

Amri (ām’ ri). In Dryden’s Absalom and Achitophel is designed for Heneage Finch, Earl of Nottingham and Lord Chancellor.

Amrita (ām ré’ tā) (Sanskrít). In Hindu mythology, the elixir of immortality, the soma-juice, corresponding to the ambrosia (q.v.) of classical mythology.

Lo, Krishna! lo, the one that thirsts for thee!
Give him the drink of amrita from thy lips.

Sir Edwin Arnold: Indian Song of Songs.
In 1788 the Abbé Barthélemy published
Le voyage du Jeune Anacharsis, a description of Greece in the time of Pericles and Philip.
He worked thirty years on preparing this book and at one time it was extremely popular and had great influence on the young. Baron Jean Baptiste Clootz (1755-1794), a Prussian brought up in France, assumed the name of Anacharsis after travelling about Greece and other countries in search of knowledge. He was caught up in the Revolution, when he took to himself the title of The Orator of the Human Race. He was guillotined by Robespierre in 1794.

Anaclethra. Another name for the agelasta (q.v.).

Anacreon (anak' ri ón). A Greek lyric poet, who wrote chiefly in praise of love and wine (about 563-478 B.c.).

Anacreon Moore. Thomas Moore (1779-1852), who not only translated Anacreon into English, but also wrote original poems in the same style.

Anacreon of Painters. Francesco Albano, a painter of beautiful women (1578-1660).

Anacreon of the Guillotine. Bertrand Barère de Vieuzac (1755-1841), president of the National Convention; so called from the flowery language and convivial jests used by him towards his miserable victims.

Anacreon of the Temple. Guillaume Amfrye (1639-1720), abbé de Chaulieu; French man of letters and man of the world; called by Voltaire (whom he encouraged) "the greatest of neglected poets."

Anacreon of the Twelfth Century. Walter Mapes (about 1140-1210), also called "The Jovial Toper." His best-known piece is the famous drinking-song, "Meum est propositum in taberna mori."

The French Anacreon. Pontus de Thiard, one of the Pleiad poets (1521-1605); also P. Laujon (1727-1811).

The Persian Anacreon. Hafiz (b. Shirza, d. c. 1389), greatest of Persian poets; his collected odes are known as The Duan.

The Scottish Anacreon. Alexander Scot, who flourished about 1550.

The Sicilian Anacreon. Giovanni Meli (1740-1815).

Anachronism (Gr. ana chronos, out of time). An event placed at a wrong date.

Shakespeare has several more or less glaring examples. In 1 Henry IV, ii, 3, the carrier complains that the turkeys in his pannier are quite starved; whereas turkeys were introduced from America, which was not discovered until a century after Henry's time. Again, in Julius Caesar, ii, 1, the clock strikes and Cassius says, "The clock has stricken three." But striking clocks were not invented until some 1400 years after the days of Cæsar. The great mine of literary anachronisms is to be found in the medieval romances of chivalry, where Charlemagne, Edward III, Saracens and Romans all appear as living persons.

Anagram (Gr. ana graphein, to write over again). A word or phrase formed by transposing and writing over again the letters of some other word or phrase. Among the many famous examples are:

Dame Eleanor Davies (prophetess in the reign of Charles I) = Never so mad a lady.
Gustavus = Augustus.
Horatio Nelson = Honor est a Nilo.
Queen Victoria's Jubilee Year = I require love in a subject.

Quid est Veritas (John viii, 38)? = Vír est qui adest.
Marie Touchet (mistress of Charles IX, of France) = Je charme tout (made by Henry IV).

Voltaire is an anagram of Arouet (lejeune).

These are interchangeable words:

Alcuinus and Calvinus; Amor and Roma; Eros and Rose; Evil and Live; and many more.

Ananas [Peruvian nanas]. The pineapple. Through the final "s" having been mistaken for the sign of the plural, an erroneous singular, anana, is sometimes used:—

Witness thou, best Anana! thou the pride
Of vegetable life.

THOMSON: Summer, 685.

Anastasia, St. (án as tá' zi a). A saint martyred in the reign of Nero, and commemorated on April 15. Her emblems are a stake and faggots, with a palm branch in her hand.

Anathema (áná thém' a mà). A denunciation or curse. The word is Greek, and means "a thing devoted"—originally, a thing devoted to any purpose, e.g. to the gods, but lastly a thing devoted to evil, hence, an accursed thing. It has allusion to the custom of hanging in the temple of a patron god something devoted to him. Thus Gordius hung up his yoke and beam; the shipwrecked hung up their wet clothes; retired workmen hung up their tools; cured cripples their crutches, etc.

Anatomy. He was like an anatomy—i.e. a mere skeleton, very thin, like one whose flesh had been anatomized or cut off. Shakespeare uses atomys as a synonym. Thus in 2 Henry IV, v, 4, Quickly says to the Beadle: "Thou atomys, thou!" and Doll Tearable caps the phrase with, "Come, you thin thing; come you rascal."

Anceus (án sé' ús). Helmsman of the ship Argo, after the death of Tiphys. He was told by a slave that he would never live to taste the wine of his vineyards. When wine from his own grapes was set before him on his return, he sent for the slave to laugh at his prognostications; but the slave made answer. "There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip." At this instant a messenger came in, and told Anceus that the Calydonian boar was laying his vineyard waste, whereupon he set down his cup, went out against the boar, and was killed in the encounter.

Anchor. In Christian symbolism the anchor is the sign of hope, in allusion to Heb. vi, 19, "Hope we have as an anchor of the soul." In art it is an attribute of Clement of Rome and Nicholas of Bari. Pope Clement, in The D.'80, was bound to an anchor and cast into the sea; Nicholas of Bari is the patron saint of sailors.
The anchor is speak. That is, the cable of the anchor is so tight that the ship is drawn completely over it.

The anchor comes home. The anchor has been dragged from its hold. Figuratively, the enterprise has failed, notwithstanding the precautions employed.

To weigh anchor. To haul in the anchor, so that the ship may sail away from its mooring. Figuratively, to begin an enterprise which has hung on hand.

Anchor light. A white light shown from the forward part of an anchored vessel and visible all round the horizon.

Anchor watch. A watch of one or two men, while the vessel rides at anchor, in port.

See BOWER ANCHOR: SHEET ANCHOR.

Anchorite (ān′kər līt). This is from a Greek word meaning "recluse," and it was applied to those who retired to the desert or solitary places for a life of contemplation and religious exercises. The classes of such ascetics are: monks, who adopt a secluded form of life but live in community; hermits, who withdraw to desert places but live in caves and occupy themselves manually; anchorites, who choose the greatest solitudes and deny themselves shelter and all but a minimum of food.

Ancien Régime (Fr.). The old order of things; a phrase used during the French Revolution for the old Bourbon monarchy, or the system of government, with all its evils, which existed prior to that great change.

Ancient. A corruption of ensign—a flag and the officer who bore it. Pistol was Falstaff's "ancient."

Ten times more dishonourable ragged than an old-faced ancient—SHAKESPEARE: 1 Henry IV, iv, 2.

My whole charge consists of ancients, corporals, lieutenants, gentlemen of companies... 1 Henry IV, iv, 2.

Ancient Mariner. The story in Coleridge's Rime of the Ancient Mariner (first published in the Lyrical Ballads, 1798) is founded partly on a dream told by the author's friend, Cruickshank, and partly on passages in various books that he had read. Wordsworth told him the story of the privater George Shevocke who, while rounding Cape Horn in the Speedwell, in 1720, shot a black albatross. For many weeks following the vessel encountered bad weather, being driven hither and thither before making the coast of Chile, and this ill luck was attributed to the shooting of the bird. Thomas James's Strange and Dangerous Voyage (1683) is thought to have suggested some of the more eerie episodes, while the Letter of St. Paulinus to Macarius, in which he relates astounding wonders concerning the shipwreck of an old man (1618), giving a story of how there is only one survivor of a crew and how the ship was navigated by angels and steered by "the Pilot of the World," may have furnished the basis of part of the Rime.

Ancient of Days. A scriptural name given to God (Dan. vii, 9).

Ancile (ān′sil). The Palladium of Rome; the sacred buckler said to have fallen from heaven in the time of Numa. To prevent its being stolen, he caused eleven others to be made precisely like it, and confided them to the twelve Salii, dancing priests of Mars (see Saliens), who bore them in procession through the city every year at the beginning of March.

And, "&." See AMPERSAND.

Andiron (ān′dīr on). A fire-dog; that is, a contrivance consisting of a short horizontal bar projecting from an upright stand or rod, the whole usually of iron, for the purpose of holding up the ends of logs as a wood fire. Though the contrivance is made of iron the word originally had nothing to do with the metal, but is from the Old French andier, after the late Latin andecus, andena, or anderius. The English form of the word—like the Latin—has, even in modern times, had many variations, such as end-iron and hand-iron. Andirons are also known as dogs, or fire-dogs.

Andrea Ferrara (ān drā′ ā fe′ rá′ rá). A sword, also called, from the same cause, an Andrew and a Ferrara. All these expressions are common in Elizabethan literature. So called from a famous 16th-century sword-maker of the name.

Andrew, a name used in old plays for a valet or manservant. See MERRY ANDREW.

Andrew, St., depicted in Christian art as an old man with long white hair and beard, holding the Gospel in his right hand, and leaning on a St. Andrew's cross. His day is November 30th. It is said that he suffered martyrdom in Patrace (A.D. 70). See RULE, St.

Andrew Macs, The. A slang name for the crew of H.M.S. Andromache. Similarly, the Bellerophon was called by English sailors "Billy ruffian," and the Achilles the "Ash heels." These corruptions are similar to those given under BEEFEATER (q.v.).

Androcles and the Lion (ān dro′klēz). An Oriental apologue on the benefits to be expected as a result of gratitude; told in Aesop, and by Aulus Gellius, in the GestA Rominorum, etc., but of unknown antiquity.

Androcles was a runaway slave who took refuge in a cavern. A lion entered, and instead of tearing him to pieces, lifted up his fore paw that Androcles might extract from it a thorn. The slave being subsequently captured, was doomed to fight with a lion in the Roman arena. It so happened that the same lion was let out against him, and recognizing his benefactor, showed towards him every demonstration of love and gratitude.

Android. An old name for an automaton figure resembling a human being (Gr. andros- eidos, a man's likeness).

Andromache (ān drom′ ā ki). In Greek legend she was the wife of Hector, subsequently of Neoptolemus, and finally of Helenus, Hector's brother. It is also the title of a play of Euripides.

Andromeda (ān drom′ ē dá). Daughter of Cepheus and Cassiopeia. Her mother boasted... that the beauty of Andromeda surpassed that of the Nereids; so the Nereids induced Neptune to send a sea-monster to the country, and an oracle declared that Andromeda must be given up to it. She was accordingly chained to a rock, but was delivered by Perseus, who married her; and, at the wedding, slew Phineus, to whom she had been previously promised, with all his companions. After death she was placed among the stars.

Angary. Right of. The right of a belligerent, under stress of necessity, to confiscate or destroy neutral property, especially shipping, subject to claim for compensation.

Angel. In post-canonical and apocalyptic literature angels are grouped in varying orders, and the hierarchy thus constructed was adapted to Church uses by the early Christian Fathers. In his De Hierarchia Celestis the pseudo-Dionysius (early 5th century) gives the names of the nine orders; they are taken from the Old Testament, Eph. i, 21, and Col. i, 16, and are as follows:

Seraphim and Cherubim, in the first circle Thrones and Dominions, in the second, Virtues, Powers, Principalities, Archangels and Angels in the third.

Botticelli's great picture, The Assumption of the Virgin, in the National Gallery, London, well illustrates the mediaeval conception of the "triple circles."

The seven holy angels are—Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, Uriel, Chamuel, Jophiel, and Zadkiel. Michael and Gabriel are mentioned in the Bible, Raphael in the Apocalypse, and all in the apocryphal book of Enoch (vii, 2).

Milton (Paradise Lost, Bk. i, 392) gives a list of the fallen angels.

Mohammedans say that angels were created from pure, bright gems; the genie, of fire; and man, of clay.

Angel. An obsolete English coin, current from the time of Edward IV to that of Charles I; its full name being the Anglic stone. It was the coin presented to persons touched for the King's Evil (q.v.).

Angel. In modern theatrical parlance the word is used to denote the financial backer to a play.

Angel. See Public-house signs.

Angel of the Schools. St. Thomas Aquinas. See Angelic Doctor.

On the side of the angels. See side.

Angels of Mons. The 3rd and 4th Divisions of the Old Contemptibles, under the command of Gen. Smith-Dorrien, were sorely pressed in the retreat from Mons, August 26th and 27th, 1914. Their losses were heavy, and that they survived at all was by some attributed to divine interposition. Writing from Fleet Street, Arthur Machen, a London journalist, described with great verisimilitude the host of angels who, clad in conventional white and armed with flaming swords, held back the might of the German First Army. What at first had been a "might have been" became with some a "had been"; the Angels of Mons thus grew into a phrase and a fable.

Angel-beast. A 17th-century card-game. Five cards were dealt to each player, and three heaps formed—one for the king, one for play, and the third for Triolet. The name of the game was la bête (beast), and an angel was a usual stake; hence the full name, much as we speak of "halfpenny nay," or "shilling auction."

This gentleman offers to play at Angel-beast, though he scarce knows the cards.—Sedley: Mulberry Garden (1668).

Angel visits. Delightful intercourse of short duration and rare occurrence.

Visits

Like those of angels, short and far between.

Blair: Grave, ii, 586.

Like angel visits, few and far between.

Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, ii, 378.

Angel-water. An old Spanish cosmetic, made of roses, trefoil, and lavender. So called because it was originally made chiefly of angelica.

Angel-water was the worst scent about her.

Sedley: Bellam.

Angelic Brothers. A sect of Dutch Pietists founded in the 16th century by George Gichtel. Their views on marriage were similar to those held by the Abélites and Adamites (q.v.).

Angelic Doctor. Thomas Aquinas was so called, because of the purity and excellence of his teaching. His exposition of the most recondite problems of theology and philosophy was judged to be the fruit of almost more than human intelligence, and within the present century a Pope has laid it down that from St. Thomas and his Summa Theologica all teaching must derive.

Angelic Hymn, The. The hymn beginning with Glory be to God in the highest, etc. (Luke ii, 14); so called because in the former part of it was sung by the angel host that appeared to the shepherds of Bethlehem.

Angelic Salutation, The. The Ave Maria (q.v.).

Angelic Stone. The speculum of Dr. Dee. He asserted that it was given him by the angels Raphael and Gabriel. It passed into the possession of the Earl of Peterborough, thence to Lady Betty Germaine, by whom it was given to the Duke of Argyll, whose son presented it to Horace Walpole. It was sold in 1842, at the dispersal of the curiosities of Strawberry Hill.

Angelica (án jel’i ká). This beautiful but fickle young woman was the heroine of Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato and Ariosto's Orlando Furioso. Orlando's unrequited love for her drove him mad. The name was used also by Congreve for the principal character in Love for Love and by Farquhar in The Constant Couple and Sir Harry Wildair.

Angelus, The (án’je lús). A Roman Catholic devotion in honour of the Incarnation, consisting of three texts, each said as versicle and response and followed by the Ave Maria, Angurvadel. Frithiof's sword, inscribed with "'ith Plato, Stoics, it meant ass; (7) the ox of Moses; (8) the dog Kratim of Alfred the Great.

Anger is valuable for the history of England from the birth of Christ to 1154. It is written in Anglo-Saxon, is in prose, and was probably begun in the time of Alfred the Great. It is valuable for the information it gives regarding the 8th and 9th centuries.

Angra Mainyu. See AHRIMAN.

Angurvadel. Frithiof's sword, inscribed with runic letters, which blazed in time of war, but gleamed with a dim light in time of peace. See SWORD.

Animas Mundm (än’i mà mán’di) (the soul of the world), with the oldest of the ancient philosophers, meant "the source of life"; with Plato, it meant "the animating principle of matter," inferior to pure spirit; with the Stoics, it meant "the whole vital force of the universe."

G. E. Stahl (1660–1734) taught that the phenomena of animal life are due to an immortal anima, or vital principle distinct from matter.

Animals in Heaven. According to Moham-median legend the following ten animals have been allowed to enter paradise:—

(1) Jonah's whale; (2) Solomon's ant; (3) the ram caught by Abraham and sacrificed instead of Isaac; (4) the lapwing of Balkis; (5) the camel of the prophet Saleh; (6) Balaam's ass; (7) the ox of Moses; (8) the dog Kratim of the Seven Sleepers; (9) Al Borak, Mohammed's ass; and (10) Noah's dove.

Animals in art. Some animals are appropriated to certain saints: as the calf or ox to St. Luke; the cock to St. Peter; the eagle to St. John the Divine; the lion to St. Mark and St. Jerome; the raven to St. Benedict, etc.

Animals sacred to special deities. To Apollo, the wolf, the griffin, and the crow; to Bacchus, the dragon and the panther; to Diana, the stag; to Asclepius, the serpent; to Hercules, the deer; to Isis, the heifer; to Jupiter, the eagle; to Juno, the peacock and the lamb; to the Lares, the dog; to Mars, the horse and the vulture; to Mercury, the cock; to Minerva, the owl; to Mercury, the bull; to Tethys, the halcyon; to Venus, the dove, the swan, and the sparrow; to Vulcan, the lion, etc.

Animals in symbolism. The lamb, the pelican, and the unicorn, are symbols of Christ.

The dragon, serpent, and swine, symbolize Satan and his crew.

The ant symbolizes frugality and prevision; ape, uncleanness, malice, lust, and cunning; ass, stupidity; bantam cock, pluckiness, priggishness; bat, blindness; bear, ill-temper, uncouthness; bee, industry; beetle, blindness; bull, strength, straightforwardness; bull-dog, pertinacity; butterfly, sportiveness, living in pleasure; camel, submission; cat, deceit; calf, lumpishness, cowardice; cicada, poetry; cock, vigilance, overbearing insolence; crow, longevity; crocodile, hypocrisy; cuckoo, cuckoldom; dog, fidelity, dirty habits; dove, innocence, harmlessness; duck, deceit (French, canard, a hoax); eagle, majesty, inspiration; elephant, sagacity, ponderosity; fly, feebleness, insignificance; fox, cunning, artifice; frog and toad, inspiration; goat, lasciviousness; goose, conceit, folly; gull, gullibility; grasshopper, old age; hare, timidity; hawk, rapacity, penetration; hen, maternal care; hog, impurity; horse, speed, grace; jackdaw, vain assumption, empty conceit; jay, senseless chatter; kitten, playfulness; lamb, innocence, sacrifice; lark, cheerfulness; leopard, sin; lion, noble courage; lynx, suspicious vigilance; magpie, garrulity; mole, blindness, obtuseness; monkey, tricks; mule, obstinacy; nightingale, forlornness; ostrich, stupidity; ox, patience, strength, and pride; owl, wisdom; parrot, mocking verbosity; peacock, pride; pigeon, cowardice (pigeon-livered); pig, obstinacy, dirtiness, glutony; puppy, conceit; rabbit, secundity; raven, ill luck; raven, Jason's crow; red-breast, confiding trust; serpent, wisdom; sheep, slowness, timidity; sparrow, lasciviousness; spider, wiliness; stag, cuckoldom; swan, grace; tiger, ferocity; tortoise, chastity; turkey-cock, official insolence; turtle-dove, conjugal fidelity; vulture, rapine; wolf, cruelty, ferocity; worm, cringing; etc.

Animals, Cries of. To the cry, call, or voice of many animals a special name is given; to apply these names indiscriminately is always wrong and frequently ludicrous. Thus, we do not speak of the "croak" of a dog or the "bark" of a bee. Apes gibber; ass bray; bees hum; beetles drone; bear growl; bitterns boom; blackbirds and thrushes whistle; bulls... bellow; cats mew, purr, swear, and caterwaul; calves bleat; chaffinches chirp or pink; chickens peep; cocks crow; cows moo or low; crows caaw; cuckoos cry cuckoo; deer bellow; dogs bark, bay, howl, and yelp; doves coo; ducks quack; eagles, vultures, and peacocks scream; falcons chant; flies buzz; foxes bark and yelp: frogs croak; geese cackle and hiss; grasshoppers chirp and pitter; guineafowls cry “Come back”; and guinea-pigs and hares squeak: hawks scream; hens cackle and cluck; horses neigh and whinny; hvenas laugh: jays and magpies chatter; kittens meow; lambs bleat; snakes hiss; sparrows chirp; stags bellow and call; swallows twitter; swans cry coo; as the fire of a horse, called in Latin or hie.at; snakes hiss; sparrows chirp; stags cackle; c:i.:i.Je O\ kitter. pee-wit; pigeons squeal: hawks scream; hens cackle and cluck; horses neigh and whinny; hvenas laugh: jays and magpies chatter; kittens meow; lambs bleat; snakes hiss; sparrows chirp; stags bellow and call; swallows twitter; swans cry and are said to sing just before death (see SWAN); turkey-cocks gobble; wolves howl. Most birds, besides many of those here mentioned, sing, but we speak of the chick-chick of the black-cap, the drumming of the grouse, and the churr of the whitethroat.

Animosity meant originally animation, spirit, as the fire of a horse, called in Latin equi animositas. Its present exclusive use in a bad sense is an instance of the tendency which words originally neutral have to assume a bad meaning.

Animula, vagula, etc. (an im' ū lá vág' ū lá). The opening of a poem to his soul, ascribed by his biographer, Aelius Spartanus, to the dying Emperor Hadrian:—

Animula, vagula, blandula.

Hospes, comesque corporis; Qui se habet, Pallidula, rigida, nudula: Nescut solis, dabis jocos!

It was Englished by Byron:—

Ah! gentle, fleeting, waving sprite, Friend and associate of this clay! To what unknown region borne, Wilt thou now wing thy distant flight? No more with wondred humour gay, But pallid, cheerless, and forlorn.

Ann, Mother. Ann Lee (1736-1784), the founder and “spiritual mother” of the American Society of Shakers (q.v.).

Annabel, in Dryden’s Absalom and Achitophel, is designed for Anne Scott, Duchess of Monmouth and Countess of Bucleuch, the richest heiress in Europe. The duke was faithless to her, and, after his death, the widow, still handsome, married again.

To all his [Monmouth’s] wishes, nothing he [David] denied:

And made the charming Annabel his bride. i, 33.

Annates (án’ átz) (Lat. annus, a year). One entire year’s income claimed by the Pope on the appointment of a bishop or other ecclesiastic in the Catholic Church, also called the first fruits. By the Statute of Recusants (25 Hen. VIII, c. 20, and the Confirming Act), the right to English Annates and Tenches was transferred to the Crown; but, in the reign of Queen Anne, annates were given up to form a fund for the augmentation of poor livings. See Queen Anne’s Bounty.

Anne’s Great Captain. The Duke of Marlborough (1650-1722).

Annie Laurie was eldest of the three daughters of Sir Robert Laurie, of Maxwellton, born December 16th, 1682. William Douglas, of Fingland (Kirkcudbright), wrote the popular song, but Annie married, in 1709, James Ferguson, of Craigmillar, and was the grandmother of Alexander Ferguson, the hero of Burns’s song called The Whistle.

Anno Domini (án’ ō dom’ i ni) (Lat.). In the Year of our Lord; i.e. in the year since the Nativity; generally abbreviated to “A.D.” It was Dionysius Exiguus who fixed the date of the Nativity; he lived in the early 6th century, and his computation is probably late by some three to six years.

The phrase is sometimes used as a slang synonym for old age; thus, “Anno Domini is his trouble,” means that he is suffering from senile decay.

Annunciation, The Day of the. March 25th, also called Lady Day, on which the angel announced to the Virgin Mary that she would be the mother of the Messiah.

Order of the Annunciation. An Italian order of military knights, founded as the Order of the Collar by Amadeus VI of Savoy in 1362, and dating under its present name from 1518. It has on its collar the letters F E R T. Fert (Lat. he bears) is an ancient motto of the House of Savoy; but the letters have also been interpreted as standing for the initials of Fortitudo Eius Rhodum Tenuit, in allusion to the succour rendered to Rhodes by Savoy in 1310; Fadere et Religionem Tenemur, on the gold doubloon of Victor Amadeus I (1718-1730); or, Fortitudo Eius Rempublicam Tenet.

Sisters of the Annunciation. See FRANCISCANS.

Annus Luctus (án’ ūs lük’ tūs) (Lat. the year of mourning). The period during which a widow is supposed to remain unmarried. If she marries within about nine months from the death of her husband and a child is born, a doubt might arise as to its paternity. Such a marriage is not illegal.

Annus Mirabilis (án’ us mir’ ā’ lis). The year of wonders, 1666, memorable for the great fire of London and the successes of English arms over the Dutch. Dryden wrote a poem with this title, in which he described both these events.

Anodyne Necklace, An. An anodyne is a medicine to relieve pain, and the anodyne necklace was an amulet supposed to be efficacious against various diseases. In Johnson’s Idler, No. 40, we read:—

The true pathos of advertisements must have sunk deep into the heart of every man that remembers the cease shown by the seller of the anodyne necklace, for the ease and safety of poor toothless infants.
The term soon came to be applied to the hangman's noose, and we have George Primrose saying:

"May I die by an anodyne necklace, but I had rather be an under-turnkey than an usher in a boarding-school."—GOLDSMITH, _Vicar of Wakefield_, ch. xx.

Anon. The O.E. _on ane_, in one (state, mind, course, body, etc.), the present meaning—soon, in a little while—being a misuse of the earlier meaning—straightway, _at once_—much as _directly_ and immediately are misused. _Mark_ i, 30, gives an instance of the old meaning—

But Simon's wife's mother lay sick of a fever, and anon they tell him of her.

this is the Authorized Version: the Revised Version gives _straightway_. Wordsworth's—

Fast the churchyard _folks_;—_anon_—look again, and they all are gone. _White Doe of Rylstone_, i, 31.

exemplifies the later meaning. The word also was used by servants, tapsters, etc., as an interjectional reply meaning "Coming, sir!"

Answer is the O.E. _and-sworn_, verb _and-swarian_ or _swarian_, where _and_ is the preposition—the Lat. _re_ in _re-spond-er_. To _swear_ (q.v.) means literally "to affirm something," and to _an-swear_ is to "say something" by way of rejoinder.

To _answer its purpose_. To carry out what was expected or what was intended.

To _answer more Scotico_. To divert the direct question by starting another question or subject.

_Antaeus_ (àn tè' us), in Greek mythology, a gigantic wrestler (son of Earth and Sea, Ge and Poseidon), whose strength was invincible so long as he touched the earth. When he was lifted his strength diminished, but it was renewed by touching the earth again.

_Antarctica_ (àn tark' tik ə). The name given to the great continent that covers the region of the South Pole. Its area is about 5,000,000 sq. miles. It contains mountains from 8,000 to 15,000 ft. in height, with several volcanoes, of which only one, Mt. Erebus, is now active. There are no land animals, but it is notable for its penguins. There is no international agreement as to territorial rights, which lie largely between Britain, the Commonwealth of Australia and Argentina.

Antediluvian. Before the Deluge. The word is colloquially used in a disparaging way for anything that is very out of date.

Anthology. The Greek anthology is a collection of several thousand short Greek poems by many authors of every period of Greek literature from the Persian war to the decadence of Byzantium. The most complete edition was published in 1794-1814.

Anthony the Great. St. The patron saint of swineherds; he lived in the 4th century, and was the founder of the fraternity of ascetics who lived in the deserts. The story of his temptations by the devil is well known in literature and art. His day is 17th January. Not to be confused with St. Anthony of Padua, who was a Franciscan of the 13th century, and is commemorated on June 13th. See also TANTONY.

St. Anthony's fire. Erysipelas is so called from the tradition that those who sought the intercession of St. Anthony recovered from the pestilential erysipelas called the _sacred fire_, which proved so fatal in 1089.

St. Anthony's pig. A pet pig, the smallest of the litter, also called the "tontony pig" (q.v.); in allusion to St. Anthony being the patron saint of swineherds.

The term is also used of a sponger or hanger-on. Stow says that the officers of the market used to slit the ears of pigs unfit for food. One day one of the proctors of St. Anthony's Hospital tied a bell about a pig whose ear was slit, and no one would ever hurt it. The pig would follow like a dog anyone who fed it.

_Anthroposophy_ (àn thrôs' ô fô). The nickname of Thomas Vaughan (1622-1666), the alchemist, twin-brother of Henry Vaughan, the Silurist. He was rector of St. Bridget's in Brecknockshire, and was so called from his _Anthroposophia Teomagica_ (1650), a book written to show the condition of man after death.

_Antic Hay_. See _Hay_.

Antichrist. The many legends connected with Antichrist, or the Man of Sin, expected by some to precede the second coming of Christ, that were so popular in the Middle Ages are chiefly founded on 2_Thes._ _ii_, 1-12, and _Rev._ _xiii_. In ancient times Antichrist was identified with Caligula, Nero, etc., and there is little doubt that in 2_Thes._ _ii_, 7, St. Paul was referring to the Roman Empire. Mohammed was also called Antichrist, and the name has been given to many disturbers of the world's peace, even to Napoleon and to William II of Germany (see NUMBER OF THE BEAST). The Mohammedans have a legend that Christ will slay the Antichrist at the gate of the church at Lydda, in Palestine.

Anti-pope. A pope chosen or nominated by temporal authority in opposition to one canonically elected by the cardinals; or one who usurps the papacy: the term is particularly applied to rival claimants to the papal Throne during the Great Schism of the West, 1309-1376. They are:—

Nicholas V 1328-1330
Clement XIII 1424-1429
Clement VII 1378-1394
Benedict XIV 1424-1439
Benedict XIII 1394-1424
Felix V 1439-1449

_Antigone_ (àn teg' oni). The subject of a tragedy by Sophocles; she was the daughter of _Edipus_ by his mother, _Jocasta_. In consequence of disobeying an edict of _Creon_ she was imprisoned in a cave, where she slew herself. She was famed for her devotion to her brother, _Polyneices_, hence the Duchess of Antimone (1778-1851), sister and prison companion of Louis XVII, was sometimes called the Modern Antigone.

Antimony (an'ti mon'i). A word of unknown but (as it was introduced through alchemy) probably of Arabian origin. "Popular etymology" has been busy with this word, and Johnson—copying earlier writers—in his Dictionary derives it from the Greek antimonos-achos (bad for monks), telling the story that a prior once gave some of this mineral to his convent pigs, who thrived upon it, and became very fat. He next tried it on the monks, who died from its effects.

Antinomian (án'ti nö' mi'án) (Gr. anti-nomos, exempt from the law). One who believes that Christians are not bound to observe the "law of God," but "may continue in sin that grace may abound." The term was first applied to John Agricola, advocate of Martin Luther, and was given to a sect that arose in Germany about 1535.

Antinous (án' tin'ó ús). A model of manly beauty. He was the page of Hadrian, the Roman Emperor.

Antiquarian. A standard size of drawing paper measuring 53 in. by 31 in.

Antisthenes (án tis' the nèz'). Founder of the Cynic School in Athens, born about 444 B.C., died about 370. He wore a ragged cloak, and carried a wallet and staff; like a beggar. Socrates, whose pupil he was, wittily said he could "see rank pride peering through the holes of Antisthenes' rags."

Antonius (án tō nī' nōús). The Wall of Antoninus. A wall of regularly laid sods resting on a stone pavement, built by the Romans about 100 miles north of Hadrian's Wall, from Dumbarton on the Clyde to Carriden on the Forth, under the direction of Lollius Urbicus, governor of the province under Antoninus Pius, about A.D. 140. It was probably some 14 ft. thick at the base and about the same height; it was fortified at frequent intervals, and was faced with a deep ditch.

Anthus (án trús' ti ó nz). (O.Fr., from O.H.Ger. trost, trust, fidelity). The chief followers of the Frankish kings, who were specially trusted to them.

None but the king could have antrustions. STUBBS: Constitutional History, 1, ix.

Anubis (án' nū' bis). In Egyptian mythology similar to the Hermes of Greece, whose office it was to take the souls of the dead before the judge of the infernal regions. Anubis was the son of Osiris the judge, and is represented with a human body and jackal's head.

Anvil. It is on the anvil, under deliberation; the project is in hand.

Anzac. Word coined in 1915 from the initials of Australian and New Zealand Army Corps. It was then applied to the area in Gallipoli where those troops landed. The word was used again in World War II.

Anzac Day. April 25th, commemorating the landing of the Corps in Gallipoli in 1915.

Anzac Pact. The agreement between Australia and New Zealand in 1944.

Aonian (ái' ön an). Poetical, pertaining to the Muses. The Muses, according to Greek mythology, dwelt in Aonia, that part of Beotia which contains Mount Helicon and the Muses' Fountain. Milton speaks of "the Aonian mount" (Paradise Lost, i, 15), and Thomson calls the fraternity of poets "The Aonian hive"—Who praised are, and stave right merrily. CASTLE OF INDOLENCE, ii, 2.

A outrage. See À l'outrance.

Apache (áp' pach'é). The name of a tribe of North American Indians, given to—or adopted by—the hooligans and roughs of Paris about the opening of the present century (in this case pronounced á' pash'). The use of the name for this purpose has a curious parallel in the Mohocks (q.v.) of the 17th century.

Ape. To copy, to imitate.

The buffoon ape, in Dryden's The Hind and the Panther, means the Freethinkers. Next her [the bear] the buffoon ape, as atheists use, Minicked all sects, and had his own to choose. Part i, 39.

He keeps them, like an ape, in the corner of his jaw; first mouthed, to be last swallowed (Hamlet, iv, 2). Most of the Old World monkeys have cheek pouches, which they use as receptacles for food.

To lead apes in hell. It is an old saying (frequent in the Elizabethan dramatists) that "this is the fate of old maids. Hence, ape-leader, an old maid."

I will even take sixpence in earnest of the bearward, and lead his apes into hell. SHAKESPEARE: Much Ado about Nothing, ii, 1.

Women, dying maids, lead apes in hell. The London Prodigal, i, 2.

I will rather hazard my being one of the Devil's Ape-leaders, than to marry while he is melancholy. BROMEO: The Jovial Crew, ii.

To play the ape, to play practical jokes; to play silly tricks; to make facial imitations, like an ape.

To put an ape into your hood (or cap)—i.e., to make a fool of you. Apes were formerly carried on the shoulders of fools and simpletons.

To say an ape's patronster, is to chatter with fright or cold, like an ape. One of the books in Rabelais' "Library of St. Victor" is called "The Ape's Patronstar.

Apelles (áp e' pel' ezh). A famous Grecian painter, contemporary with Alexander the Great. He was born at Colophon, on the coast of Asia Minor, and is known as the Chian painter—

The Chian painter, when he was required To portrait Venus in her perfect hue, To make his work more absolute, desired Of all the fairest maids to have the view. SPENSER: Dedicatory Sonnets, xvii.

Aper-se (á pér sè). An A I: a person or thing of unusual merit. "A" all alone, with no one who can follow, nemo proximus aut secundus.

Chaucer calls Cresseide "the florile and Aper-se of Troi and Greek." London, thou art of townes A-per-se. DUNBAR (1501).
Apex. The topmost height, summit, or tiptop; originally the pointed olive-wood spike on the top of the cap of a Roman flamen; also the crest or spike of a helmet.

Aphrodite (a'fro'di ti) (Gr. aphros, foam). The Greek Venus; so called because she sprang from the foam of the sea.

Aphrodite's girdle. The cestus (q.v.).

Apicius (a pis'i ús) A gourmand. Marcus Gabius Apicius was a Roman gourmand of the time of Augustus and Tiberius, whose income being reduced by his luxurious living to only ten million sesterces (about $80,000), put an end to his life, to avoid the misery of being obliged to live on plain diet.

A-pig-back. See Pick-a-back.

Apis (a'pis). In Egyptian mythology, the bull of Memphis, sacred to Osiris of whose soul it was supposed to be the image. The sacred bull had to have natural spots on the forehead forming a triangle, and a half-moon on the breast. It was not suffered to live more than twenty-five years, when it was sacrificed and buried with great pomp. Cambyses, King of Persia (529-522 B.C.), and conqueror of Egypt, slew the sacred bull of Memphis with his own hands, and is said to have become mad in consequence.

Apocalyptic Number. 666 See Number of the Beast.

Apocrypha (a pok' ri fa) (Gr. apokrupto, hidden); hence, of unknown authorship: the explanation given in the Preface to the Apocrypha in the 1539 Bible that the books are so called "because they were wont to be read not openly ... but, as it were, in secret and apart" is not tenable. Those books included in the Septuagint and Vulgate versions of the Old Testament, but which, at the Reformation, were excluded from the Sacred Canon by the Protestants, mainly on the grounds that they were not originally written in Hebrew, and were not looked upon as genuine by the Jews. They are not printed in Protestant Bibles in ordinary circulation, but in the Authorized Version, as printed in 1611, they are given immediately after the Old Testament. The books are as follows:—

1 and 2 Esdras. Baruch, with the Epistle of Jeremiah.
Judith. The Song of the Three Children.
The rest of Esther. The Story of Susanna.
Wisdom. The Idol Bel and the Dragon.
Ecclesiasticus. 1 and 2 Maccabees.

The New Testament also has a large number of apocryphal books more or less attached to it: these consist of later gospels and epistles, apocalypses, etc., as well as such recently discovered fragments as Logia (sayings of Jesus) of the Oxyrhynchus papyrus. The best-known books of the New Testament apocrypha are:—

Protevangelium, or the Book of James.
Gospel of Nicodemus, or the Acts of Pilate.
The Ascent of James.
The Acts of Paul and Thecla.
Letters of Abgarus to Christ.
Epistles of Paul to the Laodiceans, and to the Alexandrines, and the Third Epistle to the Corinthians.
The Teaching of the Apostles (Didache).
The three Books of the Shepherd of Hermas.

Apollonians (a pol in ár i anz). An heretical sect founded in the middle of the 4th century by Apollinaris, a presbyter of Laodicea. They denied that Christ had a human soul, and asserted that the Eros supplied its place. The heresy was condemned at the Council of Chalcedon, the fourth General Council, 451.

Apollo (a pol' ó). In Greek and Roman mythology, son of Zeus and Leto (Latona), one of the great gods of Olympus, typifying the sun in its light- and life-giving as well as in its destroying power; often identified with Helios, the sun-god. He was god of music, poetry, and the healing art, the latter of which he bestowed on his son, Aesculapius. He is represented in art as the perfection of youthful manhood.

The fire-robed god,

Golden Apollo.

Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iv, 4. Apollo with the plectrum strook

The chords, and from beneath his hands a crash

Of mighty sounds rushed forth, whose music shook

The soul with sweetness, and like an adept

His sweeter voice a just accordance kept,

Shelley: Homer's Hymn to Mercury, lxxv.

A perfect Apollo is a model of manly beauty, referring to the Apollo Belvedere (q.v.).

Apollo of Portugal. Luis Camoens (c. 1524-1580), author of the Lusiad; the great Portuguese poet, who ended his days in poverty.

Apollo Belvedere. An ancient marble statue, supposed to be a Roman-Greek copy of a bronze votive statue set up at Delphi in commemoration of the repulse of an attack by the Gauls on the shrine of Apollo in 279 B.C. It represents the god holding the remains of a bow, or (according to some conjectures) an aegis, in his left hand, and is called Belvedere from the Belvedere Gallery of the Vatican, where it stands. It was discovered in 1495, amidst the ruins of Antium and was purchased by Pope Julius II.

Apollodorus (a pol' ó dór' ús). Plato says: "Who would not rather be a man of sorrows than Apollodorus, envied by all for his enormous wealth, yet nourishing in his heart the scorpions of a guilty conscience" (The Republic). This Apollodorus was the tyrant of Cassandra. He obtained the supreme power 379 B.C., exercised it with the utmost cruelty, and was put to death by Antigonos Gonatas.

Apollonius of Tyana (fl. c. 4 B.C.). A Pythagorean philosopher. He professed to have powers of magic and it was he who discovered that the young Phoenician woman whom Menippus Lycius intended to wed was in fact a serpent, or lamia. This story was noted by Robert Burton in his Anatomy of Melancholy, and it forms the subject of Keats's Lamia.

Apollon (a pol' yón). The Greek name of Abaddon (q.v.), king of hell and angel of the bottomless pit. (Rev. ix, 11.) His introduction by Bunyan into The Pilgrim's Progress has made his name familiar.
Apostrophe. See Quos ego.

Apostate. The. Julian, the Roman emperor (331-363). He was brought up as a Christian, but on his accession to the throne (361) he announced his conversion to paganism and proclaimed the free toleration of all religions.

A posteriori (à pos té'ri ör'ī). (Lat. from the latter). An a posteriori argument is proving the cause from the effect. Thus, if we see a watch there was another watchmaker. Robinson Crusoe inferred there was another human being on the desert island, because he saw a human footprint in the wet sand. It is thus the existence and character of God are inferred from His works. See A PRIORI.

Apostles. In the preamble of the statutes instituting the Order of St. Michael, founded in 1469 by Louis XI, the archangel is styled “my lord,” and is created a knight. The apostles had been already ennobled and knighted. We read of “the Earl Peter,” “Count Paul,” “the Baron Stephen,” and so on. Thus, in the introduction of a sermon upon St. Stephen’s Day, we have these lines:—

Contes vous vueille la patron
De St. Estueil le baron.

The Apostles were gentlemen of bloude ... and Christ ... might, if He had esteemed of the very glory of this world, have borne coat armour.

The Blazon of Gentrie.

The badges or symbols of the fourteen apostles (i.e., the twelve original apostles with Matthias and Paul).

Andrew, an X-shaped cross, because he was crucified on one bar.

Bartholomew, a knife, because he was flayed with a knife.

James the Great, a scallop shell, a pilgrim’s staff, or a gourd bottle, because he is the patron saint of pilgrims. See SCALLOP SHELL.

James the Less, a fuller’s pole, because he was killed by a blow on the head with a pole, dealt him by Simeon the fuller.

John, a cup with a winged serpent flying out of it, in allusion to the tradition about Aristodemus, priest of Diana, who challenged John to drink a cup of poison. John made the sign of a cross on the cup, Satan like a dragon flew from it, and John then drank the potion which was quite innocuous.

Judas Iscariot, a box, because he had the bag and “bare what was put therein” (John xii, 6).

Jude, a club, because he was martyred with a club.

Matthew, a hatchet or halberd, because he was slain at Nadabar with a halberd.

Matthias, a battleaxe, because he was first stoned, and then beheaded with a battleaxe.

Paul, a sword, because his head was cut off with a sword. The convent of La Lisla, in Spain, boasts of possessing the very instrument.

Peter, a bunch of keys, because Christ gave him the keys of the kingdom of heaven. A cock, because he went out and wept bitterly when he heard the cock crow (Matt. xxvi, 75).

Philip, a long staff surmounted with a cross, because he suffered death by being suspended by the neck from a tall pillar.

Simon, a saw, because he was sawn to death, according to tradition.

Thomas, a lance, because he was pierced through the body, at Melaïper, with a lance.

According to Catholic legend, seven of the Apostles are buried at Rome.

Andrew lies buried at Amalfi (Naples).

Bartholomew, at Rome, in the church of Bartholomew, on the Tiber Island.

James the Great was buried at St. Jago de Compostella, in Spain.

James the Less, at Rome, in the church of SS. Philip and James.

Jude, at Rome.

Matthew, at Salerno (Naples).

Matthew, at Rome, under the altar of the Basilica.

Paul, somewhere in Italy.

Peter, at Rome, in the church of St. Peter.

Philip, at Rome.

Simon of Sinem, at Rome.

Thomas, at Ortona (Naples). (? Madras.) The supposed remains of Mark the Evangelist were buried at Venice, about 800.

Luke the Evangelist is said to have been buried at Padua.

N.B.—Italy claims thirteen of these apostles or evangelists—Rome seven, Naples three, Mark at Venice, Luke at Padua, and Paul at Rome.

See EVANGELISTS.

Apostles of Abysinnians, St. Frumentius. (Fourth century.)

Alps, Felix Neff. (1798-1829.)

Andalusia, Juan de Avila. (1500-1569.)

Ardennes, St. Hubert. (656-727.)

Armenians, Gregory of Armenia, “The Illuminator.” (256-311.)

Brazil, José de Anchieta, a Jesuit missionary. (1533-1597.)

English, St. Augustine. (Died 604.) St. George.

Free Trade, Richard Cobden. (1804-1865.)

French, St. Denis. (Third century.)

Frisians, St. Willibrord. (657-738.)

Gauls, St. Irenæus (130-200; St. Martin of Tours (338-401.)

Gentiles, St. Paul.

Germany, St. Boniface. (680-755.)

Highlanders, St. Columba. (521-597.)

Hungary, St. Anastasius. (954-1044.)

Indians (American), Bartolome de las Casas (1474-1566). John Eliot (1604-1690.)

Indies (East), St. Francis Xavier. (1506-1552.)

Ireland, St. Patrick. (373-463.)

North, St. Ansgar or Anscarius, missionary to Scandinavia (180-864); Bernard Gilpin, Archdeacon of Durham, evangelist on the Scottish border. (1517-1583.)

Peru, Alonso de Barcena, a Jesuit missionary. (1528-1598.)

Picts, St. Ninian. (Fifth century.)

Scottish Reformers, John Knox. (1505-1572.)

Slavs, St. Cyril. (c. 920-969.)

Spain, St. James the Great. (Died 62.)

The Sword, Mohammed. (570-632.)

Temperance, Father Mathew. (1790-1856.)

Yorkshire, Paulinus, bishop of York and Rochester. (Died 644.)

Wales, St. David. (Died about 601.)

Prince of the Apostles. St. Peter. (Matt. xvi, 18, 19.)

Twelve Apostles. The last twelve names on the poll or list of ordinary degrees were so called, when the list was arranged in order of merit, and not alphabetically, as now: they were also called the Chosen Twelve. The last of the twelve was designated “St. Paul,” from a play on the verse 1 Cor. xv, 9. The same term was later applied to the last twelve in the Mathematical Tripos.

Apostle spoons. Spoons having the figure of one of the apostles at the top of the handle, formerly given at christenings. Sometimes two spoons, representing the twelve apostles; sometimes four, representing the four evangelists; and sometimes only one, was presented. Occasionally a set occurs containing in addition the “Master Spoon” and the “Lady Spoon.”
Apostles' Creed. A Church creed supposed to be an epitome of doctrine taught by the apostles. It was received into the Latin Church, in its present form, in the 11th century, but a formula somewhat like it existed in the 2nd century. Items were added in the 4th and 5th centuries, and verbal alterations much later.

Apostolic Fathers. Christian authors born in the 1st century, when the apostles lived. John is supposed to have died about A.O. 99, was his disciple. Clement of Rome (died about 100), Ignatius (died about 115), Polycarp (about 69-155), St. Barnabas, to whom an apocryphal epistle (now usually assigned to the 2nd century) was ascribed by Clemens Alexanderinus and Origen (martyred, 61), Hermas (author of The Shepherd of Hermas, and possibly identical with the Hermens of Rom. xvi, 14), and Papias, a bishop of Hierapolis, mentioned by Eusebius.

Apostolic Majesty. A title borne by the emperors of Austria, as kings of Hungary. It was conferred by Pope Sylvester II on the King of Hungary in 1000. Cp. RELIGIOUS.

Apostolic Succession. This is the term in use for the doctrine that the mission given to the apostles by Christ (John xx, 23 and Matt. xxviii, 19) must extend to their legitimate successors in an unbroken line. This means in practice that only those clergy who have been ordained by bishops who are themselves in the succession can administer the sacraments and perform other sacerdotal functions.

Apparel. One meaning of this word used to be "ornament" or "embellishment," especially the embroidery on ecclesiastical vestments. In the 19th century it was revived, and applied to the ornamental parts of the alb at the lower edge and at the wrists. Pugin says:—

The alb should be made with apparels worked in silk or gold, embroidered with ornaments.—Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornament (1844).

Appeal to the Country. To ask the nation to express their opinion on some moot question. In order to obtain such public opinion Parliament must be dissolved and a general election held.

Appiades (áp' i á déz). Five divinities whose temple stood near the fountains of Appius, in Rome. Their names are Venus, Pallas, Concord, Peace, and Vesta. They were represented on horseback, like Amazons.

Appian Way (áp' i án). The oldest and best known of all the Roman roads, leading from Rome to Brundisium (Brindisi) by way of Capua. This "queen of roads" was begun by Appius Claudius, the decemvir, 313 B.C.

Apple. The well-known story of Newton and the Apple originated with Voltaire, who tells us that Mrs. Conduit, Newton's niece, told him that Newton was at Woolsthorpe (visiting his mother) in 1666, when, seeing an apple fall, he was led into the train of thought which resulted in his establishment of the law of gravitation (1685).

Apple of Discord. A cause of dispute; something to contend about. At the marriage of Thetis and Peleus, where all the gods and goddesses met together, Discord (Eris), who had not been invited, threw on the table a golden apple "for the most beautiful." Juno, Minerva, and Venus put in their separate claims; the point was referred to Paris (q.v.), who gave judgment in favour of Venus. This brought upon him the vengeance of Juno and Minerva, to whose spite the fall of Troy is attributed.

The apple appears more than once in Greek story; see ATALANTA'S RACE; HESPERIDES. There is no mention of an apple in the Bible story of Eve's temptation. We have no further particulars than that it was "the fruit of the tree in the midst of the garden," and the Mohammedans leave the matter equally vague, though their commentators hazard the guess that it may have been an ear of wheat, or the fruit of the vine or the fig. The apple is a comparatively late conjecture. For the story of William Tell and the apple, see TELL.

Prince Ahmed's apple. In the Arabian Nights story of Prince Ahmed, a cure for every disorder. The prince purchased it at Samar-cand.

Apples of Istakhar are "all sweetness on one side, and all bitterness on the other."

Apples of Paradise, according to tradition, had a bite on one side, to commemorate the bite given by Eve.

Apples of perpetual youth. In Scandinavian mythology, the golden apples of perpetual youth, in the keeping of Idhunn, d. "giver of the dwarf Svaed, and wife of Bragi. It is by tasting them that the gods preserve their youth.

Apples of Pyban, says Sir John Mandeville, fed the pigmies with their odour only.

Apples of Sodom. Thevenot says—"There are apple-trees on the sides of the Dead Sea which bear lovely fruit, but within are full of ashes." Josephus, Strabo, Tacitus, and others speak of these apples, and are probably referring to the gall-nuts produced by the insect Cynips insana. The phrase is used figuratively for anything disappointing.

You see, my lords, what greatly the scene; Yet like those apples travellers report To sow where Sodom and Gomorrah stood, I will but touch her, and straight you will see She'll fall to soot and ashes.

WEBSTER: The White Devil.

Apple of the eye. The pupil, because it is the apple of the eye. It is said that the fruit of this tree was the very apple of Sodom and Gomorrah. The phrase is used to express that which is most precious, or anything extremely dear or extremely sensitive. He kept him as the apple of his eye.—Deut. xxxii, 10.

Apple-cart. To upset the apple-cart. To ruin carefully laid plans. To have one's expectations blighted, as a farmer's might be when his load of apples was overturned. This phrase is recorded as in use as early as 1796.

Apple-jack. An apple-turnover is sometimes so called in East Anglia. In the United States the name is given to a drink distilled from fermented apple juice—like French Calvados.
Apple-john. An apple so called from its being at maturity about St. John's Day (Dec. 27th). We are told that apple-johns will keep for two years, and are best when shrivelled.

I am withered like an old apple-john.

Shakespeare: Henry IV, iii, 3.

Sometimes incorrectly called the Apples of King John.

Apple-pie bed. A bed in which the sheets are so folded that a person cannot get his legs down; perhaps a corruption of "a nappe-plit bed." From the Fr. nappe pliée, a folded sheet. Also incorrectly used by schoolboys to describe a bed into which a quantity of strange objects have been piled to discomfit the occupant.

Apple-pie order. Prim and precise order.

The origin of this phrase is still doubtful. Perhaps the suggestion made above of nappe-pliée (Fr. nappes pliées, folded linen, neat as folded linen) is near the mark.

Apple-polishing. An attempt to win favour by gifts or flattery. From the practice of American schoolchildren of bringing shiny apples to their teachers.

Apple Tree Gang. The name given to John Reid, and his friends, from Scotland, who were responsible for the introduction of Golf into U.S.A. in 1888, at Yonkers, N.Y. The name was coined in 1892 when Reid and his friends moved to their 3rd "course" at Yonkers—a 34-acre orchard which yielded six holes.

Aprés moi le déâuge. After me the deluge—I care not what happens after I am dead and gone. It is recorded that Madame de Pompadour (1721-64) mistress of Louis XV said, Après nous le déâuge, when remonstrated with on account of the extravagances of the Court. It is probable that she had heard the phrase on the lips of her royal lover. Metternich, the Austrian statesman (1773-1859) also used the expression, but his meaning was that when his guiding hand was removed, things would probably go to rack and ruin.

April. The month when trees unfold and the lamb of nature opens with young life. (Lat. aperire, to open.)

The old Dutch name was Gras-maand (grass-month); the old Saxon, Easter-monath (orient or pascal-month). In the French Republican calendar it was called Germinal (the time of budding, March 21st to April 19th).

April fool. Called in France un poisson d'Avril (q.v.), and in Scotland a gock (cuckoo). In Hindustan similar tricks are played at the Huli Festival (March 31st). So that it cannot refer to the uncertainty of the weather, nor yet to a mockery of the trial of our Redeemer, the two most popular explanations. A better solution is this: As March 25th used to be a New Year's Day, April 1st was its octave, when its festivities culminated and ended.

It may be a relic of the Roman "Cerealia," held at the beginning of April. The tale is that Proserpina was sporting in the Elysian meadows, and had just filled her lap with daffodils, when Pluto carried her off to the lower world. Her mother, Ceres, heard the echo of her screams; and went in search of "the voice"; but her search was a fool's errand, it was hunting the gowk, or looking for the "echo of a scream."

A priori (ä pri ör' i) (Lat. from an antecedent). An a priori argument is one in which a fact is deduced from something antecedent, as when we infer certain effects from given causes. All mathematical proofs are of the a priori kind, whereas judgments in the law courts are usually a posteriori (q.v.); we infer the animus from the act.

An apron (O.Fr. napperon). Originally napron in English, this word is representative of a considerable number that have either lost or gained an "n" through coalescence—or the reverse—with the article "an" or "an." A napron became an apron. Other examples are adder for a nadder, auger for a nauger, and umpire for a numpipe. The opposite coalescence may be seen in newt for an ew, nickname for an ekename, and the old nuckle for mine uncle. Cp. NONE.

A bishop's apron represents the short cassock which, by the 74th canon, all clergymen were enjoined to wear.

A kilt-apron is a brown linen washable apron with a pocket in front in lieu of a sporran, worn with the kilt by Scottish troops in battle or when they have dirty work to do.

Apron-string tenure. A tenure held in virtue of one's wife. Tied to his mother's apron-string. Completely under his mother's thumb. Applied to a big boy or young man who is still under mother rule.

Aquarius. (Ak' ware' jë). (Lat. water-bearer). The eleventh of the twelve zodiacal constellations, representing the figure of a man with his left hand raised and with his right pouring from a ewer a stream of water; it is the eleventh division of the ecliptic, which the sun enters on January 21st, though this does not now coincide with the constellation.

Aquæ vitaé. (Ak' wà ví' tê) (Lat. water of life). Brandy: any spirituous liquor; also, formerly, certain ardent spirits used by the alchemists. Ben Jonson terms a qua vitaé man (Alchemist, i. 1). The "elixir of life" (q.v.) was made from these spirits. See Eau de Vie.

Aquarius. (Ak' kwär' i ús) (Lat. the water-bearer). The eleventh of the twelve zodiacal constellations, representing the figure of a man with his left hand raised and with his right pouring from a ewer a stream of water; it is the eleventh division of the ecliptic, which the sun enters on January 21st, though this does not now coincide with the constellation.

Aquila. (Ak' wi là non cáp' tát múś' kás). A Latin phrase, "An eagle does not hawk at flies," a proverbial saying implying that little things are beneath a great man's contempt.

Aquilina. Raymond's matchless steed. See Horse.

Aquiline. (Ak' wi là non cáp' tát múś' kás). A Latin phrase, "An eagle does not hawk at flies," a proverbial saying implying that little things are beneath a great man's contempt.
Aquinián Sage, The. Juvenal is so called because he was born at Aquinum, a town of the Volscians.

Arabesque. An adjective and noun applied to the Arab and Moorish style of decoration and architecture. One of its chief features is that no representation of animal forms is admitted. During the Spanish wars in the reign of Louis XIV. arabesque decorations were profusely introduced into France.

Arabia. It was Ptolemy who was the author of the threefold division into Arabia Petraea, "Stony Arabia," Arabia Felix (Yemen), "Fertile Arabia," i.e. the south-west coast; and Arabia Deserta, "Desert Arabia."

Arabian Bird, The. The phoenix; hence, figuratively, a marvellous or unique person.

Arabians. A name given to the early Nestorians and Jacobites in Arabia; also to an heretical Arabian sect of the 3rd century, which maintained that the soul dies with the body; and to a sect which believed that the soul died and rose again with the body.

Arabic figures. The figures 1, 2, 3, 4, etc. so called because they were introduced into Europe (Spain) by the Moors or Arabs (about the end of the 10th century), who brought them from India about 250 years earlier. They were not generally adopted in Europe till after the invention of printing. Far more important than the characters, is the decimal system of these figures: 1 figure = units. 2 figures = tens, 3 figures = hundreds, and so on ad infinitum. Cm. NUMERALS.

Arachne. The figures i, ii, iii, iv, v, vi, vii, viii, ix, x, etc. are called Roman figures.

Street Arabs. Children of the houseless poor; street children. So called because, like the Arabs, they are nomads or wanderers with no settled home.

Arachne's Labours (á rak' ni). In Greek legend Arachne was so skilful a spinner that she challenged Minerva to a trial of skill, and hanged herself because the goddess beat her. Minerva then changed her into a spider. Hence arachnida, the scientific name for spiders, scorpions, and mites.

Aram, Eugène (ár' ám) (1704-59). This murderer was a man of considerable learning, who, while a schoolmaster at Knaresborough, became involved with a man named Clark in a series of frauds. In 1745 he murdered Clark, but the crime was not discovered until 1758, when Clark's skeleton was found. Aram was arrested while teaching in a school at King's Lynn, tried and executed, 6 August, 1759. He was said to be a proficient scholar in Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, French, and Welsh. His story forms the theme of Lytton's novel Eugene Aram.

Aratus (ár a' tús). A Greek statesman and general (271-213 B.C.), famous for his patriotism and devotion to freedom. He liberated his native Sicyon from the usurper Nicocles, and would not allow even a picture of a king to exist. He was poisoned by Philip of Macedon.

Aratus, who awhile returned the soul of fondly-lingerer liberty in Greece.

Arbor Day. A day set apart in Canada and the United States for planting trees. It was first inaugurated about 1885 in Nebraska.

Arbor Jude. See Judas Tree.

Arcadia (ar ká' di a). A district of the Peloponnesus which, according to Virgil, was the home of pastoral simplicity and happiness. The name was taken by Sidney as the title of his romance (1590), and it was soon generally adopted in English.

Arcadian beasts. An old expression, to be found in Plautus, Pliny, etc. See Persius, iii, 9:

Arcidie pecuaria rudere credas and Rabelais, V, vii. So called because the ancient Arcadians were renowned as simpletons. Juvenal (vii, 160) has arcadicius juvenis, meaning a stupid youth.

Arcades ambo (ár' ká dez' ám bo) (Lat.). From Virgil's seventh Eclogue: "Ambo florentes ariatibus, Arcades ambo" (Both in the flower of youth, Arcadians both), meaning "both poets or musicians," now extended to two persons having tastes or habits in common. Byron gave the phrase a whimsical turn:—

Each pulled different ways with many an oath,
"Arcades ambo"—id est, blackguards both.

Arca. See Calisto.

Archangel. In Christian legend, the title is usually given to Michael, the chief opponent of Satan and his angels and the champion of the Church of Christ on earth. In the medieval hierarchy (see ANGEL) the Archangels comprise an order of the third division.

According to the Koran, there are four archangels: Gabriel, the angel of revelations, who writes down the divine decrees; Michael, the champion, who fights the battles of faith; Azrael, the angel of death; and Israfil, who is commissioned to sound the trumpet of the resurrection.
The best archers in British history and story are Robin Hood and his two comrades, Little John and Will Scarlet. The famous archers of Henry II were Tepus his followers, of the Guards, Gilbert of the white hind, Hubert of Suffolk, and Clifton of Hampshire.

Nearly equal to these were Egbert of Kent and William of Southampton. See also CLEYM OF THE CLOUGH.

Domitian, the Roman emperor, we are told, could shoot four arrows between the spread fingers of a man's hand. Tell, who shot an apple set on the head of his son, is a replica of the Scandinavian tale of Egil, who, at the command of King Nidung, performed a precisely similar feat.

Robin Hood, we are told, could shoot an arrow a mile or more.

Arches, Court of. The ecclesiastical court of appeal for the province of Canterbury, which was anciently held in the church of St. Mary-le-Bow (S. Maria de Arcibus), Cheapside, London.

Arcbus (ar kə' us). The immaterial principle which, according to the Paracelsians, energizes all living substances. There were supposed to be numerous archei, but the chief one was said to reside in the stomach.

Archies. This was the name given in World War 1 to anti-aircraft guns and batteries—probably from Archibald, the eponymous hero of one of George Robey's songs.

Archilochian Bitterness (ar ki lo' ki' an). Ill-natured satire, so named from Archilochus, the Greek satirist (fl. 690 b.c.).

Archimago (ar ki mə' gə). The enchanter in Spenser's Faerie Queene (Bks. I and II), typifying hypocrisy and false religion.

Archimedean Principle (ar ki me' di' ən). The quantity of water displaced by any body immersed therein will equal in bulk the body immersed. This scientific fact was noted by the philosopher Archimedes of Syracuse (c. 287-212 b.c.). See EUREKA.

Archimedean screw. An endless screw, used for raising water, etc., invented by Archimedes.

Architecture, Orders of. These five are the classic orders: Tuscan, Doric, Ionic, Corinthian, and Composite.

In ancient times the following was the usual practice:

CORINTHIAN, for temples of Venus, Flora, Proserpine, and the Water Nymphs.

DORIC, for temples of Minerva, Mars, and Hercules.

IONIC, for temples of Juno, Diana, and Bacchus.

TUSCAN, for grottoes and all rural deities.

Arcbro. In ancient Greece the archon was a chief magistrate; in the 2nd century A.D. the Gnostics, known as Archontics, applied the word as a subordinate power (analogous, perhaps, to the angels), who, at the bidding of God, made the world.

Arcite (ar s'i' ti, ar' si'). A young Theban knight, made captive by Duke Theseus, and imprisoned with Palamon at Athens. Both captives fell in love with Emily, the duke's sister, sister-in-law, or daughter (according to different versions), and after they had gained their liberty Emily was promised by the duke to the victor in a tournament. Arcite won, but, as he was riding to receive the prize, he was thrown from his horse and killed. Emily became the bride of Palamon. The story has been told many times and in many versions, notably by Boccaccio, Chaucer (Knight's Tale), Dryden, and Fletcher (Two Noble Kinsmen).

Arcos Barbs. War steeds of Arcos, in Andalusia, very famous in Spanish ballads. See Barbs.

Arctic Region means the region of Arcturus (the Bear stars), from Gr. arktos, meaning both the animal and the constellation, and arktikos, pertaining to the bear, hence, northern. Arcturus (the bear-ward) is the name now given to the brightest star in Boötes that can be readily found by following the curve of the Great Bear's tail; but in Job xxxviii, 32, it means the Great Bear itself.

Arden, The Forest of. This was once a large tract of forest land in Warwickshire, to the north of the Avon. Shakespeare was well acquainted with the forest and laid the rural scenes of As You Like It among its glades.

Arden, Enoch. The story in Tennyson's poem of this name, first published in 1864 (of a husband who mysteriously and unwillingly disappears, and returns years later to find that his wife—who still loves his memory—is married to another), was, he says—founded on a theme given me by the sculptor Woolner. I believe that his particular story came out of Suffolk, but something like the same story is told in Brittany and elsewhere.

It is not uncommon, either in fact or fiction. Tennyson said that several similar true stories had been sent to him since its publication, and four years before it appeared Adelaide Anne Procter's Homeward Bound, to which Enoch Arden bears a strong resemblance, was published in her Legends and Lyrics (1858).

Mrs. Gaskell's Manchester Marriage has a similar plot.

Arden of Feversham. This tragedy, first printed in 1592, was at one time attributed to Shakespeare; it is possibly the work of Thomas Kyd (c. 1557-c. 1595). The story is of Alice Arden, whose love for her base paramour Mosbie leads her to plan the murder of her husband. This is carried out while he and Mosbie are playing a game of draughts; on Mosbie giving the signal by saying, "Now I take you," a couple of hired ruffians dash in and murder Arden.

In 1736 George Lillo wrote a play on this theme, which was not acted until 1759. This, again, being altered, the revised play was put on the stage in 1790.

Areopagus (ā r e op' ā gus) (Gr. the hill of Mars, or Ares). The seat of a famous tribunal in Athens; so called from the tradition that the first cause tried there was that of Mars or Ares, accused by Neptune of the death of his son Halirrhothius.

Then Paul stood in the midst of Mars' Hill.—Acts xvii, 22.
Ares (ár’ éz). The god of war in Greek mythology, son of Zeus and Hera. In certain aspects he corresponds with the Roman Mars.

Aretian Syllables. Ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, used by Guido d’Arezzo in the 11th century for his hexachord, or scale of six notes. They are the first syllables of some words in the opening stanza of a hymn for St. John’s Day (see DoH). Si, the seventh note, was not introduced till the 17th century.

Argan (ar’gon). The principal character in Molière’s Malade Imaginaire, a hypochondriac uncertain whether to think more of his ailments or of his purse.

Argand Lamp. A lamp with a circular wick, through which a current of air flows, to supply oxygen to the flame, and increase its brilliancy. Invented by Aime Argand, 1789.

Argenis (ár’ jen is). A political allegory by John Barclay, written originally in Latin and published in 1621. It is apparently a romance of gallantry and heroism; it contains double meanings throughout. “Sicily” is France. “Poliarchus” (with whom Argenis is in love), Henry IV, “Hyanisbe,” Queen Elizabeth, and so on. It deals with the state of Europe, and more especially of France, during the time of the league.

Argentine, Argentina (ár’ jen tin, ar’ jen té’ ná). The name of this great S. American republic means The Silver Republic and is akin to that word is French, and was formerly used only for the canting jargon of thieves, rogues, and vagabonds.

Argus-eyed. Jealously watchful. According to Grecian fable, the fabulous creature, Argus, had 100 eyes, and Juno set him to watch Io, of whom she was jealous. Mercury, however, charmed Argus to sleep and slew him; whereupon Juno changed him into a peacock with the eyes in the tail (cp. Peacock’s Feather). Hence the name Argus for a genus of Asiatic pheasant.

Argyle (ár’gil’), of whom Thomson says, in his Autumn (928-30)—

On thee, Argyle,

Her hope, her stay, her darling, and her boast, Thy fond, imploring country turns her eye—was John, the great duke, who lived only two years after he succeeded to the dukedom. Pope (Ep. Sat. ii, 86, 87) says—

Argyle the state’s whole thunder born to wield,
And shake alike the senate and the field.

“God bless the Duke of Argyle.” is a phrase, supposed to be ejaculated by Highlanders when they scratched themselves. The story is that a Duke of Argyle caused posts to be erected in a treeless portion of his estates so that his cattle might have the opportunity of rubbing themselves against them and so easing themselves of the “torment of flies.” It was not long before the herdsmen discovered the efficacy of the practice, and as they rubbed theiritching backs against the posts they thankfully muttered the above words.

Ariadne (ári àd’ ni). In Greek mythology, daughter of the Cretan king, Minos. She helped Theseus to escape from the labyrinth, and later went with him to Naxos, where he deserted her and she became the wife of Bacchus (q.v.).

Arians (ár’ i ánz). The followers of Arius, a presbyter of the Church of Alexandria, in the 4th century. He maintained (1) that the Father and Son are distinct beings; (2) that the Son, though divine, is not equal to the Father; (3) that the Son had a state of existence previous to His appearance on earth, but not from eternity; and (4) that the Messiah was not real man, but a divine being in a case of flesh. Their tenets varied from time to time and also among their different sections. The heresy was formally anathematized at the Council of Nicaea (325), but the sect was not, and never has been, wholly extinguished.

Ariel (áril’). The name of a spirit. Used in cabalistic angelology, and in Heywood’s Hierarchy of the Blessed Angels (1635) for one of the seven angelic “princes” who rule the waters; by Milton for one of the rebel angels (Paradise Lost, vi, 371); by Pope (Rape of the Lock) for a sylph, the guardian of Belinda; but especially by Shakespeare, in the Tempest, for “an ayrie spirit.”

He was enslaved to the witch Sycorax, who overtasked him; and in punishment for not doing what was beyond his power, she put him up in a pine-rift for twelve years. On the death of Sycorax, Ariel became the slave of Caliban, who tortured him most cruelly. Prospero liberated him from the pine-rift, and the grateful fairy served him for sixteen years, when he was set free.

Aries (ār ěz). The Ram. The sign of the Zodiac in which the sun is from March 21st to April 20th; the first portion of the ecliptic, between 0° and 30° longitude.

Aristides (ār i stós). A pupil of Socrates, and founder of the Athenian statesman and general, who died about 468 b.c., and was surnamed the “Just.” He was present at the battles of Marathon and Salamis, and was in command at Platæa.

Aristophanes (ār i stóf' anez). The greatest of the Greek comic dramatists. He was born about 450 b.c. and died about 380 b.c., and is especially notable as a satirist.

Aristotle (ār ṭl'stól). One of the greatest of the Greek philosophers, pupil of Plato, and founder of the Peripatetic School. See Peripatetics.

Aristotelian philosophy. See Dramatic Unities.

Arm, Arms. This word, with the meaning of the limb, has given rise to a good many common phrases, such as:—

Arm in arm. Walking in a friendly way with arms linked.

Arm of the sea. A narrow inlet.

Secular arm. Civil, in contra-distinction to ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

To chance your arm. See Chance.

At arm's length. At a good distance; hence, with avoidance of familiarity.

Infant in arms. One that cannot yet walk and so has to be carried, but a nation in arms is one in which all the people are prepared for war.

With open arms. Cordially; as persons receive a dear friend when they open their arms for an embrace.

The word “arm” is almost always plural nowadays when denoting implements or accoutrements for fighting, etc., and also in heraldic usage. Among common phrases are:—

A passage of arms. A literary controversy; a battle of words.

An assault at arms (or of arms). A hand-to-hand military exercise.

Small arms. Those which do not, like artillery, require carriages.

To appeal to arms. To determine to decide a litigation by war.
To arms. Make ready for battle. "To arms!" cried Mortimer, And couched his quivering lance.
GRAY: The Bard.

To lay down arms. To cease from armed hostility; to surrender.

Under arms. Prepared for battle; in battle array.

Up in arms. In open rebellion; figuratively, roused to anger.

King of Arms. See HERALDS.

The right to bear arms. The right to use an heraldic device, which can be obtained only by direct grant from the College of Heralds (and the payment of certain fees), or by patent, i.e. direct descent from one on whom the grant has been conferred. In either case a small annual licence must be paid if the coat of arms is used in any way, such as on one’s carriage, silver, or stationery. A person having such right is said to be armigerous.

The Royal Arms of England. The three lions passant gardant were introduced by Richard Cour de Lion after his return from the third Crusade; the lion rampant in the second quarter is from the arms of Scotland, it having first been used in the reign of Alexander II (1214-49); and the harp in the fourth quarter represents Ireland; it was assigned to Ireland in the time of Henry VIII; before that time her device was three crowns. The lion supporter is English, and the unicorn Scottish; they were introduced by James I. The crest, a lion statant gardant, first appears on the Great Seal of Edward III.

The correct emblazoning of the arms of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland is:
Quarterly, first and fourth gules, three lions passant gardant in pale, or, for England; second or, a lion passant gardant in paly with a double trefoil counter-scythed double trefoil gules, for Scotland; third azure, a harp or, stringed argent, for Ireland; all surrounded by the Garter. Crest.—Upon the royal helmet, the imperial crown proper, thereon a lion statant gardant or, imperial crowned proper. Supporters.—A lion rampant gardant, or, crowned as the crest. Sinister, a unicorn argent, armed, crined, and unguled proper, gorged with a coronet composed of crosses patee and fleur de lis, a chain affixed thereto passing between the forelegs, and reflexed over the back, also or. Motto.—"Dieu et mon Droit" in the compartment below, the shield, with the Union rose, shamrock, and thistle engraved on the same stem.

From the time of Edward III (1340) until the Union of Great Britain and Ireland (1800) the reigning sovereigns styled themselves "of Great Britain, France and Ireland, King." (Elizabeth said that if the Salic Law forbade her to be Queen of France she would e’en be King) and the fleur de lys of France was quartered with the arms of England and Scotland. The empty title was abandoned as from 1 January, 1801 and from that date and for that reason all diplomatic correspondence henceforward was carried on in English instead of French.

Nor has this been the only change in the Royal Arms. On the accession of George I (1714) the White Horse of Hanover was borne in pretence (i.e. superimposed in the centre of the royal coat of arms). On the death of William IV (1837) the Salic Law prohibited the accession of Victoria to the throne of Hanover, and on her uncle the Duke of Cumberland succeeding to that throne, the Hanoverian arms were dropped from the British royal arms.

Armada (ar má´dá). Originally Spanish for "army," the word is now used, from the Spanish Armada, for any fleet of large size or strength. Formerly spelt armado. At length resolved I assert the wat’ry ball, He [Charles II] in himself did whole Armadoes bring; Him aged seamen might their master call. And choose for general, were he not their king.
DRYDEN: Annus Mirabilis, xiv.

The Spanish Armada. The fleet assembled by Philip II of Spain, in 1588, for the conquest of England. It consisted of 129 vessels, carried 8,000 sailors, 19,000 soldiers, 2,000 guns and provisions to feed 40,000 men for six months. After battle and storm no more than 54 vessels got back to Spain, carrying a few sick and exhausted men.

Armageddon (ar má´dón). The name given in the Apocalypse (Rev. xvi, 16) to the site of the last great battle that is to be between the nations before the Day of Judgment; hence, any great battle or scene of slaughter.

The place the author of the Apocalypse had in mind was probably the mountainous district near Megiddo, generally identified with the modern Lejum, about 54 miles due north of Jerusalem.

Arme Blanche (arm blonsh) (Fr. white arm). Steel weapons—the sword, sabre, bayonet, or spear—in contradistinction to firearms.

Armenian Church, The. Said to have been founded in Armenia by St. Bartholomew. Its members are to be found in Armenia, Persia, Syria, Poland, Asia Minor, etc.; they attribute only one nature to Christ and hold that the Spirit proceeds from the Father only, enjoin the adoration of saints, have some peculiar ways of administering baptism and the Lord’s Supper, and communicate infants; they do not maintain the doctrine of purgatory.

Armida (ar mě’dá). In Tasso’s Jerusalem Delivered a beautiful sorceress, with whom Rinaldo fell in love, and wasted his time in voluptuous pleasure. After his escape from her, Armida followed him, but not being able to allure him back, set fire to her palace, rushed into a combat, and was slain.

In 1806, Frederick William of Prussia declared war against Napoleon, and his young queen rode about in military costume to arouse the enthusiasm of the people. When Napoleon was told of it, he said, "She is Armida, in her distraction setting fire to her own palace."

Arminians. Followers of Jacobus Harmensen, or Arminius (1560-1609), a Protestant divine in Leyden. They were an offshoot of Calvinism, and formulated their creed (called the Remonstrance) in 1610, in five points. They asserted that God bestows forgiveness and eternal life on all who repent and believe; that He wills all men to be saved; and that His predestination is founded on His foreknowledge.
Armistice Day. Hostilities in World War I ended at 11 o'clock on November 11th, 1918, when an armistice was signed. In subsequent years November 11th was kept as Armistice Day, marked by a two-minute silence and cessation of work at 11 a.m., followed in various places by ceremonies. In 1946 the old name was changed to Remembrance Day, to include a memorial of the close of the 1939-45 war and it is kept on the Sunday nearest 11th November.

Armoury. Heraldry is so called, because it first found its special use in direct connexion with military equipments, knightly exercises, and the mêlée of actual battle.

Armour is an Art rightly prescribing the true knowledge and use of Arms.

Gulielm's Display of Heraldrie (1610).

Armour, Coat, or a Coat of Arms, was originally a drapery of silk or other rich stuff worn by a knight over his armour and embroidered in colours with his distinguishing device. This practice was adopted by the Crusaders, who found it necessary to cover their steel armour from the rays of the sun.

Armoury. The place where armour and arms are kept.

The sword
Of Michael from the armoury of God
Was given him.

Milton: Paradise Lost, vi, 320.

The word may also mean armour collectively, as in Paradise Lost, iv, 553:—

nigh at hand
Celestial armoury, shields, helms, and spears,
Hung high, with diamond flaming and with gold.

Stained with the best of Arnaut's blood.

Byron: The Giaour.

Arod. In Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel is designed for Sir William Waller. But in the sacred annals of our plot Industrious Arod never forgot,
The labours of this midnight magistrate May vie with Corah's [Titus Oates] to preserve the state.

Part ii.

Aroint thee. A phrase that first appears in Shakespeare's Macbeth (I, iii, 6) and King Lear (III, iv, 129), on both occasions in connexion with witches. It signifies "get ye gone," "be off," and its origin is unknown. The Brownings made a verb of it, Mrs. Browning in her To Flash—"Whiskered cats arointed flee," and Browning in The Two Poets of Croisic, and elsewhere.

Arondight (ar' on dit). The sword of Sir Leuncelot of the Lake. See SWORD.

Arras (ar' as). Tapestry; the cloth of Arras, in Artois, formerly famed for its manufacture. When rooms were hung with tapestry it was easy for persons to hide behind it; thus Hubert hid the two villains who were to put out Arthur's eyes, Polonius was slain by Hamlet while concealed behind the arras, Falstaff proposed to hide behind it at Windsor, etc.

Arria (ar' ia). The wife of Cecina Petus, who, being accused of conspiring against the Emperor Claudius, was condemned to death by suicide. As he hesitated to carry out the sentence Arria stabbed herself, then presenting the dagger to her husband, said; "Petus, it gives no pain" (non doler). (A.D. 42). See FLINY, vii.

Arrière ban. See BAN.

Arrière pensée (Fr. "behind-thought"). A hidden or reserved motive, not apparent on the surface.

Arrow. See BROAD ARROW: JONATHAN'S ARROWS.

Artaxerxes (ar taks erks' ez), called by the Persians Artakhshathra, and surnamed the long-handed (Longimanus), because his right hand was longer than his left, was the first Persian king of that name, and reigned from 465 to 425 B.C. He was the son of Xerxes, and is mentioned in the Bible in connexion with the part he played in the restoration of Jerusalem after the Captivity. See EzrA iv, vi, and vii, and Neh. ii, v, and xiii.

Artegal, or Arthegal, Sir (ar' te gål). The hero of Bk. v of Spenser's Faerie Queene, lover of Britomart, to whom he is made known by means of a magic mirror. He is emblematic of Justice, and in many of his deeds, such as the rescue of Irena (Ireland) from Grantorito, is typical of Arthur, Lord Grey of Wilton, who went to Ireland as Lord Lieutenant in 1580 with Spenser as his secretary. See ELLIDUR.

Artemis. See DIANA.

Artemus Ward. This was the pseudonym of Charles Farrar Browne (1834-67), the American humourist. He began as a lecturer in 1861 and visited England in 1866, dying in Southampton before he could get back to America. The famous character he created was that of a Yankee showman.

Artesian Wells. So called from Arteis, the Old French name for Artois, in France, where they were first bored. They are sunk with a boring or drilling apparatus into water or oil-bearing strata from which the liquid rises by its own pressure to the top of the bore.

Artful Dodger. A young thief in Dickens's Oliver Twist, pupil of Fagin. His name was Jack Dawkins, and he became a most perfect adept in villainy.

Arthegal. See ARTEGAL.

Arthur. A shadowy British chieftain of the 6th century, first mentioned by Nennius, a Breton monk of the 10th century. He fought many battles and is said to have been a king of the Silures, a tribe of ancient Britons, to have been mortally wounded in the battle of Camlan (537), in Cornwall, during the revolt of his nephew, Modred (who was also slain), and to have been taken to Glastonbury, where he died.

His wife was Guinevere, who committed adultery with Sir Leuncelot of the Lake, one of the Knights of the Round Table.

Arthur was the natural son of Uther and Igrina (wife of Gorolis, duke of Cornwall), and was brought up by Sir Ector.

He was born at Tintagel Castle, in Cornwall.

His chief home and the seat of his court was Caerleon, in Wales; and he was buried at Avalon (q.v.).
His sword was called Excalibur; his spear, Rone; and his shield, Prudwin. His dog was named Cavall. See Round Table, Knights of the Round Table.

Arthur's Seat. A hill overlooking Edinburgh from the east. The name is not connected with King Arthur; it is a corruption of the Gaelic Ard-na-said, the height of the arrows, hence, a convenient ground to shoot from.

Arthurian Romances. The stories which have King Arthur as their central figure appear as early as the 12th century in the Historia Regum Britanniae of Geoffrey of Monmouth (d. 1154), which drew partly from the work of Nennius (see Arthur), partly—according to the author—from an ancient British or Breton book (lost if ever existing) lent him by Walter, Archdeacon of Oxford, and partly from sources which are untraced, but the originals of which are put into Welsh or Celtic legends, most of them being non-extant. The original Arthur was a very shadowy warrior; Geoffrey of Monmouth, probably at the instigation of Henry I and for the purpose of providing the new nation with a national hero, made many additions: the story was taken up in France and further expanded; Wace, a French poet (who is the first to mention the Grail Round Table, c. 1155); Celtic and other legends, including those of the Grail (q.v.) and Sir Tristan, were superadded, and in about 1205 Layamon, the Worcestershire priest, completed his Brut (about 30,000 lines), which included Wace's work and amplifications such as the story of the fairies at Arthur's birth, who, at his death, wafted him to Avalon, as well as Sir Gawain and Sir Bedivere. In France the legends were worked upon by Robert de Borron (fl. 1215), who first attached the story of the Grail (q.v.) to the Arthurian Cycle and brought the legend of Merlin into prominence, and Chrystien de Troyes (c. 1140-90), who is responsible for the presence in the Cycle of the tale of Enid and Geraint, the tragic loves of Launcelot and Guinevere, the story of Perceval, and other additions for many of which he was indebted to the Welsh Mabinogion. Many other legends in the form of ballads, romances, and Welsh and Breton songs and lays were popular, and in the 15th century the whole corpus was collected, edited, and more or less worked into a state of homogeneity by Sir Thomas Malory (d. 1471), his Le Morte d'Arthur being printed by Caxton in 1485. For the different heroes, sections, etc., of this great Cycle of Romance, see the various names throughout this Dictionary.

Articles of Roup. The conditions of sale at a roup (q.v.), as announced by a crier.

Arts. Degrees in Arts. In the mediæval ages the full course consisted of the three subjects which constituted the Trivium:—

The Trivium was grammar, logic, and rhetoric.

The Quadrivium was music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy.

The Master of Arts was the person qualified to teach or be the master of students in arts; as the Doctor was the person qualified to teach theology, law, or medicine.

Arundel. See Horse.

Arundelian Marbles. A collection of ancient sculptures made at great expense by Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel, and presented to the University of Oxford in 1667 by his grandson, Henry Howard, afterwards Duke of Norfolk. They contain tables of ancient chronology, especially that of Athens, from 1582 to 264 B.C., engraved in old Greek capitals, and the famous "Parian Chronicle," said to have been executed in the island of Paros about 263 B.C.

Arvakur. See Horse.

Arval Brothers. An ancient Roman college of priests, revived by Augustus. It consisted of 12 priests (including the Emperor), whose sole duty was to preside at the festival of Dea Dia in May; they worshipped in the groves of that goddess on the Via Campana, 3 miles from Rome.

Aryans. The parent stock of what is called the Indo-European family of nations. Their original home is quite unknown, authorities differing so widely as between a locality enclosed by the river Oxus and the Hindu-kush mountains, and the shores of the Baltic, or Central Europe. The Aryan family of languages includes Sanskrit, Zend, Latin, Greek, Celtic, Persian and Hindu, with all the European, except Basque, Turkish, Hungarian, and Finnish. Sometimes called the Indo-European, sometimes the Inde-Germanic, and sometimes the Japhetic.

Under the Nazi regime in Germany the word was prostituted by being applied to any race, person or thing that was not Semitic, even the Japanese being classified as Aryans.

Arzina. A river that flows into the North Sea, near Wardhus, where Sir Hugh Willoughby's three ships were ice-bound, and the whole crew perished of starvation.

In these fell regions, in Arzina caught,
And to the stony deep his idle ship
Immediate sealed, he with his hapless crew . . .
Froze into statues.

Thomson: Winter, 930.

Asaph. In the Bible, a famous musician in David's time (1 Chron. xxv, 1, 2). There was probably no such person, but in post-exilic times there were two hereditary choirs that superintended the musical services of the Temple, one of which was b'ne Asaph, and the other b'ne Korah. The Asaph mentioned in Chronicles is the supposed founder of the first named.

Tate, who wrote the second part of Absalom and Achitophel, lauds Dryden under this name.

While Judah's throne and Sion's rock stand fast,
The song of Asaph and the fame shall last.

Absalom and Achitophel, Pt. ii, 1063.

Ascalaphus. In Greek mythology, an inhabitant of the underworld who, when Pluto gave Proserpine permission to return to the upper world if she had eaten nothing, said that she had partaken of a pomegranate. In revenge Proserpine turned him into an owl by sprinkling him with the water of Phlegethon.

Ascendant. An astrological term. In casting a horoscope the point of the ecliptic or degree of the zodiac which is just rising at the moment of birth is called the ascendant, and the easternmost star represents the house of life (see House), because it is in the act of ascending. This is a man's strongest star, and when his outlook is bright, we say his star is in the ascendant.

The house of the Ascendant, includes five degrees of the zodiac above the point just rising, and twenty-five below it. Usually, the point of birth is referred to.

The lord of the Ascendant is any planet within the "house of the Ascendant." The house and lord of the Ascendant at birth were said by astrologers to exercise great influence on the future life of the child. Deborah referred to the influence of the stars when she said "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera" (Judges v. 20).

Ascension Day, or Holy Thursday (q.v.). The day set apart by the Christian Churches to commemorate the ascent of our Lord from earth to heaven. It is the fortieth day after Easter. See Bounds, Beating the.

Asclepiads, or Asclepiadic Metre (as kle pi' a'dz) A term in Greek and Latin prosody denoting a verse (invented by Asclepiades) which consists of a spondee (two, or three) choriambi, and an iambus, usually with a central casura, thus:—

\[ \text{--- | --- | --- | --- | ---} \]

The first ode of Horace is Asclepiadic. The first and last two lines may be translated in the same metre, thus:—

Dear friend, patron of song, sprung from the race of kings:
Thy name ever a grace and a protection bring. . . .
My name, if to the lyre haply you chance to wed,
Pride would high as the stars lift my exalted head.

Ascot Races. A very fashionable meeting, run early in June on Ascot Heath (6 miles from Windsor). These races were instituted early in the 18th century.

Ascrean Poet, or Sage (ás kré' án). Hesiod, the Greek didactic poet, born at Ascrea in Boeotia. Virgil (Eclogues, vii, 70) calls him the "Old Ascrean."

Asgard (ás' gard) (As, a god, gard or gardh, an enclosure, garth, yard). The realm of the Aesir, or the Northern gods, the Olympus of Scandinavian mythology. It is said to be situated in the centre of the universe, and accessible only by the rainbow-bridge (Bifrost). It contained many regions and mansions, such as Gladheim and Valhalla.

Ash Tree, or Tree of the Universe. See Yggdrasil.

Ash Wednesday. The first Wednesday in Lent, so called from an ancient Roman Catholic custom of sprinkling on the heads of penitents who had confessed that day the ashes of the palms that were consecrated on the previous Palm Sunday which themselves had been consecrated at the altar. The custom, it is said, was introduced by Gregory the Great.

Ashes. Ashes to ashes, dust to dust. A phrase from the English Burial Service, used sometimes to signify total finality. It is founded on various scriptural texts, such as "Dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return" (Gen. iii. 19), and "I will bring thee to ashes upon the earth in the sight of all them that behold thee" (Ezek. xxviii, 18).

Ashes to ashes and dust to dust, if God won't have him the Devil must.

According to Sir Walter Scott (see his edition of Swift's Journal to Stella. March 25th, 1710-11), this was the form of burial service given by the sexton to the body of Guiscard, the French refugee who, in 1711, attempted the life of Harley.

To recover the ashes. A cricket term applied to the England-Australia cricket seasons played alternately in the two countries, the "ashes" being the mythical prize contends for. When England was beaten in 1882 a humorous epitaph on English cricket appeared in a sporting journal, and it wound up with the remark that "the body will be cremated and the ashes taken to Australia." There are several more or less fabulous embroideries of this story.

Ashmolean Museum (ás mó' li án). The first public museum of curiosities in England. It was presented to the University of Oxford in 1677 by Elias Ashmole (1617-92), the antiquarian, who had inherited the greater part of the contents from his friend John Tradescant. Ashmole later gave his library to the University. The museum building was the work of Sir Christopher Wren.

Asthoreth (ás'h to reth). The goddess of fertility and reproduction among the Canaanites and Phoenicians, called by the Babylonians Ishtar (Venus), and by the Greeks Astarte (q.v.). She may possibly be the "queen of heaven" mentioned by Jeremiah (vii, 18, xlv, 17, 25). Formerly she was supposed to be a non-goddess, hence Milton's reference in his Ode on the Nativity.

Mooned Ashtoroth, Heaven's queen and mother both.

Ashur. See Asir.

Asinago (ás i né' go) (Port.) A young ass, a simpleton.

Thou hast no more brain than I have in mine elbows; an asinago may tutor thee—

Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, ii, 1.

Asir. See Áesir.

Ask. The dialectal ax was the common literary form down to about the end of the 16th century. The word comes from the O.E. ascian, which, by metathesis, became axian, and so axian. Chaucer has:—

How shold I axen mercy of Tisbe

When am I he that have yow slain, alias!

Legend of Good Women, 835.

and the Wyclif version of Matt. vii, 7-10, reads:—

Axe ye and it shaile be gyven to you; seke yee, and yee schulen fynde; knocke ye: and it schal be opeined to you. For eche day the thirth, takith, and he that sekith, fundith: and it schal be opeined to him that knockith. What man of you is, that if his sone axe him breed: whether he wol take him a stoyn? Or if he axe fishe, whether he wol give him an Eddre?
Asmo. See Horse.

Asmodeus (ās mō dē'ús, ās mō' di ús). The "evil demon" who appears in the Apocryphal book of Tobit, borrowed (and to some extent transformed) from Aeshma, one of the seven archangels of Persian mythology. The name is probably the Zend Aeshmo daeva (the demon Aeshma), and is not connected with the Heb. samad, to destroy. The character of Asmodeus is explained in the following passage from The Testament of Solomon—

I am called Asmodeus among mortals, and my business is to plot against the newly-wedded, so that they may not know one another. And I sever them utterly by many calamities: and I waste away the beauty of virgins, and estrange their hearts.

In Tobit Asmodeus falls in love with Sara, daughter of Raguel, and causes the death of seven husbands in succession, each on his bridal night. After her marriage to Tobias, he was driven into Egypt by a charm, made by Tobias of the heart and liver of a fish burnt on perfumed ashes, and being pursued was taken prisoner and bound.

Le Sage gave the name to the companion of Don Cleofas in his Devil on Two Sticks.

Asmodeus flight. Don Cleofas, catching hold of his companion's cloak, is perched on the steeple of St. Salvador. Here the fool fiend stretches out his hand, and the roofs of all the houses open in a moment, to show the Don what is going on privately in each respective dwelling.

Asoka (ās'ō kā). An Indian king of the Maurya dynasty of Magadha, 263-226 B.C., who was converted to Buddhism by a miracle and became its "nursing father," as Constantine was of Christianity. He is called "the king beloved of the gods."

Aspasia (a spā' zi ā). A Milesian woman (fl. 440 B.C.), celebrated for her beauty and talents, who lived at Athens as mistress of Pericles, and whose house became the centre of literary and philosophical society. She was the most celebrated of the Greek hetairas, and on the death of Pericles (429 B.C.) lived with the democratic leader, Lysicles.

Aspasia (a spā' šā), in the Maid's Tragedy, of Beaumont and Fletcher, is noted for her deep sorrows, her great resignation, and the pathos of her speeches. Anytlor deserts her, women point at her with scorn, she is the jest and byword of everyone, but she bears it all with patience.

Aspen. The aspen leaf is said to tremble from shame and horror, because our Lord's cross was made of this wood. In fact, owing to the shape of the leaf and its long, flexible leaf-stalk, it is peculiarly liable to be acted on by the least breath of air.

Asphaltic Lake. The Dead Sea, where asphalt abounds both on the surface of the water and on the banks. Asphalt is a bitumen. There was an asphaltic and Bituminous nature in that lake before the fire of Gomorrah.

There is a bituminous, or asphalt, lake in Trinidad.

Asphodel (ās' fo del). Old-fashioned garden flowers of the natural order Liliaceae. The name daffodil is a corruption of asphodel. In the language of flowers it means "regret." It was said that the spirits of the dead sustained themselves on the roots of this flower, and the ancients planted them on graves. Pliny and others said that the ghosts beyond Acheron roamed through the meadows of asphodel, in order to reach the waters of Lethe or Oblivion.

Ass. The dark stripe running down the back of an ass, crossed by another at the shoulders, is, according to tradition, the cross that was communicated to the creature when our Lord rode on the back of an ass in His triumphant entry into Jerusalem.

Till the ass ascends the ladder—i.e. never. A rabbinical expression. The Romans had a similar one, Cum asinus in tegulis ascenderit (When the ass climbs to the tiles).

That which thou knowest not perchance thine ass can tell thee. An allusion to Balaam's ass.

Ass, deaf to music. This tradition arose from the hideous noise made by "Sir Balaam" in braying. See Ass-earred.

An ass in a lion's skin. A coward who hectors, a fool that apes the wise man. The allusion is to the fable of an ass that put on a lion's hide, but was betrayed when he began to bray.

To make an ass of oneself. To do something very foolish. To expose oneself to ridicule.

Sell your ass. Get rid of your foolish ways.

The ass waggeth his ears. This proverb is applied to those who lack learning, and yet talk as if they were very wise: men wise in their own conceit. The ass, proverbial for having no "taste for music," will nevertheless wag its ears at a "concord of sweet sounds," just as if it could well appreciate it.

An ass with two panniers. Said of a man walking the streets with a lady on each arm. The Italian equivalent is a pitchcr with two handles, and formerly it was called in London walking bodkin (q.v.). Our expression is from the French faire le pantier à deux anses, a colloquialism for walking with a lady on each arm.

Ass's bridge. See Pons Asinorum.

Well, well! honey is not for the ass's mouth. Persuasion will not persuade fools. The gentlest words will not divert the anger of the unreasonable.

Wrangle for an ass's shadow. To contend about trifles. The tale told by Demosthenes is, that a man hired an ass to take him to Megara: and at noon, the sun being very hot, the traveller dismounted, and sat himself down in the shadow of the ass. Just then the owner came up and claimed the right of sitting in this shady spot, saying that he let out the ass for hire, but there was no bargain made about the ass’s shade. The two men then fell to blows to settle the point in dispute. While they were wrestling the ass took to its heels and ran away, leaving them both in the glare of the sun.

Asses as well as pitchers have ears. Children, and even the densest minds, hear and understand many a word and hint which the speaker supposed would pass unheeded.

Feast of Asses. See Fools.

Asses that carry the mysteries (asini portant mysteria). A classical knock at the Roman clergy. The allusion is to the custom of employing asses to carry the cista which contained the sacred symbols, when processions were made through the streets. (Warburton: Divine Legation, ii, 4.)

Golden Ass. See GOLDEN.

Ass-eared. Midas had the ears of an ass. The tale says Apollo and Pan had a contest and chose Midas to decide which was the better musician. Midas gave sentence in favour of Pan; and Apollo, in disgust, changed his ears into those of an ass.

Avarice is as deaf to the voice of virtue, as the ass to the voice of Apollo.—Orlando Furioso, xvii.

Assassins (a sās’ inz). A sect of Oriental fanatics of a military and religious character, founded in Persia in 1090 by Hassan ben Sabbah, better known as the Old Man (or Sheik) of the Mountains (see under MOUNTAIN), because the sect migrated to Mount Lebanon and made it its stronghold. This band was the terror of the world for two centuries, and, to the number of 50,000 strong, offered formidable opposition to the Crusaders. Their religion was a compound of Magianism, Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism, and their name is derived from haschisch (bang), an intoxicating drink, with which they are said to have “doped” themselves before perpetrating their orgies of massacre. They were finally put down by the Sultan Bibars, about 1272.

Assay (a sāy), or Essay (through O.Fr. from Latt. exaurire, to weigh). To try or test; to determine the amount of different metals in an ore, etc.; and, formerly, to taste food or drink before it is offered to a sovereign; hence, to take the assay is to taste wine to prove it is not poisoned.

The aphetic form of the word, “say,” was common down to the 17th century, and Edmund, in King Lear (v. 5), says to Edgar, “Thy tongue, some say of breeding breathes”; i.e., thy speech gives indication of good breeding—it savours of it.

Assay, as a noun, means a test or trial, as in

[He] makes vow before his uncle never more
To give the assay of arms against your majesty. Shakespeare: Hamlet, ii, 2.

But for the last three hundred years the spelling essay has been adopted (from French) for the noun, in all uses except those connected with the assaying of metals.

Assaye Regiment. See REGIMENTAL NICKNAMES.
Asshur. The chief god of the Assyrian pantheon, perhaps derived from the Babylonian god of heaven, Anu. His symbol was a draped male figure carrying three horns on the head and with one hand stretched forth, sometimes with a bow in the hand. His wife was Belit (i.e. the Lady, par excellence), who has been identified with the Ishtar pantheon, perhaps derived from the astral world. According to the occultists, the Astral Body. In theosophical parlance, the Astral Body. In theosophical parlance, the Assumption, Feast of. In the R.C. Church the principal feast day of the Virgin Mary, observed on August 15th. On November 1st, 1950, Pope Pius XII declared ex cathedra that thenceforth it would be a dogma of the Church that at the death of the Virgin her body was preserved from corruption, and that shortly afterwards it was assumed (Lat. assumere, to take to) into heaven and reunited to her soul.

Assurance. Audacity, brazen self-confidence. "His assurance is quite unbearable."

Assurance provides for the contingency of a certainty, e.g. life assurance is a financial provision for the certain fact of death. Insurance provides against what may or may not happen, e.g. burglary, fire.

To make assurance doubly sure. To make security doubly secure.

But yet I'll make assurance double sure, And take a bound of fate.

SHAKESPEARE: Macbeth, iv. 1.

Astarte (ā star' ti). The Greek name for Ashtoreth (q.v.), sometimes thought to have been a moon-goddess. Hence Milton's allusion:

With these in troop Came Astoreth, whom the Phoenicians called Astarté, queen of heaven, with crescent horns.

Paradise Lost, i, 437.

Byron gave the name to the lady beloved by Manfred in his drama, Manfred. It has been suggested that Astarte was drawn from the poet’s sister, Augusta (Mrs. Leigh).

Astartolat (ās'tō lāt). This town, mentioned in the Arthurian legends, is generally identified with Guildford, in Surrey, though there can be no certainty.

The Lily Maid of Astartolat. Elaine (q.v.).

Astoreth. See Ashtoreth.

Astra (ās' trä'). Equity, innocence. During the Golden Age this goddess dwelt on earth, but when sin began to prevail, she reluctantly left it, and was metamorphosed into the constellation Virgo.

When hard-hearted interest first began To poison earth, Astra left the plain.

THOMSON: Castle of Indolence, i. x.

Pope gave the name to Mrs. Aphra Behn (1640-89), playwright and novelist, author of the once-popular novel Oroonoko.

Sir John Davies (1569-1626) wrote a series of twenty-six acrostics, entitled Hymns to Astraec, in honour of Queen Elizabeth.

Astrakhan. Takes its name from the province of Astrakhan in Russia and is the fur, or wool, of a karakul lamb.

Astral Body. In theosophical parlance, the phantasmal or spiritual appearance of the physical human form, that is existent both before and after the death of the material body, though during life it is not usually separated from it; also the "kamarupa" or body of desires, which retains a finite life in the astral world after bodily death.

Astral spirits. The spirits of the dead that occupy the stars and the stellar regions, or astral world. According to the occultists, each
Astrology

The ancient and mediæval so-called "science" that professed to foretell events by studying the position of the stars and discovering their occult influence on human affairs. It is one of the most ancient superstitions; it prevailed from earliest times among the Chaldeans, Egyptians, Etruscans, Hindus, Chinese, etc., and had a powerful influence in the Europe of the Middle Ages. Natural Astrology—i.e. the branch that dealt with meteorological phenomena and with time, tides, eclipses, a rising of Easter, etc.—was the forerunner of the science of Astronomy; what is now known as "astrology" was formerly differentiated from this as Judicial Astrology, and dealt with star-divination and the occult planetary and sidereal influences upon human affairs. See Houses, Astrological; Horoscope; Microcosm.

Astronomers Royal. (1) Flamsteed, 1675; (2) Halley, 1719; (3) Bradley, 1742; (4) Bliss, 1762; (5) Maskelyne, who originated the Nautical Almanack, 1765; (6) Pond, 1811; (7) Airy, 1835; (8) Christie, 1881; (9) Sir F. W. Dyson, 1910; (10) Sir H. S. Jones, 1933

Astrophel (äs' trö fel). Sir Philip Sidney (1554-86). "Phil. Sid." being a contraction of Philos Sidus, and the Latin sidus being changed to the Greek astron, we get astron-phlos (star-lover). The "star" that he loved was Penelope Devereux, whom he called Stella (star), and to whom he was betrothed. Spen- ser called Astrophel, to the memory of his friend and patron, who fell at the battle of Zutphen.

Asur (äs' ür). The national god of the ancient Assyrians; the supreme god over all the gods. See Asshur.

Asurbanipal. See Sardanapalus.

Asylum means, literally, a place where pillage is forbidden (Gr. a, not, sulon, right of pillage). The ancients set apart certain places of refuge, where the vilest criminals were protected, from both private and public assaults.

Asynthia (äs in' yá). The goddesses of Asgard; the feminine counterparts of the Æsir.

At Home. See Home.

Atalanta's Race (ät á lánt' tā). Atalanta, in Greek legend, was a daughter of Iasus and Clymene. She took part in the Calydonian hunt and, being very swift of foot, refused to stay unless the sitor should first defeat her in a race. Milon overcame her at last by dropping, one after another, during the race, three golden apples that had been given him for the purpose by Venus. Atalanta was not proof against the temptation to pick them up, and so lost the race and became a wife. In the Æolian form of the legend Hippomenes takes the place of Milion.

Atargatis (ät ar gät' is). A fish-goddess of the Phoenicians. Her temple at Carnaim is mentioned in the Apocryphal book of 2 Maccabees (xi, 26), and she had another at Ascalon.

Ate (ä' tē). In Greek mythology, the goddess of vengeance and mischief; she was driven out of heaven, and took refuge among the sons of men.

With Ate by his side come hot from hell. . .
Cry "Havoc!" and let slip the dogs of war.
SHAKESPEARE: Julius Caesar, iii, 1.

In Spenser's Faerie Queene (IV, i, iv, ix, etc.), the name is given to a lying and slanderous Hag, the companion of Duessa.

Atellanæ, or Atellan Farces (ä tē la' nē). Licentious interludes in the Roman theatres, introduced from Atella, in Campania. The characters of Macchus and Bucco are the forerunners of our Punch and Clown.

Athenasian Creed (äth á ná' shan). One of the three creeds accepted by the Roman and Anglican Churches; so called because it embodies the opinions of Athanasius respecting the Trinity. It was compiled in the 5th century by Hilary, Bishop of Arles.

In the Episcopal Prayer Book of America this creed is omitted.

Atheists. During World War II Father W. T. Cummings, an American army chaplain at Bataan, in one of his sermons used the phrase, "there are no atheists in foxholes," meaning that no one can deny the existence of God in the face of imminent death.

Athenæum (äth é ne' ūm). A famous academy or university situated on the Capitoline Hill at Rome, and founded by Hadrian about A.D. 133. So called in honour of Athene. As now used the name usually denotes a literary or scientific institution.

The Athenæum Club in London was established in 1824; the review of this name (now merged in the Spectator) was founded by James Silk Buckingham in 1828.

Athene (ä thé' ne). The goddess of wisdom and of the arts and sciences in Greek mythology: the counterpart of the Roman Minerva (q.v.).

Athens. When the goddess of wisdom disputed with the sea-god which of them should be called by the name of that deity which bestowed on man the most useful boon. Athene (the goddess of wisdom) created the olive tree, Poseidon created the horse. The vote was given in favour of the olive tree, and the city was called Athens. An olive branch was the symbol of peace, and was also the highest prize of the victor in the Olympic games. The horse, on the other hand, was the symbol of war.

Athens of Ireland. Belfast.

Athens of the New World. Boston.

Athens of the West. Cordoba in Spain, was so called in the Middle Ages.

Athenian Bee. Plato (429-327 B.C.), a native of Athens, was so called because, according to tradition, when in his cradle a swarm of bees alighted on his mouth, and in consequence his words flowed with the sweetness of honey. The same tale is told of St.
Ambrose, and others. See Bee. Xenophon (444-359 B.C.) is also called "the Bee of Athens," or "the Athenian Bee."

Athole Brose (Scots). A compound of oatmeal, honey, and whisky.

Atkins. See Tommy Atkins.

Atlantean Shoulders. Shoulders able to bear a great weight, like those of Atlas (q.v.). Sage he stood. With Atlantean shoulders, fit to bear the weight of mightiest monarchies.

Atlanites (at lan' tez). Figures of men, used in architecture as pillars. So called from Atlas (q.v.). Female figures are called Caryatides (q.v.). See also Telamones.

Atlantic Charter. President Roosevelt and Winston Churchill after meeting at sea during the 1939-45 War made a declaration of their common principles, August 14th 1941, known as the Atlantic Charter. They declared, among other things, that the U.S. and Great Britain desired no aggrandizement, that they wished all peoples to live under their chosen form of Government and to have access to those raw materials necessary to their economic prosperity, that they hoped for improved labour standards and social security for all, and that when peace came they wished all men to live free from fear and from want. Finally, they urged general disarmament at the end of hostilities.

Atlantic Ocean. The ocean is so called either from the Atlas mountains, the great range in north-west Africa which, to the ancients, seemed to overlook the whole ocean, or from Atlantis (q.v.).

Atlantic Wall. The name given by the Germans in World War II to their defences built up around the west coast of France to resist the expected Allied landings.

Atlantis. A mythical island of great extent which was anciently supposed to have existed in the Atlantic Ocean. It is first mentioned by Plato (in the Timaeus and Critias), and Solon was told of it by an Egyptian priest, who said that it had been overwhelmed by an earthquake and sunk beneath the sea 9,000 years before his time. Cp. Lemuria; Lyonesse.

The New Atlantis. An allegorical romance by Bacon (written between 1614 and 1618) in which he describes an imaginary island where was established a philosophical commonwealth bent on the cultivation of the natural sciences. See Utopia; City of the Sun.

Mrs. Manley, in 1709, published under the same title a scandalous chronicle, in which the names of contemporaries are so thinly disguised as to be readily recognized.

Atlas (at' las). In Greek mythology, one of the Titans condemned by Zeus for his share in the War of the Titans to uphold the heavens on his shoulders. He was stationed on the Atlas mountains in Africa, and the tale is merely a poetical way of saying that they prop up the heavens, because they are so lofty.

Bid Atlas, propping heaven, as poets feign, His subterranean wonders spread! Thomson: Autumn, 797.

A book of maps is so called because the figure of Atlas with the world on his back was employed by Mercator on the title-page of his collection of maps in the 16th century. In the paper trade Atlas is a standard size of drawing-paper measuring 26 × 34 in.

Atlantic Energy and the Atomic Bomb. All matter consists of atoms, and science asserts that each atom is composed of three types of particle, the proton, the electron and the neutron: the first possesses a positive electric charge, the second a negative charge of equal value, the neutron has no such charge. The protons, neutrons and some of the electrons form a nucleus around which the remainder of the electrons revolve. The binding force of the nucleus is not the same for every element. When the nucleus of one atom of Uranium 235 is split up energy is released, due to the formation of an element with a lower binding force. In addition neutrons are emitted which, in their turn, split up other atoms. If the whole process expands in this way it is called a chain reaction, and if sufficient material is available a terrific explosion results.

Atomic philosophy. The hypothesis of Leucippus, Democritus, and Epicurus, that the world is composed of a concourse of atoms, or particles of matter so minute as to be incapable of further diminution. Cp. Corpuscular Philosophy.

Atomic theory. The doctrine that all elemental bodies consist of aggregations of atoms (i.e. the smallest indivisible particles of the element in question), not united fortuitously, but according to fixed proportions. The four laws of Dalton are—constant proportion, reciprocal proportion, multiple proportion, and compound proportion.

Atomic volume. The space occupied by a quantity of an element compared with, or in proportion to, atomic weight.

Atomic weight. The weight of an atom of an element, compared with an atom of hydrogen, the standard of unity.

Atomy. See Anatomy.

Atossa (atos' a). Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough (1660-1744), so called by Pope (Moral Essays, ii), was the friend of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, whom he calls Sappho. Herodotus says that Atossa, the mother of Xerxes, was a follower of Sappho.

A-trip. The anchor is a-trip when it has just been drawn from the ground in a perpendicular direction. A sail is a-trip when it has been hoisted from the cap, and is ready for trimming.
Atropos (át’ rō pōs). In Greek mythology the eldest of the Three Fates, and the one who severs the thread of human life.

Attainted (etymologically the same word as attain, through Fr. from Lat. ad, to, tangere, to touch). An old term in chivalry, meaning to strike the helmet and shield of an antagonist so firmly with the lance, held in a direct line, as to make the lance or overthrow the person struck. Hence, to convict, condemn; hence, to condemn one convicted of treason to loss of honours and death. The latter development of the word was affected by its fanciful association with taint.

Attic. The Attic Bee. Sophocles (495-405 B.C.), the tragic poet, a native of Athens; so called from the great sweetness of his compositions. See also Athenian Bee.

The Attic Bird. The nightingale; so called either because Philomel was the daughter of the King of Athens, or because of the great abundance of nightingales in Attica. Where the Attic bird Trills her thick-warbled notes the summer long.
Milton: Paradise Regained, iv, 245.

The Attic Boy. Cephalos, beloved by Aurora or Morn; passionately fond of hunting.

The Attic Muse. Xenophon (444-356 B.C.), the historian, a native of Athens; so called because the style of his composition is a model of elegance.

Attic salt. Elegant and delicate wit. Salt, both in Latin and Greek, was a common term for wit, or sparkling thought well expressed; thus Cicero says, Scipio omnes sale superabat. (Scipio surpassed all in wit). The Athenians were noted for their wit and elegant turns of thought.

Atticus (ā’tı’ kus). The most elegant and finished scholar of the Romans, and a bookseller (109-32 B.C.). His admirable taste and sound judgment were so highly thought of that even Cicero submitted several of his treatises to him.

The Christian Atticus. Reginald Heber (1783-1826), Bishop of Calcutta, a great bookseller, publisher, and friend of Swift; so called by Lord Chesterfield when Viceroy of Ireland.

The English Atticus. Joseph Addison (1672-1719), so called by Pope (Prologue to Satires), on account of his refined taste and philosophical mind.

The Irish Atticus. George Faulkner (1700-75), bookseller, publisher, and friend of Swift; so called by Lord Chesterfield when Viceroy of Ireland.

Atilla. See Ezel.

Attis. See Atys.

Attorney (a ter’ ni) (Fr. atourner, to attorn, or turn over to another). One who acts as agent for another, especially in legal matters. The work of an attorney is now undertaken by a solicitor, and the term is only used in "Power of Attorney" described below. A solicitor is one who solicits or petitions in Courts of Equity through counsel. At one time solicitors belonged to Courts of Equity, and attorneys to the other courts.

From and after Act 36, 37 Vict. lxi, 87, "all persons admitted as solicitors, attorneys, or proctors . . . empowered to practise in any court, the jurisdiction of which is hereby transferred to the High Court of Justice, or the Court of Appeal, shall be called Solicitors of the Supreme Court." (1873.)

Power of Attorney. Legal authority given to another to collect rents, pay wages, invest money, or to act in matters stated in the instrument, according to his own judgment. In such cases quod aliquis facit per aliquem, facit per se.

Warrant of Attorney. The legal instrument which confers on another the "Power of Attorney."

The Attorney-General is the chief law officer of the Government and head of the Bar. He conducts cases on behalf of the Crown, advises the various departments of State on legal matters, and, if necessary, justifies such advice and action in Parliament.

Atys (ā’tis). The Phrygian counterpart of the Greek Adonis and Phæcian Tammuz. He was beloved by Cybele, the mother of the gods, who changed him into a pine-tree as he was about to commit suicide. A three-days' festival was held in his honour every spring; great grief and mourning was expressed, he was sought for on the mountains, and on the third day brought back to the shrine of Cybele amid great rejoicing.

A.U.C. Abbreviation of the Lat. Anno Urbis Condita, "from the foundation of the city" (Rome). It is the starting point of the Roman system of dating events, and corresponds with 753 B.C.

Au courant (ō koo’ ron) (Fr.), "acquainted with" (literally, in the current events). To keep one au courant of everything that passes, is to keep one familiar with, or informed of, passing events.

Au fait (Fr.). Skilful, thorough master of; as, He is quite au fait in those matters, i.e. quite master of them or conversant with them.

Au pied de la lettre (Fr.). Literatim et verbatim; according to the strict letter of the text.

Arthur is but a boy, and a wild, enthusiastic young fellow whose opinions one must not take au pied de la lettre.

Thackeray: Pendennis, i, 11.

Au revoir (Fr.). "Good-bye for the present." Literally, till seeing you again.

Aubaine. See DROIT D'AUBAIN.

Aubry's Dog. See DOG.

Auburn (aw’ barn). It is supposed that this hamlet described by Goldsmith in The Deserted Village was Lissoy, County Westmeath, Ireland.

Audley. We will John Audley it. A theatrical phrase meaning to abridge, or bring to a conclusion, a play in progress. It is said that in the 18th century a travelling showman named Shuter used to lengthen out his performance till a goodly number of newcomers were waiting for admission to the next house. An assistant would then call out, “Is John Audley here?” and the play was brought to an end as soon as possible.

Audrey. In Shakespeare’s As You Like It, an awkward country wench, who jilted William for Touchstone. See also TAWDRY.

Augean Stables (aw jēˈən). The stables of Augeas, the mythological king of Elis, in Greece. In these stables he had kept 3,000 oxen, and they had not been cleansed for thirty years. One of the labours of Hercules (q.v.) was to cleanse them, and he did so by causing two rivers to run through them. Hence the phrase, to cleanse the Augean stables, means to clear away an accumulated mass of corruption, moral, religious, physical, or legal.

Augsburg Confession. The chief standard of faith in the Lutheran Church, drawn up by Melancthon and Luther in 1530, and presented to Charles V and the Diet of the German Empire, which was sitting at Augsburg.

The Interim of Augsburg. A Concordat drawn up by Charles V in 1548 to allay the religious turmoil of Germany. It was a provisional arrangement, based on the Augsburg Confession, and was to be in force till some definite decision could be pronounced by the General Council to be held at Trent. The Interim of Ratisbon was a similar temporary arrangement, resulting from the Diet of Ratisbon (1541).

Augury (aw' gō ri) (probably from Lat. avis, a bird, and garrisse, to talk), means properly the function of an augur, i.e. a religious official among the Romans who professed to foretell future events from omens derived chiefly from the actions of birds. The augur, having taken his stand on the Capitoline Hill, marked out with his wand the space of the heavens to be the field of observation, and divided it from top to bottom. If the birds appeared on the left of the division the augury was unlucky, but if on the right it was favourable.

This form of divination may have been due to the earliest sailors, who, if they got out of sight of land, would watch the flight of birds for indications of the shore. Cp. INAUGURATE; SINISTER.

August. This month was once called setillis, as it was the sixth from March, with which the year used to open, but it was changed to Augustus in compliment to Augustus (63 B.C.-A.D. 14), the first Roman Emperor, whose “lucky month” it was. Cp. JULY. It was the month in which he entered upon his first consulate, celebrated three triumphs, received the oath of allegiance from the legions which occupied of Alexandria, reduced Egypt, and put an end to the civil wars.

The old Dutch name for August was Oostmaand (harvest-month); the old Saxon Wood-monath (weed-month), where weed signifies vegetation in general. In the French Republican calendar it was called Thermidor (hot-month, July 19th to August 17th).

Augustus. A title conferred in 27 B.C. upon Caius Julius Cæsar Octavianus, the first Roman Emperor, meaning reverend, or venerable, and probably in origin consecrated by augury. In the reign of Diocletian (284-313) the two emperors each bore the title, and the two viceroys that of Cæsar. Prior to that time Hadrian limited the latter to the heir presumptive.

Augustus was the name given to Philippe II of France (1165-1223) and to Sigismund II of Poland (1520-72) both of whom were born in the month of August.

Augusta. The Roman name for the town that occupied the site of the City of London.

Augustan Age. The most fruitful and splendid time of Latin literature, so called from the Emperor Augustus. Horace, Ovid, Propertius, Tibullus, Virgil, etc., flourished in his reign, from 27 B.C. to A.D. 14.

Augustan Age of English Literature. The period of the classical writers of the time of Queen Anne and George I.

Augustan History. A series of histories of the Roman Empire from Hadrian to Numerianus (117-285), of unknown authorship and date, but ascribed to Ælius Spartianus, Julius Capitolinus, Ælius Lampridius, Vulciatus Gallicanus, Trebellius Pollio, and Flavius Vopiscus.

Augustine, The Second. Thomas Aquinas, the Angelic Doctor (q.v.).

Augustinian Canons. An order of monks founded in the 11th century by Ivo, Bishop of Chartres, and following the traditional rule of Augustine, Bishop of Hippo (d. 430). They came to England in the reign of Henry I, and had houses at Oxford, Bristol, Carlisle, Walsingham, Newstead, etc.

Augustinian, or Austin, Friars. A mendicant order founded by Innocent IV in 1250; they came to England two years later. See BEGGING FRIARS.

Auld Brig and New Brig. Robert Burns thus refers to the bridges over the river Ayr.

Auld Hornie. After the establishment of Christianity, the heathen deities were degraded by the Church into fallen angels; and Pan, with his horns, crooked nose, goat's beard, pointed ears, and goat's feet, was transformed to his Satanic majesty, and called Old Horney.

O thou, whatever title suit thee,
Auld Hornie, Satan, Nick, or Clootie.

Burns.

Auld Reekie. Edinburgh old town; so called because it generally appeared to be capped by a cloud of “reek” or smoke.

Aulic Council (Lat. aula, a court). The council of the Kaiser in the Holy Roman Empire, from which there was no appeal. It was instituted in 1501, and came to an end with the extinction of the Empire in 1806, though the name was afterwards given to the Emperor of Austria’s Council of State.

Aulis (aw’ lis). A harbour in Boeotia where the Greek fleet is said to have assembled before sailing against Troy. The goddess Artemis becalmed the vessels because Agamemnon had once killed a stag in the grove sacred to her, and it was declared that she could be propitiated only by the sacrifice of Agamemnon's daughter Iphigenia. The story is the subject of an opera (1774) by Gluck.

The "ord

Auneole. Strictly speaking the same as the vesice pisces (q.v.), i.e. an elliptical halo of light or colour surrounding the whole figure in early paintings of the Saviour and sometimes of the saints. Now, however, frequently used as though synonymous with nimbus (q.v.). Du Cange informs us that the aureole of nuns is white, of martyrs red, and of doctors green.

Aurignacian (aw rij' nå' shun). An early palaeolithic period in which the graphic arts were evidenced in the grotto at Aurignac, Haute Garonne, France. Flint and bone instruments and ornaments belong to this period.

Auri sacra fames (aw' ri sák' rá fà' méz'). A Latin "tag" from the Aeneid (III. 57), meaning, the cursed hunger for wealth. It is applied to that restless craving for money which is almost a monomania.

Aurora (aw' rór' á). Early morning. According to Grecian mythology, the goddess Aurora, called by Homer rosy-fingered," sets up before the sun, and is the pioneer of his rising. The Oizet hath yoked The Hours, like young Aurora, to his car.

Aurora's tears. The morning dew.

Aurora borealis. The electrical lights occasionally seen in the northern part of the sky: also called Northern Lights," and "Merry Dancers." See DEPWENTWATER.

The similar phenomenon that occurs in the south and round the South Pole is known as the Aurora Australis.

Aussone, Chateau (aw só' nán). A very fine claret.

Ausiona (aw só' ni á). An ancient name of Italy; so called from Auson, son of Ulysses, and father of the Ausones.

Austia. See AUGUSTINIAN FRIARS.

The narrow lane in the City of London of this name is so called because it is on part of the site of an Augustinian priory, the church of which remained until 1941 when it was destroyed by an aerial bomb.

Austrian Lip. No one who has seen portraits of the Spanish royal family of Hapsburgs can have failed to notice the curiously protruded lower jaw and lip that marked them all. This is one of the most famous cases of inherited physical deformities. It is said to have been derived originally through marriage with a daughter of the Polish princely family of Jacquellon. Describing the Emperor Charles V, at the age of fifty-five, Motley says "the lower jaw protruded so far beyond the upper that it was impossible for him to bring together the few fragments of teeth which still remained, or to speak a whole sentence in an intelligible voice." Of Charles II of Spain, his descendant in the fourth generation, and the last of the Hapsburgs, Macaulay says, "the malformation of the jaw, characteristic of his family, was so serious that he could not masticate his food."

Austrialy. The States of Australia have their own familiar names:—

South Australia, the Wheat State.
Queensland, Bananaland.
Victoria, the Cabbage Patch.
New South Wales, Ma State.
Northern Territory, Land of the White Ant.

Among the cities, Perth is called The Swan City; Adelaide, The City of the Churches; Melbourne, City of the Cabbage Garden.

Austrian Lip. No one who has seen portraits of the Spanish royal family of Hapsburgs can have failed to notice the curiously protruded lower jaw and lip that marked them all. This is one of the most famous cases of inherited physical deformities. It is said to have been derived originally through marriage with a daughter of the Polish princely family of Jacquellon. Authentic Doctor. A title bestowed on the scholastic philosopher, Gregory of Rimini (d. 1358).
Avernum

Authorized Version, The. See Bible, the English.

Autocrat of the Breakfast Table. A name given to Oliver Wendell Holmes, who wrote a series of essays under this title for the first twelve numbers of the Atlantic Monthly in 1857. They were published in volume form the following year.

Auto da Fe (aw’ to da fā) (Port. an act of faith). An assembly of the Spanish Inquisition for the examination of heretics, or for the carrying into execution of the sentences imposed by it. Those who persisted in their heresy were delivered to the secular arm and usually burnt. The reason why inquisitors burnt their victims was, because they were forbidden to “shed blood”: a tergiversation based on the axiom of the Roman Catholic Church, Ecclesia non novit sanguinem (The Church is untainted with blood).

Autolycus (aw tol’ i kús). In Greek mythology, son of Mercury, and the charioteer of Achilles, but according to Shakespeare’s use his name for the rascally pedlar in Winter’s Tale, and says:—

My father named me Autolycus; who being, as I am, littered [i.e. born] under Mercury, was likewise a snapper-up of unconsidered trifles.

Winter’s Tale, iv, 2.

Automedon (aw tom’ é don). A coachman. He was, according to Homer, the companion and the charioteer of Achilles, but according to Virgil the brother-in-arms of Achilles’s son, Pyrrhus.

Autumn. The third season of the year; astronomically, from September 21st to December 21st, but popularly comprising (in England) August, September, and October. Figuratively the word may mean the fruits of autumn, as in Milton’s:—

Raised of grassy turf
Their table was, and mossy seats had round,
And on her ample square, from side to side,
All autumn piled.

Paradise Lost, vi, 391.

or, a season of maturity or decay, as in Shelley’s:—

His limbs were lean; his scattered hair,
Served by the autumn of strange suffering,
Sung dirges in the wind.

Alastor, 248.

He is come to his autumn. A colloquialism, which may mean that he has entered on his period of (natural or induced) decay.

Ava (a’ vā). A ruined city in Burma, situated on the Irawaddy, some 10 miles south-west of Mandalay. It was the capital of the Burman empire until 1782 and again from 1823 to 1837. On being raised to the marquisate in 1888, the Earl of Dufferin, who had negotiated the annexation of Upper Burma, added the name of Ava to his title, becoming 1st Marquis of Dufferin and Ava.

Avalon (āv’ a lon). A Celtic word meaning “the island of apples,” and in Celtic mythology applied to the Island of Blessed Souls, an earthly paradise set in the western seas. In the Arthurian legends it is the abode and burial-place of Arthur, who was carried by Morgan le Fay. Its identification with Glastonbury (q.v.) rests on etymological confusion. Ogier le Dane and Overon also held their courts at Avalon.

Avant-courier (ā’ von kur’ yer). An Anglicized form of Fr. avant-courier, a messenger sent before, one who is to get things ready for a party of travellers, soldiers, etc., or to announce their approach. Figuratively, anything said or done to prepare the way for something more important; a feeler, a harbinger.

Avant-garde (ā’ von gard) (Fr.). The advanced guard of an army, usually nowadays cut down to vanguard. The term is also applied to ultra-modern and experimental young artists and writers.

Avars. See Banát.

Avatar (Sans., avatara, descent; hence, incarnation of a god). In Hindu mythology, the advent to earth of a deity in a visible form. The ten avatars of Vishnu are by far the most celebrated. The 1st advent (the Matsya), in the form of a fish; 2nd, (the Kurma), in that of a tortoise; 3rd (the Varaha), of a boar; 4th (the Narasinha), of a monster, half man and half lion; 5th (the Vaman), in the form of a dwarf; 6th (Parashurama), in human form, as Rama with the axe; 7th (Ramachandra), again as Rama; 8th, as Krishna (q.v.); 9th, as Buddha. These are all past. The 10th advent will occur at the end of four ages, and will be in the form of a white horse (Kalki) with wings, to destroy the earth.

The word is used metaphorically to denote a manifestation or embodiment of some idea or phase:—

I would take the last years of Queen Anne’s reign as the zenith, or palmy state, of Whiggism, in its divinest avatar of common sense.

Coleridge: Table-talk.

Ave (ā’ vi, a’ vā). Latin for “Hail!”

Ave atque vale. See Vale.

Ave Maria (Lat. Hail, Mary!). The first two words of the angel’s salutation to the Virgin Mary (Luke i, 28). In the Roman Catholic Church the phrase is applied to an invocation to the Virgin beginning with those words; and also to the smaller beads of a rosary, the larger ones being termed pater­nosters.

Avenger of Blood, The. The man who, in the Jewish polity, had the right of taking vengeance on him who had slain one of his kinsmen (Josh. xx, 5, etc.). The Avenger in Hebrew is called goel.

Cities of refuge were appointed for the protection of homicides, and of those who had caused another’s death by accident. (Num. xxxv, 12.). The Koran sanctions the Jewish custom.

Aver. See Avoirdupois.

Avernus (ā ver’ nú s) (Gr. a-ornis, “without a root”). A lake in Campania, so called from the belief that its sulphurous and mephitic vapours caused any bird that attempted to fly over it to fall into its waters. Latin mythology placed the entrance to the infernal regions near it; hence Virgil's lines:—

Faciles decausus Averno
Nosque atque dies patet atri Janua Dies;
Sed revocare gradum, superasque evadere ad auras,
Hoc opus, hoc labor est.

Aenid, vi. 126.

Englished by Dryden as follows:—
Smooth the descent and easy is the way
(The Gates of Hell stand open night and day); But to return, and view the cheerful skies.
In this the task and mighty labour lies.

Bad habits are easily acquired, but very hard to give up.

Avesta (ä' vè' tâ). The Zoroastrian and Parsee Bible, dating in its present form from the last quarter of the 4th century, A.D., collected from the ancient writings, sermons, etc., of Zoroaster (fl. before 800 B.C.), oral traditions, etc. It is only a fragment, and consists of (1) the Yasna, the chief liturgical portion, which includes Gathas, or hymns; (2) the Vepred, another liturgical work; (3) the Vendic, which, like our Pentateuch, contains the law and deals with stories of the different gods; together with prayers and other fragments.

The books are sometimes erroneously called the Zend-Avesta; this is a topsy-turvy misunderstanding of the term "Avesta-Zend," which means simply "text and commentary." Avestan (ä' vè' nûs). A writer of imitations of Aesop's fables in the decline of the Roman Empire. In the Middle Ages they were used as a first lesson book in schools.

Avicenna. See Abou Ibn Sina.

Avisgion Popes (ä' vè' nyôn). In 1309 Pope Clement V left Rome and transferred the papal court to Avignon, where the popes remained for seventy years of strife and confusion. The Avisgion popes were:

Clement V 1305-1314
Innocent VI 1352-1362
John XXII 1316-1334
Urban V 1362-1370
Benedict XII 1334-1342
Gregory XI 1370-1378
Clement VI 1342-1352

A vinculo matrimonii (ä' vëng' kû lô mät ri mö nii) (Lat.). A total divorce from marriage that is possible when a divorce of men'sa et thor (i.e. from table and bed—from bed and board) is partial, because the parties may, if they choose, come together again; but a divorce a vinculo matrimonii is granted in cases in which the "marriage" was never legal owing to a precontract (bigamy), consanguinity, or affinity.

Avoid Extremes. A traditional saying of Plutarch of Mitylene (652-569 B.C.), one of the seven Wise Men of Greece. It is echoed in many writers and literatures. Compare the advice given by Phaethon to Phaethon when he was preparing to drive the chariot of the sun:—

Medio tutissimus ibis (You will go more safely in the middle).—Ovid: Met. ii, 137.

Avoidupois (ä' év dû pôz'). Fr. avoir, avor, aver or aver, goods in general, and poise = pounds (weight). Not the verb, but the noun avoir. Prudently avoir de poise (goods having weight), goods sold by weight. There is an obsolete English word aver, meaning goods in general, hence also cattle; whence such compounds as aver-corn, aver-penny, aver-silver and aver-land.

Awar. One of the sons of Eblis (q.v.).

A-weather. A sailor's term; towards the weather, or the side on which the wind strikes, the reverse of a-lee, which is in the lee or shelter, and therefore opposite to the wind side.

Awkward Squad. Military recruits not yet fitted to take their place in the ranks. A "squad" is a contraction of "squadron." Ayl. "I'll pack up my awls and be gone," i.e. all my goods. The play is on awl and all.

Ax. To hang up one's axe. To retire from business, to give over a useless project. The allusion is to the battle-axe, formerly devoted to the gods and hung up when fighting was over. See Ask.

To put the axe on the helve. To solve a difficulty. To hit the right nail on the head.

To send the axe after the helve. To spend money in the hope of recovering bad debts.

He has an axe to grind. Some selfish motive in the background; some personal interest to answer. Franklin tells of a man who wanted to grind his axe, but had no time to turn the grindstone. Going to the yard where he saw young Franklin, he asked the boy to show him how the machine worked, kept praising him till his axe was ground, and then laughed at him for his pains.

Axiom (ä' ksm). A method of divination practised by the ancient Greeks with a view to discovering crime. An agate, or piece of jet, was placed on a red-hot axe, and indicated the guilty person by its motion (Gr. axine manteia).

Axis. The term used by the Fascist states of Central Europe, in the sense of an alliance. It was first used by Mussolini, in 1936 in a speech in which he declared the German-Italian agreement to be "an axis round which all European states animated by the will to collaboration and peace can also assemble."

Axis of advance. A military term for the road or track running through an area to be attacked and used by the attackers to maintain direction.

Ayah (ä' ya). Now an Anglo-Indian word, but originally Portuguese. A native Hindu nurse or lady's maid.

Ayeshah (ä' yesh' a). Mohammed's second and favourite wife. He married her when she was only nine years old, and died in her arms. She was born about 611 and died about 678.

Aymon, The Four Sons of (ä' mon). Aymon is a semi-mythical hero, and was father of Reynaud (or Rinaldo, q.v.), Guiseard, Alard, and Richard, all of whom were knighted by Charlemagne. The earliest version was probably compiled by Huon de Villeneuve from earlier chansons in the 13th century. The brothers, and their famous horse Bayard (q.v.), appear in many poems and romances, including Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, Pulci's Morgante Maggiore, Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato, Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, etc., and the story formed the basis of a number of French chap-books.

Ayrshire Poet. Robert Burns (1759-96), who was born at Alloway near the town of Ayr.
Azazel (ā zaz' el). In Lev. xvi we read that among other ceremonies the high priest, on the Day of Atonement, cast lots on two goats; one lot was for the Lord, and the other lot for Azazel. Milton uses the name for the standard-bearer of the rebel angels (Paradise Lost, i. 534). In Mohammedan legend, Azazel is a jinn of the desert; when God commanded the angels to worship Adam, Azazel replied, "Why should the son of fire fall down before a son of clay?" and God cast him out of heaven. His name was then changed to Ebils (q.v.), which means "despair.

Azrael (ā záriz' el). In Byron's Heaven and Earth, a seraph who fell in love with Anah, a granddaughter of Cain. When the flood came, he carried her under his wing to another planet.

Azilian (ā zil'i án). The main period of the Mesolithic Age, of which many harpoons made from stag bones have been found in the Pyrenean caves at Mas Azil.

Azoth (āz'oth) (Arab.). The alchemists' name for mercury; also the panacea or universal remedy of Paracelsus. Browning, in his poem Paracelsus (Bk. v), gives the name to Paracelsus's sword.

Azriel. See Kensington Gardens.

B. The form of the Roman capital "B" can be traced through early Greek to Phoenician and Egyptian hieratic; the small "b" is derived from the cursive form of the capital. The letter is called in Hebrew beth (a house); in Egyptian hieroglyphics it was represented by the crane.

Babel. A perfect Babel. A thorough confusion. "A Babel of sounds." A confused uproar, in which nothing can be heard but hubbub. The allusion is to the confusion of tongues at Babel (Gen. xi).
Babes in the Wood. See Children. The phrase has been humorously applied to (1) simple trustful folks, never suspicious, and easily gulled; (2) insurrectionary hordes that infested the mountains of Wicklow and the woods of Enniscorthy towards the close of the 18th century; and (3) men in the stocks or in the pillory.

Babes, Protecting deities of. According to Varro. Roman infants were looked after by Vagitarianus, the god who caused them to utter their first cry: Fabulinus, who presided over their speech; Cuba, the goddess who protected them in their cots; and Demiducia, who brought young children safe home, and kept guard over them when out of their parents’ sight. In the Christian Church St. Nicholas is the patron saint of children.

Babes in the Eyes. Love in the expression of the eyes. Love is the little babe Cupid, and hence the conceit, originating from the miniature image of oneself in the pupil of another’s eyes. In each of her two crystal eyes Smoketh a naked boy (Cupid).

She clung about his neck, gave him ten kisses. Toyed with his locks, looked babies in his eyes. Heywood: Love’s Mistress.

Babylon (báb’ lón). The Modern Babylon. So London is sometimes called, on account of its wealth, luxury, and dissipation; also (with allusion to Babel) because of the many nationalities that meet, and languages that are spoken there.

The hanging gardens of Babylon. See HANGING.

The whore of Babylon. An epithet bestowed on the Roman Catholic Church by the early Puritans and some of their descendants. The allusion is to Rev. xvii-xix. (Cp. SCARLET WOMAN.) In the book of the Revelation Babylon stands for Rome, the capital of the world; the embodiment of luxury, vice, splendour, tyranny, and all that the early Church knew was against the spirit of Christ.

Babylonian Captivity. The seventy years that the Jews were captives in Babylon. They were made captives by Nebuchadnezzar, and released by Cyrus (536 B.C.).

Babylonian numbers. Nec Babylonis tempus numeros (Horace: Odes. Bk. i, xi, 2). Do not pry into futurity by astrological calculations and horoscopes. Do not consult fortune-tellers. The Chaldeans were the most noted of astrologers.

Baca, The Valley of (ba’ ka). An unidentified place mentioned in Ps. lxxix, 6, meaning the Valley of Weeping, and so translated in the Revised Version. Baca trees were either mulberry trees or balsams.

Bacchuc (bák’ búc). A Chaldean or Assyrian word for an earthenware pitcher, cruse, or bottle, taken by Rabelais as the name of the Oracle of the Holy Bottle (and of its priestess), to which Pantagruel and his companions made a famous voyage. The question to be proposed was whether or not Panurge ought to marry. The Holy Bottle answered with a click like the noise made by a glass snapping. Bacbuc told Panurge the noise meant trinc (drink), and that was the response, the most direct and positive ever given by the oracle. Panurge might interpret it as he liked, the obscurity would always save the oracle. See ORACLE.

Bacchus (bák’ ús). In Roman mythology, the god of wine, the Dionysus of the Greeks, son of Zeus and Semele. He is represented in early art as a bearded man and completely clad, but after the time of Praxiteles as a beautiful youth with black eyes, golden locks, flowing with curls about his shoulders, and filleted with ivy. In peace his robe was purple, in war he was covered with a panther’s skin. His chariot was drawn by panthers.

In the famous statue in Rome he has a bunch of grapes in his hand and a panther at his feet. Pliny tells us that, after his conquest of India, Bacchus entered Thebes in a chariot drawn by elephants, and, according to some accounts, he married Ariadne after Theseus had deserted her in Naxos.

The name “Bacchus” is a corruption of Gr. Iacchus (from Iacho, a shout), and was originally merely an epithet of Dionysus as the noisy or rowdy god.

As jolly Bacchus, god of pleasure, Charmed the wide world with drink and dances, And all his thousand airy fancies. Parnell.

Bacchus sprang from the thigh of Zeus. The tale is that Semele, at the suggestion of Juno, asked Zeus to appear before her in all his glory, but the foolish request proved her death. Zeus saved the child which was prematurely born by sewing it up in his thigh till it came to maturity.

What has that to do with Bacchus? i.e. what has that to do with the matter in hand? When Thespis introduced recitations in the vintage songs, the innovation was suffered to pass, so long as the subject of recitation bore on the exploits of Bacchus; but when, for variety’s sake, he wandered to other subjects, the Greeks pulled him up with the exclamation, “What has that to do with Bacchus?”

Bacchus a noyé plus d’hommes que Neptune. The allele-wrecks more men than the ocean.

A priest, or son, of Bacchus. A toper.

Bacchus, in the Lusiad, is the evil demon or antagonist of Jupiter, the lord of destiny. As Mars is the guardian power of Christianity, Bacchus is the guardian power of Mohammedanism.

Bacchanalia. The triennial festivals held at night in Rome in honour of Bacchus, called in Greece Dionysia, Dionysus being the Greek equivalent of Bacchus. In Rome, in later times in Greece, they were characterized by drunkenness, debauchery, and licentiousness of all kinds; but originally they were very different and were of greater importance than any other ancient festival on account of their connexion with the origin and development of the drama; for in Attica, at the Dionysia choragic literary contests were held, and from these both tragedy and comedy originated. Hence bacchanalian, drunken. The terms are now applied to any drunken and convivial orgy on the grand scale.

Bacchanals (bāk' ā nálz) (see also Bag o' Nails), Bacchants, Bacchantes. Priests and priestesses, or male and female votaries, of Bacchus; hence, a drunken roysterer.

Bacchante (bā kān'ti). A female wine-bibber; so-called from the "bacchantes," or female priestesses of Bacchus. They wore fillets of ivy.

Bacharach (bāk' ā rāk). A brand of Rhine wine made in this small Rhenish town some 23 miles south of Coblenz. It once enjoyed great popularity in England and the name appears in many forms in Elizabethan and later literature—backrack, backrag, baccharic, etc.

I'm for no tongues but dry'd ones, such as will Give a fine relish to my backrag.

Mayne: The City Match (1629).

Good backrack . . . to drink down in healths.

Fletcher: Beggars' Bush.

Bachelor. A man who has not been married.

This is a word whose ultimate etymology is unknown; it is from O.Fr. bachelor, which is from a late Latin word baccalarius. This last may be merely a translation of the French word, as it is only of rare and very late occurrence, but it may be allied to baccarius, a late Latin adjective applied to farm labourers, the history of which is very doubtful.

In the Prologue to the Canterbury Tales (1, 80), Chaucer uses the word in its old sense of a knight not old enough to display his own banner, and so following that of another:

With him ther was his sone, a young Squerer, A loosere, and a lusty bachelor.

Taxes on bachelors. By an Act of 1694 a tax was imposed on unmarried male persons above the age of twenty-five, varying in amount from £12 10s. to £1, according to the taxpayer's status. It was repealed in 1706. In 1785 bachelors' servants were subjected to a higher tax than those of other persons. In the graduated Income Tax designed by Pitt in 1799 the rate for bachelors was higher than for married men. In the existing Income Tax system a bachelor pays at a higher rate than a married man by having no allowances for wife, children, etc.

Bachelor of Arts. A student who has taken the university degree below that of Master.

Bachelor of Salamanca. The last novel of Le Sage (published in 1736); the hero is a bachelor of arts, Don Cherubin de la Ronda; he is placed in different situations of life, and associates with all classes of society.

Bachelor's buttons. Several flowers are so called. Red bachelor's buttons, the double red campion; yellow, the upright crowfoot; white, the white ranunculus, or white campion. The similitude of these flowers have to the jagged cloath buttons anciently wore ... gave occasion . . . to call them Bachelor's Buttons.

Gerard: Herbal.

Or the phrase may come from a custom sometimes observed by countrymen of carrying the flower in their pockets to know how they stand with their sweethearts. If the flower dies, it is a bad omen; but if it does not fade, they may hope for the best.

Bachelor's fare. Bread and cheese and kisses.

Bachelor's porch. An old name for the north door of a church. Menservants and poor men used to sit on benches down the north aisle, and maidservants and poor women on the south side. After service the men formed one line and the women another, down which the clergy and gentry passed.

Bachelor's wife. A hypothetical ideal or perfect wife.

Bachelors' wives and maids' children be well taught.

Heywood: Proverbs.

Back, To. To support with money, influence, or encouragement; as to "back a friend": to lay money on a horse in a race, "backing" it to win or for a place.

A commercial term, meaning to endorse. When a merchant backs or endorses a bill, he guarantees its value.

Falstaff says to the Prince:—

You care not who sees your back. Call you that backing of your friends? A plague upon such backing!

1 Henry IV, ii, 4.

Back-of-beyond. A phrase originating in Australia to describe the wide inland spaces, the great Outback. The phrase backblock is found in 1850. Referring to those vast territories divided up by the government into blocks for settlement.

Back the oars, or back water, is to row backwards, that the boat may move the reverse of its ordinary direction.

Back and edge. Entirely, heartily, tooth and nail, with might and main. The reference is, perhaps, to a wedge driven home to split wood.

They were working back and edge for me.

Boldrickwood: Robbery under Arms, ch. ii.

Laid on one's back. Laid up with chronic ill-health; helpless.

Thrown on his back. Completely beaten. A figure taken from wrestling.

To back and fill. A nautical phrase, denoting a mode of tacking when the tide is against the ship and the wind against it. Metaphorically, to be irresolute.

To back out. To withdraw from an engagement, bargain, etc.; to retreat from a difficult position.

To back the field. To bet on all the horses bar one.

To back the sails. So to arrange them that the ship's way may be checked.

To back up. To uphold, to support. As one who stands at your back to support you. An advance by the batsman not taking strike at cricket in order to be ready to take a quick run if the striker makes an opportunity.

To break the back of. To finish the hardest part of one's work.
To get one's back up. To be irritated. The allusion is to a cat, which sets its back up when attacked by a dog or other animal.

To go back on one's word. To withdraw what one has said; to refuse to perform what one has promised. To go back on a person is to betray him.

To have one's back to the wall. To act on the defensive against odds. One beset with foes tries to get his back against a wall that he may not be attacked by foes behind.

To see his back: to see the back of anything. To get rid of a person or thing; to see it leave.

To take a back seat. To withdraw from a position one has occupied or attempted to occupy: to retire into obscurity, usually as a confession of failure.

To the back. To the backbone, entirely.

To turn one's back on another. To leave, forsake, or neglect one. To leave him by going away.

Backbite. To slander behind one's back.

Back-handed compliment: a compliment as to imply an insult.

Back-handed. The A.S. bac gamen (back game), so called because the pieces (in certain circumstances) are taken up and obliged to go back to enter at the table again.

Back-hander. A blow with the back of the hand. Also one who takes back the decanter in order to hand himself another glass before the decanter is passed on.

He that backbiteth not with his tongue. Psalm xv, 3.

Backgammon. A game given familiarly to the scientists and others who, unknown to the general public, devised and developed in their studies and laboratories methods of scientific warfare. The name has since been applied generally to such unknown workers in their studies and laboratories methods of failure.

Backwater. This means properly a pool or creek of still water fed indirectly by a river or stream. It has come to mean figuratively any state in which one is isolated from the active flow of life.

Bacon. To baste your bacon. To strike or scourge one. Bacon is the outside portion of the sides of pork, and may be considered generally as the part which would receive a blow.

Falstaff's remark to the travellers at Gadshill, "Oh, bacons, on!" (1 Henry IV, ii, 2) is an allusion to the fact that formerly swine's flesh formed the staple food of English rustics; hence such terms as bacon-down and chaw-bacon for a clownish blockhead.

To bring home the bacon. To bring back the prize; to succeed. This phrase may have originated in reference to the contest for the Dunmow flitch, or to the sport of catching a greased pig at country fairs.

To save one's bacon. To save oneself from injury; to escape loss. The allusion may be to the care taken by our forefathers to save from the numerous dogs that frequented their houses the bacon which was laid up for winter. But here I say the Turks were much mistaken, Who, hating hogs, yet wished to save their bacon. ~BYRON: Don Juan, vii, 42.

He may fetch a flitch of bacon from Dunmow. He is so amiable and good-tempered he will never quarrel with his wife. The allusion is to the Dunmow Flitch. See DUNMOW.

Baconian Philosophy. A system of philosophy based on principles laid down by Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam, in the 2nd book of his Novum Organum. It is also called inductive philosophy.

Baconian Theory. The theory that Lord Bacon wrote the plays attributed to Shakespeare.

Bacon's Brazen Head. See BRAZEN HEAD.

Bactrian Sage. Zoroaster, or Zarathustrtha, the founder of the Perso-Iranian religion, who is supposed to have flourished in Bactria (the modern Balkh) before 800 B.C.

Bad. Among rulers surnamed "The Bad" are William I, King of Sicily from 1154 to 1166, Albert, Landgrave of Thuringia and Margrave of Meisen (d. 1314), and Charles II, King of Navarre (1332-87).

Bad blood. Vindictiveness, ill-feeling; hence, to make bad blood, or to stir up bad blood, to create or renew ill-feeling and a vindictive spirit.

You are in my bad books. See BLACK BOOKS.
Bad debts. Debts not likely to be paid.

Bad egg. A disreputable character; a thoroughly bad fellow.

A bad excuse is better than none. An adage that first appeared in Nicolas Udall's Ralph Roister Doister (1541), the first comedy written for the English stage.

Bad form. Not in good taste.

The Bad Lands. In America, the Mauvais Terres of the early French settlers west of Missouri; extensive tracts of sterile, alkali hills, rocky, desolate, and almost destitute of vegetation, in South Dakota.

Bad lot. A person of bad moral character, or one commercially unsound. Also a commercial project or stock of worthless value.

Bad shot. A wrong guess. A sporting phrase; a bad shot is one which does not bring down the bird shot at, one that misses the mark.

Badger. A hawker, huckster, or itinerant dealer, especially in corn, but also in butter, eggs, fish, etc. The word is still in use in some dialects; its derivation is not certainly known, but it is not in any way connected with a badger. Fuller derived it from Lat. bajulare, to carry, but there is no substantiation for this. The modern hawker's licence dates from the time when he belonged, in red or blue cloth, on the shoulder of the right sleeve. See Dyvour.

It is a vulgar error that the legs of a badger are shorter on one side than on the other. I think that Titus Oates was as uneven as a badger.

Macaulay.

Drawing a badger, is drawing him out of his tub by means of dogs.

In the U.S.A. badger is the slang name of an inhabitant of Wisconsin.

Badinage (ba dín'gā). A nickname given to Napoleon III. It is said to be the name of the workman whose clothes he wore when he contrived to escape from the fortress of Ham, in 1846.

If Badinage and Bismarck have a row together let them settle it between them with their fists, instead of troubling hundreds of thousands of men who have no wish to fight.

Zola: The Downfall, ch. ii.

Napoleon's adherents were known as Badinageux.

Badminton (bad'mi nōn). The country seat of the Dukes of Beaufort in Gloucestershire. It has given its name to a drink and a game. The drink is a claret-cup made of claret, sugar, spices, soda-water, and ice. In pugilistic parlance blood, which is sometimes called "claret" (q.v.), is also sometimes called "badminton," from the colour.

The game badminton is a predecessor of, and is similar to, lawn tennis; it is played with shuttlecocks instead of balls.

Badoura (ba dô' rä). "The most beautiful woman ever seen upon earth," heroine of the story of Camaralzaman and Badoura in the Arabian Nights.

Baedeker. Starred in Baedeker. For many years tourists the world over have flocked to places of interest, red guide-book in hand. Karl Baedeker (1801-59) brought out his first guide-book (to Holland, Belgium and the Rhine) by arrangement with Mr. John Murray in 1839. In subsequent years he and his agents wrote exhaustive guide-books of almost every part of the world. Baedeker inaugurated the somewhat invidious and not always reliable system of marking with one or more stars objects and places of interest according to their historic or aesthetic importance.

Baedeker Raids. A phrase first used in Britain April 29th, 1942, to describe German air raids which, in reprisal for damage done to Cologne and Lubeck, were deliberately directed on historic monuments (e.g. Bath, Canterbury, Norwich) listed as such in Baedeker's guide.

Baffle. Originally a punishment meted out to a recreant or traitorous knight by which he was degraded and thoroughly disgraced, part of which seems to have consisted in hanging him or his effigy by the heels from a tree and loudly proclaiming his misdeeds. See Spenser's Faerie Queene, VI, vii, 26:-

"Letting him arise like abject thrall
He gan to him object his heinous crime,
And to revile, and rate, and recreant call,
And lastly to despoyle of knightly bannier all.
And after all, for greater infamous,
He by the heele he hung upon a tree,
And baffle so, that all which passed by,
The picture of his punishment might see,
And by the like ensample warned be.
How ever they through high treason doe trespass.

Bag and Baggage, as "Get away with you, bag and baggage," i.e. get away, and carry with you all your belongings. Originally a military phrase signifying the whole property and stores of an army and of the soldiers composing it. Hence the bag and baggage policy. In 1866 Gladstone, speaking on the Eastern question, said, "Let the Turks now carry away their abuses in the only possible manner, namely, by carrying away themselves. . . . One and all: bag and baggage, shall, I hope, clear out from the province they have desolated and profaned." See also BAGGAGE.

A bag of bones. Very emaciated: generally "a mere bag of bones."

Bag o' Nails. Corruption of Bacchanals. A not uncommon inn-sign, The Devil and the Bag o' Nails, represents Pan, with his cloven hoo's and his horns, accompanied by satyrs.

A bag of tricks, or the whole bag of tricks. The whole lot, the entire collection. This is an allusion to the conjurer's bag in which he carries the various properties and impedimenta for performing his tricks.

The bottom of the bag. The last expedient, having emptied every other one out of one's bag: a trump card held in reserve.

In the bag. As good as certain.

To be left holding the bag. To have one's comrades' decamp or withdraw leaving one with the entire onus of what was originally a group responsibility.

To empty the bag. To tell the whole matter and conceal nothing (Fr. vider le sac, to expose all to view).

To give the bag, now means the same as to give the sack (see SACK), but it seems originally to have had the reverse meaning; a servant or employee leaving without having given notice was said to have given his master "the bag."

To let the cat out of the bag. See under CAT.

To bag. Secure for oneself; probably an extension of the sporting use of the word, meaning, to put into one's bag what one has shot, caught, or trapped. Hence, a good bag, a large catch of game, fish, or other animals sought after by sportsmen.

Bag-man. A. A commercial traveller, who carries a bag with samples to show to those whose custom he solicits. In former times commercial travellers used to ride a horse with saddle-bags sometimes so large as almost to conceal the rider.

Bags I. See FAINS.

Bags. Slang for "trousers," which may be taken as the bags of the body. When the pattern was very staring and "loud," they once were called howling-bags.

Oxford bags are wide-bottomed flannel trousers.

Bags of mystery. Slang for sausages or saveloys; the allusion is obvious.

Baga de Secrets. Records in the Record Office of trials for high treason and other State offences from the reign of Edward IV to the close of the reign of George III. These records contain the proceedings in the trials of Anne Boleyn, Sir Walter Raleigh, Guy Fawkes, the regicides, and of the risings of 1715 and 1745.

Baggage, as applied to a worthless or a flirtatious woman, dates from the days when soldiers' wives taken on foreign service with the regiment travelled with the regimental stores and baggage.

Bagstock, Major. A blustering old toady figuring in Dickens's Dombey and Son. He always alludes to himself in the third person as "Joey B.," "Old Josh B.," and so forth.

Bahram (ba' rām). Governor of Media, and a famous Persian general in the 6th century A.D. He was "Bahram the Great Hunter" of Omar Khayyam. The Aga Khan's horse of this name won the Derby in 1935.

Bail (Fr. bailler, to deliver up). Security given for the temporary release of an accused person pending his trial or the completion of his trial; also the person or persons giving such security. See also LEG-BAIL.

Common bail, or bail below. A bail given to the sheriff to guarantee the appearance of the defendant in court at any day and time the court demands.

Special bail, or bail above. A bail which includes, besides the guarantee of the defendant's appearance, an undertaking to satisfy all claims made on him.

Bail up! The Australian bushranger's equivalent for the highwayman's "Stand and deliver!"

Bailey (probably in ultimate origin from O.Fr. bailler, to enclose). The external wall of a mediaeval castle, forming the first line of defence; also the outer court of the castle, the space immediately within the outer wall. The entrance was over a drawbridge, and through the embattled gate. When there were two courts they were distinguished as the outer or inner bailey. Subsequently the word included the court and all its buildings; and when the court was abolished, the term was attached to the castle, as the Old Bailey (London) and the Bailey (Oxford).

Bailey bridge. The name given in World War II to a metal bridge made of easily portable sections of amazing strength which could be speedily erected. A major factor in the rapidity of Allied advances, particularly in N.W. Europe, was the employment of these bridges. They were invented by the British engineer, D. C. Bailey.

Bailiff. See Bum-bailiff.

Bailiwick (bā' li wik). The county in which a sheriff, as bailiff of the King, exercises jurisdiction; or the liberty of some lord "who has an exclusive authority within its limits to act as the sheriff does in the county."

The sheriff of the shire, whose peculiar office it is to walk continually up and down his bailiwick as ye would have a marshall.

SPENSER: State of Ireland, 1597.

Out of one's bailiwick, far from home, on strange ground.
Baily's Beads. See Bead.

Bain Marie (bán má ré). The French name for a double saucepan like a glue-pot. The term is sometimes used in English kitchens. It appears earlier (as in Mrs. Glasse's Cookery Book, 1796) under its Latin name, Balneum Maria, hence the "St. Mary's bath" of Ben Jonson's Alchemist, ii, iii. The name is supposed to be due to the gentleness of this method of heating.

Bairam (bí'rám). The name given to two great Mohammedan feasts. The Lesser begins on the new moon of the month Shawwal, at the termination of the fast of Ramadan, and lasts three days. The Greater (Idul-Kabir) is celebrated on the tenth day of the twelfth month (Dhul Hijja), lasts for four days, and forms the concluding ceremony of the pilgrimage to Mecca. It comes seventy days after the Lesser Bairam. It appears in the Book of the Koran under the name of 'Idul-Kabir.

Bajadere. See Bayadere.

Bajan. Bajanella. See Bejan.

Bajazet (baj' á zet). Sultan of the Turks from 1389 to 1403, he was a great warrior, among his other victories being that of Nicopolis in 1396 when he defeated the allied armies of the Hungarians, Poles, and French. But he was himself beaten by Timur at Ankara (1402) and held prisoner by him until his death. There is no warrant whatsoever for the story that Timur carried him about in an iron cage, but the story inspired both Marlowe and Rowe to some of their finest writing.

Baked Meats, or Bake-meats. Meat pies. "The funeral baked meats did coldly furnish for the table" (Hamlet, iv, 2); i.e. the hot meat pies served at the funeral and not eaten, were served cold at the marriage banquet.

Baker, The. Louis XVI was called "the Baker," the queen was called "the baker's wife" (or La Boulangère), and the dauphin the "shop boy"; because they gave bread to the mob of starving men and women who came to Versailles on October 6th, 1789.

The return of the baker, his wife, and the shop-boy to Paris [after the king was brought from Versailles] had not had the expected effect. Flour and bread were still scarce. —A. Dumas: The Countess of Charny, ch. ix.

Baker's dozen. Thirteen for twelve. When a heavy penalty was inflicted for short weight, bakers used to give a surplus number of loaves, called the inbread, to avoid all risk of incurring the fine. The 13th was the "vantage loaf."

To give one a baker's dozen, in slang phraseology, is to give him a sound drubbing —i.e. all he deserves and one stroke more.

Baker's knee. Knock-knee. Bakers were said to be particularly liable to this deformity owing to the constrained position in which they have to stand when kneading bread.

Bakha. The sacred bull of Hermomthis in Egypt. He changed colour every hour of the day, and is supposed to have been an incarnation of Menthu, the Egyptian personification of the heat of the sun.

Bakshesh (bák' shesh). A Persian word for a gratuity. These gifts are insolently and persistently demanded throughout the Near East by beggars, camel-men, servants and all sorts of officials more as a claim than a gratuity. I was to give the men, too, a "baksheesh," that is a present of money, which is usually made upon the conclusion of any sort of treaty. —KINGLACK: Eothen.

Balaam (bá' lám). (1) In Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, the Earl of Huntingdon, one of the rebels in Monmouth's army.

(2) The "citizen of sober fame," who lived hard by the Monument, in Pope's Moral Essays, Ep. iii, was drawn, in part, from Thomas Pitt ("Diamond Pitt," see Pitt Diamond), grandfather of the Earl of Chatham. He "was a plain, good man; religious, punctual, and frugal"; he grew rich; got knighted; seldom went to church; became a courtier; "took a bribe from France"; was hanged for treason, and all his goods were confiscated to the State.

This word was also used for matter kept in type for filling up odd spaces in periodical's. Lockhart, in his Life of Scott (ch. lxx) tells us:—Balaam is the cant name for asinine paragraphs about monstrous productions of nature and the like. The story inspired both Marlowe and Rowe to some of their finest writing.

To strike a balance. To calculate the exact difference, if any, between the debit and credit side of an account.

Balance of trade. The money-value difference between the exports and imports of a nation.

Balance of power. Such an adjustment of power among sovereign States as results in no one nation having such a preponderance as could enable it to endanger the independence of the rest.

Balclutha (bál cloo’ thá). A fortified town on the banks of the Clutha (i.e. the Clyde) mentioned in Carthun, one of the Ossian poems. It was captured and burnt by Fingal’s father, Comhal, in one of his forays against the Britons.

Bald. Charles le Chauve. Charles I of France (822, 840-77), son of Louis le Debonnaire, was surnamed “the Bald” (le Chauve).

Baldheaded. To go for someone baldheaded, that is without restraint or compunction, probably dates from the days when men wore wigs, and any energetic action required that the wig should be thrown aside and the owner go into the fray unencumbered.

Baldachin (bol’ dá kin). The dais or canopy under which, in Roman Catholic processions, the Holy Sacrament is carried: also the canopy above an altar. It is the Ital. baldacchino, so called from Baldaccio (Ital. for Bagdad), where the cloth was originally made.

Baldar (bol’ der). Son of Odin and Frigga; the Scandinavian god of light, who dwelt at Breidhakil, one of the mansions of Asgard. He is the central figure of many myths, the chief being connected with his death. He is said to have been slain by his rival Hodhr while fighting for possession of the beautiful Nanna. Another legend tells that Frigga bound all things by oath not to harm him, but accidentally omitted the mistletoe, with a twig of which Baldar was slain. His death was the prelude to the final overthrow of the gods.

Balderdash. A word of uncertain origin, formerly meaning froth, also a mixture of incongruous liquors (such as wine and beer or beer and milk), but now denoting nonsensical talk; ridiculous poetry, jumbled ideas, etc. It may be connected with the Dan. bolder, noise, clatter; but in view of the earlier senses of the word this is, at least, doubtful.

Baldwin. (1) In the Charlemagne romances, nephew of Roland and the youngest and comeliest of Charlemagne’s paladins.

(2) Brother of Godfrey of Bouillon, whom he succeeded (1100) as King of Jerusalem. He figures in Tasso’s Jerusalem Delivered as the restless and ambitious Duke of Bologna, leader of 200 horse in the allied Christian army. He died in Egypt, 1118.

Bale. When bale is highest, boot is nestest. An old Icelandic proverb that appears in Heywood and many other English writers. It means, when things have come to the worst they must needs mend. Bale means “evil,” and is common to most Teutonic languages; but (q.v.) is the M.E. bote, relief, remedy.

Bale out. The literal meaning of this phrase is to ladle out with buckets, as when one empties the water out of a small boat. Among flying men “to bale out” means to descend from an aeroplane by parachute when some emergency necessitating this arises, and in the army to get out of a tank in a hurry when it is hit.

Balfour of Burley, John. Leader of the Covenanters in Scott’s Old Mortality. His prototype in real life was John Balfour of Kinloch. Scott seems to have confused him with John, Lord Balfour of Burleigh, who died in 1688 and was not a Covenanter.

Balin (bál’ in). Brother to Balin in the Arthurian romances. They were devoted to each other, but they accidentally met in single combat and slew one another, neither knowing until just before death who was his opponent. At their request they were buried in one grave by Merlin. The story is told in Malory, Bk. ii.

Tennyson gives a much altered version in the Idylls of the King.

Balios. See Horse.

Balisarda. See Sword.

Balistraria (bál’ is trár’ já) (mediaeval Lat.). Narrow apertures in the form of a cross in the walls of ancient castles, through which cross-bow-men discharged their arrows.

Balk (bawk). Originally a ridge or mound on the ground (O.E. balca), then the ridge between two furrows left in ploughing, the word came to be figuratively applied to any obstacle, stumbling-block, or check on one’s actions; as in billiards, the balk (or baulk) is the part of the table behind the balk-line from which one has to play when, in certain circumstances, one’s freedom is checked. So, also, to balk is to place obstacles in the way of.

A balk of timber is a large beam of timber, often in the rough.

To make a balk. To miss a part of the field in ploughing. Hence, to disappoint, to withhold deceitfully.

Balker. One who from an eminence on shore directs fishermen where shoals of herrings have gathered together. Probably from the Dutch balken, to shout, and connected with the O.E. balcan, with the same meaning.

Balkis (ból’ kis). The Mohammedan name for the Queen of Sheba, who visited Solomon.

Ball. “Ball,” the spherical body, is a Middle English and Old Teutonic word; “ball,” the dancing assembly, is from O.Fr. baler, to dance, from late Lat. ballare. The two are in no way connected.

To keep the ball a-rolling. To continue without intermission. To keep the fun, or the conversation, etc., alive; to keep the matter going. A metaphor taken from several games played with balls.

To have the ball at your feet. To have a great opportunity. A metaphor from football.

To take the ball before the bound. To anticipate an opportunity; to over-hasty. A metaphor from cricket.
The ball is with you. It is your turn now.

A ball of fortune. One tossed like a ball, from pillar to post; one who has experienced many vicissitudes of fortune.

To open the ball. To lead off the first dance at a ball.

To strike the ball under the line. To fail in one's object. The allusion is to tennis, in which a line is stretched in the middle of the court, and the players standing on each side have to send the ball over the line.

Ballad. Originally a song to dance music, or a song sung while dancing. It is from late Lat. ballare, to dance (as "ball," the dance), through Provençal balada, and O.Fr. balade. Let me make the ballads, and who will may make the laws. Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun, in Scotland, wrote to the Marquis of Montrose, "I knew a very wise man of Sir Christopher Musgrave's sentiment. He believed, if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws" (1703).

Ballade (bál' ad'). This is an artificial verse-form originating with the Provençal troubadours. In its normal type it consists of three stanzas of eight lines, followed by a verse of four lines known as the Envoi. The principal rules for the ballade are: The same set of rhymes in the same order they occupy in the first half of the verses. No word used as a rhyme must be used again for that purpose throughout the ballade. Each stanza and the Envoi must close with the refrain: The Envoi always taking the same rhymes as the last half of the preceding verse. Only three rhymes are permissible. The sequence of the rhymes is usually:—a, b, a, b, c, b, c, for each verse and b, c, b, c, for the Envoi.

Ballet. A theatrical representation of some adventure, intrigue, or emotional phase by pantomime and dancing. Baltazarini, director of music to Catherine de Medici, is said to have been the inventor of ballets as presented in modern times: for long they were an integral part of Italian opera.

Balliol College, Oxford, founded in 1263, by Sir John de Ballyol (father of Ballyol, King of Scotland) and his wife, Devorguilla.

Balloon. The balloon was invented by Jacques Etienne Montgolfier (1745-1799). The first ascent was made in 1783, the balloon being caused to rise by hot air. In 1825 Charles Green went up in the first gas-filled balloon. During the siege of Paris, in 1871, fifty-four balloons were dispatched carrying 2,500,000 letters. In World War I captive balloons were largely used by both sides to observe the enemy's movements and dispositions. A barrage of captive balloons was used in both World Wars as a defence of cities against enemy aircraft.

Ballot. This method of voting is so called because it was originally by the use of small balls secretly put into a box, as is still done in clubs, etc. Voting for Parliamentary elections was first carried out by ballot in 1870 (the Ballot Act was two years later) and the method then introduced has since obtained. The names of candidates are printed in alphabetical order on a voting paper, the elector marks a cross against his choice, and the folded paper is then slipped into a sealed box.

Ballyhoo (bál i hoo'). The word is said to come from Ballyhooly, a village in Co. Cork, but in its present sense its origin is in the U.S.A. Ballyhoo means noisy demonstration to attract attention, exaggerated publicity, or extravagant advertisement.

Balm (Fr. baume; a contraction of balsam). An aromatic, resinous gum exuding from certain trees, and used in perfumery and medicine; hence, a soothing remedy or alleviating agency.

Is there no balm in Gilead? (Jer. viii, 22). Is there no remedy, no consolation? "Balm" in this passage is the Geneva Bible's translation of the Heb. sor, which probably means mastic, the resin yielded by the mastic tree. Pistacia Lentiscus, which was formerly an ingredient used in many medicines. In Wyclif's Bible the word is translated "gumme," and in Coverdale's "tricle." See Treacle.

The gold-coloured resin now known as "Balm of Gilead" is that from the Balnea-Moedendorf Gileadense, an entirely different tree.

Balmerino (bál mer' i nó). The story was long current that when Lord Balmerino was executed for his part in the Jacobite rebellion of 1745, the executioner bungled and only half cut off his head; whereupon his lordship turned round and grinned at him.

Balmy. "I am going to the balmy"—i.e. to "Balmy sleep"; one of Dick Swiveller's pet phrases (Dickens: Old Curiosity Shop).

For balmy in the sense of silly, or mildly idiotic, see BARMY.

Balnibari (bál ni' bar' bi). A land occupied by projectors (Swift: Gulliver's Travels).

Balthazar (bál thá' zár). One of the kings of Cologne. See MAGI.

Baltic Sea. Scandinavia used to be known as Baltia. There is a Lithuanian word, baltas, meaning "white," from which the name may be derived; but it may also be from Scand balta, a strait or belt, and the Baltic would then be the sea of the "belts."

Baltic, The, in commercial parlance is the familiar name of the Baltic Mercantile and Shipping Exchange, which was founded in the 17th century. It deals with chartering of ships, freights, marine insurance, etc., all over the world.
In which applied specifically subjects to be preached yearly at Great denunci•ation, Oxford Mans, R.A.S. matize, to pronounce a curse upon; and the the same person may never be chosen sen

All the people upon earth, excepting those two or three worthy gentlemen, are imposed upon, cheated, bullied, abused, bamboozled.

Addison: The Drummer.

Bampton Lectures. Founded by the Rev. John Bampton, canon of Salisbury, who, in 1751, left £120 per annum to the university of Oxford, to pay for eight divinity lectures on given subjects to be preached yearly at Great St. Mary's, and printed afterwards. M.A.s of Oxford or Cambridge are eligible as lecturers, but the same person may never be chosen twice. Cp. Hulsean Lectures.

Ban (A.S. banan, to summon, O.Teut. to proclaim). Originally meaning to summon, the verb came to mean to implicate, to anathematize, to pronounce a curse upon; and the noun from being a general proclamation was applied specifically to an ecclesiastical curse or denunciation, a formal prohibition, a sentence of outlawry, etc. Banish and BANS (q.v.), are from the same root.

Lever le ban et l'arriere ban (Fr.). To levy the ban was to call the king's vassals to active service; to levy the arriere ban was to levy the vassals of a suzerain or under-lord.

Ban. King. In the Arthurian legends, father of Sir Launcelot du Lac. He died of grief when his castle was taken and burnt through the treachery of his seneschal.

Banagher. That beats (bán 'á her). Wonderfully inconsistent and absurd—exceedingly ridiculous. Banagher is a town in Ireland, on the Shannon, in Offaly. It formerly sent two members to Parliament, and was a famous pocket borough. When a member spoke of a family borough where every voter was a man employed by the lord, it was not unusual to reply, "Well, that beats Banagher."

Grose, however, gives another explanation. According to him Banagher (or Banaghan) was an Irish minstrel famous for telling wonderful stories of the Munchausen kind.

Banat (bán 'át). A territory under a ban (Persian for lord, master), particularly certain districts of Hungary and Croatia. The word was brought into Europe by the Avars, a Ural-Altaic people allied to the Huns, who appeared on the Danube and settled in Dacia in the latter half of the 6th century.

Banbury. A town in Oxfordshire, proverbially famous for its Puritans, its "cheese-paring" cakes, and its cross. Hence a Banbury man is a Puritan or bigot. The term is common in Elizabethan literature: Zeal-of-the-land-busy, in Jonson's Bartholomew Fair, is described as a "Banbury man." and Braithwaite's lines in Drunken Barnabee's Journal (1638) are well known:

In my progresse travelling Northward, Taking my farewell o' th Southward, To Banbery came I, O prophane one! Where I saw a Puritane one, Hanging of his Cat on Monday, For killing of a Mouse on Sunday.

As thin as Banbury cheese. In Marston's Jack Drum's Entertainment (1600) we read, "You are like a Banbury cheese, nothing but paring"; and Bardolph compares Slender to Banbury cheese (Merry Wives, i, 1). The Banbury cheese is a rich milk cheese about an inch in thickness.

Banbury cake is a sort of spiced, pastry turnover, once made exclusively at Banbury.

Banbury Cross was removed by the Puritans as a heathenish memorial in 1646, but the present one was placed on the site in its stead in 1858.

Banco (bang' kö). A commercial term denoting bank money of account as distinguished from currency; it is used principally in exchange business, and in cases where there is an appreciable difference between the actual and the nominal value of money.

In banco. A late Latin legal phrase, meaning "on the bench"; it is applied to sittings of the Superior Court of Common Law in its own bench or court, and not on circuit, or at nisi prius (q.v.).

Mark Banco. The mark of fixed value employed as an invariable standard in the old Bank at Hamburg, and used by the Hanseatic League. Deposits in gold and silver were credited in Mark Banco, and all banking accounts were carried on in Mark Banco, so that it was a matter of no moment how exchange varied.

Bancus Regius (bang' kus). The King's or Queen's Bench. Bancus Communis, the bench of Common Pleas.

Bandana or Bandanna (bán dán' á). An Indian word (bandhu, a mode of dyeing) now usually restricted to handkerchiefs of either silk or cotton having a dark ground of Turkey red or blue, with white or yellow spots.

Bandbox. He looks as if he were just out of a. He is so neat and precise, so carefully got up in his dress and person, that he looks like some company dress, carefully kept in a bandbox, a cardboard box formerly used by parsons for keeping their clerical bands (q.v.) in.

Neat as a bandbox. Neat as clothes folded and put by in a bandbox.

The Bandbox Plot. Rapin (History of England, iv, 297) tells us that a bandbox was sent to the lord-treasurer, in Queen Anne's reign, with three pistols charged and cocked, the triggers being tied to a pack-thread fastened to the lid. When the lid was lifted, the pistols would go off and shoot the person who opened the lid. He adds that Dean Swift happened to be by at the time the box arrived, and seeing the pack-thread, cut it, thereby saving the life of the lord-treasurer:

Two ink-born tops your Whigs did fill
With gunpowder and lead;
Which with two serpents made of quill.
You in a bandbox laid;
A tinder-box there was beside,
Which had a trigger to it.
To which the very string was ty’d
That was designed to do it.
Plot upon Plot (about 1713).

Bandingto. To bandingto is an Australian phrase meaning to steal vegetables—often by removing the roots—as with potatoes and carrots—and leaving the tops standing in the ground so that the theft is not noticed.

Bands. Clerical bands are a relic of the ancient amice, a square linen tippet tied about the neck of priests during the saying of Mass. They are rarely worn in England nowadays, but are still used by Presbyterian ministers and clergies on the Continent.

Legal bands are a relic of the wide falling collars which formed a part of the ordinary dress in the reign of Henry VIII, and which were especially conspicuous in the reign of the Stuarts. In the showy days of Charles II the plain bands were changed for lace ends. The eighth Henry, as I understand, was the first prince that ever wore a band.

John Taylor, the Water Poet (1580-1654).

Bandwagon. On the bandwagon. To get on the bandwagon is to show strong and open support for some popular movement or cause. It was formerly the custom in American elections for a wagon carrying a band to parade through the streets, in order to arouse enthusiasm for a particular candidate. Local political leaders who supported that candidate would then jump on to the wagon and ride with the band.

Bandy. I am not going to bandy words with you—i.e. to wrangle. The metaphor is from the Irish game bandy (the precursor of marooco and bandy), in which each player has a stick with a crook at the end to strike a wooden or other hard ball. The ball is banded from side to side, each party trying to beat it home to the opposite goal. The derivation of the word is quite uncertain. It was earlier a term in tennis, as is shown by the passage in Webster’s Vittoria Corombona (iv, 4), where the conspirators regret that the handle of the racket of the man to be murdered had not been poisoned.

That while he had been bandying at tennis,
He might have sworn himself to hell, and strook
His soul into the hazard.

Bane really means ruin, death, or destruction (A.S. bana, a murderer); and “I will be his bane” means I will ruin or murder him. Bane is, therefore, a mortalt injury.

My bare both before it.

This [word] in a moment brings me to an end.
But this [Plato] assures me I shall never die.

Addison: Cato.

Bangers (băng’ erz). One of the many slang terms for sausages.

Bangorian Controversy. A theological paper-war stirred up by a sermon preached March 31st, 1717, before George I, by Dr. Hoadly, Bishop of Bangor, on the text, “My kingdom is not of this world,” the argument being that Christ had not delegated His power or authority to either king or clergy. The sermon was printed by royal command; it led to such discord in Convocation that this body was prorogued, and from that time till 1852 was allowed to meet only as a matter of form.

Banian, Banyan (bâni’an) (Sanskrit vani, a merchant). This was the name applied to a caste of Hindu traders, who wore a particular dress, were strict in their observance of fasts, and abstained from eating any kind of flesh. It is from this circumstance that sailors speak of Banyan Days (q.v.).

The word is also used to describe a sort of loose house-coat worn by Anglo-Indians.

Bank. The original meaning was “bench” or “shelf”; in Italy the word (barco) was applied specially to a tradesman’s counter, and hence to a money-changer’s bench or table, which gives the modern meaning of an establishment which deals in money, investments, etc.

Bank of a river. Stand with your back to the source, and face to the sea or outlet: the left bank is on your left, and right bank on your right hand.

Bankside. Part of the borough of Southwark on the right bank of the Thames, between Blackfriars and Waterloo Bridges. In Shakespeare’s time it was noted for its theatres, its prison, and its brothels. Hence, Sisters of the Bank, an old term for prostitutes.

Come I will send for a whole coach or two of Bankside ladies, and we will be jovial.—Randolph: The Muses’ Looking Glass, II, iv.

Bankrupt. In Italy, when a moneylender was unable to continue business, his bench or counter (see Bank) was broken up, and he himself was spoken of as a bancorotto—i.e. a bankrupt. This is said to be the origin of our term.

Banksy. Horse. A horse trained to do all manner of tricks, called Marocco, and belonging to one Banks about the end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. One of his exploits is said to have been the ascent of St. Paul’s steeple. A favourite story of the time is of an apprentice who called his master to see the spectacle. “Away, you fool,” said the shopkeeper; “what need I go to see a horse on the top when I can see so many asses at the bottom!” When Banks went to Paris in 1601 he was packed off to prison, as the city authorities and the Church suspected that Marocco’s tricks were performed by black magic.

Bannatyne Club. A literary club, named after George Bannatyne (d. about 1608), to whose industry we owe the preservation of much early Scottish poetry. It was instituted in 1823 by Sir Walter Scott, and had for its object the publication of rare works illustrative of Scottish history, poetry, and general literature. The club was dissolved in 1859.
Banner of the Prophet

Banner of the Prophet, The. What purports to be the actual standard of Mohammed is preserved in the Eyab mosque of Constantinople. It is called Sin aqa'ish-sharif' and is 12 feet in length. It is made of four layers of silk, the outermost being green, embroidered with gold. In times of peace the banner is guarded in the hall of the "noble vestment," as the dress worn by the Prophet is styled. In the same hall are preserved many other relics including the surrup, the sabre, and the bow of Mohammed.

Banner of France, The sacred, was the Oriflamme (q.v.).

Banners in churches. These are suspended as thank offerings to God. Those in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, Henry VII's Chapel, Westminster, etc., are to indicate that the knight whose banner is hung up avows himself devoted to God's service.

Banneret. One who leads his vassals to battle under his own banner. Also an order of knighthood formerly conferred on the field of battle for deeds of valour. The first knight-banneret to be made seems to have been John de Copeland, who, in 1346, captured King David Bruce at Neville's Cross. The order was allowed to become extinct soon after the first creation of baronets, in 1611.

Banns of Marriage. The publication in the parish church for three successive Sundays of an intended marriage. It is made after the Second Lesson of the Morning Service. To announce the intention is called "Publishing the banns," from the words "I publish the banns of marriage between . . ." The word is from the same root as BAN (q.v.).

To forbid the banns. To object formally to the proposed marriage.

And a better fate did poor Maria deserve than to have a banns forbidden by the curate of the parish who published them.—STERNE: Sentimental Journey.

Banquet used at one time to have, besides its present meaning, the meaning of dessert. Thus, in the Pennless Pilgrimage (1618) John Taylor, the Water Poet, says: "Our first and second course being three-score dishes at one board, and after that, always a banquet." The word is from It. banco (see BANK), a bench or table; at which one sits for a meal, hence "bad manners at table."

Banshee. The domestic spirit of certain Irish or Highland Scottish families, supposed to take an interest in its welfare, and to wail at the death of one of the family. The word is the Old Irish ben side, a woman of the elves or fairies.

Bantam. A little bantam cock. A plucky little fellow that will not be bullied by a person bigger than himself. The bantam cock will of course cock five times his own weight, and is therefore said to "have a great soul in a little body." The bantam originally came from Bantam, in Java.

Banting. Reducing superfluous fat by living on meat diet, and abstaining from beer, farinaceus food, and vegetables, according to the method adopted by William Banting (1797-1876), a London cabinet-maker, once a very fat man. The word was introduced about 1864. A greater benefactor to mankind was Sir Frederick Grant Banting (1890-1941) who discovered insulin in 1922.

Bantling. A child, a brat; usually with a depreciatory sense, or meaning an illegitimate child. It is from Ger. bankling, a bastard, from bank, a bench; hence, a child begotten casually, as on a bench, instead of in the marriage-bed. The word has been confused with bantling, taken to mean a little one in swaddling clothes.

Banzai. The Japanese victory cry, meaning "Ten thousand years."

Baphomet. An imaginary idol or symbol, which the Templars were said to worship in their mysterious rites. The word is a corruption of Mahomet. (Fr. Baphomet; O.Sp. Matomat.)

Baptes. Priests of the goddess Cotytto, the Thracian goddess of lewdness, whose midnight orgies were so obscene that they disgusted even the goddess herself. They received their name from the Greek verb baptio, to wash, because of the so-called ceremonies of purification connected with her rites. (Juvenal, ii, 91.)

Baptism. This sacrament of the Christian Church dates back in one form or another to pre-apostolic times.

Baptism for the dead was the baptism of a living person instead of and for the sake of one who had died unbaptized.

Baptism of blood was martyrdom for the sake of Christ and supplied the place of the sacrifice if the martyr was unbaptized.

Baptism of desire is the virtue or grace of baptism acquired by one who dies earnestly desiring baptism before he can receive it.

Baptism of fire is really martyrdom, but the phrase was misapplied by Napoleon III to one who went under fire in battle for the first time.

Bar. The whole body of barristers; as bench means the whole body of judges. The bar is the partition separating the seats of the benchers from the rest of the hall, and, like the rood-screen of a church, which separates the chancel from the rest of the building, is due to the old idea that the laity form an inferior order of beings.

To be called to the bar. To be admitted a barrister. Students having attained a certain status used to be called from the body of the hall within the bar, to take part in the proceedings of the court. To disbar means to expel a barrister from his profession.

To be called within the bar. To be appointed King's Counsel.
Trial at Bar. By full court of judges in the King's Bench division. These trials are for very difficult causes, before special juries, and occupy the attention of the four judges in the superior court, instead of at Nisi Prius.

At the bar. The prisoner at the bar, the prisoner in the dock before the judge.

Bar, excepting. In racing phrase a man will bet "Two to one, bar one," that is, two to one against any horse in the field with one exception. The word means "barring out," shutting out, debarring, as in Shakespeare's:-

"Nay, but I bar to-night: you shall not gage me by what we do to-night."—Merchant of Venice, ii. 2.

Bar. An honourable ordinary, in heraldry, consisting of two parallel horizontal lines drawn across the shield and containing a fifth part of the field.

A barre . . . is drawneth overhath the escohon . . . it containeth the fifth part of the Field.

Gwillim: Heraldry.

Bar sinister. A phrase popularly used to imply bastardy, though the heraldic sign intended is a bend sinister (q.v.).

Barring out. In the brave days when schoolboys played pranks on their masters, they occasionally vented their humour—and sometimes their spleen—on one by barricading windows and doors to prevent his entering the school. Miss Edgeworth has a story thus entitled.

Revols, republics, revolutions, most
No graver than a schoolboys' barring out.

Tennyson: The Princess.

Baralipton. See Syllogism.

Barataria. Sancho Panza's island-city, in Don Quixote, over which he was appointed governor. The table was presided over by Doctor Pedro Rezio de Aguero, who caused every dish set upon the board to be removed without being tasted—some because they heated the blood, and others because they chilled it; some for one ill effect, and some for another; so that Sancho was allowed to eat nothing. The word is from Span. barato, cheap.

Barataria is also the setting of Act II of The Gondoliers.

Barathon, or Baraphrum. A deep ditch behind the Acropolis of Athens into which malefactors were thrown; somewhat in the same way as criminals at Rome were cast from the Tarpeian Rock. Sometimes used figuratively, as in Massinger's New Way to Pay Old Debts, where Sir Giles Overreach calls Greedy a "barathrum of the shambles" (iii. 2), meaning that he was a sink into which any kind of food or offal could be thrown.

Mercury: Why, Jupiter will put you all into a sack together, and toss you into Barathrum, terrible Barathrum.

Carson: Barathrum? What's Barathrum?

Mer: Why, Barathrum is Pluto's boggards (privy): you must be all thrown into Barathrum.

Randall: Hey for Honesty, v. 1 (c.1630).

Barb (Lat. barba, a beard). Used in early times in England for the beard of a man, and so for similar appendages such as the feathers under the beak of a hawk; but its first English use was for a curved-back instrument such as a fish-hook (which has one backward curve, or barb), or an arrow (which has two). The barb of an arrow is, then, the metal point having two iron "feathers," which stick out so as to hinder extraction, and does not denote the feather on the upper part of the shaft.

Barb. A Barby steed, noted for docility, speed, endurance, and spirit, formerly also called a Barbary, as in Ben Jonson's:-

You must . . . be seen on your barby often, or leaping over stools for the credit of your back.

Silent Women, IV, I.

Cp. also Barbary Roan.

Barbara. See Syllogism.

Barbara, St. The patron saint of arsenals and powder magazines. Her father delivered her up to Martian, governor of Nicomedia, for being a Christian. After she had been subjected to the most cruel tortures, her unnatural father was about to strike off her head, when a lightning flash laid him dead at her feet. Hence, St. Barbara is invoked against lightning. Her feast day is December 4th.

Barbari (bar' bér è). Quod non feccurant bar­bari, fecerunt Barberini, i.e. What the barbarians left standing, the Barberini contrived to destroy. A saying current in Rome at the time when Pope Urban VIII (Barberini) converted the bronze fittings of the Pantheon—which had remained in splendid condition since 27 B.C.—into cannon (1635).

Barbarian. The Greeks and Romans called all foreigners barbarians (babblers; men who spoke a language not understood by them); the word was probably merely imitative of unintelligible speech, but may have been an actual word in some outlandish tongue.

If then I know not the meaning of the voice [words], I shall be to him that speaketh a barbarian, and be that speaketh will be a barbarian unto me.

1 Cor. xiv, 11.

Barbarossa (bar bá ros' á). (Red-beard, similar to Rufus). The surname of Frederick I of Germany (1121-90). Klaireddin Barbargos, the famous corsair, became Admiral in 1518, and in 1537 was appointed high admiral of the Turkish fleet. With Francis I he captured Nice in 1543; he died at Constanti­nople three years later.

Barbary Roan, the favourite horse of Richard II. See Horse.

Barb, or Barbed Steed.

Barbason (bar' bá son). A fiend mentioned by Shakespeare in the Merry Wives of Windsor, ii, 2, and in Henry V, iii, 1.

Amaimon sounds well, Lucifer well, Barbason well, yet they are . . . the names of fiends.—Merry Wives.

The name seems to have been obtained from Scot's Discoverie of Witchcraft (1584), where we are told of "Marbas, alias Babas," who—is a great president, and appeareth in the forme of a mightie lion: but at the commandment of a conjuror cummeth up in a likenes of a man, and answereth fullie as touching anie thing which is hidden or secret.

Barbecue (bar' be kü) (Sp. barbacoa, a wooden framework set on posts). A term used in America formerly for a wooden bedstead, and also for a kind of large griddiron upon which an animal could be roasted whole. Hence, an animal, such as a hog, so roasted; also the feast at which it is eaten, and the process of roasting it. Oldfield, with more than harpy throat subdued. Cries, Send me, 5e gods, a whole hog barbecued!

Barbed Steed. A horse in armour. Barbed should properly be barded; it is from the Fr. barde, horse-armour. Horses’ “bars” were the metal coverings for the breast and flanks. And now, instead of mounting barbed steeds To fright the souls of fearful adversaries, He capers nimbly in a lady’s chamber, To the lascivious pleasing of a lute. Richard III.

Barber. Every barber knows that, Omnibus notum tonsoribus. Satires, ii, 3.

In ancient Rome, as in modern England, the barber’s shop was a centre for the dissemination of scandal, and the talk of the town.

Barber Poet. Jacques Jasmin (1798-1864), a Provençal poet, who was also known as “the last of the Troubadours,” was so called. He was a barber.

Barber’s pole. This pole, painted spirally with two stripes of red and white, and displayed outside barber’s shops as a sign, is a relic of the days when the callings of barber and surgeon were combined; it is symbolic of the winding of a bandage round the arm previous to blood-letting. The gilt knob at its end represents the brass basin which is sometimes actually suspended on the pole. The basin has a curved gap cut in it to fit the throat, and was used for lathering customers before shaving them. The Barber-Surgeons’ Company was founded in 1461 and was re-incorporated in 1540. In 1745 it was decided that the business or trades of barber and surgeon were really independent of each other and the two branches were separated; but the ancient company, or guild, was allowed to retain its charter. The last barber-surgeon in London is said to have been one Middleditch, of Great Suffolk Street in the Borough, who died 1821. To this year (1541), (says Wornum) . . . belongs the Barber-Surgeons’ picture of Henry (VIII) granting a charter to the Corporation. The barbers and surgeons of London, originally constituting one company, had been separated, but were again, in the 32 Henry VIII, combined into a single society, and it was the ceremony of presenting them with a new charter which is commemorated by Holbein’s picture, now in their hall in Monkwell Street.

Barber of Seville. The comedy by this name (Le Barbier de Séville) was written by Beaumarchais and produced in Paris in 1775. In it appeared for the first time the famous character of Figaro. In 1780 Paisiello produced an opera bouffe on the same lines, but this was eclipsed by 1816 by the appearance of Rossini’s Barbieri di Siviglia, with words by S器bini. On its first appearance it was hissed but it has since maintained its place as one of the most popular operas ever written.

Barbican. The outwork intended to defend the drawbridge in a fortified town or castle (Fr. barbican). Also an opening or loophole in the wall of a fortress, through which guns may be fired. The street of this name in London is built partly on the site of a barbican that was in front of Aldersgate.

Barcarole (bar kà röl). Properly, a song sung by Venetian boatmen as they row their gondolas (It. barcaiola, a boatman).

Barcelona (bar se ló ná). A fichu, piece of velvet for the neck, or small necktie, made at Barcelona, and common in England in the early 19th century. Also a neckcloth of some bright colour, as red with yellow spots. Now on this handkerchief so starch and white She pinned a Barcelona black and tight.

Barchester. An imaginary cathedral town (said to be Salisbury), in the county of Barset­shire; the setting of the Barchester Novels by Anthony Trollope (1815-82). These are: The Warden, 1855; Barchester Towers, 1857; Doctor Thorne, 1858; Framley Parsonage, 1861: The Small House at Allington (1864); and Last Chronicle of Barset, 1867.

Barcochebah or Barchochebas (Shimeon) (bar koch’ e ba). An heroic leader of the Jews against the Romans A.D. 132. He took Jerusalem in 132, and was proclaimed king, many of the Jews believing him to be the Messiah, but in 135 he was overthrown with great slaughter. Jerusalem was laid in ruins, and he himself slain. It is said that he gave himself out to be the “Star out of Jacob” mentioned in Numb. xxiv, 17. (Bar Cochba in Hebrew means “Son of a star.”)

Bard. The minstrel of the ancient Celtic peoples, the Gauls, British, Welsh, Irish, and Scots; they celebrated the deeds of gods and heroes, incited to battle, sang at royal and other festivities, and frequently acted as heralds. The oldest bardic compositions that have been preserved are of the 5th century.

Bard of Avon. William Shakespeare (1564-1616), who was born and buried at Stratford­upon-Avon.

Bard of Olney. William Cowper (1731-1800), who resided at Olney, in Bucks, for many years.

Bard of Twickenham. Alexander Pope (1688-1744), who resided at Twickenham.
Bardolph (bar' dolf). One of Falstaff's inferior officers. Falstaff calls him "the knight of the burning lamp," because his nose was so red, and his face so "full of meteors." He is a low-bred, drunken swaggerer, without principle, and poor as a church mouse. (Merry Wives; Henry IV, I, 2.)

Barebones Parliament. The. The Parliament convened by Cromwell in 1653; so called from Praise-God Barebones, a fanatical leader, who was a prominent member. Also called the Little Parliament, because it comprised fewer than 150 members and lasted only five months.

Barefaced. The present meaning, audacious, shameless, impudent, is a depreciation of its earlier sense, which was merely with uncovered face. "A bare face" is, of course, one that is beardless, one of the features of which are in no way hidden. The French equivalent is à visage découvert, with uncovered face.

Barefooted. Certain friars and nuns (some of whom use sandals instead of shoes), particularly the reformed section of the Order of Carmelites (White Friars) that was founded by St. Theresa in the 16th century. These are known as the Discaled Carmelites (Lat. calceus, a shoe). The practice is defended by the command of our Lord to His disciples: "Carry neither purse, nor scrip, nor shoes" (Luke x. 4). The Jews and Romans used to put off their shoes in mourning and public calamities, by way of humiliation.

Bare Poles, Under. A nautical term, implying that on account of rough weather and high winds the ship carries no sails on the masts. Figuratively applied to a man reduced to the last extremity.

We were scudding before a heavy gale, under bare poles.—Capt. MARRYAT.

Bargain. Into the bargain. In addition therto: besides what was bargained for.

To make the best of a bad bargain. To bear bad luck, or bad circumstances with equanimity.

To stand to a bargain. To abide by it; the Lat. stare conventis, conditionibus stare, pactis stare, etc.

Barisal Gums. A name given to certain mysterious booming sounds heard in many parts of the world as well as Barisal (Bengal), generally on or near water. They resemble the sound of distant cannon, and are probably of subterranean origin. At Seneca Lake, New York, they are known as Lake guns, on the coast of Holland and Belgium as mistpeffers, and in Italy as bombiti, baturlo marina, etc.

Bark. Dogs in their wild state never bark; they howl, whine, and growl, but do not bark. Barkering is an acquired habit.

Barking dogs seldom bite. Huffing, bousing, hectoring fellows rarely possess cool courage. Similar proverbs are found in Latin, French, Italian, and German.

To bark at the moon. To rail uselessly, especially at those in high places, as a dog thinks to frighten the moon by baying at it.

There is a superstition that when a dog does this it portends death or ill-luck.

I'd rather be a dog, and bay the moon, Than such a Roman. SHAKESPEARE: Julius Caesar, iv. 3.

His bark is worse than his bite. He scolds and abuses roundly, but does not bear malice, or do mischief.

To bark up the wrong tree. To waste energy, to be on the wrong scent. The phrase comes from raccoon hunting. This sport always takes place in the dark, with dogs who are supposed to mark the tree where the raccoon has taken refuge, and bark until the hunter arrives. But even dogs can mistake the tree in the dark, and often bark up the wrong one.

Barker. A pistol, which barks or makes a loud report.

The term is also used by circus people, etc., for the man who stands at the entrance to a side-show and shouts out the attraction to be seen within.

Barkis is willin'. The message sent by Barkis to Peggotty by David Copperfield, expressing his desire to marry. It has passed into a proverbial expression indicating willingness.

Barlaam and Josaphat (bar' lam, jos' a fat). An Eastern romance telling how Barlaam, an ascetic monk of the desert of Sinai, converted Josaphat, son of a Hindu king, to Christianity. Probably written in the first half of the 7th century, it seems to have been put into its final form by St. John of Damascus, a Syrian monk of the 8th century; it became immensely popular in the Middle Ages, and includes (among many other stories) the Story of the Three Caskets, which was used by Shakespeare in the Merchant of Venice. A poetical version was written by von Ems (13th cent.).

Barley. To cry barley. To ask for truce (in children's games). Probably a corruption of parley, from Fr. parler, to speak. In Scots, to have a barley is to have a break, to pause for a moment's rest.

Barley-break. An old country game like the modern "Prisoners' Base," having a "home" which was called "hell." Herrick has a poem, Barley-break, or Last in Hell.

Barley-bree. Ale: malt liquor brewed from barley, also called barley-broth.

The cock may crow, the day may daw, And ay we'll taste the barley-bree. BURNS: Willie Brew'd a Peck o' Maut.

To wear the barley cap. To be top-heavy or tipsy with barley-break.

John or Sir John Barleycorn. A personification of malt liquor. The term was made popular by Burns. Inspiring bold John Barleycorn, What dangers thou canst make us scorn! Tam o' Shanter, 105, 106.

Barley-mow. A heap or stack of barley. (A.S. muga; cp. Icel. muge, a swath.) See Mow.

Barmecide's Feast (bar me sd). An illusion: particularly one containing a great disappointment. The reference is to the Story of the Barber's Sixth Brother in the Arabian Nights. A prince of the great Barmecide family in Bagdad, wishing to have some sport, asked Schacabac, a poor, starving wretch, to dinner, and set before him a series of empty plates. "How do you like your soup?" asked the merchant. "I_i_s; not enough," replied Schacabac. "Did you ever see whiter bread?" "Never. honourable sir, was the civil answer. Illusory wine was later offered him, but Schacabac excused himself by pretending to be drunk already, and knocked the Barmecide down. The latter saw the humour of the situation, forgave Schacabac, and provided him with food to his heart's content.

Barmy. Mad, crazy. Sometimes spelled "balmy." but properly as above, as from "barm," froth. Ferment. Burns has:—

"Just now I've taen the fit o' rhyme.
My barmie noodle's working prime.
To James Smith, 19.

Hence, in prison slang to put on the barmy stick is to feign insanity; and the "Barmy Ward" is the infirmary in which the insane, real or feigned, are confined.

Barnabas. St. Barnabas' Day. June 11th. St. Barnabas was a fellow-labourer of St. Paul. His symbol is a rake, because June 11th is the time of hay harvest.

Barnabites. An Order of regular clerks of whom Charles I. founded 1533, so called because the church of St. Barnabas, in Milan, was given to them to preach in.

Barnaby Bright. An old provincial name for Barnwell, a London apprentice. Before the reform of the calendar it was the longest day, hence the jingle in Ray's Collection of Proverbs:

Barnaby bright! Barnaby bright!
The longest day and the shortest night.

Barnaby Lecturers. Four lecturers in the University of Cambridge, elected annually on Barnabas' Day (June 11th), to lecture on mathematics, philosophy, rhetoric, and logic.

Barnaby Rudge. The principal interest in this book is the picture it gives of the Gordon Riots of 1780. For the general impression he gives and some of the particulars Dickens relied upon the descriptions given to him by those who remembered the event clearly. The book came out in parts in 1840, only sixty years after the riots.

Barnacle. A species of wild goose allied to the brent goose. Also the popular name of the Cirripedes, especially those which are attached by a stalk to floating balks of timber, the bottoms of ships, etc. In medieval times it was thought that the two were different forms of the same animal (much as are the frog and the tadpole), and as late as 1636 Gerard speaks of "broken pieces of old ships on which is found certain spume or froth, which in time breedeth into shells, and the fish which is hatched therefrom is in shape and habit like a bird."

The origin of this extraordinary belief is very obscure, but it is probably due to the accident of the identity of the name (which was at one time applied to the presence in the shell-fish of the long feathery cirri which protrude from the shells and, when in the water, are very suggestive of plumage. In England the name was first attached to the bird. It is thought to be a diminutive of the M.E. bernake, a species of wild goose. The name of the shell-fish, on the other hand, may be from a diminutive (penicula) of the Lat. perna, a mussel or similar shell-fish, though no such diminutive has been traced. With an identity of name it was, perhaps, natural to look for an identity of nature in the two creatures.

The name is given figuratively to close and constant companions, hangers on, or sycophants; also to placemen who stick to their offices but do little work, like the barnacles which stick to the bottoms of ships but impede their progress.

Barnacles. Spectacles; especially those of a heavy or clumsy make or appearance. A slang term, from their supposed resemblance in shape to the twitches or "barnacles" formerly used by farriers to keep under restraint unruly horses during the process of bleeding, shoeing, etc. This instrument consisted of two branches joined at one end by a hinge, and was employed to grip the horse's nostrils. The word is probably derived from the O.Fr. bernace, a kind of muzzle for horses.

Barnard's Inn. One of the Old Inns of Chancery, formerly situated on the south side of Holborn, east of Staple Inn. It was once known as "Mackworth's Inn," because Dean Mackworth of Lincoln (d. 1454) lived there.

Barnburners. Destroyers, who, like the Dutchman of story, would burn down their barns to rid themselves of the rats.

Barnstormer. A slang term for a strolling player, and hence for any second-rate actor, especially one whose style is of an exaggerated declamatory kind. From the custom of itinerant troupes of actors giving their shows in village barns when better accommodation was not forthcoming.

Barnwell, George. The chief character in The London Merchant, or the History of George Barnwell, a prose tragedy by George Lillo, 1731. It is founded on a popular 17th-century ballad which is given in Percy's Reliques. Barnwell was a London apprentice who was seduced by Sarah Millwood, a disappointed and repulsive woman of the town, to whom he gave £200 of his master's money. He next robbed and murdered his pious uncle, a rich grazier at Ludlow. Having spent the money, Sarah turned him out; each informed against the other, and both were hanged. The story is mentioned frequently in 19th-century literature.

Baron is from late Lat. baro (through O.Fr. baron), and meant originally "a man," especially opposed to something else, as a freeman to a slave, a husband to a wife, etc., and also in relation to someone else, as "the king's man." From the former comes the legal and heraldic use of the word in the phrase baron and feme, husband and wife: from the latter the more common use, the king's "man" or "baron" being his vassal holding tenure of the king by military or other service. To-day a baron is a member of the lowest order of nobility; he is addressed as "Lord," and by the Sovereign as "our right trusty and well beloved." The premier English barony is that of De Ros, dating from 1264.
The War of the Barons was the insurrection of the barons, under Simon de Montfort against the arbitrary government of Henry III, 1263-65. Drayton's poem The Barons' Wars was published in 1603.

Baron Bung. Mine host, master of the beer bung.

Baron Munchausen. See MunCHAUSEN.

Baron of beef. Two sirloins left uncut at the backbone. The baron is the backpart of the ox, called in Danish, the rug. Jocously, but wrongly, said to be a pun upon baron and sir loin.

Baronet. An hereditary titled order of commoners, ranking next below barons and next above knights, using (like the latter) the title “Sir” before the Christian name, and the contraction “Bt.” after the surname. The degree, as it now exists, was instituted by James I, and the title was sold for £1,000 to gentlemen possessing not less than £1,000 per annum, for the plantation of Ulster, in allusion to which the Red Hand of Ulster (see under HAnd) is the badge of Baronets of England, the United Kingdom, and of Great Britain, also of the old Baronets of Ireland (created prior to the Union in 1800).

The premier baronetcy is that of Bacon of Redgrave, originally conferred in 1611 on Nicholas, half-brother of Sir Francis Bacon, Viscount St. Albans.

Barque, barquentine (bark, bar' ken ten'). In the old days of sailing these words described two different rigs. A barque was a sailing ship with three masts, having the fore- and main-masts square rigged and the mizen-mast fore-and-aft rigged. A barquentine was a three-masted vessel square-rigged on the fore-mast and fore-and-aft rigged on the main- and mizen-mast. See Ship.

Barrack. To barrack is to jeer or shout rude comments at the players of games. The word came into use about 1880 in Australia where barracking is considered a legitimate and natural hazard with which, for instance, first-class cricket fans have to contend.

Barracks. Soldiers’ quarters of a permanent nature. The word was introduced in the 17th century from It. baracca, a tent, through Fr. baraque, a barrack.

Barrage (b’ razh) (Fr.). The original meaning of this word was an artificial dam or bar across a river to deepen the water on one side of it, as the great barrage on the Nile at Assouan. But from World War I the term is applied to a curtain of projectiles from artillery which is ranged to fall in front of advancing troops, or to keep off raiding aircraft, or to shield offensive operations, etc. cp. Balloon.

Creeping barrage. A curtain of artillery fire moving forward on a time schedule.

Box barrage. A curtain of artillery fire laid down round a locality either to contain or exclude the enemy.

Barratry. A legal term denoting (1) the offence of vexatiously exciting or maintaining lawsuits, and (2)—the commoner use—fraud or criminal negligence on the part of the master or crew of a ship to the detriment of the owners. Like many of our legal terms, it is from Old French.

Barrell’s Blues. The 4th Foot: so called from the colour of their facings, and William Barrell, colonel of the regiment (1734-9). Now called “The King’s Own (Royal Lancaster Regiment).” They were called “Lions” from their badge, the Lion of England.

Barricade. To block up a street, passage, etc. The term rose in France in 1588, when Henri de Guise returned to Paris in defiance of the king’s order. The king sent for his Swiss Guards, and the Parisians tore up the pavement, threw chains across the streets, and piled up barrels (Fr. barriques) filled with earth and stones, behind which they shot down the Swiss.

The day of the Barricades—

1. May 12th, 1588, when the people forced Henry III to flee from Paris.
2. August 5th, 1648, the beginning of the Fronde (q.v.).
3. July 27th, 1830, the first day of la grande semaine which drove Charles X from the throne.
4. February 24th, 1848, which resulted in the abdication of Louis Philippe.
5. June 25th, 1848, when the Archbishop of Paris was shot in his attempt to quell the insurrection.
6. December 2nd, 1851, the day of the coup d’état, when Louis Napoleon made his appeal to the people for re-election to the Presidency for ten years.

Barrier Treaty. A treaty fixing frontiers: especially that of November 15th, 1715, signed by Austria, Great Britain, and the Netherlands, by which the Low Countries were guaranteed to the House of Austria, and the Dutch were to garrison certain fortresses. The treaty was annulled at Fontainebleau in 1785.

Barrister. One admitted to plead at the bar: one who has been “called to the bar.” See Bar. They are of two degrees, the lower order being called simply “barristers” or formerly “master” or “utter” barristers; the higher “King’s Counsel.” Until 1880 there was a superior order known as “Serjeants-at-Law” (q.v.). The King’s Counsel (K.C.) is a senior, and when raised to this position he is said to “take silk,” being privileged to wear a silk gown and, on special occasions, a full-bottomed wig. The junior counsel, or barristers, wear a plain stuff gown and a short wig.

A Revising Barrister. One appointed to revise the lists of electors for members of parliament.

A Vacation Barrister. Formerly one newly called to the bar, who for three years had to attend in “Long Vacation.” The practice (and consequently the term) is now obsolete.

Barristers’ Bags. See Lawyers.

Barristers’ gowns. “Utter barristers wear a stuff or bombazine gown, and the pucked material between the shoulders of the gown is all that is now left of the purse into which, in early days, the successful litigant . . . dropped his . . . pecuniary tribute . . . for services rendered " (Notes and Queries. March 11th, 1893, p. 124). The fact is that the counsel was supposed to appear merely as a friend of the litigant. Even now he cannot recover his fees by legal process.

Barry Cornwall, poet. The nom de plume of Bryan Waller Proctor (1787-1874). Writer of once-popular songs.

Bar-sur-Aube. See Castle of Bungay.

Bartholomew, St. The symbol of this saint is a knife, in allusion to the knife with which he was flayed alive. He is commemorated on August 24th, and is said to have been martyred in Armenia, a.d. 44.

Bartholomew doll. A tawdry, over-dressed woman: like one of the flashy, bespangled dolls offered for sale at Bartholomew Fair.

Bartholomew Fair. A fair held for centuries from its institution in 1133 at Smithfield, London, on St. Bartholomew's Day: after the change of the calendar in 1752 it was held on September 3rd. While it lasted the Fair was the centre of London life: Elizabethan and Restoration playwrights and story-tellers are full of its amusements and dissipations. Besides the refreshment stalls, loaded with roast pork and cakes, there were innumerable sideshows:-

Here's the woman who challenges all the fairs
Come buy my nuts and damsons, and burgumy pears!
Here's the woman of Baston, the devil and the pope,
And here's the little girl, just going on the rope!
Here's the dives and Lazarus, and the world's creation;
Here's the tall Dutchwoman, the like's not in the nation.
Here is the booth where the high Dutch maid is,
Here are the bears that dance like any ladies;
Tat, tat, tat, tat, says little penny trumpet;
Here's Jacob Hall, that does so jump it, jump it;
Sound trumpet, sound, for silver spoon and fork,
Not even the Puritans were able to put down the riotings of Bartholomew Fair, and it went on unchanged till 1840, when it was removed to Islington. This was its death, and in 1855 it disappeared from utter neglect and inanition. Ben Jonson wrote a comedy satirizing the Puritans under this name.

Bartholomew, Massacre of St. The slaughter of the French Huguenots in the reign of Charles IX, begun on St. Bartholomew's Day, August 24th, 1572, at the instigation of Catherine de' Medici, the mother of the young king. It is said that 30,000 persons fell in this dreadful persecution.

Bartholomew pig. A very fat person. At Bartholomew Fair one of the chief attractions used to be a pig, roasted whole, and sold piping hot. Falstaff calls himself-

A little tidy Bartholomew boar-pig.—2 Henry IV, ii. 4.

Bartolist. One skilled in law or, specifically, a student of Bartolus. Bartolus (1314-57) was an eminent Italian lawyer who wrote extensive commentaries on the Corpus Juris Civilis, and did much to arouse and stimulate interest in the ancient Roman law.

Bas Bleu. See Blue Stocking.

Base Tenure. Originally, tenure not by military, but by base, service, such as a serf or villein might give: later, a tenure in fee-simple that was determinate on the fulfilment of some contingent qualification.

Base of operations. In military parlance, the protected place from which operations are conducted, where magazines of all sorts are formed, and upon which (in case of reverse) the army can fall back.

Bashaw (bà shaw). An arrogant, domineering man: a corruption of the Turkish pasha, a viceroy or provincial governor.

A three-tailed bashaw. A beglerbeg or prince of princes among the Turks, who has a standard of three horse-tails borne before him. The next rank is the bashaw with two tails, and then the boy, who has only one horse-tail.

Bashi-bazouk (bash' bá zook'). A savage and brutal ruffian. The word is Turkish and means literally "one whose head is turned": it is applied in Turkey to non-uniformed irregular soldiers who make up in plunder for what they do not get in pay. It came into prominence at the time of the Crimean War, and again in that of the Bulgarian atrocities of 1876.

Basil (bá z'il) (Gr. basilikos, royal). An aromatic plant so called because it was thought to have been used in making royal perfume. The story of Isabella who placed her murdered lover's head in a pot and planted basil on top, which she watered with her tears, was taken by Keats from Boccaccio's Decameron, V, 5.

Basilian Monks. Monks of the Order of St. Basil, who lived in the 4th century. It is said that the Order has produced 14 popes, 1,805 bishops, 3,010 abbots, and 11,085 martyrs.

Basilica (bá z'il kà) (Gr. basilikos, royal). Originally a royal palace, but afterwards (in Rome) a large building with nave, aisles, and an apse at one end, used as a court of justice and for public meetings. By the early Christians the latter use gradually extended for purposes of worship; the church of St. John Lateran at Rome was an ancient basilica.

Basiliks (bá zül'iks). The legal code of the Eastern Empire, being a digest of the laws of Justinian and others prepared by the order of the Byzantine emperor Basilius, and completed by his son Leo towards the end of the 9th century.

Basilisco (bá' zil' kò). A cowardly, bragging knight in Kyd's tragedy, Solyman and Perseda (1588). Shakespeare (King John, i, 1) makes the Bastard say to his mother, who asks him why he boasted of his ill-birth, "Knight, knight, good mother, Basilisco-like"—i.e., my boasting has made me a knight. In the earlier play Basilisco, speaking of his name, adds, "Knight, good fellow, knight, knight!" and is answered, "Knave, good fellow, knave, knave!"

Basilisk (bá' z'ilis); The king of serpents (Gr. basilisus, a king), a fabulous reptile, also called a cockatrice (q.v.), and alleged to be hatched by a serpent from a cock's egg; supposed to have the power of "looking anyone dead on whom it fixed its eyes."

The Basiliske . . .

From powerful eyes close venin doth convey
Into the lookers hart, and killetth farre away.

_Spenser: Faerie Queene, IV, vii, 37._

Also the name of a large brass cannon in use in Elizabethan times.

_Thou hast talke'd
Of sallies and retirets, of trenches, tents,
Of palisadoes, frontiers, parapets,
Of basilsks, of cannon._

_Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV', ii, 3._

Basinful. He's got a basinful, meaning. He's got just as much trouble, etc., as he can stand.

Basket. To be left in the basket. Neglected or uncareed for. At one time foundling hospitals used to place baskets at their doors for the reception of abandoned babies.

To give a basket. To refuse to marry. In Germany it was an old custom to fix a basket to the roof of one who had been jilted.

To go to the basket. Old slang for to go to prison: referring to the dependence of the lowest grade of poor prisoners (those in the "Hole") for their sustenance upon what passers-by put in the basket for them.

Basochians (bā sosh' yánz). An old French term for Clerks of the Parlements, hence, lawyers. The chief of the Basochians was called Le roi de la basoche, and had his court, coin, and grand officers. He reviewed his "subjects" every year, and administered justice twice a week. The basoche was responsible for public amusements, the presentation of farces, sotties, and moralities, etc.
Henri III suppressed the "king," and transferred all his functions and privileges to the Chancellor.

Hence monnaie de Basoche, worthless money, from the coins at one time made and circulated by the lawyers of France, which had no currency beyond their own community.

Bass (bās). The inner bark of the limetree, or linden, properly cloth is woven from it.

_Bass. (bas)_. The inner bark of the limetree, or linden, properly called _bast_, a Teutonic word the ultimate origin of which is unknown.

Bat. Bastard. An illegitimate child; a French word, from the Old French and Provençal _baust_, a pack-saddle. The pack-saddles were used by muleteers as beds; hence, as _bantling_ (q.v.) is a "bench-begotten" child, so is _bastard_, literally, one begotten on a pack-saddle bed.

The name was formerly given to a sweetened Spanish wine (white or brown) made of the bastard muscadine grape.

Baste. I'll baste your jacket for you, _i.e._ cane
you. I'll give you a thorough basting, _i.e._
beating. (A word of uncertain origin).

_Bastille_ (bās tēl') means simply a building (O.Fr. _bastir_, now _bâtir_, to build). The famous state prison in Paris was commenced by Charles V as a roval château in 1370, and it was first used as a prison by Louis XI. It was seized and sacked by the mob in the French Revolution, July 14th, 1789, and on the first anniversary its final demolition was begun and the Place de la Bastille laid out on its site.
July 14th is the national holiday in France.

Bat. Harlequin's lath wand (Fr. _batte_, a wooden sword).

Off his own bat. By his own exertions: on his own account. A cricketer's phrase, meaning runs won by a single player.

To carry out one's bat (in cricket). Not to be "out" when the time for drawing the stumps has arrived.

Parliament of Bats. _See Club Parliament._

To get along at a great bat. Here the word means _beat, pace, rate of speed._

To have bats in the belfry. To be crazy in the head, bats in this case being the nocturnal creatures.

_Batman._ A military officer's soldier-servant;
but properly a soldier in charge of a _bat-horse_ (or pack-horse) and its load. From Fr. _bat_, a pack-saddle (O.Fr. _bast_; _see Bastard)._

_Batavi_ (bā tā' vi ā'). The Netherlands; so called from the Batavi, a German tribe which in Roman times inhabited the modern Hol-lund.

_Bate me an Ace. _See Bolton._

_Bath._ Knights of the Bath. This name is derived from the ceremony of bathing, which used to be practised at the inauguration of a _knight_, as a symbol of purity. The last knights created in this ancient form were at the coronation of Charles II in 1661. The Order was revived by George I, in 1725, and remodelled by the Prince Regent in 1815.

_G.C.B._ stands for _Grand Cross of the Bath_ (the first class); _K.C.B._ Knight Commander of the _Bath_ (the second class); _C.B._ Companion of the _Bath_ (the third class).

_Bath brick._ Alluvial matter compressed to the form of a brick, and used for cleaning knives, polishing metals, etc. It is made at Bridgewater, the material being dredged from the river Parrett, which runs through Bridgdwater.

_Bath chair._ A chair mounted on wheels and used for invalids. First used at Bath, which for long has been frequented by invalids on account of its hot springs.

There, go to Bath with you! Don't talk nonsense. Insane persons used to be sent to Bath for the benefit of its mineral waters. The implied reproof is, what you say is so silly, you ought to go to Bath.

_Bath, King of._ Richard Nash (1674-1762), generally called Beau Nash, a celebrated master of the ceremonies at Bath for fifty-six years.

_Bath King-of-Arms. _See Heraldry (College of Arms)._

_Bath metal._ An alloy like pinchbeck (q.v.) consisting of about sixteen parts copper and five of zinc.
Bath Oliver. A special kind of biscuit invented by Dr. William Oliver (1695-1764), physician to the Bath Mineral Water Hospital, and an authority on gout.

Bath post. A letter paper with a highly glazed surface, used by the ultra-fashionable visitors of Bath when that watering-place was at its prime. See Post-paper.

Bath shillings. Silver tokens coined at Bath in 1811-12 and issued by various tradespeople, with face values of 4s., 2s., and 1s.

Bath stone. A limestone used for building, and found in the Lower Oolite, near Bath. It is easily wrought in the quarry but hardens on exposure to the air.

Bath, St. Mary's. See Bain Marie.

Bathia (báth' i à). The name given in the Talmud to the daughter of Pharaoh who found Moses in the ark of bulrushes.

Bath-kol (báth' kol') (daughter of the voice). A sort of divination common among the ancient Jews after the gift of prophecy had ceased. When an appeal was made to Bath-kol, the first words uttered after the appeal were considered oracular. See Ray's Three Physico-Theological Discourses, iii, 1693.

Bathos (bá' thós) (Gr. bathos, depth). A ludicrous descent from grandiloquence to bathos, given by archaologists to a kind of manufacture it in the 13th century. The name given by archaologists to a kind of limestone used for building, and found in the quarry but hardens on exposure to the air.

Bathsheba (báth'shè bá). In Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, intended for the Duchess of Portsmouth, a favourite of Charles II. The allusion is to the wife of Uriah the Hittite, beloved by David (2 Sam. xi).

Bathyllus (bá-th' i lús). A beautiful boy of Soy, greatly beloved by Polycrates the tyrant, and by the poet Anacreon. (Horace: Epistle iv, 9.)

Batiste (bá tés'). A kind of cambric (q.v.), so called from Bastiste of Cambrai, who first manufactured it in the 13th century.

Baton de commandement (bátôn de kom' mon') (Fr. literally "commander's truncheon"). The name given by archaeologists to a kind of rod, usually of reindeer horn, pierced with one or more round holes, and sometimes embossed with carvings. It belongs to the Magdalenian age; but its use or purpose is quite unknown.

Batrachomachia (bá trák ó mî' ó mā kyâ). A storm in a puddle; much ado about nothing. The word is the name of a mock heroic Greek epic, supposed to be by Pigres of Caria, but formerly attributed to Homer. It tells, as its name imports, of a Battle between the Frogs and Mice.

Batta (bát' á). An Anglo-Indian term for perquisites. Properly, an extra allowance to troops when in the field or on special service. Sometimes spelt batty.

Battle. He would rather live on half-pay in a garrison than boast of a five-courts than vegetate on full batta where there was none.—G. R. Gleig: Thomas Munro, vol. i, ch. iv, p. 287.

Battels (bát' élz). At Oxford University the accounts for board and provisions, etc., provided by the kitchen and also (more loosely) one's total accounts for these together with fees for tuition, membership of clubs, etc., for the term. The word has so been used for the provisions or rations themselves; which is the earlier use has never been decided, and the derivation of the word is still a matter for conjecture.

Battersea. You must go to Battersea to get your simples cut. A reproo to a simpleton, or one who makes a very foolish observation. The market gardeners of Battersea used to grow simples (medicinal herbs), and the London apothecaries went there to select or cut such as they wanted.

Battle. A pitched battle. A battle which has been planned, and the ground pitched on or chosen beforehand.

Battle royal. A certain number of cocks, say sixteen, are pitted together; the eight victors are then pitted, then the four, and last of all the two; and the winner is victor of the battle royal. Metaphorically, the term is applied to any contest of wits, etc.

A close battle. Originally a naval fight at "close quarters," in which opposing ships engage each other side by side.

Line of battle. The formation of the ships in a naval engagement. A line of battle ship was a capital ship fit to take part in a main attack. Frigates did not join in a general engagement.

Half the battle. Half determines the battle. Thus, "The first stroke is half the battle," that is, the way in which the battle is begun determines what the end will be.

Trial by battle. The submission of a legal suit to a combat between the litigants, under the notion that God would defend the right.

Wager of battle. One of the forms of ordeal or appeal to the judgment of God, in the old Norman courts of the kingdom. It consisted of a personal combat between the plaintiff and the defendant, in the presence of the court itself. Abolished by 59 Geo. III, c. 46 (1819).

Battle above the Clouds. See Clouds.

Battle bowler. This was a nickname given in World War I to the steel helmet or "tin hat" worn at the front. Used again 1939-45, when it was also called a "tin topee."

Battle of the Books. A satire by Swift (written 1697, published 1704), on the literary squabals as to the comparative value of ancient and modern authors. In the battle the ancient books fight against the modern books in St. James's Library. See Boyle Controversy.

Battle of Britain. The prolonged aerial operations over Southern England and the Channel, August-September 1940, in which the German Luftwaffe endeavoured to seize superiority in the air from the R.A.F. (as a necessary prelude to the invasion of Britain) and was defeated.

Battle of the Frogs and Mice. See BATRACHOMYMACHIA.

Battle of the Giants. See GIANTS.

Battle of the Herrings. See HERRINGS.

Battle of the Nations. See NATIONS.

Battle of the Poets, The. A satirical poem (1725) by John Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham, in which the versifiers of the time are brought into the field.

Battle of the Spurs. See SPURS.

Battle of the Standard. See STANDARD.

Battle of the Three Emperors. See THREE EMPERORS.

Battle-painter, The, or Delle Battaglie. Michael Angelo Cerquozzi (1600-1660), a Roman artist noted for his battle-scenes, was so called.

Battle, Sarah. A character in one of Lamb’s Essays of Elia, who considered that whist “was her life business; her duty: the thing she came into the world to do, and she did it. She unbent her mind afterwards over a book.”

Battledore. Originally the wooden bat used in washing linen. The etymology of the word is not at all certain, but there is an old Provençal batedor, meaning a washing-beetle.

Battledore book. A name sometimes formerly given to a horn-book (q.v.), because of its shape. Hence, perhaps, the phrase “Not to know B from a battledore.” See B.

Battue (bâ tu). A French word meaning literally “a beating,” used in English as a sporting term to signify a regular butchery of game, the “guns” being collected at a certain spot over which the birds are driven by the beaters who “beat” the bushes, etc., for the purpose. Hence, a wholesale slaughter, especially of unarmed people.

Batty. See BATT.

Baturlio marina. See BARISAL GUNS.

Bawbee. See BAWBEE.

Bauble. A fool should never hold a bauble in his hand. “‘Tis a foolish bird that fouts its own nest.” The bauble was a short stick, ornamented with ass’s ears, carried by licensed fools. (O.Pr. babeel, or bawbel, a child’s toy; perhaps confused with the M.E. babyll, or babulle, a stick with a thong, from bablyn, to wave or oscillate.)

If every fool held a bauble, fuel would be dear. The proverb indicates that the world contains a vast number of fools.

To deserve the bauble. To be so foolish as to be qualified to carry the fool’s emblem of office.

Baucis. See PHILEMON.

Bauld Wullie. See BELTED WILL.

Baulk. See BAULK.

Baviad, The (bâ’i âd). A merciless satire by Gifford on the Della Cruscan poetry, published 1794, and republished the following year with a second part called The Mæviad. Bavius and Mævius were two minor poets pilloried by Virgil (Eclogue, iii, 9).

He may with foxes plough, and milk he-goats,
Who praise Bavius or on Mævius dotes.
And their names are still used for inferior versifiers.

May some choice patron bless each grey goose quil,
May every Bavius have his Budio still.

Pope: Prologue to Satires, 249.

Bavieca. The Cid’s horse.

Bavius. See BAVIAD.

Bawbee. A debased silver coin representing six Scots pennies and about equal in value to a halfpenny English, first issued in 1541, in the reign of James V. The word is probably derived from the laird of Silecbawby, a contemporary mint-master, as appears from the Treasurer’s account, September 7th, 1541, “In argento recepistis a Jacobo Arzinomo et Alexander Orac de Sillecbawby respective.”

Jenny’s bawbee. Her marriage portion.

Who’ll hire, who’ll hire, who’ll hire, who’ll hire the bawbee?

Three plumps and a wallop for ahe bawbee.

An old rhyme embodying a reflection on the supposed parsimony and poverty of the Scots. The tradition is that the people of Kirkmanhoe were so poor, they could not afford meat for their broth. A cobbler bought four sheephanks, and for the payment of one bawbee would “plump” one of them into the boiling water, and give it a “wallop” or whisk round. The sheep-shank was called a gustin bone, and was supposed to give a rich “gust” to the broth.

Bawtry. Like the saddler of Bawtry, who was hanged for leaving his liquor (Yorkshire proverb). It was customary for criminals on their way to execution to stop at a certain tavern in York for a “parting draught.” The saddler of Bawtry refused to accept the liquor and was hanged. If he had stopped a few minutes at the tavern, his reprieve, which was on the road, would have arrived in time to save his life.

Baxterians. Followers of Richard Baxter (1615-91), a noted English Nonconformist. His chief doctrines were—(1) That Christ died in a spiritual sense for the elect, and in a general sense for all; (2) that there is no such thing as reprobation; (3) that even saints may fall from grace. He thus tried to effect a compromise between the “heretical” opinions of the Arminians and the Calvinists.

Bay. The shrub was anciently supposed to be a preservative against lightning, because it was the tree of Apollo. Hence, according to Pliny, Tiberius and other Roman emperors wore a wreath of bay as an amulet, especially in thunder-storms.

Reach the bays—

I’ll tie a garland here about his head;
‘Twill keep my boy from lightning.

Webster: Vitioria Corumbona, v. 1.

The bay being sacred to Apollo is accounted for by the legend that he fell in love with, and was rejected by, the beautiful Daphne, daughter of the river-god Peneos, in Thessaly, who had resolved to pass her life in perpetual virginity. She fled from him and sought the protection of her father, who changed her into the bay-tree, whereupon Apollo declared that henceforth her husband would wear bay leaves instead of the oak, and that all who sought his favour should follow his example.

The withering of a bay-tree was supposed to be the omen of a death. Holinshed refers to this superstition:—

In this year [1399] in a manner throughout all the dominions of England, old bay trees withered, and, afterwards, contrarie to all mens thinking, grew greene againe; a strange sight, and supposed to impart some unknown event.—III, 496, 2, 66.

Shakespeare makes use of this note in his Richard II, ii, 4—

"This thought the king is dead. We'll not stay— The bay-trees in our country are withered.

In another sense Bay is a reddish-brown colour, generally used of horses. The word is the Fr. bai, from Lat. badius, a term used by Varro in his list of colours appropriate to horses. Bayard (q.v.) means "bay-coloured."

Crowned with bays. A reward of victory: from the custom that obtained in ancient Rome of so crowning a victorious general.

The Queen's Bays. The 2nd Dragoon Guards: so called because they are mounted on bay horses: often known, "for short," as The Queen's.

Bay at the moon, To. See Bark.

Bay salt. Coarse-grained salt, formerly obtained by slow evaporation of sea-water and used for curing meat, etc. Perhaps so called because originally imported from the shores of Bay of Biscay.

Bay Psalm Book. A metrical version of the Psalms published by Stephen Daye at Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1680. One of the first printed works of the New World, and now highly prized. "What the Gutenberg Bible is to Europe, the Bay Psalm Book is to the United States"—A. E. Newton. In 1947 a copy changed hands at auction for $151,000.00.

Bay State, The. Massachusetts. In Colonial days its full title was "The Colony of Massachusetts Bay": hence the name.

Bayadere (bā'ya'dār'). A Hindu dancing girl employed both for religious dances and for private amusement. The word is a French corruption of the Portuguese bailadeara, a female dancer.

Bayard (bā'yard). A horse of incredible swiftness, given by Charlemagne to the four sons of Aymon. See Aymon. If only one of the sons mounted, the horse was of the ordinary size; but if all four mounted, his body became elongated to the requisite length. He is introduced in Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato, Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, and elsewhere, and legend relates that he is still alive and can be heard neighing in the Ardennes on Midsummer Day. The name is used for any valuable or wonderful horse, and means a "high bay-coloured horse."

Bold as Blind Bayard. Foolhardy. If a blind horse leaps, the chance is he will fall into a ditch. Grose mentions the following expression, To ride Bayard of ten toes—"Going by the marrow-bone stage"—i.e. walking.

Keep Bayard in the stable. Keep what is of value under lock and key.

The Bayard of the East, or of the Indian Army. Sir James Outram (1803-63).

The British Bayard. Sir Philip Sidney (1554-86).

The Polish Bayard. Prince Joseph Poniatowski (1762-1813), who served with the greatest distinction under Napoleon.

Bayardo. The famous steed of Rinaldo (q.v.), which once belonged to Amadis of Gaul. See Horse.

Bayardo's Leap. Three stones, about thirty yards apart, near Sleaford. It is said that Rinaldo was riding on his favourite steed, when the demon of the place sprang up behind him; but Bayardo in terror took three tremendous leaps and unhorsed the fiend.

Bayes (bāz). A character in the Rehearsal, by the Duke of Buckingham (1671), designed to satirize Dryden. The name refers to the laureateship.

Dead men may rise again, like Bayes's troops, or the savages in the Fantocini. In the Rehearsal a battle is fought between foot-soldiers and great hobby-horses. At last Drawcansir kills all on both sides. Smith then asks how they are to go off, to which Bayes replies, "As they came on—upon their legs"; upon which they all jump up alive again.

Bayeux Tapestry (bi'yer). A strip of linen 231 ft. long and 20 in. wide on which is represented in tapestry the mission of Harold to William, Duke of Normandy (William the Conqueror), and all the incidents of his history from then till his death at Hastings in 1066. It is preserved at Bayeux, and is supposed to be the work of Matilda, wife of William the Conqueror.

In the tapestry, the Saxons fight on foot with javelin and battle-axe, and bear shields with the British characteristic of a boss in the centre. The men are moustached.

The Normans are on horseback, with long shields and pennoned lances. The men are not only shaven, but most of them have a complete toison on the back of the head, whence the spies said to Harold, "There are more priests in the Norman army than men in Harold's."

Bayonet (bā' ō net). A stabbing weapon fixed to a rifle for shock action by infantry. Its name is said to be taken from Bayonne where it was first made. The bayonet is mentioned in the memoirs of Puysegur, in 1647; it was introduced into the English army in 1672. In its original form it was a plug bayonet, fitted into the barrel of the musket, and had therefore to be removed before the gun could be fired.
Bayonets. A synonym of "rank and file," that is, privates and corporals of infantry. As, "the number of bayonets was 25,000." It is on the bayonets that a Quartermaster-General relies for his working and fatigue parties.—Howitt: Hist. of Eng. (year 1854, p. 260).

Bayou State (bi'you). The State of Mississippi so called from its numerous bayous. A bayou is a creek, or sluggish and marshy overflow of a river or lake. The word may be of native American origin, but is probably a corruption of Fr. boyau, gut.

Bayoukaed. To be in a tank struck by such a projectile.

Beachcomber. One who, devoid of other means of existence, subsists on what flotsam and jetsam he can find on the seashore. The word originated in New Zealand, where it is found in print by 1844: an earlier form (1827) was beach ranger, analogous to Bushranger (q.v.).

Bead. From A.S. -bed (in gebed), a prayer, biddan, to pray. "Bead," thus originally meant simply "a prayer": but as prayers were "told" (i.e. account kept of them) on a "paternoster," the word came to be transferred to the small globular perforated body a number of which, threaded on a string, composed this paternoster or "rosary."

To count one's beads. To say one's prayers. See Rosary.

To draw a bead on. See Draw.

To pray without one's beads. To be out of one's reckoning.

Bailly's beads. When the disc of the moon has (in an eclipse) reduced that of the sun to a thin crescent, the crescent assumes the appearance somewhat resembling a string of beads. This was first described in detail by Francis Bailly in 1836, whence the name of the phenomenon, the cause of which is the sun shining through the depressions between the lunar mountains.

St. Cuthbert's beads. Single joints of the articulated stems of enemics. They are perforated in the centre, and bear a fanciful resemblance to a cross; hence, they were once used for rosaries (q.v.). St. Cuthbert was a Scottish monk of the 6th century, and may be called the St. Patrick of the Border. Legend relates that he sits at night on a rock in Holy Island and uses the opposite rock as his anvil while he forges the beads.

St. Cuthbert sits, and toils to frame
The sea-born beads that bear his name.

St. Martin's beads. Flash jewellery. St. Martin-le-Grand was at one time a noted place for sham jewellery.

Bead-house. An almshouse for beadsmen.

Bead-roll. A list of persons to be prayed for; hence, also, any list.

Beadsman or Bedesman. Properly, one who prays; hence, an inmate of an almshouse. Because most charities of this class were instituted so that the inmates might "pray for the soul of the founder." See Bead.

To be bazookaed. To be in a tank struck by a weapon of the same nature (P.I.A.T.—projectile infantry anti-tank—and Panzerfaust).

Beadle. A person whose duty it is to bid or cite persons to appear to a summons; also a church servant, whose duty it is to bid the parishioners to attend the vestry, or to give notice of vestry meetings. It is ultimately a Teutonic word (Old High Ger. bitel, one who asks, whence the A.S. beadan, to bid, and bydel, a herald), but it came to us through the O.Fr. badel, a herald. See Bedel.

Bean. Slang for a police magistrate, but formerly (16th and 17th cent.) for a constable. Various fanciful derivations have been suggested, but the etymology of the word is unknown.

Beaker. A drinking-glass; a rummer: a wide-mouthed glass vessel with a lip, used in scientific experiments. A much-travelled word, having come to us by way of the Scandinavian bikar, a cup (Dut. beker; Ger. becher), from Greek bikas, a wine-jar, which was of Eastern origin. Our pitcher is really the same word.

Bean. To be out of one's reckoning. A modern phrase coming from the directing of a ship, for a ship was said to be on her beam-ends when she was laid by a heavy gale completely on her side, i.e. the part where her beams end. Not infrequently the only means of righting her in such a case was to cut away her masts.

On the starboard beam. A distant point out at sea on the right-hand side, and at right angles to the keel.

On the port beam. A similar point on the left-hand side.

On the weather beam. On that side of a ship which faces the wind.

To kick the beam. See Kick.

To be on the beam. To be on the right course.

Beamed (of a stag). The main trunk of the horn, the part that bears the branches (A.S. beam, a tree).

Bean. Every bean has its black. Nemo sine vitis nascitur (Everyone has his faults). The bean has a black eye. (Ogni grano ha la sua semola.)

He has found the bean in the cake. He has got a prize in the lottery, has come to some unexpected good fortune. The allusion is to twelfth cakes in which a bean is buried. When the cake is cut up and distributed, he who gets the bean is the twelfth-night king. See Bean.

Bean. A slang expression of good-natured familiarity that became very common early in the 20th century.

Bean.
Bean-feast. Much the same as wayz-goose (q.v.). A feast given by an employer to those he employs. Probably so called because either beans or a bean-goose used to be a favourite dish on such occasions.

Bean-goose. A migratory bird which appears in England in the autumn: so named from a mark on its bill like a horse-bean. It is next in size to the greylag-goose.

Bean-king. Rey de Habas, the child appointed to play the part of king on twelfth-night. Twelfth-night was sometimes known as the Bean-king's festival.

Beans. Slang for property, money: also for a sovereign, and (formerly) a guinea. In this sense it is probably the O.Fr. cant, biens, meaning property; but in such phrases as not worth a bean, the allusion is to the bean's small value.

Three small bullets or large shot in a bladder would make a very good rattle for a child.

Beans are in flower. A catch-phrase said to one by way of accounting for his being so silly. Our forefathers imagined that the perfume of the flowering bean made men silly or light-headed.

He knows how many beans make five. He is "up to snuff": he is no fool: he is not to be imposed upon. The reference is to an old trap. Everyone knows that five beans make five, and on this answer being correctly given the questioner goes on, "But you don't know how many blue beans make five white ones." The complete answer to this is "Five—if peeled."

Full of beans. Said of a fresh and spirited horse; hence, in good form; full of health and spirits.

I'll give him beans. I'll give him a thrashing. There is a similar French proverb, S'il me donne des pois, je lui donnerai des fèves (i.e. If he gives me peas I will give him beans). I will give him tit for tat, a Roland for an Oliver.

In ancient times Pythagoras forbade the use of beans to his disciples—not the use of beans as food, but for political elections. Magistrates and other public officers were elected by beans cast by the voters into a helmet, and what Pythagoras advised was that his disciples should not interfere with politics or "love beans"—i.e. office. But according to Aristotle the word bean implied venery, and that the prohibition to "abstain from beans" was equivalent to "keeping the body chaste."

Without a bean. Penniless, "broke."

To spill the beans. To give away a secret; to let the cat out of the bag.

Bear. In the phraseology of the Stock Exchange, a speculator for a fall. (Cp. Bull.) Thus, to operate for a bear, or to bear the market, is to use every effort to depress prices, so as to buy cheap and make a profit on the rise. Such a transaction is known as a Bear account.

The term is of some antiquity, and was current at least as early as the South Sea Bubble, in the 18th century. Its probable origin will be found in the proverb, "Selling the skin before you have caught the bear." One who sold stocks in this way was formerly called a bearskin jobber.

The Bear. Albert, margrave of Brandenburg (1106-70). He was so called from his heraldic device.

The bloody bear, in Dryden's The Hind and the Panther, means the Independents.

The bloody beyr, an independent beast.

Unlicked to form, in groans her hate expressed. Pt. i, 35, 36.

In mediaval times it was popularly supposed that bear-cubs were born as shapeless masses of flesh and fur, and had to be literally "licked into shape" by their mothers. Hence the reference in the above quotation, and the phrase "to lick into shape" (q.v.).

The Great Bear, and Little Bear. These constellations were so named by the Greeks, and their word, arktos, a bear, is still kept in the names Arcturus (the bear-ward, oures, guardian) and Arctic (q.v.). The Sanskrit name for the Great Bear is from the verb rakhi, to be bright, and it has been suggested that the Greeks named it arktos as a result of confusion between the two words. Cp. Charles's Wain; Northern Wagoner.

The wind-shaken surge, with high and monstrous mane,

Seems to cast water on the burning bear

And quench the guards of th' ever-fixed pole.

SHAKESPEARE: Othello, ii. i.

The guards referred to in the above extract are β and γ of Ursa Minor. They are so named, not from any supposed guarding that they do, but from the Sp. guardare, to behold, because of the great assistance they were to mariners in navigation.

The classical fable is that Calisto, a nymph of Diana, had two sons by Jupiter, which Juno changed into bears, and Jupiter converted into constellations.

'Twas here we saw Calisto's star retire

Beneath the waves, unawed by Juno's ire.

CAMOENS: Lusiad, Bk. v.

The Northern Bear. In political cartoons, etc., Russia is depicted as a bear.

A bridled bear. A young nobleman under the control of a travelling tutor. See Bear-leader.

Th' bear and ragged stuff. A crest of the Nevilles and later Earls of Warwick, often used as a public-house sign. The first earl is said to have been Arth or Arthgal, of the Round Table, whose cognizance was a bear, arth meaning a bear (Lat. ursa). Morvid, the second earl, overcame, in single combat, a might giant, who came against him with a club consisting of a tree pulled up by the roots, but stripped of its branches. In remembrance of his victory over the giant he added "the ragged stuff."
The bear and the tea-kettle. Said of a person who injures himself by foolish rashness. The story is that one day a bear entered a hut in Kamchatka, where a kettle was on the fire. Master Bruin smelt it at and burnt his nose; greatly irritated, he seized it with his paws, and squeezed it against his breast. This, of course, made matters worse for the boiling water, scalded him terribly, and he growled in agony till some neighbours put an end to his life with their guns.

A bear sucking his paws. It used to be believed that when a bear was deprived of food it sustained life by sucking its paws. The same was said of the badger. The phrase is applied to industrious idleness.

As savage as a bear with a sore head. Unreasonably ill-tempered.

As a bear has no tail, For a lion he'll fail.

The same as Ne sutor supra crepidam (Let not the cobbler aspire above his last). Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, a descendant of the Warwick family, is said to have changed his own crest. "a green lion with two tails, for the Warwick "bear and ragged staff." When made governor of the Low Countries, he was suspected of aiming at absolute supremacy, or the desire of being the monarch of his fellows, as the lion is monarch among beasts. Some wit wrote under his crest the Latin verse, Ursarum cauda non quae est esse leon, i.e.— Your bear for lion needs must fail.

Because your true bears have no tail.

To take the bear by the tooth. To put your head into the lion's mouth: needlessly to run into danger.

Bear garden. This place is a perfect bear garden—that is, full of confusion, noise, tumult, and quarrels. In Elizabethan and Stuart times the gardens where bears were kept and baited for public amusement were famous for all sorts of riotous disorder.

Bear-leader. A common expression in the 18th century denoting a travelling tutor who escorted a young nobleman or youth of wealth and fashion, on the "Grand Tour." From the old custom of leading muzzled bears about the streets, and making them show off in danger.

To bear arms. To do military service; to be entitled to heraldic coat of arms and crest.

To bear away (nautical). To keep away from the wind.

To bear one company. To be one's companion.

His faithful dog shall bear him company.

POPE: Essay on Man, epistle i, 112.

To bear down. To overpower.

To bear down upon (nautical). To approach from the weather side.
To run in one's beard. To offer opposition to a person; to do something obnoxious to a person before his face.

With the beard on the shoulder. (Sp.) In the attitude of listening to overhear something; with circumspection, looking in all directions for surprises and ambushes. The same as the Spanish proverb expresses it, "with the beard on the shoulder," looking round from time to time, and using every precaution against pursuit.—Scott: Peveril of the Peak, ch. vii.

Tax upon beards. Peter the Great imposed a tax upon beards. Every one above the lowest class had to pay 100 roubles, and the lowest class had to pay a copeck, for enjoying this "luxury." Clerks were stationed at the gates of every town to collect the beard tax.

Bearded Master (Magister barbatus). So Persius styled Socrates, under the notion that the beard is the symbol of wisdom.

The bearded. A surname or nickname (Pogonatus) given to Constantine IV, Emperor of the East, 668-85; also to Baldwin IV, Count of Flanders. 988-1056; Geoffrey the Crusader. Bouchard of the house of Montmorency, and St. Paula. See BEARDED WOMEN.

Bearded women. St. Paula the Bearded, a Spanish saint of uncertain date of whom it is said that when long pursued by a man she fled to a crucifix and at once a beard and moustache appeared on her face, thus disguising her and saving her from her would-be ravisher. A somewhat similar story is told of St. Wilgefortis, a mythical saint supposed to have been one of seven daughters born at a birth to a king of Portugal; also of the English saint, St. Uncumber.

Many bearded women are recorded in history; among them may be mentioned:—

Bartel Graetej, of Stuttgart, born 1562.
A Charles XII had in his army a woman whose beard was a yard and a half long. She was taken prisoner at the battle of Pultawa, and presented to the Czar, 1724.

A Milanese de Chène, born at Geneva in 1854, and exhibited in London in 1852-3; she had a profuse head of hair, a strong black beard, large whiskers, and thick hair on her arms and back.

Julia Pastrana, found among the Digger Indians of Mexico, was exhibited in London in 1857; died, 1862, at Moscow; was embalmed by Professor Suckaloff; and the embalmed body was exhibited in London.

Bearings. I'll bring him to his bearings. I'll bring him to his senses, put him on the right track. Bearings is a term in navigation signifying the direction in which an object is seen. Thus to keep one's bearings is to keep on the right course, in the right direction.

To lose one's bearings. To become bewildered; to get perplexed as to which is the right road.

To take the bearings. To ascertain the relative position of some object.

Béarnais, i.e. Henry IV of France (1553-1610); so called from Le Béarn, his native province.

Beast. The Number of the Beast. See NUMBER.

Beast of Belsen. In World War II the name applied to Joseph Kramer, commandant of the notorious Belsen Concentration Camp.

Beasts of heraldry. In English heraldry all manner of creatures have been borne as charges or as crests, the principal being the lion, bear, bull, boar, cat, swallow (called a martlet), pelican, unicorn, stag. The attitude or position of the animals is described as follows: couchant, squatting, with head erect; dormant, lying down asleep; pasant, walking, with one paw raised; passant guardant, walking but looking at the spectator; rampant, on its hind legs; rampant combattant, two beasts rampant facing one another; rampant endorsed, two beasts rampant back to back. A beast can be proper, which is emblazoned in some colour similar to its natural colour; naissant, showing its upper half as though it were emerging from the womb; erased, showing its head and shoulders only.

Beat (A.S. beaut). The first sense of the word was that of striking; that of overcoming or defeating followed on as a natural extension. A track, line, or appointed range. A walk often trodden or beaten by the feet, as a policeman's beat. The word means a beaten path.

Not in my beat. Not in my line; not in the range of my talents or inclination.

Off his beat. Not on duty; not in his appointed walk; not his specialty or line.

Off his own beat his opinions were of no value. Emerson: English Traits, ch. i.

On his beat. In his appointed walk; on duty.

Out of his beat. In his wrong walk; out of his proper sphere.

Dead beat. So completely beaten or worsted as to have no leg to stand on. Like a dead man with no fight left in him; quite tired out.

Dead beat escapement (of a watch). One in which there is no reverse motion of the escapewheel.

That beats Banagher. See BANAGHER: TERTMAGANT.

To beat about. A nautical phrase, meaning to tack against the wind.

To beat about the bush. To approach a matter cautiously or in a roundabout way; to shilly-shally; perhaps because one goes carefully when beating a bush to find if any game is lurking within.

To beat an alarm. To give notice of danger by beat of drum.

To beat a retreat (Fr. battre en retraite); to beat to arms; to beat a charge. Military terms similar to the above.

To beat down. To make a seller abate his price.

To beat or drum a thing into one. To repeat as a drummer repeats his strokes on a drum.

To beat hollow, or to a mummy, a frazzle, to ribbons, a jelly, etc. To beat wholly, utterly, completely.
To beat the air. To strike out at nothing, merely to bring one's muscles into play, as pugilists do before they begin to fight; to toil without profit; to work to no purpose.

So fight I, not as one that beateth the air.—1 Cor. ix, 28.

To beat the booby. See BOOBY.

To beat the bounds. See BOUNDS.

To beat the bush. To allow another to profit by one's exertions: "one beat the bush and another caught the hare." "Other men laboured, and ye are entered into their labours" (John iv, 38). The allusion is to beaters, whose business it is to beat the bushes and start the game for a shooting party.

To beat the devil's tattoo. See TATTOO.

To beat the Dutch. To draw a very long bow; to say something very incredible. To beat the band means the same thing.

To beat time. To mark time in music by beating or moving the hands, feet, or a baton.

To beat up against the wind. To tack against an adverse wind; to get the better of the wind.

To beat up someone's quarters. To hunt out where he lives: to visit without ceremony. A military term, signifying to make an unexpected attack on an enemy in camp.

To beat the quarters of some of our less-known relations.—LAMB: ESSAYS OF ELIA.

To beat up recruiters or supporters. To hunt them up or call them together, as soldiers are summoned by beat of drum.

To beat one with his own staff. To confute him by his own words. An argumentum ad hominem.

Can High Church bigotry go farther than this? And how well have I since been beaten with mine own staff.—J. WYLLIE. [He refers to his excluding Bolzius from communion because he had not been canonically baptized.]

Beati Possidentes (bē a'tt pōs i den'tēz). Blessed are those who have (for they shall receive). "Possession is nine points of the law."

Beatiific Vision. The sight of God, or of the blessed in the realms of heaven, especially that granted to the soul at the instant of death. See Is. vi, i-4, and Acts vii, 55, 56.

Beatification (bēat i fī kā'shūn). In the R.C. Church this is a solemn act by which a deceased person is formally declared by the Pope to be one of the blessed departed and therefore a proper subject for a mass and office in his honour, generally with some local restriction. Beatification is usually, though not necessarily, a step to canonization.

Beatitude (bē a'tit ūd). In theology this is the perfect good which completely satisfies all desire.

The Beatitudes are the eight blessings pronounced by our Lord at the opening of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v. 3-11).

Beatrice. Celebrated by Dante in the Vita Nuova and the Divina Commedia, this girl was born 1266 and died in 1290, under twenty-four years old. She was a native of Florence, of the Portinari family, and married Simone de'Bardi in 1287. Dante married Gemma Donati about two years after Beatrice's death.

Beau (bō). The French word, which means "fine," or "beautiful," has, in England, often been prefixed to the name of a man of fashion, or a pop as an epithet of distinction. The following are well known:—

Beau D'Orsay. Count D'Orsay (1801-52), called by Byron JEUNE CUPIDON.

Beau Feilding. Robert Feilding (d. 1712), called "Handsome Feilding" by Charles II. He died in Scotland Yard, London, after having been convicted of bigamously marrying the Duchess of Cleveland, a former mistress of Charles II. He figures as Orlando in Steele's Tatler (Nos. 50 and 51).

Beau Hewitt. The model for "Sir Fopling Flutter," hero of Etheredge's MAN OF MODE.

Beau Nash. Richard Nash (1674-1762). Son of a Welsh gentleman, a notorious dinker-out. He undertook the management of the rooms at Bath, and conducted the public balls with a splendour and decorum never before witnessed.

Beau Didapper, in Feilding's Joseph Andrews, and Beau Tibbs, noted for his finery, vanity, and poverty in Goldsmith's Citizen of the World, may also be mentioned.

In America the word beau is applied to a girl's favourite admirer, or lover.

Beau ideal. Properly, the ideal Beautiful, the abstract idea of beauty, ideal, in the French, being the adjective, and beau, the substantive: but in English the parts played by the words are usually transposed, and thus have come to mean the ideal type or model of anything in its most consummate perfection.

Beau monde. The fashionable world; people who make up the coterie of fashion.

Beau trap. An old slang expression for a loose paving-stone under which water lodged, and which squirted up filth when trodden on, to the annoyance of the smartly dressed.

Beaucerc (bō' klērk) (good scholar). Applied to Henry I (1068-1135), who had clerk-like accomplishments, very rare in the times in which he lived.

Beaumontagille or Beaumontage. Material used for filling in accidental holes in wood- or metal-work, repairing cracks, disguising bawdy joinery, etc. Said to be so called from the celebrated French geologist, Elie de Beaumont (1798-1874), who also gave his name to beaumontite, a silicate of copper.

Beauseant (bō sā' on). The battle-cry of the Knights Templar. See TEMPLAR.

Beautiful Parricide. Beatrice Cenci, daughter of Francesco Cenci, a dissipated and passionate Roman nobleman. With her brothers, she plotted the death of her father because of his unmitigated cruelty to his wife and children. She was executed in 1599, and at the trial her counsel, with the view of still further gaining popular sympathy for his client, accused the father, probably without foundation, of having attempted to commit incest with her. Her story has been a favourite theme in poetry and art: Shelley's tragedy The Cenci is particularly noteworthy.

Beauty. Beauty is but skin deep.

O formosa puer, niumin ne crede colori.

Virgil: Eclogues, ii.

(O my pretty boy, trust not too much to your pretty looks.)

Beauty and the Beast. The hero and heroine of the well-known fairy tale in which Beauty saved the life of her father by consenting to live with the Beast; and the Beast, being disenchanted by Beauty's love, became a handsome prince, and married her.

The story is found in Straparola's Fawcevoll Notti (1550), and it is from this collection that Mme le Prince de Beaumont probably obtained it when it became popular through her French version (1757). It is the basis of Gretry's opera Zémire et Azor (1771).

The story of a handsome and wealthy prince being compelled by enchantment to assume the appearance of a loathsome beast or formidable dragon until released by the pure love of one who does not suspect the disguise, is of great antiquity and takes various forms. Sometimes, as in the story of Lamia, and the old ballads Kempion and The Laidley Worm of Spindlestonehough, it is the woman—the “Loathly Lady” of the romances—who is enchanted into the form of a serpent and is only released by the kiss of a true knight.

Beauty of Buttermere. Mary Robinson, married in 1802 to John Hatfield (c. 1758-1803), a heartless impostor, and already a gigamist, who was executed for forgery at Carlisle in 1803. She was the subject of many dramas and stories.

... a story drawn from our own ground.—The Maid of Buttermere,—

And now, unfaithful to a virtuous wife
Deserted and deceived, the Spoiler came
And wooed the artless daughter of the hills,
And wedded her, in cruel mockery

X love and marriage bonds.

Beauty sleep. Sleep taken before midnight. Those who habitually go to bed, especially during youth, after midnight, are supposed to become pale and more or less haggard.

Beaux Espris (bô zâ sprê) (Fr.). Men of wit or genius (singular, Un bel esprit, a wit, a genius).

Beaux yeux (bô zyâ') (Fr.). Beautiful eyes or attractive looks. "I will do it for your beaux yeux" (because you are so pretty, or because your eyes are so attractive).

Beaver. The lower and movable part of a helmet: so called from Fr. bavière, which meant child's bib, to which this part had some resemblance. It is not connected with bever q.v., the afternoon draught in the harvest-field.

Hamlet: Then you saw not his face?

Horatio: O yes, my lord; he wore his beaver up.

Shakespeare: Hamlet, i, 2.

Beaver is also an old name for a man's hat; because they used to be made of beaver fur. For some years in the 1920s the word was applied to anyone wearing a beard.

Bécasse (bâ kas). French for a woodcock and also for a booby or "softy." The word is sometimes used in the latter sense in English.

Bed. The great bed of Ware. A bed eleven feet square, and capable of holding twelve persons. It dates from the last quarter of the 16th century. In 1531, it came into the possession of the Victoria and Albert Museum.

Although the sheet was big enough for the bed of Ware in England.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, ii, 2.

As you make your bed you must lie on it. Everyone must bear the consequences of his own acts. "As you sow, so must you reap." "As you brew, so must you bake."

To bed out. To plant what are called "bedding-out plants" in a flower-bed. Bedding-out plants are reared in pots, generally in a hothouse, and are transferred into garden-beds early in the summer. Such plants as geraniums, marguerites, pentstemons, petunias, verbenas, lobelias, calceolarias, etc., are meant.

To make the bed. To arrange it and make it fit for use. In America this sense of "make" is more common than it is with us. "Your room is made," arranged in due order.

You got out of bed the wrong way, or with the left leg foremost. Said of a person who is patchy and ill-tempered. It was an ancient superstition that it was unlucky to set the left foot on the ground first on getting out of bed. The same superstition applies to putting on the left shoe first, a "fancy" not yet wholly exploded. Augustus Cesar was very superstitious in this respect.

Bed of justice. See Lit.

A bed of roses. A situation of ease and pleasure.

A bed of thorns. A situation of great anxiety and apprehension.

In the twinkling of a bed-post or bed-staff. As quickly as possible. In old bed-frames it is said that posts were placed in brackets at the two sides of the bedstead for keeping the bed-clothes from rolling off; there was also in some cases a staff used to beat the bed and clean it. In the reign of Edward I, Sir John Chichester had a mock skirmish with his servant (Sir John with his rapier and the servant with the bed-staff), in which the servant was accidentally killed. Wright, in his Domestic Manners, shows us a chambermaid of the 17th century using a bed-staff to beat up the bedding. "Twinkling" is from A.S. twincian, a frequentative verb connected with twiccian, to twitch, and connotes rapid or tremulous movement.

I'll do it instantly, in the twinkling of a bed-staff.

Shadwell: Virtuoso, i, 1 (1676).

The phrase is probably due to the older and more readily understandable one, in the twinkling of an eye, in the smallest thinkable fraction of time:

We shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump.—1 Cor. xv, 51, 52.

Bedchamber Question. In May, 1839, Lord Melbourne's Whig ministry resigned, and when Sir Robert Peel formed a government he intimated to Queen Victoria that he would replace the Whig ladies of the bedchamber to be replaced by Tories. The Queen refused to accede to this request, and persisting in her refusal, called Lord Melbourne to her aid. A new Whig ministry was formed, which lasted until 1841, by which time the Prince Consort was able to smooth over the difficulty when a Tory government was formed.

Bede. See VENERABLE BEDE.

Bedel, or Bedell (bè’dél). Old forms of the word beadle (q.v.), still used at Oxford and Cambridge in place of the modern spelling for the officer who carries the mace before the Vice-Chancellor and performs a few other duties. At Oxford there are four, called bedels; at Cambridge there are two, called bedells, or esquire-bedells.

Beder (bè’dér). A village between Medina and Mecca famous for the first victory gained by Mohammed over the Koreshites (624 A.D.). It is the battle he is said to have been assisted by 3,000 angels, led by Gabriel, mounted on his horse Haizum.

Bedesman. See BEADSMAAN.

Bedford Level. The large tract of marshy land about 60 miles in breadth and 40 in length which lies in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Northamptonshire, and Lincolnshire, and includes the Isle of Ely and the whole of the Fen district. So called from Francis, fourth Earl of Bedford, who undertook the draining of the Fens in 1634.

Bedford Book of Hours. An illuminated manuscript of extraordinary beauty made for John, Duke of Bedford, second son of King Henry IV, whose wife presented it to King Henry VI at Christmas, 1430. It is now in the British Museum.

Bedivere, or Bediver. In the Arthurian romances, a knight of the Round Table, butler and staunch adherent of King Arthur. It was he who, at the request of the dying king, threw a large boulder into the Lake of Avalon.

Bedlam. A lunatic asylum or madhouse; a term for a madman, a fool, an inhabitant of Bedlam. See ABRAHAM.

Bedlamite. A madman, a fool, an inhabitant of Bedlam. See ABRAHAM.

Bedlam, Tom o'.' See Tom.

Bednal Green. See BEGGAR'S DAUGHTER.

Bedouins (bed'ou inz). French (and thence English) form of an Arabic word meaning "a dweller in the desert," given indiscriminately by Europeans to the nomadic tribes of Arabia and Syria, and applied in journalistic jargon to gipsies, or the homeless poor of the streets. In this use it is merely a further extension of the term "street Arab," which means the same thing.

Bed-rock. American slang for one’s last shilling. A miner’s term for the hard basis rock which is reached when the mine is exhausted. "I’m come down to the bed-rock," i.e. my last dollar.

Bedver. See BEDIVERE.

Bee. Legend has it that Jupiter was nourished by bees in infancy, and Pindar is said to have been nourished by bees with honey instead of milk.

The Greeks consecrated bees to the moon. With the Romans a flight of bees was considered a bad omen. Appian (Civil War, Bk. ii) says a swarm of bees lighted on the altar and prognosticated the fatal issue of the battle of Pharsalia.

The coins of Ephesus had a bee on the reverse. When Plato was an infant, bees settled on his lips when he was asleep, indicating that he would become famous for his honeyed words. And as when Plato did i’ the cradle thrive, Bees to his lips brought honey from their hive.

W. BROWNE: Britannia’s Pastoral, ii.

The same story is told of Sophocles, Pindar, St. Chrysostom, and others, including St. Ambrose, who is represented with a beehive.

The Bee was the emblem of Napoleon Bonaparte. The name bee is given, particularly in America, to a social gathering for some useful work, the allusion being to the social and industrious character of bees. The name of the object of the gathering generally precedes the word, as a spelling-bee (for a competition in spelling), apple-bees, husking-bees, etc. It is an old Devonshire custom, carried across the Atlantic in Stuart times, but the name appears to have originated in America. See also ANIMALS IN SYMBOLISM.

The Athenian Bee. See ATHENIAN.

The Bee of Athens. See ATHENIAN and ATTIC BEE.

Bee-line. The shortest distance between two given points; such as a bee is supposed to take in making for its hive. Air-line is another term for the same thing.

To have your head full of bees, or to have a bee in your bonnet. To be cranky; to have an idiosyncrasy; to be full of devices, crotchets, fancies, inventions, and dreamy theories. The connexion between bees and the soul was once generally maintained: hence Mohammed admits bees to Paradise. Porphyry says of the fountains, “they are adapted to the numphs, or those souls which the ancient called bees.” Cp. MAGGOT.
Beef. This word, from the O.Fr. boef (mod. Fr. bœuf), an ox, is, like mutton (Fr. mouton), a reminder of the time when, in the years following the Norman Conquest, the Saxons were the dogs and the Norman servants of the conquerors. The Normans had the cooked meat, and when set before them the word they were accustomed to; the Saxons was the herdsman, and while the beast was under his charge called it by its Saxon name.

Beefeaters. The popular name of the Yeomen of the Guard in the royal household, appointed, in 1485, by Henry VII, to form part of the royal train at banquets and on other grand occasions; also of the Yeomen Extraordinary of the Guard, who were appointed as Warders of the Tower of London by Edward VI, and wear the same Tudor-period costume as the Yeomen of the Guard themselves.

There is no evidence whatever for the old guess that the word is connected with the French buffet, and signifies “an attendant at the royal buffet, or sideboard”; on the contrary, every indication goes to show that it means exactly what it says, viz. “eater of beef.” That “eater” was formerly used as a synonym for “servant” is clear, not only from the fact that the O.E. hlaf-æta (literally, “loaf-eater”) meant “a menial servant,” but also from the passage in Ben Jonson’s Silent Woman iii. 2. (1669) where Morose, calling for his servants, shouts:—

Bar my doors! bar my doors! Where are all my eaters? My mouths, now? Bar up my doors, you varlets!

Sir. S. D. Scott, in his The British Army (ii. 513), quotes an early use of the word from a letter of Prince Rupert’s dated 1645, and shows (p. 517) that the large daily allowance of beef provided for their table makes the words in their literal meaning quite appropriate.

There is plenty of evidence to show that in the 17th century there was little doubt of the meaning of the word: e.g. Cartwright’s The Ordinary, ii. 1 (1651):—

These goodly Juments of the guard would fight (not eat beef) after six stone a day.

Beef-steak Club. The present Beef-steak Club dates from 1876, but the original club of this name was founded about 1707. Its badge was a gridiron, and it was said to comprise “the chief wits and great men of the nation.” In 1735 the “Sublime Society of the Steaks,” which has sometimes been confused with this, but which scorned to be called a club, was inaugurated through a chance dinner taken by Lord Peterborough in the scene-room of Rich over Covent Garden Theatre. His lordship was so delighted with the steak provided and cooked by the actor that he proposed to repeat the entertainment every Saturday. The “Sublime Society,” which was then founded, continued to meet at Covent Garden till the fire of 1808, and, after various vicissitudes, was finally dissolved in 1867. The original gridiron on which Rich broiled the peer’s steak is still in existence.

Beelzebub. The name should be spelt Beelzebul (or, rather, Baalzebul, see BAAL), and means “lord of the high house”; but, as this title was ambiguous and might have been taken as referring to Solomon’s Temple, the late Jews changed it to Beelzebub, which has the meaning “lord of flies.” Beelzebub was the particular Baal worshipped originally in Ekron and afterwards far and wide in Palestine and the adjacent countries. To the Jews he came to be the chief representative of the false gods, and he took an important place in their hierarchy of demons. He is referred to in Matt. xii, 24, as “the prince of the devils,” and hence Milton places him next in rank to Satan.

One next himself in power, and next in crime, Long after known in Palestine, and named Beelzebub. Paradise Lost, i, 79.

Beer. See Ale.

He does not think small beer of himself. See Small Beer.

Life is not all beer and skittles, i.e. not all eating, drinking, and play; not all pleasure; not all harmony and love.

Sport like life, and life like sport, Isn’t all skittles and beer.

Beeswing. The second crust, or film, composed of shining scales of mucilage, which forms in good port and some other wines after long keeping, and which bears some resemblance to the wings of bees. Unlike the “crust” which forms on the bottle, it is not detrimental if it passes into the decanter at decanting.

Beetle. To. To overhang, to threaten, to jut over. The word seems to have been first used by Shakespeare:

Or to the dreadful summit of the din, That beetles o’er his base into the sea. —Hamlet, i, 4.

It is formed from the adjective, beerebrowed, having prominent or shaggy eyebrows; and it is not the case, as has sometimes been stated, that the adjective was formed from the verb. The derivation of beetle in this use is not quite certain, but it probably refers to the tufted antennæ which, in some beetles, stand straight out from the head.

Befana (be fa’na). The good fairy of Italian children, who is supposed to fill their stockings with toys when they go to bed on Twelfth Night. Someone enters the one enters the bedroom for the purpose, and the wakeful youngsters cry out, “Ecco la Befana.” According to legend, Befana was too busy with house affairs to look after the Magi when they went to offer their gifts, and said she would wait to see them on their return; but they went another way, and Befana, every Twelfth Night, watches to see them. The name is a corruption of Epiphania.

Before the Lights. See LIGHTS.

Before the Mast. See MAST.

Beg. A Turkish chief or governor. See BEY.

Beg the Question. To. To assume a proposition which, in reality, involves the conclusion. Thus, to say that parallel lines will never meet because they are parallel, is simply to assume as a fact the very thing you profess to prove. The phrase is the common English equivalent of the Latin term, petitio principii.

Beggar. A beggar may sing before a pick-pocket. Cantabit vacuus coram latrone viator (Juvenal, x, 22). A beggar may sing in the presence of thieves because he has nothing in his pocket to lose.

Beggar of Bednall Green. See Bessee, the Beggar's Daughter.

Beggars cannot choose. Beggars must take what is given them, and not dictate to the giver what they like best. They must accept and be thankful.

Beggars' barm. The thick foam which collects on the surface of ponds, brooks, and other pieces of water where the current meets stoppage. It looks like barm or yeast, but, being unfit for use, is only beggarly barm at best.

Beggars' bullets. Stones.

To go by beggar's bush, or Go home by beggar's bush — i.e. to go to ruin. Beggar's bush is the name of a tree which once stood on the left hand of the London road from Huntingdon to Caxton; so called because it was a noted rendezvous for beggars. These punning phrases and proverbs are very common.

Bessee, the beggar's daughter of Bednall Green, the heroine of an old ballad given in Percy's Reliques, and introduced by Chettle and Day into their play The Blind Beggar of Bednall Green (1600). Sheridan Knowles also has a play on the story (1834). Bessee was very beautiful, and was courted by four suitors at once—a knight, a gentleman of fortune, a London merchant, and the son of the innkeeper at Romford. She told them that they must obtain the consent of her father, the poor blind beggar of Bednall Green. When they heard that, they all slunk off except the knight, who went to ask the beggar's leave to wed the "pretty Bessee." The beggar gave her £3,000 for her dower, and £100 to buy her wedding gown. At the wedding feast he explained to the guests that he was Henry, son and heir of Sir Simon de Montfort.

Beggar's Opera. Opera produced in London in 1727 with enormous success. The words are by Gay and the music, partly traditional ballads and partly contemporary "hits," was arranged by Pepusch. The "hero" is a highwayman, MacHeath, and the originality lay in composing an opera round criminals and Newgate Prison.

King of the beggars. Bampfylde Moore Carew (1693-1770), a famous English vagabond who was elected King of the Gipsies. He fell into the hands of the Law, was transported to Maryland but escaped and got back to England. He was one of the Young Pretender's troopers in the '45 and followed him to Derby.

Set a beggar on horseback, and he'll ride to the devil. There is no one so proud and arrogant as a beggar who has suddenly grown rich.

Such is the sad effect of wealth — rank pride—Mount but a beggar, how the rogue will ride!
Peter Pindar: Epistle to Lord Lonsdale. The proverb is common to many languages.

Begging Friars. See Mendicant Orders.

Beghards (be gardz). A monastic fraternity which rose in the Low Countries in the 12th century, so called from Lambert le Begue, a priest of Liége, who also founded a sisterhood. They took no vows, and were free to leave the society when they liked. In the 17th century, those who survived the persecutions of the Popes and Inquisition joined the Tertiarii of the Franciscans. See Beguines.

Beglerbed. See Bashaw.

Begorra. An Irish form of the English minced oath "begad," for "By God."

Beguine (bë gé'). A popular Martinique and South American dance, or music for this dance, in bolero rhythm. This rhythm inspired Cole Porter's success of the 1930s, "Begin the Beguine."

Beguines (bâ gé'). A sisterhood founded in the 12th century by Lambert le Begue (see Beghards). The Beguines were at liberty to quit the cloister and to marry; they formerly flourished in the Low Countries, Germany, France, and Italy; and there are still communities with this name in Belgium. The cap called a beguin was named from this sisterhood.

Begum. A lady, princess, or woman of high rank in India; the wife of a ruler (fem. of Bey, see Bey).

Behemoth (be'h moth). The animal described under this name in Job xl, 15 et seq., is, if an actual animal were intended, almost certainly the hippopotamus; but modern scholarship rather tends to the opinion that the reference is purely mythological. The English poet Thomson, apparently took it to be the rhinoceros:

Behold! in plated mail,
Behemoth rears his head.
The Seasons: Summer, 709.

The word is sometimes pronounced Be'hemoth; but Milton, like Thomson, places the accent on the second syllable.

Scarcely from his mold
Behemoth, biggest born of earth, upheaved
His vastness.
Paradise Lost, v., 471.

Beheminsts (bâ'men ists). A sect of theosophical mystics, so called from Jacob Behmen, or Bohme (1575-1624), their founder. The first Beheminst sect in England was founded under the name of Philadelphists by a certain Jane Leade, in 1697.

Behram (bâ' rám). The most holy kind of fire, according to Parseeism (q.v.). See also Guebres.

Bejan (bê' jân). A freshman or greenhorn. This term was introduced into some of the Scottish Universities from the University of Paris, and is a corruption of Fr. bec jaune, yellow beak, with allusion to a nestling or unfrighted bird. At Aberdeen a woman student is called a banjanella or bejanella.

In France bejaune is still the name for the repast that the freshman is supposed to provide for his new companions.

Bel. The name of two Assyrio-Babylonian gods; it is the same word as Baal (q.v.). The story of Bel and the Dragon, in which we are told how Daniel convinced the king that Bel was not an actual living deity but only an image, was formerly part of the Book of Daniel, but is now relegated to the Apocrypha.

Bel Esprit (bel es prê) (Fr.). Literally, fine mind, means, in English, a vivacious wit: one of quick and lively parts, ready at repartee (pl. bel es prêts).

Belch. Sir Toby. A reckless, roistering, jolly fellow: from the knight of that name in Shakespeare's Twelfth Night.

Belcher. A pocket-handkerchief—properly, one with white spots on a blue ground; so called from Jim Belcher (1781-1811), the pugilist, who adopted it. The Belcher ring was a massive gold affair, sometimes set with a precious stone.

Beldam. An old woman. This is not from the French belle dame, but from English dam, a mother, and bel-, a prefix expressing relationship as does grand- in grandmother, etc. Belfather is an old term for grandfather. Old men and beldames in the streets Do prophesy upon it dangerously. —Shakespeare: King John, iv, 2.

Belfast Regiment. The. See regimental nicknames.

Bel-frères. See beltan.

Belfry. A military tower, pushed by besiegers against the wall of a besieged city, that missiles may be thrown more easily against the defenders. (From O.Fr. berfrê, berfroit, Mid. High Ger. berfritte—berc, shelter, fence—a protecting tower.) A church steeple is called a belfry from its resemblance to these towers, and not because bells are hung in it.

Belial (bê'li ál) (Heb.). The worthless or lawless one, i.e., the devil. What concord hath Christ with Belial? 2 Cor. vi, 15.

Milton, in his pandemonium, makes him a very high and distinguished prince of darkness. Belial came last—than whom a spirit more lewd Fell not from heaven, or more gross to love Vive for itself. —Paradise Lost, bk. i, 490.

Sons of Belial. Lawless, worthless, rebellious people. Now the sons of Eli were sons of Belial. 1 Sam. ii, 12.

Belisarius (bel i sar' i us). Belisarius begging for an obolus. Belisarius (d. 565), the greatest of Justinian's generals, being accused of conspiring against the life of the emperor, was deprived of all his property. The tale is that his eyes were put out, and that when living as a beggar in Constantinople he fastened a bag to his roadside hat, with the inscription: "Give an obolus to poor old Belisarius." This tradition is of no historic value.

Bell. See assur.

Bell, Acton, Currer, and Ellis. These were the names under which Anne, Charlotte, and Emily Brontë wrote their novels.

Bell. As the bell clinks, so the fool thinks, or. As the fool thinks, so the bell clinks. The tale says when Whittington ran away from his master, and had got as far as Highgate Hill, he was hungry, tired, and wished to return. Bow Bells began to ring, and Whittington fancied they said, "Turn again, Whittington, Lord Mayor of London." The bells clinked in response to the boy's thoughts.

At three bells, at five bells, etc. A term on board ship with much the same meaning as our expression a'clock. Five out of the seven watches last four hours, and each half-hour is marked by a bell, which gives a number of strokes corresponding to the number of half-hours passed. Thus, "three bells" denotes the third half-hour of the watch, "five bells" the fifth half-hour of the watch, and so on. The two short watches, which last only two hours each, are from four to six and six to eight in the afternoon. "Eight bells" is rung at noon, four, and eight o'clock, and is the signal for the beginning of a new watch. See watch.

Bell, book, and candle. In the greater excommunication, introduced into the Catholic Church in the 8th century, after reading the sentence a bell is rung, a book closed, and a candle extinguished. From that moment the excommunicated person is excluded from the sacraments and even from divine worship. The form of excommunication closed with the words "Close the book, quench the candle, ring the bell!"

Bell, book, and candle shall not drive me back. —Shakespeare: King John, iii, 3.

Hence, in spite of bell, book, and candle, signifies in spite of all the opposition which even the Christian hierarchy can offer.

Give her the bells and let her fly. Don't throw good money after bad; make the best of a bad job. —Shakespeare: All's Well That Ends Well, ii, 12.

Passing bell. The hallowed bell which used to be rung when persons were in extremis, to scare away evil spirits which were supposed to lurk about the dying ready to pounce on the soul while passing from the body. It is a very ancient custom, and the Athenians used to beat on brazen kettles at the moment of a decase to scare away the Furies. A secondary object was to announce to the neighbourhood the fact that all good Christians might offer up a prayer for the safe passage of the soul into Paradise. The bell rung at a funeral is sometimes improperly called the "passing bell." The Koran says that bells hang on the trees of Paradise, and are set in motion by wind from the throne of God, as often as the blessed wish for music.

Bells as musical: As those that, on the golden-shafted trees Of Eden, shook by the eternal breeze. —T. Moore: Lalla Rookh, pt. i.
Ringing the hallowed bell. Consecrated bells were believed to be able to disperse storms and pestilence, drive away devils (see PASSING BELL, above), and extinguish fire. In France in quite recent times it was by no means unusual to ring church bells to ward off the effects of lightning, and as lately as 1852 it is said that the Bishop of Malta ordered the church bells to be rung for an hour to "lay a gale of wind."

Funera plango, fulgura frango, sabbata pango.

Excito lentos, dissippo ventos, paco eructos.

A Helpe to Discourse (1668).

(Death's tale I tell, the winds dispel, ill-feeling quell, The slothful shake, the storm-clouds break, the Sabbath wake.)

The legend on the Münster bell, cast at Basle in 1486, known as Schiller's bell because it furnished him with the idea for his Lied von der Glocke, reads:

Vivos voco, mortuos plango, Plango, fulgura frango, sabbata pango.

Ringing the bells backwards, is ringing a muffled peal. Backwards is often used to denote "in a reverse manner," as, "I hear you are grown rich"—"Yes, backwards," meaning "quite the reverse."

A muffled peal is a peal of sorrow, not of joy, and was formerly sometimes employed as a tocsin, or notice of danger.

Sound as a bell. Quite sound. A cracked bell is useless.

Blinde Fortune did so happily contrive, That we as sound as bells did safe arise At Dover. Taylor's Works, ii, 22 (1630).

Tolling the bell for church. The "church-going bell," as Cowper called it (Alexander Selkirk) was in pre-Reformation days rung, not as an invitation to church, but as an Ave Bell, to invite worshippers to a preparatory prayer to the Virgin.

To bear or carry away the bell. To be first tiddle; to carry off the palm; to be the best. The leader of the flock, the "bell-bearer," bong the bell; hence the phrase; but it has been confused with an old custom of presenting to winners of horse-races, etc., a little gold or silver bell as a prize.

Jockey and his horse were by their masters sent To put in for the bell. They are to run and cannot miss the bell. NORTH: Forest of Varieties.

Warwick shakes his bells. Beware of danger, for Warwick is in the field. Trojans beware, Achilles has donned his armour. A metaphor from falconry, the bells being those of a hawk.

Neither the king, nor he that loves him best, Dares stir a wing. If Warwick shakes the bells. SHAKESPEARE: 3 Henry VI, 1, 1.

Who is to bell the cat? Who will risk his own life to save his neighbour's? Anyone who encounters great personal hazard for the sake of others undertakes to "bell the cat."

Bell-the-Cat. Archibald Douglas, fifth Earl of Angus (d. 1514), was so called. James III made favourites of architects and masons. One mason, named Cochrane, he created Earl of Mar. The Scottish nobles held a council in the church of Lauder for the purpose of putting down these upstarts, when Lord Gray asked, "Who will bell the cat?" "That will I," said Douglas, and he fearlessly put to death, in the king's presence, the obnoxious minions. The allusion is to the fable of the cunning old mouse (given in Piers Plowman and elsewhere), who suggested that they should hang a bell on the cat's neck to give notice to all mice of her approach. "Excellent," said a wise young mouse, "but who is to undertake the job?"

Bellman. A town-crier. Before the present police force was established, watchmen or bellmen used to parade the streets at night, and at Easter a copy of verses was left at the chief houses in the hope of obtaining an offering. These verses were the relics of the old incantations sung or said by the bellman to keep off elves and hobgoblins.

Bell-ropes. A humorous name for a curl worn by a man—a "rope" for the "bells" to play with. CP. BOW-CATCHER.

Bell Savage. See LA BELLE SAUVAGE.

Bell-waver. Valactating. Swaying from side to side like a bell. A man whom his mind jangles out of tune from delirium, drunkenness, or temporary insanity, is said to have his wits gone bell-wawering.

Bellwether of the flock. A jocose and rather deprecated term applied to the leader of a party. The allusion is to the wether or sheep which leads the flock with a bell fastened to its neck.

Belladonna (bel'don'a). The Deadly Nightshade. The name is Italian, and means "beautiful lady"; it is not certainly known why it should have been given to the plant. One account says that it is from a practice once common among ladies of touching their eyes with it to make the pupils large and hirsrous; but another has it that it is from its having been used by an Italian poisoner, named Leucota, to poison beautiful women. It is used today by ophthalmic surgeons in order to enlarge the pupil so that they may more easily examine the inside of the eye.

Bellarmine (bel'ar min). A large Flemish potch, or stone beer-jug, originally made in Flanders in ridicule of Cardinal Bellarmine (1542-1621), the great persecutor of the Protestants there. It carried a rude likeness of the cardinal. CP. GREYBEARD.

Belle (bel) (Fr.). A beauty. The Belle of the ball. The most beautiful woman in the room.

La belle France. A common French phrase applied to France, as "Merrie England" is to our own country.

Belles lettres (bel let). Polite literature; poetry, and standard literary works which are not scientific or technical: the study or pursuit of such literature. The term—which is French—has given birth to the very ugly words belletrist and bellettristic.

Bellerophon (be ler' ó fon). The Joseph of Greek mythology; Antea, the wife of Prætus, being the "Potiphar's wife" who tempted him, and afterwards falsely accused him. Her husband, Prætus, sent Bellerophon with a letter to Iobates, the King of Lycia, his wife's Bellerus (bē'le-rūs). The name of a giant invented by Milton by way of accounting for "Bellerium," the old Roman name for the Land's End district of Cornwall:

"Sleep'st by the fable of Bellerus old.

Milton had originally written "Corineus," (q.v.), a name already well known in British legend.

Bellona. In Roman mythology, the goddess of war and wife (or sometimes sister) of Mars. She was probably in origin a Sabine deity.

Belly. The belly and its members. The fable of Menenius Agrippa to the Roman people when they succed to the Sacred Mount:

"Once on a time the members refused to work for the lazy belly; but, as the supply of food was thus stopped, they found there was a necessary and mutual dependence between them." The fable is given by Esop and by Plutarch, whence Shakespeare introduces it in his Coriolanus, i, 1.

The belly has no ears. A hungry man will not listen to advice or arguments. The Romans had the same proverb, Venter non habet aures; and in French, Ventre affamé n'a point d'oreilles.

Belly-timber. Food. The term is quite an old one, and was not originally slang. It is used seriously by Massinger and other Elizabethan dramatists, and is given by Cotgrave (1611) as a translation of the French Carrelure de ventre (literally, a resoling, or re-furnishing, of the stomach.)

... through deserts vast
And regions desolate they pass'd
Where belly-timber above ground
Or under, was not to be found.

Belphegor (bel'fe-gör). The Assyrian form of Baal-Peor (see Baal), the Moabitish god to whom the Israelites became attached in Shittim (Num. xxv, 3).

The name was given in a mediaeval Latin legend to a demon who was sent into the world from the infernal regions by his fellows to test the truth of certain rumours that had reached them concerning the happiness—and otherwise—of married life on earth. After a thorough trial, the details of which are told with great intimacy, he fled in horror and dismay to the happy regions where female society and companionship was non-existent. Hence, the term is applied both to a misanthrope and to a nasty, licentious, obscene fellow.

The story is found in Machiavelli's works, and became very popular. Its first appearance in English is in Barnabe Rich's Farewell to the Military Profession (1581); and it either forms the main source of, or furnishes incidents to, many plays including Grim, the Collier of Croydon (1600), Jonson's The Devil is an Ass (1616), and John Wilson's Belphegor, or The Marriage of the Devil (1691).

Beloved Disciple. St. John. (John xiii, 23, etc.)

Beloved Physician. St. Luke. (Col. iv, 14.)

Belvedere (bel' vē-dēr). A sort of pleasure-house built on an eminence in a garden, from which one can survey the surrounding prospect, or a look-out on the top of a house. The word is Italian, and means a fine sight.
Benares (ben är' ez). The holy city of the Hindus, being to them what Mecca is to the Moslems. It was founded about 1200 b.c. and was for many years a Buddhist centre, being conquered by the Mohammedans in 1193. It is celebrated for its temples and shrines to which pilgrims go from all India.

Benbow. A name almost typical of a brave sailor, from John Benbow (1653-1702), a noted English Admiral. It is told of him that in an engagement with the French near St. Martha, on the Spanish coast, in 1701, his legs and thighs were shivered into splinters by a chain-shot, but, supported in a wooden frame, he remained on the quarter deck till morning, when Du Casse bore away. Almeyda, the Portuguese governor of India, in his engagement with the united fleet of Cumbaya and Egypt, had his legs and thighs shattered in a similar manner; but, instead of-retreating, had himself bound to the ship's mast, where he "waved his sword to cheer on the combatants," till he died from loss of blood.

Whirled by the cannon's rage, in shivers torn,
His thighs far shattered o'er the waves are borne;
Bound to the mast the god-like hero stands,
Waves his proud sword and cheers his woeful bands;
Though winds and seas their wonted aid deny,
To yield he knows not but he knows to die.

Somewhat similar stories are told of Cynagros and Jaafer (qq.v.).

Bench. Originally the same word as Bank, it means, properly, a long wooden seat, hence the official seat of judges in Court, bishops in the House of Lords, aldermen in the council chamber, etc.; hence, by extension judges, bishops, etc., collectively, the court or place where they administer justice or sit officially, the dignity of holding such an official status, etc. Hence Bench of bishops. The whole body of prelates, who sit in the House of Lords.

To be raised to the bench. To be made a judge.

To be raised to the Episcopal bench. To be made a bishop.

King's (or Queen's) Bench. See King's Bench and Bar. Judges and barristers. See Bar; Barrister.

Benchers. Senior members of the Inns of Court. They exercise the functions of calling students to the bar (qq.v.), and have powers of expulsion.

Bend. In heraldry, an ordinary formed by two parallel lines drawn across the shield from the dexter chief (i.e. the top left-hand corner when looking at the shield) to the sinister base point (i.e. the opposite corner). It is said to represent the sword-belt.

Bend sinister. A bend running across the shield in the opposite direction, i.e. from right to left. It often is an indication of bastardy (cp. Bar sinister); hence the phrase "he has a bend sinister," he was not born in lawful wedlock.

Beyond my bend, i.e. my means or power. The phrase is probably a corruption of beyond my bent, but it may be in allusion to a bow or spring, which, if strained beyond its bending power, breaks.

Bendemeer (ben' de mër). A river that flows near the ruins of Chilminar or Istachar, in the province of Chusistan, in Persia.

There's a bower of roses by Bendemeer's stream,
And the nightingale sings round it all the day

MOORE: Lalla Rookh, I.

Bender. A sixpenny-piece; perhaps because it can be bent without much difficulty. Also (in schoolboy slang) a "licking" with the cane, the culprit being in a bent position. In Scotland it is an old term for a hard drinker, and in the United States it is still given to a drinking bout.

Bendigo (ben' di go). The nickname (said to be a corruption of "Abendnego") of William Thompson (1811-89), a well-known pupilist. He left his nickname to a township in Victoria, Australia, and also to a rough fur cap. The Australian town changed its name to Sandhurst, but subsequently officially reverted to its original appellation.

Bendy, Old. One of the numerous euphemistic names of the devil, who is willing to bend to anyone's inclination.

Benedicite (ben e dis' i ti). The 2nd pers. pl. imperative of the Latin verb benedicere, meaning "bless you," or "may you be blessed." In the first given sense it is the opening word of many old graces ("Bless ye the Lord," etc.); hence, a grace, or a blessing. The second sense accounts for its use as an interjection or expression of astonishment, as in Chaucer's "The god of love, A benedicite, How myghty and how great a lord is he!" Knight's Tale, 927.

Benedick. A sworn bachelor caught in the snares of matrimony: from Benedick in Shakespeare's Much Abo about Nothing. Let our worthy Cantab be bachelor or Benedick, what concern is it of ours.—Mrs. EDWARDS: A Girton Girl, ch. xv.

Benedick and Benedict are used indiscriminately, but the distinction should be observed.

Benedict. A bachelor, not necessarily one pledged to celibacy, but simply a man of marriageable age, not married. St. Benedict was a most uncompromising stickler for celibacy.

Is it not a pun? There is an old saying, "Needles and pins; when a man marries his trouble begins," If so, the unmarried man is benedictus.—Life in the West (1843).

Benedictine. A liqueur made at the Benedictine monastery at Fécamp, France.

Benedictines. Monks who follow the rule of St. Benedict. They recite the Divine Office at the canonical hours, and are at other times employed in study, teaching or manual labour. They are known as the "Black Monks" (the Dominicans being the Black Friars). The Order was founded by St. Benedict at Subiaco and Monte Cassino, Italy, about 530, and its members have from the earliest times been renowned for their learning. A similar order for nuns was founded by St. Scholastica, sister of St. Benedict.
Benefice. Under the Romans certain grants of lands made to veteran soldiers were called beneficia, and in feudal times an estate held for life in return for military or other service by a benefactor of the donor was called a benefice. When the popes assumed the power of the feudal lords with reference to ecclesiastical patronage the name was retained for a "living."

Benefit of Clergy. Originally, the privilege of exemption from trial by a secular court enjoyed by the clergy if arrested for felony. In time it comprehend not only the ordained clergy, but all who, being able to write and read, were capable of entering into holy orders. It seems to have been based on the text, "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm" (1 Chron. xvi, 22), and it was finally abolished in the reign of George IV (1827). Cp. Neck-Verse.

Benelux. A name for the customs union (1947) of Belgium, Netherlands, and Luxembourg, the first letters of which form this convenient portmanteau word.

Benevolence. A means of raising money by forced loans and without the instrumentality of Parliament, first resorted to in 1473 by Edward IV. The last time by JamesⅡ.

Bengal Tigers. The old 17th Foot, whose badge, a royal tiger, was granted them for their services in India (1802-23). Now the Leicester Regiment and known simply as "The Tigers."

Begodi (ben go' di). A "land of Cockaigne" mentioned in Boccaccio's Decameron (viii, 3), where "they tie the vines with sausages, where you may buy a fat goose for a penny and have a gosling into the bargain: where there is also a mountain of grated Parmesan cheese, and people do nothing but make cheesecakes and macaroons. There is also a river which runs Malmsey wine of the very best quality;" etc., etc.

Benicia Boy (ben is' yá). John C. Heenan, the American pugilist, who challenged and fought Tom Sayers for "the belt" in 1860; so called from Benicia in California, his birthplace.

Benjamin. The pet, the youngest; in allusion to Benjamin, the youngest son of Jacob (Gen. xxxv, 18). Also (in early- and mid-19th cent.), an overcoat; so called from a tailor of the name, and rendered popular by its association with Joseph's "coat of many colours."

Benjamin's mess. The largest share. The allusion is to the banquet given by Joseph, viceroy of Egypt, to his brethren. "Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs" (Gen. xliii, 34).

Benjamin tree. A tree of the Styrax family that yields benzoin, of which the name is a corruption, and so used by Ben Jonson in Cynthia's Revels (V, ii), where the Perfumer says:—

Taste, smell; I assure you, sir, pure benjamin, the only spirited scent that ever awaked a Neapolitan nostril.

Benthos (ben' thos). This is a new word in English, coming directly from a Greek word meaning the sea-bottom. It is now applied particularly to the bottom of deep oceans and to the minute aquatic organisms that live down there.

Beowulf (bá' ò wulf). The hero of the ancient Anglo-Saxon epic poem of the same name, of unknown date and authorship, but certainly written before the coming of the Saxons to England, and modified subsequent to the introduction of Christianity.

The scene is laid in Denmark or Sweden: the hall (Heorot) of King Heor that is raided nightly by Grendel (q.v.), whom Beowulf mortally wounds after a fierce fight. Gren­del's dam comes next night to avenge his death. Beowulf pursues her to her lair under the water and ultimately slays her with a magic sword. Beowulf in time becomes king, and fifty years later meets his death in combat with a dragon, the guardian of an immense hoard, the faithful Wiglaf being his only follower at the end.

The epic as we know it dates from the 8th century, but it probably represents a gradual growth which existed in many successive versions. In any case, it is not only the oldest epic in English, but the oldest in the whole Teutonic group of languages.

Bereans. Followers of John Barclay, of Kin­cardineshire, who seceded from the Scottish Kirk in 1773. They believed that all we know of God is from revelation: that all the Psalms refer to Christ; that assurance is the proof of faith; and that unbelief is the unpardonable sin. They took their name from the Bereans, mentioned in Acts xvii, 11, who "received the Word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily."

Berecyntian Hero. Midas, the mythological king of Phrygia; so called from Mount Berecyntus, in Phrygia.

Berenice. The sister-wife of Ptolemy Euer­getes, king of Egypt (247-222 b.c.). She vowed to sacrifice her hair to the gods, if her husband returned home the vanquisher of Asia. She suspended her hair in the temple of Arsinoe at Zephyrium, but it was stolen the first night, and Conon of Samos told the king that the winds had wafted it to heaven, where it still forms the seven stars near the tail of Leo, called Coma Berenices. The story has been used as the subject of many great works, particularly Racine's tragedy and an opera by Handel.

Bergomask (ber' go mask). A rustic dance (see Midsummer Night's Dream, v. 1); so called from Bergamo, a Venetian province, the inhabitants of which were noted for their clownishness. Also, a clown.

Berkshire (bark' shér). From the A.S. Berroc­shyre, either from its abundance of berroc (box-trees), or the bare-oak-shire, from a poll'd oak common in Windsor Forest, where the Britons used to hold meetings.
Berlin. An old-fashioned four-wheeled carriage with a hooded seat behind. It was introduced into England by a German officer about 1670.

Berlin Decree. A decree issued at Berlin by Napoleon I in November, 1806, forbidding any of the nations of Europe to trade with Great Britain, proclaiming her to be in a state of blockade, declaring all British property forfeit, and all British subjects on French soil prisoners of war.

Bermoothes (bér mö ooth' éz). The name of the island in The Tempest, feigned by Shakespeare to be enchanted and inhabited by witches and devils.

From the still- vexed Bermoothes, there she's hid.

Shakespeare almost certainly had the recently discovered Bermudas in his mind.

Bermudas (bér mú' dáz). The Bermudas was an old name for a district of London—thought to have been the narrow alleys in the neighbourhood of Covent Garden, St. Martin's Lane, and the Strand—which was an Alsatia (q.v.), where the residents had certain privileges against arrest. Hence, to live in the Bermudas, to skulk in some out-of-the-way place for cheapness or safety.

Bernard, St. Abbot of the monastery of Clairvaux in the 12th century (1091-1153). His fame for wisdom was very great, and few Church matters were undertaken without his being consulted.

Bonus Bernardus non videt omnia. We are all apt to forget sometimes; events do not always turn out as they are planned beforehand.

Poor Peter was to win honours at Shrewsbury school, and carry them thick to Cambridge; and after that a living awaited him, the gift of his godfather, Sir Peter Arley; but Bonus Bernardus non videt omnia, and Poor Peter's lot in life was very different to what his friends had planned.—Mrs. GASKELL: Cranford, ch. vi.

Poor Bernard. Claude Bernard, of Dijon, philanthropist (1588-1641).

Bernardine. A monk of the Order of St. Bernard of Clairvaux; a Cistercian (q.v.).

Bernardo del Carpio. A semi-mythical Spanish hero of the 9th century, and a favourite subject of the minstrels, and of Lope de Vega who wrote many plays around his exploits. He is credited with having defeated Roland at Roncesvalles.

Bernesque Poetry. Serio-comic poetry; so called from Francesco Berni (1498-1535), of Tuscany, who greatly excelled in it. Byron's Beppo is a good example of English bernesque; and concerning it Byron wrote to John Murray, his publisher:

Whistlecraft is my immediate model, but Berni is the father of that kind of writing.

Berserker. In Scandinavian mythology, a wild, ferocious, warlike being who was at times possessed of supernatural strength and fury. The origin of the name is doubtful; one account says that it was that of the grandson of the eight-handed Starkader and the beautiful Alf hilde, who was called ber-serce (bare of mail) because he went into battle unarmoured. Hence, any man with the fighting fever on him.

Another disregards this altogether and holds that the name means simply "men who have assumed the form of bears." It is used in English both as an adjective denoting excessive fury and a noun denoting one possessed of such.

Berth. He has tumbled into a nice berth. A nice situation or fortune. The place in which a ship is anchored is called its berth, and the sailors call it a good or bad berth as they think it favourable or otherwise. The space also allotted to a seaman for his hammock is called his berth.

To give a wide berth. Not to come near a person; to keep a person at a distance; literally, to give a ship plenty of room to swing at anchor.

Bertha, Frau. A German impersonation of the Epiphany, corresponding to the Italian Befana (q.v.). She is a white lady, who steals softly into nurseries and rocks infants asleep, but is the terror of all naughty children. Her feet are very large, and she has an iron nose.

Berthe au Grand Pied (bert o gron pé a). Mother of Charlemagne, and great-granddaughter of Charles Martel; so called because she had a club-foot. She died at an advanced age in 783.

Bertram, Count of Rousillon, beloved by Helena, the hero of Shakespeare's All's Well that Ends Well.

I cannot reconcile my heart to Bertram, a man noble without generosity, and young without truth; who marries Helena as a coward, and leaves her as a profligate.—Dr. JOHNSON.

Besail. A word formerly used in England for a great-grandfather; it is the French bisaitul.

Writ of besail. An old legal term meaning:

A writ that lies for the heir, where his great grandfather was seized the day that he died, or died seized of Land in fee-simple, and a stranger enters the day of the death of the great grandfather, or abates after his death, the heir shall have writ against such a disseisor or abator.—Termes de la Ley (1641).

Besant. See BEZANT.

Beside the Cushion. An odd phrase first used by Judge Jeffreys in the sense of "beside the question," "not to the point." Any cogent point raised by some wretch in his own defence was ruthlessly swept away as "beside the cushion."
Besom. To hang out the besom. To have a fling when your wife is gone on a visit. To be a quasi bachelor once more. Cp. the French colloquialism, rébir le balai.

Literally, "to roast the besom") which means "to live a fast life" or "to go on the razzle-dazzle."

Jumping the besom. Omitting the marriage service after the publication of banns, and living together as man and wife.

In Lowland Scots, besom is a contemptuous name applied to a prostitute or woman of low character, but it is by no means certain that the word is connected with either of the above usages.

Bess, Good Queen. Queen Elizabeth (1533-1603).

Bes o' Bedlam. A female lunatic vagrant. See Bedlam.

Bess of Hardwick. Elizabeth Talbot, Countess of Shrewsbury (1518-1608), to whose charge, in 1569, Mary Queen of Scots was committed. The countess treated the captive queen with great harshness, being jealous of the Earl of Shrewsbury (1518-1608), to whose wife she was only related. She married four times: Roben Barlow (when she was 15); the Earl of Shrewsbury; Sir William Cavendish; and lastly, George, sixth Earl of Shrewsbury. She built Hardwick Hall, and founded the wealth and dignity of the Cavendish family.

Bessie Bell and Mary Gray. A ballad relating how two young women of Perth, to avoid the plague of 1666, retired to a rural retreat called the Burnbraes, near Lyndock, the residence of Mary Gray. A young man, in love with both, carried them provisions, and they all died of the plague and were buried at Dornock Hough.

Bessie with the braid apron. See Belted Will.

Besse of Bednall Green. See Beggar's Daughter.

Bessemour Process. The conversion of cast iron to steel by oxidizing the carbon by passing currents of air through the molten metal, patented by Sir Henry Bessemer in 1856.

Best. At best or At the very best. Looking at the matter in the most favourable light. Making every allowance.

Man is a short-sighted creature at best.—DEFOE. Colonel Jack.

At one's best. At the highest or best point attainable by the person referred to.

For the best. With the best of motives; with the view of obtaining the best results.

I must make the best of my way home. It is getting late and I must use my utmost diligence to get home as soon as possible.

To best somebody. To get the better of him; to outwit him and so have the advantage.

To have the best of it, or, To have the best of the bargain. To have the advantage or best of a transaction.

To make the best of the matter. To submit to ill-luck with the best grace in your power. See also Better.
either), and the joining of hands in the presence of witnesses. In France all this had to be done in the presence of the parish priest. It was also usual for the parties to break a coin and each keep a portion. This ceremony was binding, though the engagement could be broken by mutual consent. The Church, however, reserved to itself the right to communicate either party who, without cause or agreement with the other, broke it off. In England the Civil Law came down in the same sense when, in 1735, an Act was passed enabling an aggrieved party to bring an action at common law for breach of promise.

Betrothed, The. Curiously enough, this title was chosen independently of one another by two great writers who published historical novels in the same year, 1825. Sir Walter Scott's Betrothed is a tale of the Crusaders and Wales; Manzoni's Betrothed (I Promessi Sposi) is about Milan in the 17th century.

My better half. A jocose way of saying my wife. As the twain are one, each is half. Horace calls his friend anima dimidium meae (Odes I, iii, 8).

To be better than his word. To do more than he promised.

To think better of the matter. To give it further consideration; to form a more correct opinion respecting it.

Bettina. The name taken by Elizabeth Brentano, Countess von Arnim (1785-1859), in her publication, Letters to a Child, in 1835. The letters purported to be her correspondence with Goethe (1807-11), but they are largely spurious.

Betubium (be-tu'bi-em). The old poetic name for the Cape of St. Andrew, Scotland. The north-inflated tempest foams O'er Orka's and Betubium's highest peak. THOMSON: Autumn.

Between. Between hay and grass. Neither one thing nor yet another; a hobbledchoy, neither a man nor yet a boy.

Between cup and lip. See Slip.

Between Scylla and Charybdis. See Charyb-Nisis.

Between two fires. Between two dangers. Troops caught between fire from opposite sides.

Between two stools you fall to the ground. The allusion is to a practical joke played at sea, in which two stools are set side by side, and it is arranged that the victim shall unexpectedly fall between them. Compare:—

Like a man to double business bound,
I stand in pause where I shall first begin,
And both neglect.

SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, ii, 3.

He who hunts two hares leaves one and loses the other.

Between you and me. In confidence be it spoken. Sometimes, Between you and me and the gatepost (or bed-post). These phrases, for the most part, indicate that some ill-natured remark or slander is about to be made of a third person, but occasionally they refer to some offer or private affair. Between ourselves is another form of the same phrase.

Betwixt. Betwixt and between. Neither one nor the other, but somewhere between the two. Thus, grey is neither white nor black, but betwixt and between the two.

Betwixt wind and water. A nautical phrase denoting that part of the hull that is below the water-line except when the ship heels over under pressure of the wind. It was a most dangerous place for a man-of-war to be shot in; hence a “knock-out” blow is often said to have caught the victim betwixt wind and water.

Beulah. See Land of Beulah.

Bever (be’ver). A “snack” or light repast (originally a drink) between meals; through O.Fr. beuvre (Mod. Fr. boire) from Lat. bibere, to drink—beverage has the same ancestry. At Eton they used to have “Bever days,” when extra beer and bread were served during the afternoon in the College Hall to scholars, and any friends whom they might bring in.

He is none of these same ordinary eaters, that will devour three breakfasts, and as many dinners without any prejudice to their bevers, drinkings, or suppers.

BEAUMONT and FLETCHER: Woman Hater, i, 3.

Chapman, in the Odyssey, however, uses the word for “supper”—

“...so chance it, friend,” replied Telemachus, “Your bever taken, go. In first of day Come and bring sacrifice the best you may.”

Bk. xvii, 794.

Bevin Boys. Under the Emergency Powers Defence Bill, of 1940, certain lads were directed to work in coal mines. Ernest Bevin (1881-1951) was Minister of Labour and National Service, and his name was popularly attached to the boys thus directed.

Bevis (be’vis). Marmion’s horse. See Horse.

Sir Bevis of Hamtown. A medieval chivalric romance, slightly connected with the Charlemagne cycle, which (in the English version) tells how the father of Bevis was slain by the mother, and how, on Bevis trying to avenge the murder, she sold him into slavery to Eastern merchants. After many adventures he converts and carries off Josian, daughter of the Soldan, returns to England, gets his revenge, and all ends happily. “Hamtown” is generally taken as meaning “Southampton,” but it is really a corruption of Antona, for in the original Italian version the hero is called “Beuves d’Antone,” which, in the French, became “Beuves d’Hantone.” Drayton tells the story in his Polyolbion, Song ii, lines 260-384.

Beveriskius (be-vor’is’ki-us), whose Commentary on the Generations of Adam is referred to by Sterne in the Sentimental Journey, was Johan van Beverwyck (1594-1647), a Dutch medical writer and author of a large number of books.
Bey. —A throng or company of ladies, roebucks, quails, or larks. The word is the Italian beva, a drink, but it is not known how it acquired its present meaning. It may be because timid, gregarious animals, in self-defence, go down to a river to drink in companies.

And upon her deck what a bevy of human flowers—young women, how lovely!—young men, how noble.—De Quincey: Dream-Fugue.

Bey. —A Turkish word for the governor of a town or province; also a title conferred by the Sultan, and a courtesy title given to the sons of Pashas. See Pasha; Begum; and ep. bey.

Bezaliel (be zá'ı el). In Dryden’s Abraham and Achitophel is meant for Henry Somerset, 3rd Marquis of Worcester and 1st Duke of Beaufort (1629-1700). He was an adherent of Charles II.

Bezaliel with each grace and virtue fraught,
Serene his looks, serene his life and thought:
On whom so largely Nature heaped her store.
There scarce remained for arts to give him more.

Pt. ii, 947.

Bezant (be zánt) (from Byzantium, the old name of Constantinople). A gold coin of greatly varying value struck at Constantinople by the Byzantine Emperors. It was current in England till the time of Edward III. In heraldry, the name is given to a plain gold roundel borne as a charge, and supposed to indicate that the bearer had been a Crusader.

Bezoor (bě zór). A stone from the stomach or gall-bladder of an animal, set as a jewel and believed to be an antidote against poison.

Bezonian (be zō' ni an). A new recruit: applied originally in derision to young soldiers sent from Spain to Italy, who landed both ill-equipped and in want of everything (Ital. bezogni, from bisogni, need; Fr. besoin).

“Under which king, bezonian? Speak or die” (2 Hen. IV, v. 3). Choose your leader or take the consequences, Great men off die by sile bezonian.

Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI, iv, 1.

Bianchi (bé áng' ki). The political faction in Tuscany to which Dante belonged. It and the Neri, both being branches of the Guelph family, engaged in a feud shortly before 1300 which became very violent in Florence and the neighbouring cities, and eventually the Bianchi joined the Ghibellines, the opponents of the Guelphs. In 1301 the Bianchi, including Dante, were exiled from Florence.

Bias (bı'as). The weight in bowls which makes them deviate from the straight line; hence any favourite idea or pursuit, or whatever predisposes the mind in a particular direction.

Bowls are not now loaded, but the bias depends on the shape of the bowls. They are flattened on one side, and therefore roll obliquely.

Your stomach makes your fabric roll
Just as the bias rules the bowl.

Prior: Alma, iii.

Bib. —Best bib and tucker. See Tucker.

Biberius Caldius Mero. —The punning nickname of Tiberius Claudius Nero (the Roman Emperor, Tiberius, who reigned from A.D. 14 to 37). Biberius (Tiberius) drink-loving, Caldius Mero (Claudius Nero), by metathesis for caldius mero, hot with wine.

Bible, The English. —The principal versions of the English Bible in chronological order are:

Wyclif’s Bible. —The name given to two translations of the Vulgate, one completed in 1380 and the other a few years later, in neither of which was Wyclif concerned as a translator. Nicholas of Hereford made the first version as far as Baruch ii, 20; who was responsible for the remainder is unknown. The second version has been ascribed to John Purvey, a follower of Wyclif. The Bible of 1380 was the first complete version in English; as a whole it remained unprintetl until 1850, when the monumental edition of the two versions by Forshall and Madden appeared, but in 1810 an edition of the New Testament was published by H. H. Baber, an assistant librarian at the British Museum.

Tyndale’s Bible. —This consists of the New Testament (printed at Cologne, 1523), the Pentateuch (Marburg, Hesse, 1530 or 1531), Josa, Old Testament lessons appointed to be read in place of the Epistles, and a MS. translation of the Old Testament to the end of Chronicles which was afterwards used in Matthew’s Bible (q.v.). His revisions of the Old Testament were issued in 1534 and 1535. Tyndale’s principal authority was Erasmus’s edition of the Greek Testament, but he also used Erasmus’s Latin translation of the same, the Vulgate, and Luther’s German version. Tyndale’s version fixed the style and tone of the English Bible, and subsequent Protestant versions of the books on which he worked should—with one or two minor exceptions—be looked upon as revisions of his, and not as independent translations.

Coverdale’s Bible. —The first complete English Bible to be printed, published in 1535 as a translation out of Douche (i.e. German) and Latin by Myles Coverdale. It consists of Tyndale’s translation of the Pentateuch and New Testament, with translations from the Vulgate, a Latin version (1527-8) by the Italian Catholic theologian, Sanctus PEGINUS, Luther’s German version (1534) and the Swiss-German version of Zwinglei and Leo Juda (Zurich, 1527-9). The first edition was printed at Antwerp, but the second (Southwark, 1537) was the first Bible printed in England. Matthew’s Bible ( q.v. ) is largely based on Coverdale’s. See Bug Bible below.

Matthew’s Bible. —A pronouncedly Protestant version published in 1537 as having been “truly and purely translated into English by Thomas Matthew,” which was a pseudonym, adopted for purposes of safety, of John Rogers, an assistant of Tyndale. It was probably printed at Antwerp, and the text is made up of the Pentateuch from Tyndale’s version together with his hitherto unprinted translation of Joshua to 2 Chronicles inclusive and his revised edition of the New Testament, with Coverdale’s version of the Old Testament and the Apocrypha. It was quickly superseded by the Great Bible ( q.v. ), but it is of importance as it formed the starting-point for the revisions which culminated in the Authorized Version. See BUG BIBLE below.

The Great Bible. Coverdale's revision of his own Bible of 1535 (see COVERDALE'S BIBLE above), collated with Tyndale's and Matthew's, printed in Paris by Regnault, and published by Grafton and Whitchurch in 1539. It is a large folio, and a splendid specimen of typography. It is sometimes called "Cromwell's Bible," as it was undertaken at his direction, and it was made compulsory for all parish churches to purchase a copy. The Prayer Book version of the Psalms comes from the November, 1540, edition of the Great Bible. See also CRANMER'S BIBLE.

Cranmer's Bible. The name given to the Great Bible (q.v.) of 1540. It, and later issues, contained a prologue by Cranmer, and on the wood-cut title-page (by Holbein) Henry VIII is shown seated while Cranmer and Cromwell distribute copies to the people.

The Bishops' Bible. A version made at the instigation of Archbishop Parker (hence also called "Matthew Parker's Bible"), to which most of the Anglican bishops were contributors. It was a revision of the Great Bible (q.v.), first appeared in 1568, and by 1602 had reached its eighteenth edition. It is this edition that forms the basis of our Authorized Version. See TRIACLE BIBLE below.

The Geneva Bible. A revision of great importance in the history of the English Bible, undertaken by English exiles at Geneva during the Marian persecutions and first published in 1560. It was the work of William Whittingham, assisted by Anthony Gilby and Thomas Sampson. Whittingham had previously (1557) published a translation of the New Testament. The Geneva version was the first English Bible to be printed in roman type instead of black letter, the first in which the chapters are divided into verses (taken from Robert Stephen's Greek-Latin Testament of 1537), and the first in which italics are used for explanatory and connective words and phrases (taken from Bero's New Testament of 1556). It was immensely popular; from 1560 to 1616 no year passed without a new edition, and at least two hundred are known. In every edition the word "breeches" occurs in Gen. iii, 7; hence the Geneva Bible is popularly known as the "Breeches Bible" (q.v.). See GOOSE BIBLE, PLAC-MAKERS' BIBLE, below.

The Authorized Version. This, the version in general use in England, was made by a body of scholars working at the command of King James I (hence sometimes called "King James's Bible") from 1604 to 1611, and was published in 1611. The modern "Authorized Version" is, however, by no means an exact reprint of that authorized by King James; a large number of typographical errors which occurred in the first edition have been corrected, the orthography, punctuation, etc., has been modernized, and the use of italics, capital letters, etc., varied. The Bishops' Bible (q.v.) was used as the basis of the text, but Tyndale's, Matthew's, Coverdale's, and the Geneva translations were also followed when they agreed better with the original.

The Revised Version. A revision of the Authorized Version commenced under a resolution passed by both Houses of Convocation in 1870 by a body of twenty-five English scholars (assisted and advised by an American Committee), the New Testament published in 1881, the complete Bible in 1885, and the Apocrypha in 1895.

Rheims-Douai Version. See DOUAi BIBLE below.

Taverner's Bible. An independent translation by a Greek scholar, Richard Taverner, printed in 1539 (the same year as the first Great Bible) by T. Petit for T. Berthelet. It had no influence on the Authorized Version, but is remarkable for its vigorous, idiomatic English, and for being the first English Bible to include a third Book of Maccabees in the Apocrypha.

The Douai Bible (dou'ä). A translation of the Vulgate, made by English Catholic scholars in France for the use of English boys designed for the Catholic priesthood. The New Testament was published at Rheims in 1582, and the Old Testament at Douai in 1609; hence sometimes called the Rheims-Douai version. See ROSE BIBLE.

King James's Bible. The Authorized Version (q.v.).

Matthew Parker's Bible. The Bishops' Bible (q.v.).

There have been several versions of the scriptures in modern English, of which the following are noteworthy:

A new translation of the Bible by James Moffat (N.T., 1913; O.T., 1924).

A new translation from the Vulgate by R. A. Knox, 1944.

SPecIALLY NAMED EDITIONS OF THE BIBLE. The following Bibles are named either from typographical errors or archaic words that they contain, or from some special circumstance in connexion with them:---

Adulterous Bible. The "Wicked Bible" (q.v.).

Affinity Bible, of 1923, which contains a table of affinity with the error: "A man may not marry his grandmother's wife."

The Bear Bible. The Spanish Protestant version printed at Basle in 1569; so called because the woodcut device on the title-page is a bear.

Bedell's Bible. A translation of the Authorized Version into Irish carried out under the direction of Bedell (d. 1642), Bishop of Kilmore and Ardagh.

The Breeches Bible. The Genevan Bible (see above) was popularly so called because in it
The Hebrew in 1553 for the use of the Genevan Bible, but not in any other version, though it is given in the then unprinted Wyclif MS. ("ya swiden ye levis of a figge tre and madin brechis"), and also in the translation of the Pentateuch given in Caxton's edition of Voragine's Golden Legend (1483).

The Brother's Bible. The "Kralitz Bible"
(q.v.).

The Bug Bible. Coverdale's Bible (q.v.), of 1535, is so called because Ps. xci, 5, is translated, "Thou shalt not need to be arrayed for thy bugges by night." The same reading occurs in Matthew's Bible (q.v.) and its reprints; the Authorized and Revised Versions both read "terror."

Camels Bible. of 1823. Genesis xxviii, 61 reads "And Rebekah arose, and her camels" for "camels."

Complutensian Polyglot. The great edition, in six folio volumes, containing the Hebrew and Greek texts. the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and the Chaldee paraphrase of the Pentateuch with a Latin translation, together with Greek and Hebrew grammars and a Hebrew Dictionary, prepared and printed at the expense of Cardinal Ximenes, and published at Alcala the ancient Complutum) near Madrid, 1513-17.

The Denial Bible was printed in Oxford in 1792. In Luke xxi, 34 the name Philip is substituted for Peter as the apostle who should deny Jesus.

The Discharge Bible. An edition printed in 1806 containing discharge for charge in 1 Tim.
v, 21: "I discharge thee before God, . . . that they observe these things."

The Fars to Ear Bible. An edition of 1810, in which Matt. xiii, 43, reads: "Who hath got to ear, let him hear."

The Ferrara Bible. The first Spanish edition of the Old Testament, translated from the Hebrew in 1553 for the use of the Spanish Jews. A second edition was published in the same year for Christians.

The Fool Bible. During the reign of Charles
I an edition of the Bible was printed in which the text of Psalm lxxiv, 1 reads "The fool hath said in his heart there is a God." For this mistake the printers were fined £3,000 and all copies were suppressed.

Forgotten Sins Bible, of 1638. Luke vii, 47 reads "Her sins which are many are forgotten."

The Forty-two Line Bible. The "Mazarin
Bible" (q.v.)

The Goose Bible. The editions of the Genevan Bible (q.v.) printed at Dort; the Dort press had a goose as its device.

The Gutenberg Bible. The "Mazarin
Bible" (q.v.)

The He Bible. In the two earliest editions of the Authorized Version (both 1611) in the first known as "the He Bible") Ruth iii, 15, reads: "and he went into the city"; the other (known as "the She Bible") has the variant "she." "He" is the correct translation of the Hebrew, but nearly all modern editions—with the exception of the Revised Version—perpetuate the confusion and print
"she."

The Idle Bible. An edition of 1809, in which "the idole shepherd" (Zech. xi, 17) is printed "the idle shepherd." In the Revised Version the translation is "the worthless shepherd."

Incunabula Bible. The date on the title-page reads 1495 instead of 1594.

Indian Bible. The first complete Bible printed in America, being translated into the dialect of the Indians of Massachusetts by John Eliot, and published by Samuel Green and Marmaduke Johnson (with the king's permission) in 1663.

Judas Bible of 1611. Matt. xxvi, 36 reads
"Judas" instead of "Jesus."

The Kralitz Bible. The Bible published by the United Brethren of Moravia (hence known also as the Brother's Bible) at Kralitz, 1579-93.

The "Large Family" Bible. An Oxford edition of 1820 prints Isaiah lxvi, 9 "Shall I bring to the birth and not cease [instead of cause] to bring forth."

The Leda Bible. The third edition (second folio) of the Bishops' Bible (q.v.), published in 1572, and so called because the decoration to the initial at the Epistle to the Hebrews is a startling and incongruous woodcut of Jupiter visiting Leda in the guise of a swan. This, and several other decorations in the New Testament of this edition, were from an dition of Ovid's Metamorphoses; they created such a storm of protest that they were never afterwards used.

The Leopolita Bible. A Polish translation of the Vulgate by John of Lemberg (anc., Leopold) published in 1561 at Cracow.

The Lions Bible. A Bible issued in 1804 contains a great number of printers' errors of which the following are typical: Numbers xxviii, 18, "The murderer shall surely be put together" instead of "to death"; 1 Kings viii, 19, "but thy son that shall come forth out of thy lions" instead of "of lions"; Galatians v, 17, "For the flesh lusteth after the Spirit" instead of "against the Spirit."

The Mazarin Bible. The first printed Bible
(an edition of the Vulgate), and the first known book to be printed from movable type. It contains no date, but was printed probably in 1455, and was certainly on sale by the middle of 1456. It was printed at Mainz, probably by Fust and Schoeffer, but as it was for long credited to Gutenberg—and it is not yet agreed that he was not responsible—it is frequently called the Gutenberg Bible. By bibliographers it is usually known as the Fifty-two Line Bible (it having 42 lines to the page), to differentiate it from the Bamberg Bible of 36 lines. Its popular name is due to the fact that the copy discovered in the Mazarin Library, Paris, in 1760, was the first to be known and described. A copy of Vol. I in unusually fine state and contemporary binding fetched a record price of £21,000 at auction in London, in 1947.

"More Sea" Bible, of 1641. Rev. xxi, 1 reads "...and there was more sea" instead of "...no more sea."

The Murderers' Bible. An edition of 1801 in which the misprint murderers for murderers makes Jude, 16, read: "...These are murderers, complainers, walking after their own lusts, etc."

The Old Cracow Bible. The "Leopolitia Bible" (q.v.).

The Ostrog Bible. The first complete Slavonic edition; printed at Ostrog, Volhyna, Russia, in 1581.

Pfister's Bible. The "Thirty-six Line Bible" (q.v.).

The Place-makers' Bible. The second edition of the Geneva Bible (q.v.), 1562; so called from a printer's error in Matt. v, 9, "Blessed are the placemakers [peacemakers], for they shall be called the children of God." It has also been called the "Whig Bible."

The Printers' Bible. An edition of about 1702 which makes David pathetically complain that "printers [princes] have persecuted me without a cause." (Ps. cxix, 161).

The Proof Bible (Probe-Bibel). The revised version of the first impression of Luther's German Bible. A final revised edition appeared in 1892.

The Rosin Bible. The Douai Bible (q.v.), 1609, is sometimes so called, because it has in Jer. viii, 22: "...Is there noe rosin in Galaad?" The Authorized Version translates the word by "balm," but gives "rosin" in the margin as an alternative. Cp. TREALCE BIBLE below.

Sacy's Bible. A French translation, so called from Louis Isaac le Maistre de Sacy, director of Port Royal, 1650-79. He was imprisoned for three years in the Bastille for his Jansenist opinions, and there translated the Bible, 1667, completing it a few years later, after his release.

Schelhorn's Bible. A name sometimes given to the "Thirty-six Line Bible" (q.v.).

The September Bible. Luther's German translation of the New Testament, published anonymously at Wittenberg in September, 1522.

The She Bible. See She Bible.

"Sin on" Bible. The first Bible printed in Ireland was dated 1716. John v, 14 reads "sin on more" instead of "sin no more." The mistake was not found out until the impression of 8,000 copies had been printed and bound.

The Standing Fishes Bible. An edition of 1806 in which Ezek. xlvii, 10, reads: "...And it shall come to pass that the fishes [instead of fishers] shall stand upon it, etc."

Sting Bible, of 1746. Mark vii, 35 reads "the sting of his tongue" instead of "string."

The Thirty-six Line Bible. A Latin Bible of 36 lines to the column, probably printed by A. Pfister at Bamberg in 1640. It is also known as the Bamberg, and Pfister's, Bible, and sometimes as Schelhorn's, as it was first described by the German bibliographer J. G. Schelhorn, in 1760.

The To-remain Bible. In a Bible printed at Cambridge in 1805 Gal. iv, 29, reads: "...Persecuted him that was born after the spirit to remain, even so it is now." The words "to remain" were added in error by the com­positor, the editor having answered a proof-reader's query as to the comma after "spirit" with the penciled reply "to remain" in the margin. The mistake was repeated in the first 8vo edition published by the Bible Society (1805), and again in their 12mo edition dated 1819.

The Treacle Bible. A popular name for the Bishops' Bible (q.v.), 1568, because in it, Jer. viii, 22, reads: "...Is there no tryacle in Gilead, is there no phisition there?" Cp. Rosin BIBLE above. In the same Bible "tryacle" is also given for "balm" in Jer. xi, 11, and Ezek. xxvii, 17. Coverdale's Bible (1535) also uses the word "tryacle." See TREALCE.

The Unrighteous Bible. An edition printed at Cambridge in 1653, containing the printer's error, "Know ye not that the unrighteous shall inherit [for shall not inherit] the Kingdom of God?" (1 Cor. vi, 9). The same edition gave Rom. vi, 13, as: "Neither yield ye your members as instruments of righteousness unto sin," in place of "unrighteousness." This is also sometimes known as the "Wicked Bible."

The Vinegar Bible. An edition printed at Oxford in 1717 in which the chapter heading to Luke xx is given as "The parable of the Vinegar" (instead of "Vineyard").

The Whig Bible. Another name for the "Place-makers' Bible" (q.v.).

The Wicked Bible. So called because the word not is omitted in the seventh commandment, making it: "Thou shalt commit adultery." Printed at London by Barker and Lucas, 1632. The "Unrighteous Bible" (q.v.) is also sometimes called by this name.

The Wife-hater Bible. * An 1810 edition of the Bible gives Luke xiv, 26 as: "If any man come to me, and hate not his father and mother, yea, and his own wife also" instead of "life."

Wuyck's Bible. The Polish Bible authorized by the Roman Catholics and printed at Cracow in 1599. The translation was made by the Jesuit, Jacob Wuyck.

The Zurich Bible. A German version of 1530 composed of Luther's translation of the New Testament and portions of the Old, with the remainder and the Apocrypha by other translators.

Statistics of the Bible. The following statistics are those given in the Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Bible, by Thos. Hartwell Horne, D.D., first published in 1818. They apply to the English Authorized Version.
Bidding-prayer

Shortest chapter

Psalm cxvii. |

Longest chapter

Psalm cxviii. |

 Ezra vii. 21. contains all the letters of the alphabet except j.

2 Kings xix. and Isaiah xxxvii. are exactly alike.

The last two verses of 2 Chron. and the opening verses of Ezra are alike.

Ezra ii. and Nehemiah vii. are alike.

The word he occurs in the O.T. 35,543 times, and in the N.T. 10,684 times.

The word Jehovah occurs 6,855 times, and Lord 1,555 times.

About 30 books are mentioned in the Bible, but not included in the canon.

Bible-Christians. An evangelical sect founded in 1815 by William O'Bryan, a Wesleyan, of Cornwall; also called Bryanites.

Bible-Clerk. A sizar of certain colleges at Oxford who formerly got advantages for reading the Bible at chapel.

Biblia Pauperum (the poor man's Bible). A picture-book widely used by the illiterate in the Middle Ages in place of the Bible. It was designed to illustrate the leading events in the salvation of man, and later MSS. as a rule had a Latin inscription to each picture. These biblia were among the earliest books to be printed, and they remained popular long after the invention of movable type. See Mirror of Human Salvation.

Biblicania. A love of books pursued to the point of unreason or madness. There is a legend that Don Vicente, a Spanish scholar, committed murder to obtain possession of what he thought was a unique book.

Bibliophilia is a devotion to books and the collecting of them, that stops short of bibliomania.

Bibusus (bī'ū lūs). Colleague of Julius Cæsar, a mere cipher in office, whence his name has become proverbial for one in office who is a mere fainéant.

Bickerstaff, Isaac. A name assumed by Dean Swift in a satirical pamphlet against Partridge, the almanack-maker. This produced a paper war so diverting that Steele issued the Tatler under the editorial name of "Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq., Astrologer" (1709). Later there was an actual Isaac Bickerstaff, a playwright, born in Ireland in 1735.

Bicorn (bī' körn). A mythical beast, fabled by the early French romancers to grow very fat and well-favoured through living on good and enduring husbands. It was the antitype to Chichevache (q.v.).

Chichevache (or lean cow) was said to live on good women; and a world of sarcasm was conveyed in always representing Chichevache as very poor,—all ribs, in fact,—her food being seen as to keep her in a wretched state of famine. Bycorne, on the contrary, was a monster who lived on good men: and he was always bursting with fatness, like a prize pig.—Sidney Lanier: Shakespeare and his Fore-runners, ch. vi.

Bi-corn (two-horns) contains an allusion to the horned cuckold.

Bid. The modern verb, "to bid," may be from either of the two Anglo-Saxon verbs, (1) bædan, meaning to stretch out, offer, present, and hence to inform, proclaim, command, or (2) biddan, meaning to importune, beg, pray, and hence also, command. The two words have now become very confused, but the four following examples are from (1), bædan:—

To bid fair. To seem likely; as "He bids fair to do well"; "It bids fair to be a fine day."

To bid for (votes). To promise to support in Parliament certain measures, in order to obtain votes.

To bid against one. To offer or promise a higher price for an article at auction.

I bid him defiance. I offer him defiance; I defy him.

The examples next given are derived from (2), biddan:—

I bid you good night. I wish you good night, or I pray that you may have a good night. "Bid him welcome."

Neither bid him God speed.—2 John 10, 11.

To bid one's beads. To tell off one's prayers by beads. See Beads.

To bid the (marriage) banns. To ask if anyone objects to the marriage of the persons named. "Si quis" (q.v.).

To bid to the wedding. In the New Testament is to ask to the wedding feast.

Bid-ale. An entertainment at which drinking formed the excuse for collecting people together so that they could subscribe money for the benefit of some poor man or other charity. Bid-ales frequently developed into orgies.

There was an antient custom called a Bidale or Bid-ale ... when any honest man decayed in the West of England, and in some counties called a Help-ale. Brand's Popular Antiquities (1777).

Bidding-prayer (A.S. biddan; see Bid). This term, now commonly applied to a prayer for the souls of benefactors said before the sermon, is due to its having been forgotten after the Reformation that when the priest was telling the congregation who or what to remember in "bidding their prayers" he was using the verb in its old sense of "pray," i.e. "praying their prayers." Hence, in Elizabeth's time the "bidding of prayers" came to signify
"the directing" or "enjoying" of prayers;
and hence the modern meaning.

Biddy (i.e. Bridget). A generic name for an Irish servant-maid, as Mike is for an Irish labourer. These generic names were once very common: for example, Tom Tug, a waterman; Jack Pudding, a buffoon: Cousin
Jonathan, a citizen of the United States;
Cousin Michel, a German; John Bull, an Englishman: Colin Tompon, a Swiss; Nie
Frog, a Dutchman; Mossoo, a Frenchman;
John Chiman, and many others.

In Arbuthnot's John Bull Nic Frog is certainly a Dutchman: and Frogs are called "Dutch Nightingales." As the French have the reputation of feeding on frogs the word has been transferred to them, but, properly, Nic
Frog is a Dutchman.

Red Biddy is a highly intoxicating concocion with a basis of cheap port. It is popular among certain elderly women in the East End of London.

Bideford Postman. Edward Capern (1819-94), the poet, so called from his former occupation and abode.

Bifrost (ice. bifa, tremble, rost, path). In Scandinavian mythology, the bridge between heaven and earth, Asgard and Midgard:
the rainbow may be considered to be this bridge, and its various colours are the reflections of its precious stones.
The keeper of the bridge is Heimdall (q.v.).

Big. To look big. To assume a consequential air.

To look as big as bull beef. To look stout and hearty, as if fed on bull beef. Bull beef was formerly recommended for making men strong and muscular.

To talk big. To boast or brag.

Big Ben. The name given to the large bell in the Clock Tower (or St. Stephen's Tower) at the Houses of Parliament. It weighs 13½ tons, and is named after Sir Benjamin Hall, Chief Commissioner of Works in 1856, when it was cast.

Big Bertha. A gun of large calibre used by the Germans to shell Paris from a range of 75 miles, during the 1914-18 War. It was so named by the French in allusion to Frau Bertha Krupp, of armament fame. -—Congreve:
The Two Microscopists, iv, 6.

Bilboes. A bar of iron with fetters annexed unto it, by which mutinous sailors or prisoners were linked together. The word is probably derived, as the preceding, from Bilbao, in Spain, where they may have been first made.
Some of the bilboes taken from the Spanish
Armada are still kept in the Tower of London.

Now a man that is marry'd, has as it were, d'ye see, his feet in the bilboes, and mayhap mayn't get 'em out again when he would.—Congreve: Love for Love, iii, 6.

Bile. It rouses my bile. It makes me angry or indignant. In Latin, biliosus (a bilious man) meant a choleric one. According to the ancient theory, bile is one of the humours of the body, black bile is indicative of melancholy, and when excited abnormally bile was supposed to produce choler or rage.

Bilge-water. Stale dregs; bad beer; any worthless or sickly sentimental stuff.

Big Gooseberry Season, The. The "silly season," the dead season, when newspapers are glad of any subject to fill their columns; monster gooseberries will do for such a purpose.

Big House, an American slang term for prison.

Big-wig. A person in authority, a "nob." Of course, the term arises from the custom of judges, bishops, and so on, wearing large wigs.
Bishops no longer wear them.

Bigamy (big' a mi). Though many plots and stories have been worked up on the theme of supposed bigamous marriages, the Law is very plain and outspoken on the matter. If a spouse has not been heard of for seven years or more before a second marriage, the prosecution has to prove that the prisoner had good cause to believe that the real spouse was alive;
if he or she is able to convince the Court that there was every reason to believe the missing spouse dead, even though seven years had not elapsed since the last communication, the prisoner is entitled to a verdict of Not Guilty.
The maximum punishment is seven years' penal servitude.

Bigaroon (big' a roon'). A white-heart cherry.
(Fr. bigarreau, variegated; Lat. bis varelius, double-varied, red and white mixed.)

Bight (bit). To hook the bight—i.e. to get entangled. A nautical phrase; the bight is the bend or doubled part of a rope, and when the fluke of one anchor gets into the "bight" of another's cable it is "hooked."

Bilbo. (bil' bê). A rapier or sword. So called from Bilbao, in Spain, once famous for its finely tempered blades. Falstaff says to Ford:

I suffered the pangs of three several deaths; first, an intolerable fright, to be detected . . . next, to be compassed, like a good bilbo . . . hilt to point, heel to head; and then . . . —Merry Wives, iii, 5.

Bigamy.
Bill. Originally a word used in cribbage, meaning to spoil your adversary's score, to balk him: perhaps the two words are mere variants. The usual meaning now is to cheat, to obtain goods and decamp without paying for them; especially to give a cabin man less than his fare, and, when remonstrated with, give a false name and address.

Bill. The nose, also called the beak. Hence, "Billy" is slang for a pocket-handkerchief. Lastly came Winter, clothed all in frize, Chattering his teeth for cold that did him chill; Whilst on his hoary beard his breath did freeze; And the dull drops that from his purpled bill, As from a limbeck did adown distill. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, VII, vii, 31.)

Bill. A. The draft of an Act of Parliament. When a Bill is passed and has received the royal sanction it becomes an Act. A public bill is the draft of an Act affecting the general public. A private bill is the draft of an Act for the granting of something to a company, corporation, or certain individuals.

A true bill. Under the old judicial system before a case went to the criminal Assizes it was examined by the Grand Jury whose duty it was to decide whether or not there was sufficient evidence to justify a trial. If they decided that there was they were said "to find a true bill”; if, on the other hand, they decided there was not sufficient evidence they were said "to no bill." Hence to find a true bill is a colloquial way of saying that after proper examination one can assert that such and such a thing is true.

Bill of Attainder. A legislative Act, introduced and passed exactly like any other Bill, declaring a person or persons attainted. It was originally used only against offenders who fled from justice, but was soon perverted to the destruction of political opponents, etc. The last Bill of Attainder in England was that passed in 1697 for the attainting and execution of Sir John Fenwick for participation in the Assassination plot.

Bill of exchange. An order transferring a named sum of money at a given date from the debtor ("drawee") to the creditor ("drawer"). The drawee having signed the bill becomes the "acceptor," and the document is then negotiable in commercial circles just as is money itself. We discovered, many of us for the first time, that the machinery of commerce was moved by bills of exchange. I have some of them—wretched, crinkled, scrawled over, blotched, frowsy—and yet these wretched little scraps of paper moved great ships laden with thousands of tons of precious cargo, from one end of the world to the other. What was the motive power behind them? The honour of commercial men.—Lloyd George: Speech to London Welshmen, Sept. 19th, 1914.

Bill of fare. A list of the dishes provided, or which may be ordered, at a restaurant, etc.; a menu.

Bill of health. A document, duly signed by the proper authorities, to certify that when the ship set sail no infectious disorder existed in the place. This is a clean bill of health, and the term is frequently used figuratively.

A foul bill of health is a document to show that the place was suffering from some infection when the ship set sail. If a captain cannot show a clean bill, he is supposed to have a foul one.

Bill of lading. A document signed by the master of a ship in acknowledgment of goods laden in his vessel. In this document he binds himself to deliver the articles in good condition when the ship set sail. These bills are generally in triplicate—one for the sender, one for the receiver, and one for the master of the vessel.

Bill of Pains and Penalties. A legislative Act imposing punishment (less than capital) upon a person charged with treason or other high crimes. It is like a Bill of Attainder (q.v.), differing from it in that the punishment is never capital and the children are not affected.

Bill of quantities. An abstract of the probable cost of a building, etc.

Bill of Rights. The declaration delivered to the Prince of Orange (William III) on his election to the British throne, and accepted by him, confirming the rights and privileges of the people. (Feb. 13th, 1689.)

Bill of sale. When a person borrows money and delivers goods as security, he gives the lender a "bill of sale," that is, permission to sell the goods if the money is not returned on a stated day.

Bills of Mortality. In 1592, when a great pestilence broke out, the Company of Parish Clerks, representing 109 parishes in and around London, began to publish weekly returns of all deaths occurring; these later included births or baptisms, but continued to be known as "bills of mortality." The term is now used for those abstracts from parish registers which show the births, deaths, and baptisms of the district.

Within the Bills of Mortality means within the district covered by the 109 parishes mentioned above.

Bills payable. Bills of exchange, promissory notes, or other documents promising to pay a sum of money.

Bills receivable. Promissory notes, bills of exchange, or other acceptances held by a person to whom the money stated is payable.

Billabong (Austr.). A dried-up water course, from billa, a creek, and bong, to die.

Billings, Josh. The nom de plume of Henry Wheeler Shaw (1818-85), an American humorist. For many years he published an annual known as Josh Billings' Farmers' Allminax.

Billingsgate. The site of an old passage through that part of the city wall that protected London on the river side: so called from the Billings, who were the royal race of the Varini, an ancient tribe mentioned by Tacitus. Billingsgate has been the site of a fish-market.
for many centuries, and its porters, etc., were famous for their foul and abusive language at least three hundred years ago.

Parlament spoke the cant of Billingsgate.

DyFen: Art of Poetry, c. 1.

To talk Billingsgate. To slang; to use foul, abusive language; to scold in a vulgar, coarse style.

You are no better than a Billingsgate fish-fag. You are as rude and ill-mannered as the women of Billingsgate fish-market.

Billingsgate pheasant. A red herring; a bloater.

Billy. A policeman's staff, which is a little bill or billiet.

A pocket-handkerchief (see Bill). “A blue billy” is a handkerchief with blue ground and white spots.

The tin in which originally Australian station-hands made tea and did most of their cooking. The word probably comes from bill, a creek—hence water.

Billy Barlow. A street droll, a merry-andrew; so called from a half-idiot of the name, who fancied himself some great personage. He was well known in the East of London in the early half of last century, and died in Whitechapel workhouse. Some of his sayings were really witty, and some of his attitudes really droll.

Billy and Charlie. See FORGERIFS.

Billy goat. A male goat. From this came the term once common for a tufted beard—a “billy”—or goatee.

Billycock Hat (bil’i kok). A round, low-crowned, soft felt hat with a wide brim. One account says that the name is the same as “billy-cocked,” that is, cocked in the manner of a bully, or swell, a term which was applied to a hat in the description of an Oxford dandy in Amherst’s Terra Filius (1721). Another account says that it was first used by Billy Coke (Mr. William Coke) at the great shooting parties at Holkham about 1850; and old-established hatters in the West End still call them “Coke hats.”

Bi-metallism (bi met’a lizm). The employment for coinage of two metals, silver and gold, which would be of fixed relative value.

Binary Arithmetic (bi’ na ri). Arithmetic in which the base of the notation is 2 instead of 10, a method suggested for certain uses by Leibnitz. The unit followed by a cipher signifies two; by another unit it signifies three, by two ciphers it signifies four, and so on. Thus, 10 signifies 2, 100 signifies 4; while 11 signifies 3, etc.

Binary Theory. A theory which supposes that all acids are a compound of hydrogen with a simple or compound radicle, and all salts are similar compounds in which a metal takes the place of hydrogen.

Bingham’s Dandies. The 17th Lancers; so called from their colonel, the Earl of Lucan, formerly Lord Bingham. The uniform was noted for its admirable fit and smartness. Now called “The Duke of Cambridge’s Own Lancers.”

Binnacle (bin’ ak). The case of the mariner’s compass, which used to be written bittacle, a corruption of the Span. bitacula, from Lat. habitaculum, an abode.

Birchin Lane. I must send you to Birchin Lane, i.e. whip you. The play is on birch (a rod).

A suit in Birchin Lane. Birchin Lane was once famous for all sorts of apparel; references to second-hand clothes in Birchin Lane are common enough in Elizabethan books.

Passing through Birchin Lane amidst a camp-royal of hose and doublets, I took... occasion to slip into a captain’s suit—a valiant buff doublet stuffed with points and a pair of velvet slops scored thick with lace.—Middleton: Black Book (1604).

Bird. This is the Middle English and Anglo-Saxon bird (occasionally byrde in M.E.), which meant only the young of feathered flying animals, foul, fowl, or fowl being the M.E. corresponding to the modern bird.

An enduring name for a girl.

And by my word, your bonnie bird
In danger shall not tarry;
So, though the waves are raging white,
I’ll row you o’er the ferry.

Campbell: Lord Ullin’s Daughter.

This use of the word is connected with hurd (g.v.), a poetic word for a maiden (cf. Bride) which has long been obsolete, except in ballads. In modern slang “bird” has by no means the same significance as it is a rather contemptuous term for a young woman.

Bird is also a familiar term for the shuttlecock used in Badminton.

A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush; a pound in the purse is worth two in the book.

Possession is better than expectation.

It is found in several languages:

Italian: E meglio aver oggi un uovo, che domani una gallina.

French: Un, Tiens vaut, ce dit-on, mieux que deux Tu l’auras.

L’un est sur, l’autre ne l’est pas.

German: Ein vogel in der hand ist besser als zehn über land.

Besser ein spat in der hand, als ein storch auf dem dache.

Latin: Certa amittimus dum incerta petimus (Plautus).

On the other side we have “Qui ne s’aventure, n’a ni cheval ni mule.” “Nothing venture, nothing gain.” “Use a sprat to catch a mackerel.” “Chi non s’arrischia non guadagna.”

A bird of ill-omen. A person who is regarded as unlucky; one who is in the habit of bringing ill news. The phrase dates from the time of augury (q.v.) in Greece and Rome, and even to-day many look upon owls, crows, and ravens as unlucky birds, swallows and storks as lucky ones.

Ravens, by their acute sense of smell, can locate dead and decaying bodies at a great distance; hence, perhaps, they indicate death. Owls screech when bad weather is at hand, and as foul weather often precedes sickness, so the owl is looked on as a funeral bird.
A bird of passage. A person who shifts from place to place; a temporary visitant, like a cuckoo, the swallow, starling, etc.

A little bird told me so. From Eccles. x. 20; "Curse not the king, no not in thy thought, for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter."

Birds of a feather flock together. Persons associate with those of a similar taste and station as themselves. Hence, of that feather, of that sort.

I am not of that feather to shake My friend, when he must need me. Shakespeare: Timon of Athens, i, 1.

Fine feathers make fine birds. See Feather.

Old birds are not to be caught with chaff. Experience teaches wisdom.

One beats the bush, another takes the bird. The workman does the work, master makes the money. See Beat.

The Arabian bird. The phoenix (q.v.).

The bird of June. The peacock. Minerva's bird is either the cock or the owl; that of Venus is the dove.

The bird of Washington. The American or bald-headed eagle.

The well-known bald-headed eagle, sometimes called the Bird of Washington.—Wood.

Thou has kept well the bird in thy bosom. Thou hast remained faithful to thy allegiance or faith. The expression was used of Sir Ralph Percy (slain in the battle of Hedgeley Moor in 1464) to express his having preserved unstained his fidelity to the House of Lancaster.

'Tis the early bird that catches the worm. It's the energetic man who never misses an opportunity who succeeds.

To get the bird. To be hissed; to meet with a hostile reception. See Big Bird.

To kill two birds with one stone. To effect two objects with one outlay of trouble.

Birdie. A hole at golf which the player has completed in one stroke less than par (the official figure). Two strokes less is an eagle.

Birds protected by superstitions:

Choughs were protected in Cornwall, because the soul of King Arthur was fabled to have migrated into a chough.

The Hawk was held sacred by the Egyptians, because it was the form assumed by Ra or Horus; and the Ibis because it was said that the god Thoth escaped from the pursuit of Typhon disguised as an Ibis.

Mother Carey's Chickens, or Storm Petrels, are protected by sailors, from a superstition that they are the living forms of the souls of deceased sailors.

The Robin is protected, both on account of Christian tradition and nursery legend. See Robin Redbreast.

The Stork is a sacred bird in Sweden, from the legend that it flew round the cross, crying Styrrka, Styrrka, when Jesus was crucified. See Stork.

Swans are superstitiously protected in Ireland from the legend of the Fionnuala (daughter of Lir), who was metamorphosed into a swan and condemned to wander in lakes and rivers till Christianity was introduced. Moore wrote a poem on the subject.

Birdcage Walk (St. James's Park, London); so called from an aviary that used to be there for the amusement of Charles II.

Birler. In Cumberland, a birler is the master of the revels at a bidden-wedding, who is to see that the guests are well furnished with drink. To birl is to carouse or pour out liquor (A.S. byrelan).

Birmingham Poet. John Freeth, who died at the age of seventy-eight in 1808. He was wit, poet, and publican, who not only wrote the words and tunes of songs, but sang them also, and sang them well.

Birnam Wood (ber' nam). Birnam is a hill in Perthshire, 11 miles north-west of Perth, and formerly part of the royal forest known as Birnam Wood.

Birthday Suit. He was in his birthday suit. Quite nude, as when born.

Birthstones. See Precious Stones.

Bis (Lat., twice). French and Italian audiences at theatres, concerts, etc., use this word as English audiences use "Encore."

Bis dat, qui cito dat (he gives twice who gives promptly)—i.e. prompt relief will do as much good as twice the sum at a future period (Publius Syrus Proverbs).

Biscuit. The French form of the Lat. bis coxium, i.e. twice baked. In English it was formerly spelt as pronounced—bisket—the irrational adoption of the foreign spelling without the foreign pronunciation is comparatively modern.

In pottery, earthenware or porcelain, after it has been hardened in the fire, but has not yet been glazed, is so called. Porcelain groups so prepared at Sevres, and neither coloured nor glazed, were made fashionable in the 1750s by Mme de Pompadour, who had a great liking for them.

Bise (bez). A keen dry wind from the north, sometimes with a bit of east in it, that is prevalent in Switzerland and the neighbouring parts.

Bishop (A.S. biscof, from Lat. episcopus, and Gr. episkopos, an inspector or overseer). One of the higher order of the Christian priesthood who presides over a diocese (either actually or formally) and has the power of ordaining and confirming in addition to the rights and duties of the inferior clergy.

The name is given to one of the men in chess (formerly called the "archer"), to the lady-bird (see Bishop Barnabee below), and to a drink made by pouring red wine (such as claret or burgundy), either hot or cold, on ripe bitter oranges, the liquor being sugared and spiced to taste. Similar drinks are Cardinal, which is made by using white wine.
instead of red, and Pope, which is made by using tokay.

See also Boy Bishop.

The bishop hath put his foot in it. Said of milk or porridge that is burnt, or of meat over-roasted. Tyndale says, "If the porridge be burned to, or the meat over rosted, we saye the byshope hath put his fote in the potte," and explains it thus, "because the bishopes burne who they lust." Such food is also said to be bishopped.

To bisho. There are two verbs, "to bisho," both from proper names. One is obsolete and meant to conceal a drowned a little boy in Bethnal Green and obsolete and meant to murder by drowning: it is from a man of this name who, in 1831, drowned a little boy in Bethnal Green and sold his body to the surgeons for dissection. The other is slang, and means to conceal a horse's age by "faking" his teeth.

Bishop Barker. An Australian term used around Sydney for the largest glass of beer available, named from Frederick Barker (1808-82), Bishop of Sydney (consecrated to be English). He was a very tall man.

Bishop Barnabee. The May-bug, ladybird, etc.

There is an old Sussex rhyme:—

Tell me when my wedding shall be;
If it be to-morrow day,
Ope your wings and fly away.

Bishop in Partibus. See In Partibus.

The Bishop's Bible. See Bible, The English.

Bisextile (bi seks' til). Leap-year (q.v.). We add a day to February in leap-year, but the Romans counted February 24th twice. Now, February 24th was called by them "dies bisextus" (sexto calendas Maritas), the sextile or sixth day before March 1st; and this day being reckoned twice (bis) in leap-year, which was called "annus bisextus."* Bisson (bis' on). Shakespeare (Hamlet, ii, 2) speaks of bisson rheum (blinding tears), and in Coriolanus ii, 1, "What harm can your bisson consecuteities glean out of this character?" This is the M.E. bisen and O.E. bisne, purblind. The ultimate origin of the word is unknown, but there was an A.S. sten, power of seeing, and it may be from this with the privative prefix be-, as in behead.

Bistonians (bis' tói ni ánž). The Thracians: so called from Biston, son of Mars, who built Bistonia on the Lake Bistonia.

So the Bistonian race, a maddening train,
Exult and revel on the Thracian plain;
With milk their bloody banquets they alloy,
Or from the lion rend his panting prey;
On some abandoned savage fiercely fly,
Seize, tear, devour, and think it luxury.

PIT: Status, bk. ii.

Bit. A piece, a morsel. Really the same word as bite (A.S. bitan), meaning a piece bitten off, hence a piece generally; it is the substantive of bite, as morsel (Fr. morceau) is of mordre.

Also used for a piece of money, as a "threepenny-bit," a "two-shilling bit," etc.

Bit is old thieves' slang for money generally, and a coiner is known as a "bit-maker"; but in Spanish North America and the West Indies it was the name of a small silver coin representing a portion, or "bit," of the dollar. In U.S.A. a "bit" is 12 1/2 cents, half a quarter.

In the 1920s bit was a contemptuous phrase for someone's girl, short for "bit of fluff.

Bit (of a horse). To take the bit in (or between) one's teeth. To be obstinately self-willed; to make up one's mind not to yield. When a horse has a mind to run away, he catches the bit "between his teeth," and the driver has no longer control over him.

Bite. A cheat; one who bit us. "The biter bit" explains the origin. We say "a man was bitten" when he "burns his fingers" meddling with something which promised well but turned out a failure. Thus, Pope says, "The rogue was bit," he intended to cheat, but was himself taken in. "The biter bit" is the moral of Aesop's fable called The Viper and the File, and Goldsmith's mad dog, which, "for some private ends, went mad and bit a man," but the biter was bit, for "The man recovered of the bite, the dog it was that died."* Bites and Bams. Hoaxes and quizzes; humbug.

[His] humble efforts at jocularity were chiefly confined to... bites and bams.—Scott: Guy Mannering, ch. 3.

To bite one's thumb at another. To insult or defy a man by putting the thumbnail into the mouth and clicking it against the teeth. It is difficult to see why this should have such provocative significance.

Gregory: I will frown as I pass by; and let them take it as they list.

Sampson: Nay, as they dare. I will bite my thumb at them: which is a disgrace to them, if they bear it.

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i, 1.

To bite the dust, or the ground. To be struck from one's horse, hence to be slain.

The phrase "Another Redskin bit the dust" was used in R.A.F. circles, 1939-45, to indicate that an exploit just recounted was considered a "line" (q.v.); it originates from the fabulous Western Stories of Buffalo Bill and other heroes who slew incredible numbers of Red Indians and always survived.

To bite the lip, indicative of suppressed chagrin, passion, or annoyance.

She had to bite her lips till the blood came in order to keep down the angry words that would rise in her heart.—Mrs. Gaskell: Mary Barton, ch. xi.

To bite upon the bridle. To champ the bit, like an impatient or restless horse.

Bitt. To bitt the cable is to fasten it round the bitts-hence the end at the bitts; hence to tie up, tie fast. (q. v.); see windlass. Or bit, for some private ends, went mad and bit a man, "Bitter end" in this phrase is a sea term meaning the end of a rope, or that part of the cable which is "abait the bits." When there is no windlass the cables are fastened to bitts, that is, wooden posts fixed in pairs on the deck; and when a rope is paid out until all of it is let out and no more remains, the end at the bitts—hence... the bitter end, as opposed to the other end—is reached. In Captain Smith's Seaman's Grammar (1627) we read:

A bitter is but the name of a Cable about the Bits, and vear the out by little and little. And the Bitters end, is that part of the Cable doth stay within board.

However, we read in Prov. v, 4, "Her end is bitter as wormwood," which may share the origin of the modern use of this phrase.

Bittock. A little bit: -ock as a diminutive is preserved in bull-ock, hill-ock, butt-ock, etc. "A mile and a bittock" is a mile and a little bit.

Black for mourning was a Roman custom (Juvenal, x, 243) borrowed from the Egyptians. Mutes at funerals who wore black cloaks, were sometimes known as the blacks, and sometimes as the Black Guards. Cf. Blackguards.

I do pray ye
To give me leave to live a little longer.
You must about me like my Blacks.

Beaten black and blue. So that the skin is black and blue with the marks of the beating.

Black as a crow, etc. Among the many common similes used in connexion with "black" are black as a crow, a raven, a raven's wing, ink, hell, hades, death, the grave, your hat, a thundercloud, Egypt's night, a Newgate knocker (q.v.), ebony, a wolf's mouth, a coal-pit, coal, pitch, soot, etc. Most of these are self-explanatory.

Black Assize. July 6th, 1577, when a putrid pestilence broke out at Oxford during the time of assize. The chief baron, the sheriff, and a large number of the Oxford gentry (some accounts say 300) died.

Blackamoors. Washing the blackamoor white—i.e. engaged upon a hopeless and useless task. The allusion is to one of Aesop's fables so entitled.

Black books. To be in my black books. In bad odour; in disgrace; out of favour. A black book is a book recording the names of those who are in disgrace or have merited punishment. Amherst, in his Terra Filius, or the Secret History of the Universities of Oxford (1726), speaks of the Proctor's black book, and tells us that no one can proceed to a degree whose name is found there.

Black Book of the Admiralty. An old navy code, said to have been compiled in the reign of Edward III.

Black Book of the Exchequer. An official account of the royal revenues, payments, perquisites, etc., in the reign of Henry II. Its cover was black leather. There are two of them preserved in the Public Record Office.

Black Brunswickers. A corps of 700 volunteer hussars under the command of Frederick William, Duke of Brunswick, who had been forbidden by Napoleon to succeed to his father's dukedom. They were called "Black" because they wore mourning for the deceased Duke. Frederick William fell at Quatre-Bas, 1815.

Black cap. A small square of black cloth. This is worn by a judge when he passes sentence of death on a prisoner; it is part of the judge's full dress, and is also worn on November 9th, when the new Lord Mayor takes the oath at the Law Courts. Covering the head was a sign of mourning among the Israelites, Greeks, Romans, and Anglo-Saxons. Cf. 2 Sam. xv, 30.

Black Country. The. The crowded manufacturing district of the Midlands of which Birmingham is the centre. It includes Wolverhampton, Walsall, Redditch, etc., and has been blackened by its many coal and iron mines, and smoking factory shafts.

Black Death. A plague which ravaged Europe in 1348-51; it was a putrid typhus, in which the body rapidly turned black. It reached England in 1349, and is said to have carried off twenty-five millions (one fourth of the population) in Europe alone, while in Asia and Africa the mortality was even greater.

Black Diamonds. Coals. Coals and diamonds are both forms of carbon.

Black Dog. See Dog.

Black multi-colored in the early 18th century for counterfeit silver coin. It was made of pewter double washed. "Black," as applied to bad money, was even then an old term.

To blush like a black dog. See Dog.

Black Doll. The sign of a marine store shop. The doll was a dummy dressed to indicate that cast-off garments were bought. See Dolly Shop.

Black Douglas. See Douglas.

Blackfellows. The name given to the aborigines of Australia. Their complexion is not really black, but a dark coffee colour.

Black Flag. The pirate's flag; the "Jolly Roger." Pirates of the Chinese Sea who opposed the French in Tonquin were known as "the Black Flags," as also were the troops of the Caliph of Bagdad because his banner—that of the Abbasides—was black, while that of the Fatimides was green and the Ommandes white. It is said that the black curtain which hung before the door of Ayeshah, Mohammed's favourite wife, was taken for a national flag, and is still regarded by Mussulmans as the most precious of relics. It is never unfolded except as a declaration of war.

A black flag is run up over a prison immediately after an execution has taken place within its walls.

Blackfoot. A Scottish term for a matchmaker, or an intermediary in love affairs; if he chanced to play the traitor he was called a white-foot.

In the first half of the 19th century the name was given to one of the Irish agrarian secret societies:—
And the Blackfoot who courted each foeman's approach, Faire thus the hot-foot he'd fly from the stout Father Rouch.

Blackfeet. The popular name of two North American Indian tribes, one an Algonquin nation calling themselves the Siksika, and coming originally from the Upper Missouri district, the other, the Sihasapa.

Black Friars. The Dominican friars; so called from their black cloaks. The district of this name in the City of London is the site of a large monastery of Dominicans who used to possess rights of sanctuary, etc.

Black Friday. December 6th, 1745, the day on which the news arrived in London that the Pretender had reached Derby; also May 10th, 1886, when widespread panic was caused by Overend, Gurney and Co., the brokers, suspending payment.

Black Game. Heath-fowl; in contra-distinction to red game, as grouse. The male bird is called a blackcock.

Black Genevan. A black preaching gown, formerly used in many Anglican churches, and still used by Nonconformists. So called from Geneva, where Calvin preached in such a robe.

Blackguards. The origin of this term, which for many years has been applied to low and worthless characters generally, and especially to roughs of the criminal classes, is not certainly known. It may be from the link-boys and torch-bearers at funerals, who were called by this name, or from the scullions and kitchen-knives of the royal household, during progresses, etc., had charge of the pots and pans and accompanied the wagons containing these, or from an actual body, or guard, of soldiers wearing a black uniform.

The following extract from a proclamation of May 7th, 1683, in the Lord Steward's office would seem to bear out the second suggestion:—

Whereas . . . a sort of vicious, idle, and masterless boys and rogues, commonly called the Black guard, with divers other lewd and loose fellows . . . do usually haunt and follow the court. . . . Wee do hereby strictly charge . . . all those so called. . . . with all other loose, idle . . . men . . . who have intruded themselves into His Majesty's court and stables . . . to depart upon pain of imprisonment.

Black Hand. A lawless secret society, formerly active in the U.S.A.; most of the members were Italians.

Black Hole of Calcutta. A dark cell in a prison into which Suraja Daula placed 146 British prisoners on June 29th, 1756. The following morning only twenty-three were found alive.

The punishment cell or lock-up in barracks is frequently called the "black hole."

Black Horse. The 7th Dragoon Guards, or "the Princess Royal's Dragoon Guards." Their "facings" are black. Also called "Strawboots." "The Blacks."

Black Jack. A large leather gochet, or can, for beer and ale, so called from the outside being tarred.

He hath not pledged one cup, but looked most wickedly Upon good Malaga; flies to the black-jack still,
And sticks to small drink like a water-rat.

MIDDLETON: The Witch, i, 1.

Fill, fill the goblet full with sack!
I mean our tall black-jerkin Jack.
Whose hide is proof 'gainst rabble Rout
And will keep all ill weather out.

ROBT. HEATH: Song In a Siege (1650).

In Cornwall the miners call blende or sulphide of zinc "Black Jack," the occurrence of which is considered by them a favourable indication. Hence the saying, Black Jack rides a good horse, the blende rides upon a lode of good ore.

A blackjack is a small club weighted at the end, much used by gangsters for knocking people unconscious.

Blacklead. See Misnomers.

Black-leg. An old name for a swindler, specially in cards and races; now used almost solely for a non-union workman, one who works for less than trade-union wages, or one who is willing to work during a strike.

Black letter. The Gothic or German type which, in the early days of printing, was the type in commonest use. The term came into use about 1600, because of its heavy, black appearance in comparison with roman type.

Black letter day. An unlucky day; one to be recalled with regret. The Romans marked their unlucky days with a piece of black charcoal, and their lucky ones with white chalk, but the allusion here is to the old liturgical calendars in which the saints' days and festivals are distinguished by being printed in red.

Black list. A list of persons in disgrace, or who have incurred censure or punishment; a list of bankrupts for the private guidance of the mercantile community. See BLACK BOOKS.

Blackmail (blāk’ māl). “Mail” here is the Old English and Scottish word meaning rent, ax, or tribute. In Scotland mails and duties are rents of an estate in money or otherwise. Blackmail was originally a tribute paid by the Border farmers to freebooters in return for protection or for immunity from molestation. Hence the modern signification—any payment extorted by intimidation or pressure.

Black Maria. The van which conveys prisoners from the police courts to jail. There is an unsupported tradition that the term originated in America. Maria Lee, a negress of great size and strength, kept a sailors' hired house in Boston, and when constables required help it was a common thing to send for Maria. Maria, who soon collared the refractory and led them to the lock-up.

During World War I Black Maria was one of the names given to large enemy shells that emitted dense smoke on bursting.

Black market. A phrase that came into use during World War II, to describe illicit dealing in rationed goods.

Black Mass. This is the name given to the sacrilegious mass said by diabolists in which the Devil was invoked in place of God and various obscene rites performed in ridicule of the proper ceremony.

Black Monday. Easter Monday, April 14th, 1360, was so called. Edward III was with his army lying before Paris, and the day was so dark, with mist and hail, so bitterly cold and so windy, that many of his horses and men died. Monday after Easter holidays is called “Black Monday,” in allusion to this fatal day. Launcelot says:

> It was not for nothing that my nose fell a-bleeding on Black Monday last, at six o'clock 't the morning.

Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, ii, 5.

February 27th, 1865, was so called in Melbourne from a terrible sirocco from the NNW., which produced dreadful havoc between Sandhurst and Castlemain. Schoolboys give the name to the first Monday after the holidays are over, when lessons begin again.

Black money. See Black Dog above.

Black Monks. The Benedictines (q.v.).

Black-out. From the day war was declared against Germany (Sept. 3, 1939) to the day hostilities ceased (May 8, 1945) it was obligatory throughout Great Britain to shield windows at night so that no slightest gleam of light should be visible from without. By this means enemy raiding aircraft were deprived of the help of landmarks and were literally left in the dark as to where there were towns or villages.

Black ox. The black ox has trod on his foot—i.e. misfortune has come to him. Black oxen were sacrificed to Pluto and other infernal deities.

Black Parliament. This is the name often given to the Parliament that was opened in Nov., 1529, for the purpose of furthering Henry VIII's seizing and consolidating his thefts of Church property. During the six and a half years of its existence it carried out the king's arbitrary orders with a servility no parliament has shown before or since.

Black Pope. See Pope.

Black Prince. Edward, Prince of Wales (1330-76), eldest son of Edward III. Froissart says he was “styled black by terror of his arms” (c. 169). Strutt confirms this saying: “for his martial deeds surnamed Black the Prince” (Antiquities). Meyrick says there is not the slightest proof that he ever wore black armour, and, indeed, there is indirect proof against the supposition. Thus, there was a picture on the wall of St. Stephen's Chapel, Westminster, in which the prince was clad in gilt armour; Stothard says “the effigy is of copper gilt”; and in the British Museum is an illumination of Edward III granting to his son the duchy of Aquitaine in which both figures are represented in silver armour with gilt joints. The first mention of the term “Black Prince” occurs in a parliamentary paper of the second year of Richard II; so that Shakespeare has good reason for the use of the word in his tragedy of that king:

> Brave Gaunt, thy father and myself—

Rescued the Black Prince, that young Mars of men,
From forth the ranks of many thousand French.

Black Rod. The short title of a Court official, who is styled fully “Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod,” so called from his staff of office—a black wand surmounted by a golden lion. He is the Chief Gentleman Usher of the Lord Chamberlain's Department, and also Usher to the House of Lords and the Chapter of the Garter.

Black Rood of Scotland. The “piece of the true cross” or rood, set in an ebony crucifix, which St. Margaret, the wife of King Malcolm Canmore, left to the Scottish nation.
at her death in 1093. It fell into the hands of the English at the battle of Neville's Cross (1346), and was deposited in St. Cuthbert's shrine at Durham Cathedral, but was lost at the Reformation.

Black Russia. A name formerly given to Central and Southern Russia, from its black soil.

Blacks, The. The 7th Dragoon Guards. See Black Horse.

Black Saturday. August 4th, 1621: so called in Scotland, because a violent storm occurred at that very moment the Parliament was sitting to enforce episcopacy on the people.

Black Sea. Formerly called the Euxine, this sea probably was given its present name by the Turks who, accustomed to the Aegean with its many islands and harbours, were terrified by the dangers of this larger stretch of water which was destitute of shelter and was liable to sudden and violent storms and thick fogs.

Black sheep. A disgrace to the family or community; a mauvais sujet. Black sheep are looked on with dislike by some shepherds, and are not so valuable as white ones. Cp. BÊTE NOIRE.

Black Shirts. The black shirt was the distinguishing garment worn by the Italian Fascists and adopted in England by their imitators.

Blacksmith. A smith who works in black metal (such as iron), as distinguished from a whitesmith, who works in tin or other white metal. See HARMONIOUS, LEARNED.

Black strap. Bad port wine. A sailor's name for any bad liquor. In North America, "Black-strap" is a mixture of rum and molasses, sometimes vinegar is added. The seething black strap was proverbially ready for use.ピンクターン: Molly Maguire (1882).

Black swan. See RARA AVIS.

Blackthorn winter. The cold weather which frequently occurs when the blackthorn is in blossom. See ICE-SAINTS.

Black Thursday. February 6th, 1851: so called in Victoria, Australia, from a terrible bush-fire which then occurred.

Black Tom. The Earl of Ormonde, Lord Deputy of Ireland in the reign of Elizabeth; so called from his ungracious ways and "black looks."

Black velvet. A drink composed of champagne and Guinness stout in equal parts. It was the favourite drink of the Iron Chancellor, Bismarck.

Black Watch. Originally companies employed about 1725 by the English government to watch the Islands of Scotland. They dressed in a "black" or dark tartan. They were enrolled in the regular army as the 42nd regiment under the Earl of Crawford, in 1737. Their tartan is still called "The Black Watch Tartan." The regiment is now officially "The Royal Highlanders," but is still called "The Black Watch." They are easily recognized by the small bunch of red feathers, known as the red hackle, which they wear on their bonnets in lieu of a regimental badge.

Blade. A knowing blade, a sharp fellow: a regular blade, a buck or fop. As applied to a man the word originally carried the sense of somewhat bullying bravado, a fierce and swaggering man, and he was probably named from the sword that he carried.

Bladud (bla´dod). A mythical king of England, father of King Lear. He built the city of Bath, and dedicated the medicinal springs to Minerva. Bladud studied magic, and, attempting to fly, fell into the temple of Apollo and was dashed to pieces. (Geoffrey of Monmouth.)

Blanch, To. A method of testing the quality of money paid in taxes to the King, invented by Roger of Salisbury in the reign of Henry I. 44 shillings' worth of silver coin was taken at random from the amount being paid. The Master of the Assaye then melted a pound's weight of it and the impurities were skimmed off. If the resulting mass was then light, the taxpayer had to throw in enough pence to balance the scale.

Blanchefleur (blonsh' fler). The heroine of the Old French metrical romance, Flor et Blanchefleur, which was used by Boccaccio as the basis of his prose romance, Il Filocofo. The old story tells of a young Christian prince who falls in love with the Saracen slave-girl with whom he has been brought up. They are parted, but after many adventures he rescues her unharmed from the harem of the Emir of Babylon. It is a widespread story, and is substantially the same as that of Dorigen and Aurelius by Chaucer, and that of Dianora and Ansoldo in the Decameron. See DORIGEN.

Blank. To draw blank. See DRAW.

Blank cartridge. Cartridge with powder only, that is, without shot, bullet, or ball. Used in drill and in saluting. Figuratively, empty threats.

Blank cheque. A cheque duly signed, but without specifying any sum of money; the amount to be filled in by the payee.

To give a blank cheque is, figuratively, to give carte blanche (q.v.).

Blank verse. Rhymeless verse in continuous decasyllables with iambic or trochaic rhythm, first used in English by the Earl of Surrey in his version of the Aeneid, about 1540. There is other unrhymed verse, but it is not usual to extend to such poems as Collins's Ode to Evening, Whitman's Leaves of Grass, or the vers libre of to-day, the name blank verse.

Blanket. The wrong side of the blanket. An illegitimate child is said to come of the wrong side of the blanket.

A wet blanket. A discouragement; a marplot or spoil-sport. A person is a wet blanket who discourages a proposed scheme. "Treated with a wet blanket," discouraged. A wet blanket is used to smother fire, or to prevent one escaping from a fire from being burnt.

Blanketeers. The name given to a body of some 5,000 working men out of employment Blarney. Soft, wheeling speeches to gain one end; flattery, or lying, with unblushing effrontery. Blarney is a village near Cork. Legend has it that Cormack Macarthy held its castle in 1602, and concluded an armistice with Carew, the Lord President, on condition of surrendering the fort to the English garrison. Day after day his lordship looked for the fulfilment of the terms, but received nothing but soft speeches, till he became the laughing-stock of Elizabeth’s ministers, and the dupe of the Lord of Blarney.

To kiss the Blarney Stone. In the wall of the castle at Blarney, about twenty feet from the top and difficult of access, is a triangular stone containing this inscription: “Cormac Macarthy foris me fieri fecit, A.D. 1446.” Tradition says that to whomsoever can kiss this stone, all its desires by caution. As it is almost impossible to reach, a substitute has been provided by the custodians of the castle, and it is said that this is in every way as efficacious as the original. Among the criminal classes of America “to blarney” means to pick locks.

Blasphemy (blas’ fe mi). The Greek from which this word comes means “evil speaking” but in English the term is limited to any impious or profane speaking of God or of sacred things. In Law blasphemy is constituted by the publication of anything ridiculing or insulting Christianity, or the Bible, or in the shape of any Person of the Holy Fraternity. At one time the courts held that heresies by the elegant Chesterfield.

Blasphemous Balfour. Sir James Balfour, his say, He died in 1583. He is said to have served, deserted, and profited by all parties.

Blast. To strike by lightning; to cause to wither. The “blasted oak.” This is the sense in which the word is used as an expiatory. If it [the ghost] assume my noble father’s person, I’ll cross it, though it blast me.

SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, i, 1.

The use of Blast! as an imprecation goes back to at least Stuart times; as an imprecatory adjective—“a blasted rascal”—it is employed even by the elegant Chesterfield.

In full blast. In full swing; “all out.” As used by Shakespeare: “The speech at Hyde Park on Saturday were in full blast.” A metaphor from the blast furnace in full operation.

Blatant Beast. In Spenser’s Faerie Queene “a dreadful fiend of gods and men, ydred”; the ype of calumny or slander. He was begotten of Cerberus and Chimaira, and had a hundred tongues and a sting; with his tongues he speaks things “most shameful, most un­righteous, most untrue”; and with his sting “steeps them in poison.” Sir Calidore muzzled the monster, and drew him with his chain to Faerie Land. The beast broke his chain and regained his liberty. The word “blatant” seems to have been coined by Spenser, and he never uses it except as an epithet for this monster, who is not mentioned till the twelfth canto of the fifth book. It is probably derived from the provincial word blate, meaning to bellow or roar.

Blayney’s Bloodhounds. The old 89th Foot; so called because of their unerring certainty, and untiring perseverance in hunting down the Irish rebels in 1798, when the corps was commanded by Lord Blayney.

This regiment was later called “the Second Battalion of the Princess Victoria’s Irish Fusiliers.” The first battalion is the old 87th Foot.

Blaze. A white mark in the forehead of a horse, and hence a white mark on a tree made by chipping off a piece of bark and used to serve as an indication of a path, etc. The word is not connected with the blaze of a fire, but is from Icel. blasi, a white star on the forehead of a horse, and is connected with Ger. blasz, pale.

To blaze abroad. To noise abroad. “Blaze” here is the Icel. blasa, to blow, from O. Teut. blasan, to blow, and is probably ultimately the same as Lat. flare. Dutch blazen and Ger. blasen are cognate words. See Blazon.

He began to publish it much and to blaze abroad the matter.—Mark 1, 45.

Blazer. A brightly coloured jacket, used in boating, cricket, and other summer sports. Originally applied to those of the Lady Margaret crew (Camb.), whose boat jackets are the brightest possible scarlet.

A blazer is the red flannel boat jacket worn by the Lady Margaret, St. John’s College, Cambridge, Boat Club.—Daily News, August 22nd, 1889.

Blazon. To blazon is to announce by a blast or blow (see Blaze abroad above) of a trumpet, hence the Ghost in Hamlet says, “But this eternal blazon must not be to ears of flesh and blood,” i.e. this talk about eternal things, or things of the other world, must not be made to persons still in the flesh. Knights were announced by the blast of a trumpet on their entrance into the lists; the flourish was answered by the heralds, who described aloud the arms and devices borne by the knight; hence, to blazon came to signify to “describe the charges borne”; and blazonry is “the science of describing or depicting arms.” See Heraldry.

Blé de Mars. See Bloody Mars.

Bleed. To make a man bleed is to make him pay dearly for something; to victimize him. Money is the life-blood of commerce.

It makes my heart bleed. It makes me very sorrowful.

Take your own will; my very heart bleeds for thee. FLETCHER: Queen of Corinth, ii, 3.
Bleeding Heart, Order of the. One of the many semi-religious orders instituted in the Middle Ages in honour of the Virgin Mary, whose "heart was pierced with many sorrows."

Bleeding of a dead body. It was at one time believed that, at the approach of a murderer, the blood of the murdered body gushed out. If in a dead body the slightest change was observable in the eyes, mouth, feet, or hands, the murderer was supposed to be present. The notion still survives in some places.

Bleeding the monkey. The same as Sucking the Monkey. See Monkey.

Blemmyes (blem'iz). An ancient nomadic Ethiopian tribe mentioned by Roman writers as inhabiting Nubia and Upper Egypt. They were fabled to have no head, their eyes and mouth being placed in the breast. Cp. Acephalites; Caora.

Blenheim Palace (blen' im). The mansion near Woodstock, Oxfordshire, given by the nation to the Duke of Marlborough, for his victory over the French at Blenheim, Bavaria, in 1704. The palace has given its name to a small dog, the Blenheim Spaniel, a variety of King Charles's Spaniel, and to a golden-coloured apple, the Blenheim Orange.

Blenheim Steps. Going to Blenheim Steps meant going to be dissected, or unearthed from one's grave. There was an anatomical school, over which Sir Astley Cooper presided at Blenheim Steps, Bond Street. Here "resurrectionists" were sure to find a ready mart for their gruesome wares, for which they received sums of money varying from £3 to £10, and sometimes more.

Bless. He has not a sixpence to bless himself with, i.e. in his possession; wherewith to make himself happy. This expression may perhaps be traced to the time when coins were marked with a deeply indented cross; silver is still used by gipsy fortune-tellers and so on for crossing one's palm for good luck.

Blessing. Among Greek and R.C. ecclesiastics the thumb and first two fingers, representing the Trinity, are used in ceremonial blessing in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. The thumb, being strong, represents the Father; the long or second finger, Jesus Christ; and the first finger, the Holy Ghost, which proceedeth from the Father and the Son.

Blighter. Slightly contemptuous but good-natured slang for a man, a fellow; generally with the implication that he is a bit of a scamp or, at the moment, somewhat obnoxious.

Blighty. Soldiers' slang for England or the homeland—came into popular use during World War I, but was well known to soldiers who had served in India long before. It is the Urdu Vilayati or Bilati, an adjective meaning provincial, removed at some distance; hence adopted by the military for England.

Blimey. One of the numerous class of mild oaths or expletives whose real meaning is little understood by those who use them. This is a corruption of "blind me!"

Blimp, Colonel. The term "blimp" was originally applied to a captive observation balloon, numbers of which were anchored along the front line in World War I. "Colonel Blimp" was invented by David Low, the cartoonist, to embody the elderly, dyed-in-the-wool Tory, mouthing stale political clichés and opposing any change in any shape. Colonel Blimp is usually depicted with white walrus moustache and naked save for a towel wrapped round him, as his great ideas occur in the Turkish bath.

Blind. A pretence; something ostensible to conceal a covert design. The metaphor is from window-blinds, which prevent outsiders from seeing into a room.

As an adjective blind is one of the many euphemisms for "drunk"—short for "blind drunk," i.e. so drunk as to be unable to distinguish things clearly.

Blind as a bat. A bat is not blind, but if disturbed and forced into the sunlight it cannot see, and blunders about. It sees best in the dusk.

Blind as a beetle. Beetles are not blind, but the dor-beetle or hedge-chafer, in its rapid flight, will occasionally bump against one as if it could not see.

Blind as a mole. Moles are not blind, but as they work underground, their eyes are very small. There is a mole found in the south of Europe, the eyes of which are covered by membranes, and probably this is the animal to which Aristotle refers when he says, "the mole is blind."

Blind as an owl. Owls are not blind, but being night birds, they see better in partial darkness than in the full light of day.

Blind leaders of the blind. Those who give advice to others in need of it, but who are, themselves, unfitted to do so. The allusion is to Matt. xv, 14.

To go it blind. To enter upon some undertaking without sufficient forethought, inquiry, or preparation.
When the devil is blind. A circumlocution for "never." For similar phrases see Never.

You came on his blind side. His soft or tender-hearted side. Said of persons who wheedle some favour out of another. He yielded because he was not wide awake to his own interest.

Blind alley. A cul de sac, an alley with no outlet. It is blind because it has no "eye" or passage through it.

Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green. See Beggar's Daughter. There is a public-house of this name in the Whitechapel Road.

Blind Department, The. In Post Office parlance, a colloquialism for the "Returned Letter Office" (formerly known also as the "Dead Letter Office"). The department where letters with incoherent, insufficient, or illegible addresses are examined, and, if possible, put upon the proper track for delivery. The clerk in charge was called "The Blind Man."

One of these addresses was "Santings, Hilewite" (St. Helen's, Isle of Wight). Dr. Brewer had one from "A Mons. Addresser," ed. "A Mons. Addresser, Angleterre," and it reached him. Another address was "Haseltreagh in no famshere" (Hazeltreagh, Northamptonshire).

Blind ditch. One which cannot be seen. Here blind means obscure, or concealed, as in Milton's "In the blind mazes of this tangled wood" (Comus, 181).

Blind Half-hundred, The. An old name for the 50th Regiment of Foot. Many of them suffered from ophthalmia in the Egyptian campaign of 1801.

Blind Harry. A Scottish minstre of the 15th century. He died about 1492 and left in MS. an epic on Sir William Wallace which runs to 11,855 lines.

Blind hedge. A ha-ha (q.v.).

Blind Magistrate, The. Sir John Fielding, knighted in 1761, was born blind. Sitting at Bow Street, he was in the commission of the Peace for Middlesex, Surrey, Essex, and the liberties of Westminster.

Blind Man. See Blind Department.

Blindman's buff. A very old-established name for an old and well-known children's game. "Buff" here is short for "buffet," and is an allusion to the three buffs or pats which the "blind man" gets when he has caught a player.

Blindman's holiday. The hour of dusk, when it is too dark to work, and too soon to light candles. The phrase was in common use at least as early as Elizabethan times.

One that will not blind Cupid doe in the night, which is his blindman's holiday.

T. NASHE: Lenten Stuffe (1599).

Blindmen's Dinner, The. A dinner unpaid for the landlord being made the victim. Eulenspiegel (q.v.) being asked for alms by twelve blind men, said, "Go to the inn; eat, drink, and be merry, my men; and here are twenty florins to pay the bill." The blind men thanked him; each supposing one of the others had received the money. Reaching the inn, they told the landlord of their luck, and were at once provided with food and drink to the amount of twenty florins. On asking for payment, they all said, "Let him who received the money pay for the dinner," but none had received a penny.

Blindworm. See Misnomers.

Blind spot. This is a small area not sensitive to light, situated on the retina where the optic nerve enters. The term is used figuratively to describe some area in one's discernment where judgment and understanding are lacking.

Block. To block a Bill. In parliamentary language means to postpone or prevent the passage of a Bill by giving notice of opposition, and thus preventing its being taken after half-past twelve at night.

A chip of the old block. See Chip.

To cut blocks with a razor. See Cut.

Blockhead. A stupid person; one without brains. The allusion is to a wig-maker's dummy or tête à perruque, on which he fits his wigs.

Your wit will not so soon out as another man's will; 'tis strongly wedged up in a blockhead.

SHAKESPEARE: Coriolanus, ii, 3.

Blockhouse. The oldest Negro Regiment in the U.S. Army, nicknamed from its gallant assault on a blockhouse in the Spanish-American War.

Blondin (blon' din). One of the most famous acrobats of all time. He was a Frenchman (b. 1824, d. 1897), his real name being Jean François Gravelé. He began performing at the age of five and acquired considerable repute by his aerial tricks. His great feat, however, was performed in 1859 when he crossed the Niagara Falls on a tight-rope. This he did several times, embellishing the performance by wheeling a barrow, twirling an umbrella, etc. He made a fortune by this show, and soon after his return settled in England, where he gave performances until too old to do so.

Blind. In figurative use, blind, being treated as the typical component of the body inherited from parents and ancestors, came to denote members of a family or race as distinguished from other families and races, hence family descent generally, and hence one of noble or gentle birth, which latter degenerated into a buck, or aristocratic rowdy.

The gallants of those days pretty much resembled the bloods of ours.

GOLDSMITH: Reverie at the Boar's Head Tavern.

A blood horse. A thoroughbred; a horse of good parentage or stock.

A prince of the blood. One of the Royal Family. See Blood Royal.

Bad blood. Anger, quarrels; as, It stirs up bad blood. It provokes to illfeeling and contention.

Blood and iron policy—i.e. war policy. No explanation needed.
Blood is thicker than water. Relationship has a claim which is generally acknowledged. It is better to seek kindness from a kinsman than from a stranger. Water soon evaporates and leaves no mark behind; not so blood. So the interest we take in a stranger is thinner and more evanescent than that which we take in a blood relation. The proverb occurs in Ray’s Collection (1672) and is probably many years older.

Blood money. Money paid to a person for giving such evidence as shall lead to the conviction of another; money paid to the next of kin by his victim to forgo his “right” of seeking blood for blood, or (formerly) as compensation for the murder of his relative; money paid to a person for betraying another, as Judas was paid blood-money for his betrayal of the Saviour.

Blood relation. One in direct descent from the same father or mother; one of the same family stock.

Blue blood. See blue.

Cold blood. Deliberately; not in the excitement of passion or of battle.

It makes one’s blood boil. It provokes indignation and anger.

It runs in the blood. It is inherited or exists in the family or race.

It runs in the blood of our family.—Sheridan: The Rivals, iv, 2.

Laws written in blood. Demades said that the laws of Draco were written in blood, because every offence was punishable by death.

My own flesh and blood. My own children, brothers, sisters, or other near kindred.

The blood of the Grograms. Taffety gentility; make-believe aristocratic blood. Grogram is a coarse silk taffety stiffened with gum (Fr. gos grain).

Our first tragedian was always boasting of his being “an old actor,” and was full of the “blood of the Grograms.”

Blood, toil, tears and sweat. The words used by Winston Churchill in his speech to the House of Commons, 13 May, 1940, on becoming Prime Minister. “I would say to the House as I have said to those who have joined this government, I have nothing to offer but blood, toil, tears and sweat.” In his Anatomy of the World John Donne says, “Mollifie it with thy tears, or sweat, or blood.”

The field of blood. Aceldama (Acts i, 19), the piece of ground purchased with the blood-money of our Saviour, and set apart for the burial of strangers.

The field of the battle of Cannae, where Hannibal defeated the Romans, 216 B.C., is also so called.

Young blood. Fresh members; as, “To bring young blood into the concern.” The term with the article, “a young blood,” signifies a young rip, a wealthy young aristocrat of convivial habits.

Blood Royal. The royal family or race; also called simply “the blood,” as “a prince of the blood.”

Man of blood. Any man of violent temper. David was so called in 2 Sam. xvi, 7 (Rev. Ver.), and the Puritans applied the term to Charles I.

Man of Blood and Iron. An epithet bestowed on Bismarck (1815-98), for many years Chancellor of Prussia and Germany, on account of his war policy and his indomitable will expressed in his first speech after appointment as Minister-General.

Bloodhound. Figuratively, one who follows up an enemy with pertinacity. Bloodhounds used to be employed for tracking wounded game by the blood spilt; subsequently they were employed for tracking criminals and slaves who had made their escape, and were hunters of blood, not hunters by blood. The most noted breeds are the African, Cuban, and English.

Bloodstone. See Heliotrope.

Bloodsucker. An animal like the leech, or the fabled vampire which voraciously sucks blood and which, if allowed, will rob a person of all vitality. Hence, a sponger, a parasite, or one intent upon another’s material ruin. See REGIMENTAL NICKNAMES.

Bloody. Several fanciful derivations have been found for this expletive, once considered more vulgar than recent usage suggests. The most romantic of these was that the word is a corruption of “By our Lady”; another school of thought imagined that it came from an association of ideas with “bloods” or aristocratic rowdies. There is little doubt, however, that its original meaning was, as it implies, “covered with blood.” Partly owing to its unpleasant, violent, and lurid associations, it easily became applied as an intensive in a general way.

It was bloody hot walking to-day.—Swift: Journal to Stella, letter xxii.

As a title the adjective has been bestowed on Otto II, Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, 973-983, and the English Queen Mary (1553-58), has been called “Bloody Mary” on account of the religious persecutions which took place in her reign.

The Bloody Eleventh. The old 11th Foot, “The Devonshire Regiment,” was so called from their having been several times nearly annihilated, as at Almanza, Fontenoy, Roucous, Ostend, and Salamanca (1812), in capturing a French standard.

Bloody Assizes. The infamous assizes held by Judge Jeffreys in 1685. Three hundred were executed, more whipped or imprisoned, and a thousand sent to the plantations for taking part in Monmouth’s rebellion.

Bloody Bill. The 31 Henry VIII, c, 14, which denounced death, by hanging or burning, on all who denied the doctrine of transubstantiation.

Bloody-bones. A hobgoblin; generally “Raw-head and Bloody-Bones.”

Bloody Eleventh. See REGIMENTAL NICKNAMES.

Bloody hand. A term in old Forest Law denoting a man whose hand was bloody, and was therefore presumed to be the person guilty of killing the deer shot or otherwise slain. In heraldry, the "bloody hand" is the badge of a baronet, and the armorial device of Ulster. In both uses it is derived from the O'Neills. See RED HAND, AND HAND, THE RED.

Bloody Mars. A local English name for a variety of wheat. It is a corruption of the French ble de Mars. March grain.

Bloody-nose. The popular name of the common wasp beetle, Timarcha levigata, which can emit a reddish liquid from its joints when disturbed.

Bloody Pots, The. See KIRE OF SKULLS.

Bloody Thursday. The Thursday in the first week in Lent used to be so called.

Bloody Wedding. The massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572 is so called because it took place during the marriage feast of Henri (afterwards Henri IV) and Marguerite (daughter of Catherine de’ Medici).

Bloom, Leopold. See ULYSSSES.

Bloomers. A female costume consisting of a short skirt and loose trousers gathered closely round the ankles, so called from Mrs. Amelia Bloomer, of New York, who tried in 1849 to introduce the fashion. Nowadays "bloomers" is usually applied only to the trousers portion of the outfit.

Bloomie. A meaningless euphemism for the slang epithet "bloody."

A garment called bliaud or bliaus, which appears to have been another name for a surcoat. ... In this bliaus we may discover the modern French blouse. ... smock-frock.

PLANCHE: British Costume.

The word is more commonly used for a woman's light bodice worn with a skirt.

Blow. The English spelling blow represents three words of different origin, viz.—

(1) To move as a current of air, to send a current of air from the mouth, etc., from the A.S. blowan, cognate with the Mod. Ger. blähen and Lat. flare.

(2) To blossom, to flourish, from A.S. blowan, cognate with bloom, Ger. blühen, and Lat. flaurae; and

(3) A stroke with the first, etc., which is most likely from an old Dutch word, blau, to strike.

In the following phrases, etc., the numbers refer to the group to which each belongs.

A blow out (1). A "tuck in," or feast which swells out the paunch. Also applied to the sudden flattening of a pneumatic tyre when the inner tube is punctured.

At one blow (3). By one stroke.

Blow me tight (1). A mild oath or expletive. If there's a soul, will give me food, or find me emmploy.

By day or night, then blow me tight! (he was a vulgar boy).

You be blew (1). A mild imprecation or expletive. Don't link yourself with vulgar folks, who've got no fixed abode. Tell lies, use naughty words, and say "they wish they may be blow'd!"

Ingoldsby Legends, ibid.

To blow one's top (1). To lose one's temper.

Blown (1), in the phrase "fly-blown," is a legacy from pre-scientific days, when naturalists thought that maggots were actually blown on to the meat by blow-flies.

Blown (1). Phrase applied to an internal combustion engine in which the fuel is forced into the cylinders with the aid of a supercharger, or blower.

Blown herrings (1). Herrings bloated, swollen, or cured by smoking; another name for bloaters.

Blown upon (1). Made the subject of a scandal. His reputation has been blown upon, means that he has been the subject of talk wherein something derogatory was hinted at or asserted. Blown upon by the breath of slander.

Blow-point (1). A game similar to peaputting, only instead of peas small wooden skewers or bits of pointed wood were puffed through the tube. The game is alluded to by Florio, Strutt, and several other authors.

It will soon blow over (1). It will soon be no longer talked about; it will soon come to an end, as a gale or storm blows over or ceases.

I will blow him up sky high (1). Give him a good scolding. The metaphor is from blasting by gunpowder.

The first blow is half the battle (3). Well begun is half done. Pythagoras used to say, "The beginning is half the whole." "Incipe: Dimidium facti est capposse" (Ausonius). "Dimidium facti, qui capit, habet" (Horace). "Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte."

To blow a cloud (1). To smoke a cigar, pipe, etc. This term was in use in Queen Elizabeth's reign.

To blow a trumpet (1). To sound a trumpet. But when the blast of war blows in our ears, let us be tigers in our fierce deportment.

Henry V, iii, 1.

To blow great guns (1). Said of a wind which blows so violently that its noise resembles the roar of artillery.

To blow hot and cold (1). To be inconsistent. The allusion is to the fable of a traveller who was entertained by a satyr. Being cold, the traveller blew his fingers to warm them, and afterwards blew his hot broth to cool it. The satyr, in great indignation, turned him out of doors, because he blew both hot and cold with the same breath.

To blow off steam (1). To get rid of superfluous temper. The allusion is to the forcible escape of superfluous steam no longer required.

To blow the gaff (1). To let out a secret; to inform against a companion; to "peach." Here gaff is a variant of gab (q.v.).
To blow up (1). To inflate, as a bladder; to explode, to burst into fragments; to censure severely. See I will blow him up, above.

Without striking a blow. Without coming to a contest.

Blower. A common term in the Army for wireless and telephone apparatus. Also term in motor sport used for a supercharger; a supercharged engine is said to be "blown."

Blowzelinda (blou ze lin'da). A common 18th-century name applied to a rustic girl. See Gay's Shepherd's Week:

Sweet is my toil when Blowzelinda is near;
My summer's days are happy the while she's near.

Come, Blowzelinda, ease thy swain's desire,
My summer's shadow and my winter's fire.

A blouse was a ruddy fat-cheeked wench:—
Sweet blouse, you are a beauteous blossom, sure.
Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, iv, 2.

Blowzy. Coarse, red-faced, blotted: applied to women. The word is allied to blush, blaze, etc.

Blubber (M.E. blaberen, probably of imitative origin). To cry like a child, with noise and slavering; cp. slobber, slaver.

I play the boy, and blubber in thy bosom. Otway: Venice Preserved, i. 1.

The word is also used attributively, as in blubber-lips, blubber-checks, fat flabby cheeks, like whale's blubber.

Bluchers (bloo'kerz). Half boots; so called after Field-Marshal von Blücher (1742-1819).

Bludger (Austr.). Originally (19th century) a pimp, but later any scrounger or one taking profit without risk. In World War I to bludge on the flag meant to slack in the army. The opprobrious adjective bludging is now widely used.

Blue or Azure is the symbol of Divine eternity and human immortality. Consequently, it is a mortuary colour—hence its use in covering the coffins of young persons. When used for the garment of an angel, it signifies faith and fidelity. As the dress of the Virgin, it indicates modesty. In blazonry, it signifies chastity, loveliness, fidelity, and a spotless reputation, and seems frequently to represent silver; thus we have the Blue Boar of Richard III, the Blue Lion of the Earl of Mortimer, the Blue Swan of Henry IV, the Blue Dragon, etc.

The Covenanters wore blue as their badge, in opposition to the scarlet of royalty. They based their choice on Num. xv, 38, "Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes in the borders of their garments and that they put upon the fringe a ribband of blue."

See COLOURS for its symbolisms.

A blue, or a "staunch blue." descriptive of political opinions, for in most parts of the north means a Tory, for in most counties the Conservative colour is blue. See BLUE-COAT SCHOOL; BLUE STOCKING.

Also, at Oxford and Cambridge, a man who has been chosen to represent his Varsity in rowing, cricket, etc. Some sports, such as hockey and lacrosse, come in a lower category, and for these a "half blue" is awarded.

A dark blue. An Oxford man or Harrow boy.

A light blue. A Cambridge man or Eton boy.

The Oxford Blues. The Royal Horse Guards were so called in 1690, from the Earl of Oxford their commander and the blue facings. Wellington, in one of his dispatches, writes:-"I have been appointed colonel of the Blues."

True blue will never stain. A really noble heart will never disgrace itself. The reference is to blue aprons and blouses worn by butchers, which do not show blood-stains.

True as Coventry blue. The reference is to a blue cloth and blue thread made at Coventry, noted for its permanent dye.

'Twas Presbyterian true blue. The allusion is to the blue apron which some of the Presbyterian preachers used to throw over their preaching-tub before they began to address the people. In one of the Rump songs we read of a person going to hear a lecture, and the song says—

Where I a tub did view,
Hung with an apron blue;
'Twas the preacher's, I conjecture.

To look blue. To be depressed.

He was blue in the face. He had made too great an effort; was breathless and exhausted either bodily or with suppressed anger or emotion.

A priest of the blue habit. A cant name for a barrister. See LAWYER'S BAG.

Bluebeard. A bogey, a merciless tyrant, in Charles Perrault's Contes du Temps (1697). The tale of Bluebeard (Chevalier Raoul) is known to every child, but many have speculated on the origin of this despot. Some say it was a satire on Henry VIII, of wife-killing notoriety. Dr. C. Taylor thinks it is a type of the castle lords in the days of knighthood. Holinshed calls Giles de Retz, Marquis de Laval, the original Bluebeard; he lived at Machecoul, in Brittany, was accused of murdering six of his seven wives, and was ultimately strangled and burnt in 1440.

Campbell has a Bluebeard story in his Tales of the Western Highlands, called The Widow and her Daughters; it is found also in Strapola's Nights, the Pentamerone, and elsewhere. Cp. the Story of the Third Calender in the Arabian Nights.

Bluebeard's key. When the blood stain of this key was rubbed out on one side, it appeared on the opposite side; so prodigality being overcome will appear in the form of meanness; and friends, over-fond, will often become enemies.

Blue billy. A blue neckcloth with white spots. See BILLY.

Blue Bird of Happiness. This is an idea elaborated from Maceterlinck's play of that name, first produced in London in 1910. It tells the story of a boy and girl seeking "the blue blood 121 Blue-noses blue bird" which typifies happiness. This ancy of Maeterlinck's introduced for a time the phrase into English.

Blue blood. High or noble birth or descent;
: is a Spanish phrase, and refers to the fact that the veins shown in the skin of the purebred Spanish aristocrat, whose race had never Moorish or other admixture, were more blue than those of persons of mixed, and therefore inferior, ancestry.

Blue Boar. A public-house sign; the ognisance of Richard III. In Leicester is a ane in the parish of St. Nicholas, called the Blue Boar Lane, because Richard slept there ight before the battle of Bosworth Field.
The boast boar, in infant gore,
Walloons beneath the thorny shade.
GRAY: The Bard.

Blue Bonnets, or Blue Caps. The Highanders of Scotland, or the Scots generally, do called from the blue woollen cap at one time in very general use in Scotland, and still ar from uncommon.
le is there, too, , , and a thousand blue caps more.
1 Henry IV, ii. 4.

Blue Books. In England, parliamentary ports and official publications presented by the Crown to both Houses of Parliament.
each volume is in folio, and is covered with a blue wrapper.

Short Acts of Parliament, etc., even without wrapper, come under the same designation.
The official colour of Spain is red, of Italy green,
France yellow, of Germany and Portugal, white.
In America the "Blue Books" (like our "Red books") contain lists of those persons who hold appointments.

Blue bottle. A constable, a policeman; also, formerly, an almsman, or anyone whose instinctive dress was blue.

You proud varlets, you need not be ashamed to wear blue when your master is one of your fellows.
DEREK: The Honest Whore (1602).

Shakespeare makes Doll Tarsheet denounce beadle as a "blue-bottle rogue." I'll have you soundly swung for this, you blue-ottle rogue.—SHAKESPEARE: 2 Henry IV, v. 4.

Blue Caps. See Blue Bonnets.

Blue-coat School. Christ's Hospital is so called because the boys there wear a long blue cap perched at the loins with a leather belt.
Some who attend the mathematical school are styled King's boys, and those who constitute the highest class are Grecians. The school was founded by Edward VI the year of his death. It was moved from London to Farnham in 1902.

Blue-eyed Maid. Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, is so called by Homer.

NOW Prudence gently pulled the poet's ear,
And thus the daughter of the Blue-eyed Maid,
In flattery's soothing sounds, divinely said.
"O Peter, eldest-born of Phoebus, hear.
"PETEER PINDAR: A Falling Minister.

Blue fish. The. The shark, technically called Carothias glauces, the upper parts of which are blue. This should be distinguished from blue fish, an edible fish found in American waters.

Blue gown. A harlot. Formerly a blue own was a dress of ignominy for a prostitute who had been arrested and placed in the House of Correction.

The bedesmen, to whom the kings of Scotland distributed certain alms, were also known as blue gowns, because their dress was a cloak or gown of coarse blue cloth. The number of these bedesmen was equal to that of the king's years, so that an extra one was added at every returning birthday. These paupers were privileged to ask alms through the whole realm of Scotland. See GABER-LUNZIE.

Blue Guards. So the Oxford Blues, now called the Royal Horse Guards, were called during the campaign in Flanders (1742-5).

Blue Hen's Chickens. The nickname for inhabitants of the State of Delaware. It is said that in the Revolutionary War a certain Captain Caldwell commanded, and brought to a high state of efficiency, a Delaware regiment.
He used to say that no cock could be truly game whose mother was not a blue hen.
Hence the Delaware regiment became known as "Blue Hen's Chickens," and the name was transferred to the inhabitants of the State generally.

Bluejackets. Sailors; so called because the colour of their jackets is blue.

Blue John. A blue fluor-spar, found in the Blue John mine near Castleton, Derbyshire; sold to distinguish it from the Black Jack, an ore of zinc. Called John from John Kirk, a miner, who first noticed it.

Blue laws. This is a phrase used in U.S.A. to describe laws which interfere with personal freedom, tastes and habits, such as sumptuary laws and those regulating private morals. The name was first given to several laws of this class said to have been imposed in the colonies of Connecticut and New Haven in the early 18th century.

Blue-light Federalists. A name given to those Americans who were believed to have made "friendly" ("blue-light") signals to British ships in the war of 1812.

Bluemantle. One of the four English Pursuivants (q.v.) attached to the College of Arms, or Heralds' College, so called from his official robe.

Blue Monday. The Monday before Lent, spent in dissipation. It is said that dissipation gives everything a blue tinge. Hence "blue" means tipsy.

Blue moon. Once in a blue moon. Very rarely indeed.

Blue murder. To shout blue murder.
Indicative more of terror or alarm than of real danger. It appears to be a play on the French exclamation morbles; there may also be an allusion to the common phrase "blue ruin."

Blue-noses. The Nova Scotians.

"Pray, sir," said one of my fellow-passengers,
"can you tell me the reason why the Nova Scotians are called 'Blue-noses'?"

"It is the name of a potato," said I, "which they produce in the greatest perfection, and boast to be the best in the world. The Americans have, in consequence, given them the nickname of Blue Noses."
HALIBURTON: Sam Slick.
Blue Peter. A flag with a blue ground and white square in the centre, hoisted as a signal that the ship is about to sail. It takes its name from a "repeater", a naval flag hoisted to indicate that a signal has not been read and should be repeated, this flag having been used with that meaning originally.

To hoist the blue Peter. To leave.

"When are you going to sail?"

"I cannot justly say. Our ship's bound for America next voyage ... but I've got to go to the Isle of Man first ... And I may have to hoist the blue Peter any day."

Mrs. Gaskell: Mary Barton, ch. xiii.

Blue Ribbon. The blue ribbon is the Garter, the badge of the highest and most coveted Order of Knighthood in the gift of the British Crown; hence the term is used to denote the highest honour attainable in any profession, walk of life, etc. The blue ribbon of the Church is the Archbishopric of Canterbury, that in law is the office of Lord Chancellor. See Cordon Bleu.

The Blue Ribbon of the Turf. The Derby. Lord George Bentinck sold his stud, and found the Derby a few months afterwards. Be­wailing his ill-luck, he said to Disraeli, "Ah! you don't know what the Derby is." "Yes, I do," replied Disraeli; "it is the blue ribbon of the turf."

A weal from a blow has had the term "blue ribbon" applied to it, because a bruise turns the skin blue.

"Do you want a blue ribbon round those white sides of yours, you monkey?" answered Orestes: "because, if you do, the hippopotamus hide hangs ready outside."—Kingsley: Hypatia, ch. iv.

Blue Ribbon Army. The Blue Ribbon Army was a teetotal society founded in the early eighties of the last century by Richard Booth in the U.S.A., and soon extending to Great Britain. The members were distinguished by wearing a piece of narrow blue ribbon in the buttonhole of the coat. From this symbol the phrase Blue Ribbon Army came in time to be applied to the body of teetotallers generally, whether connected with the original society or not. In 1883 the society took the name of Gospel Temperance Union.

Blue Shirts. A force of Irish Volunteers taken to Spain by General O'Duffy to help General Franco in the civil war, 1936-9.

Blue Squadron. One of the three divisions of the British Fleet in the 17th century. See Admiral of the Blue.

Blue stocking. A female pedant. In 1400 a society of ladies and gentlemen was formed at Venice, distinguished by the colour of their stockings, and called della calza. It lasted till 1590, when it appeared in Paris and was the rage among the lady savants. From France it came to England in 1780, when Mrs. Montague displayed the badge of the Bas-blue club at her evening assemblies. Mr. Benjamin Stillingfleet was a constant attendant of the soirées. The last of the clique was Miss Monckton, afterwards Countess of Cork, who died 1840, but the name has survived.

Blues. A traditional form of American Negro folk-song, of obscure origin, but expressive of the unhappiness of slaves in the Deep South. Usually consists of 12 bars, made up of three 4-bar phrases in 4/4 time. Both the words and accompaniment (which form an antiphonal) should be improvised, though many famous Blues have been written down; the subject matter is usually love, the troubles which have beset the singer, or a nostalgic longing for home. The best-known Blues singer was Bessie Smith (d. 1936).

Bluey. The Australian name for blue-coloured blankets in wide use in the 19th century. From this the word became attached to the swag which tramps carried in their blankets. In Tasmania a bluey was a blue shirt-like garment issued to convicts.

Bluff, To. In Poker and other card-games, to stake on a bad hand. This is a dodge resorted to by players to lead an adversary to throw up his cards and forfeit his stake rather than risk them against the "bluffer."

So, by extension, to bluff is to deceive by pretence. To call someone's bluff is to un­mask his deception.

Bluff Harry or Hal. Henry VIII, so called from his bluff and burly manners (1491-1547).

Blunderbore. A nursery-tale giant, brother of Cormoran, who put Jack the Giant Killer to bed and intended to kill him; but Jack thrust a billet of wood into the bed, and crept under the bedstead. Blunderbore came with his club and broke the billet to pieces, but was much amazed at seeing Jack next morning at breakfast-time. When his astonishment was abated he asked Jack how he had slept. "Pretty well," said the Cornish hero, "but once or twice I fancied a mouse tickled me with its tail." This embarrassed the giant's surprise. Hasty pudding being provided for breakfast, Jack stowed away such huge stores in a bag concealed within his dress that the giant could not keep pace with him. Jack cut the bag open to relieve "the gorge," and the giant, to affect the same relief, cut his throat and thus killed himself.

Blunderbuss. A short gun with a large bore. (Dut. donderbus, a thunder-tube.)

Blunt. Ready money; a slang term, the origin of which is unknown.

To get a Signora to warble a song,
You must fork out the blunt with a haymaker's prong!

Hoon: A Tale of a Trumpet.

Blurb. A paragraph printed on the dust­wrapper or in the preliminary leaves of a book purporting to tell what the book is about, written by the publisher and usually of a laudatory nature. The phrase was coined by Gelett Burgess, the American novelist (1866-1951), about the year 1900, when he defined it as "self-praise: to make a noise like a publisher."

Blurt Out, To. To tell something from impulse which should not have been told. To peak incautiously, or without due reflection. Horatio makes the distinction, to "flurt with one's fingers, and blurt with one's mouth."

Blush. At first blush, at first sight, on the first glance. The word comes from the Old English blæsch, a gleam, a glimpse, a momentary view. This sense of the word dropped out of use in the 16th century, except in the above phrase.

To hide a blushing blush of the bright sunne.

Sir Gawaine and the Green Knight.

At the first blush we thought they had been shipps come off from France.—Hakluyt's Voyages, III.

To blush like a blue dog. See Dog.

To put to the blush. To make one blush with shame, annoyance, or confusion.

Bo. You cannot say Bo! to a goose—i.e. you are a coward who dare not say bo! even to a ool. It is said that once when Ben Jonson was introduced to a nobleman, the peer was o struck with his homely appearance that he exclaimed, "What! are you Ben Jonson? Why, you look as if you could not say Bo! o a goose." "Bo!" exclaimed the dramatist, turning to the peer and making his bow. (Cp. Lat. bo-are; Gr. bo-ein, to cry aloud.)

Boa. Pliny (Natural History, VIII, xiv) says he word is from Lat. bos (a cow), and arose from the belief that the boa sucked the milk of cows.

Boadicea (bō ā dīs ē' ā). Much has been written about this heroic queen of the ancient Britons. She was the wife of Prasutagus, king of the Iceni, on whose death the Romans seized the territory, scourged the widow and ill-treated the daughters. Enraged and raving for vengeance, Boadicea raised a revolt of the Iceni and Trinobantes, burned Camulodunum and Londinium (Colchester and London) but was eventually defeated (A.D. 62) by Suetonius Paulinus. Rather than fall into the hands of the Romans she took poison and died.

Boanerges (bō ā nēr' jēz'). A name given to James and John, the sons of Zebedee, because they wanted to call down "fire from heaven" on the Samaritans for not "receiving" he Lord Jesus. It is said in the Bible to signify "sons of thunder," but "sons of untoll" would probably be nearer its meaning (Luke ix, 54; see Mark iii, 17).

Boar. The. Richard III. See Blue Boar.

Boar's Head Tavern. Made immortal by Shakespeare, this used to stand in Eastcheap, on the site of the present statue of William IV. The sign was the cognisance of the Gordons, the progenitor of which clan existed at the town of Leicester, as we learn. Shakespeare: Richard III, v. 3.

The bristled Baptist boar. So Dryden denominates the Anabaptists in his Hind and Panther.

The bristled Baptist boar, impure as he [the ape], But whitened with the foam of sanctity, With fat pollutions filled the sacred place, And mountains levelled in his furious race.

Pt. i, 43.

The Calydonian boar. In Greek legend, Ceneus, king of Calydon, in Etolia, having neglected to sacrifice to Artemis, was punished by the goddess sending a ferocious boar to ravage his lands. A band of heroes collected to hunt the boar, which was wounded by Atalanta, and killed by Meleager.

The wild boar of the Ardennes. Guillaume, Comte de la March (died 1485), so called because he was fierce as the wild boar, which he delighted to hunt. Introduced by Scott in Quentin Durward.

Boar's Head. The Old English custom of serving this as a Christmas dish is said to derive from Scandinavian mythology. Freyr, the god of peace and plenty, used to ride on the boar Gullinbursti; his festival was held at Yuletide (winter solstice), when a boar was sacrificed to his honour.

The head was carried into the banqueting hall, decked with bays and rosemary on a gold or silver dish, to a flourish of trumpets and the songs of the minstrels. Many of these carols are still extant (see Carol), and the following is the first verse of that sung before Prince Henry at St. John's College, Oxford, at Christmas, 1607:

To the Boar is dead,
So here is his head;
What man could have done more
Than his head off to strike,
Meleager like
And bring it as I do before?

The Boar's Head Tavern. Made immortal by Shakespeare, this used to stand in Eastcheap, on the site of the present statue of William IV. The sign was the cognisance of the Gordons, the progenitor of which clan slew, in the forest of Huntley, a wild boar, the terror of all the Merse (1093).

Board. In all its many senses, this word is ultimately the same as the A.S. bord, a board, plank, or table; but the verb, to board, meaning to attack and enter a ship by force, hence to embark on a ship, and figuratively to accost or approach a person, is short for Fr. aborde, from aborder, which itself is—from the same word, bord, as meaning the side of a ship. In starboard, larboard, on board and overboard the sense "the side of a ship" is still evident.

I'll board her, though she chide as loud As thunder.

Taming of the Shrew, i, 2.

A board. A council which sits at a board or table; as "Board of Directors," "Board of Guardians," "School Board," "Board of Trade," etc.

The Board of Green Cloth. A Court that used to form part of the English Royal Household, and was presided over by the Lord Steward. It was so called because it sat at a table covered with green cloth. It existed certainly in the reign of Henry I, and probably earlier. It is now concerned with the royal domestic arrangements, under the authority of the Master of the Household.

Board of Green Cloth, June 12th, 1681. Order was this day given that the Maides of Honour should have cherry-tarts instead of gooseberry-tarts, it being observed that cherries are threepence a pound.

In modern slang the board of green cloth is the card-table or billiard-table.

Board School. An undenominational elementary school managed by a School Board as established by the Elementary Education Act in 1870, and supported by a parliamentary grant collected by a rate. When the School Boards were abolished by the Education Act of 1902 and the County Councils were given their duties, the name Board School was dropped and the schools became known as County or Council Schools.

He is on the boards. He is an actor by profession.

To sweep the board. To win and carry off all the stakes in a game of cards, or all the prizes at some meeting.

To board. To feed and lodge together, is taken from the custom of the university members, etc., dining together at a common table or board.

Boarding school. A school where the pupils are fed and lodged as well as taught. The term is sometimes applied to "prison." I am going to boarding school, going to prison to be taught good behaviour.

Board wages. Wages paid to servants which includes the cost of their food. Servants "on board wages" provide their own victuals.

Board, in many sea phrases, is all that space of the sea which a ship passes over in tacking.

To go by the board. To go for good and all, to be quite finished with, thrown overboard. Here board means the side of the ship.

To make a good board. To make a good or long tack in beating to windward.

To make a short board. To make a short tack. "To make short boards," to tack frequently.

To make a stern board. To sail stern foremost.

To run aboard of. To run on board of another ship. See also ABOARD.

Boast of England, The. A name given to "Tom Thumb" or "Tom-a-lin" by Richard Johnson, who in 1599 published a "history of this ever-renowned soldier, the Red Rose Knight, surnamed The Boast of England, showing his honourable victories in foreign countries, with his strange fortunes in Faery Land, and how he married the fair Angiltarra, daughter of Prester John . . . "

Boatswain. (bō' zān). The officer who has charge of the boats, sails, rigging, anchors, cordage, cables, and colours. Swain is the old Scand. slave, a boy, servant, attendant; hence the use of the word in poetry for a shepherd and a sweetheart.

The merry Boas from his side
His whistle takes.

DRYDEN: Albion and Albanius.

Boaz. See JACHIN.

Bob. Slang for a shilling. The origin of the word is unknown. It dates from about 1800.

Bob. A term used in campanology denoting certain changes in the long peals rung on bells. A bob minor is rung on six bells, a bob triple on seven, a bob major on eight, a bob royal on ten, and a bob maximus on twelve.

To give the bob to anyone. To deceive, to balk. Here bob is from M.E. bobben, O.Fr. bober, to befool.

With that, turning his backe, he smiled in his sleeve, to see howe kindly hee had given her the bobbe.—GREENE: Menaphon (1589).

To bob for apples or cherries is to try and catch them in the mouth while they swing backwards and forwards. Bob here means to move up and down buoyantly; hence, the word also means "to curtsy," as in the Scottish song, If it isn't weel bobbit we'll bob it again, signifying, if it is not well done we'll do it again.

To bob for eels is to fish for them with a bob, which is a bunch of lobworms like a small mop. Fletcher uses the word in this sense:—

What, dost thou think I fish without a bait, wench? I bob for fools: he is mine own, I have him.

I told thee what would tickle him like a trout;
And, as I cast it, so I caught him daintily.

Rule A Wife and Have a Wife, ii, 4.

To bob means also to thump, and a bob is a blow.

He that a fool doth very wisely hit,
Doth very foolishly, although he smart,
Not to seem senseless of the bob.

As You Like It, ii, 7.

Bear a bob. Be brisk. The allusion is to bobbing for apples, which requires great agility and quickness.

A bob wig. A wig in which the bottom locks are turned up into bobs or short curls.

Bobbed hair is hair that has been cut short—docked—like a booted horse's tail.

Bob's your uncle. In other words, "That'll be all right; you needn't bother any more." The origin of the phrase is unknown; it was certainly in use in the 1880s, but no satisfactory explanation of who "Bob" was has been brought forward.

Pretty bobbish. Pretty well (in spirits and health), from bob, as in the phrase bear a bob above.

Bobby. A policeman; this slang word is derived from Sir Robert Peel, and became popular through his having in 1828 remodelled the Metropolitan Police Force. Cp. EEELER.

Bobby-sox. Ankle-length socks affected by teenage girls in the U.S.A. in the early 1940s; hence the noun Bobby-soxers, young women who achieved notoriety by unruly demonstrations at the public appearances of fashionable crooners.
Bobadil. A military braggart of the first water. Captain Bobadil is a character in Ben Jonson's Every Man in his Humour. This name was probably suggested by Bobadilla, first governor of Cuba, who sent Columbus home in chains.

Bobbery, as Kicking up a bobbery, making a squabble or tumult, kicking up a shindy. It is much used in India, and most probably comes from Hind. bapre. "Oh, father!" a common exclamation of surprise.

Boccus, King. See Sidrac.

Bookland or Bookland. Land severed from hell folkland (i.e. the common land belonging to the people) and held either communally or in severally, and converted into a private estate of perpetual inheritance by a written sceo (or book) i.e. a deed.

The place-name Bookland is derived from his word.

Boden-See. The German name for the Lake of Constance; so called because it lies in the Boden, or low country at the foot of the Alps.

Bodkin. A word of uncertain origin, originally signifying a small dagger. In the early years of Elizabeth's reign it was applied to the silver bodkin worn by ladies in the hair. In the Seven Champions, Castria took her silver bodkin from her hair, and stabbed to death first her sister and then herself; and it is probably with this meaning that Shakespeare used the word in the well-known passage from Hamlet, "When he himself might his quietus make with a bare bodkin."

To ride bodkin. To ride in a carriage between two others, the accommodation being only for two. There is no ground for the suggestion that bodkin in this sense is a contraction of bodykin, a little body. The allusion to something so slender that it can be squeezed in anywhere is obvious.

If you can bodkin the sweet creature into the coach. Gibbon.

There is hardly room between Jos and Miss Sharp, who are on the front seat. Mr. Osborne sitting bodkin opposite, between Captain Dobbin and Amelia. Thackeray: Vanity Fair.

Bodle. A Scotch copper coin, worth about the sixth of a penny; said to be so called from Bodwell, a mint-master. Burns: Tam o' Shanter, 110.

To care not a bodle is equivalent to our English phrase, "Not to care a farthing."

Bodleian Library (bod le' an) (Oxford). So called because it was restored by Sir Thomas Bodley in 1597. It was originally established in 1455 and formally opened in 1488, but it fell into neglect in the course of the next century. It is now, in size and importance, second only to the library of the British Museum, and is one of the five libraries to which a copy of all copyright books must be sent.

Body (A.S. bodig).

A compound body, in old chemical phraseology, is one which has two or more simple bodies or elements in its composition, as water.

A regular body, in geometry, means one of the five regular solids, called "Platonic" because first suggested by Plato. See Platonic Bodies.

The heavenly bodies. The sun, moon, stars, and so on.

The seven bodies (of alchemists). The seven metals supposed to correspond with the seven "planets."

Planes.    Metals.
1. Apollo, or the Sun    Gold.
2. Diana, or the Moon    Silver.
3. Mercury    Quicksilver.
4. Venus    Copper.
5. Mars    Iron.
7. Saturn    Lead.

To body forth. To give mental shape to an ideal form.

Imagination bodies forth

Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, v, 1.

To keep body and soul together. To sustain life; from the notion that the soul gives life. The Latin anima, and the Greek psyche, mean both soul and life; and, according to Homeric mythology and the common theory of "ghosts," the departed soul retains the shape and semblance of the body. See Astral Body.

Body colour. Paint containing body or consistency. Water-colours are made opaque by mixing with white lead.

Body corporate. An aggregate of individuals legally united into a corporation.

Body politic. A whole nation considered as a political corporation; the state. In Lat., totum corpus reipublicae.

Bodyline. A cricket term for fast bowling at the batsman instead of at the wicket, with the object of forcing him to give a catch while defending his person. The accurate but dangerous bowling of Larwood and Vece won the Ashes (q.v.) for England in Australia in 1932-33, but precipitated a crisis which caused a change in the rules of the game.

Body-snatcher. One who snatches or purloins bodies, newly buried, to sell them to surgeons for dissection. The first instance on record was in 1777, when the body of Mrs. Jane Sainsbury was "resurrected" from the burial ground near Gray's Inn Lane. The "resurrection men" (q.v.) were imprisoned for six months.

By a play on the words, a bum-bailiff was so called, because his duty was to snatch or capture the body of a delinquent.

Beotia (be o' sha'). The ancient name for a district in central Greece, probably so called because of its abundance of cattle, but, according to fable, because Cadmus was conducted by an ox (Gr. bous) to the spot where he built Thebes.

Beotian (be o' sh'an). A rude, unlettered person, a dull blockhead. The ancient Beotians loved agricultural and pastoral pursuits, so the Athenians used to say they were dull and thick as their own atmosphere; yet Hesiod, Bœtian ears

Pindar, Corinna, Plutarch, Pelopidas, and Epaminondas, were all Bœtians.

Bœtian ears. Ears unable to appreciate music or rhetoric.

Well, friend, I assure thee thou hast not got Bœtian ears [because you can appreciate the beauties of my sermons].—LE SAGE: Gil Blas, vii. 3.

Boethius (bŏ ē' thi ŭs). Interest in this Roman author (A.D. c. 475-c. 524) chiefly arises from the fact that his De Consolatione Philosophiae was translated by King Alfred and by Chaucer, who mentions him in the Canterbury Tales.

Boffin. A nickname given in the R.A.F. during World War II to research scientists or “backroom boys” (q.v.).

Bogey. See BOGY.

Bogomili (bŏg ŏ mil' i). An heretical sect which seceded from the Greek Church in the 12th century. Their chief seat was Thrace, and they were so called from a Bulgarian priest, Bogomil, a reformer of the 10th century. Their founder, Basilius, was burnt by Alexius Comnenus in 1118; they denied the Trinity, the institutions of sacraments and of priests, believed that evil spirits assisted in the creation of the world, etc.

Bog-trotters. Irish tramps; so called from their skill in crossing the Irish bogs, from tussock to tussock, either as guides or to escape pursuit.

Bogus. An adjective applied to anything spurious, sham, or fraudulent, as bogus currency, bogus transactions. The word came from America, and is by some connected with bogy; but there are other suggestions. One is that it is from an Italian named Borgese who, about 1837, was remarkably successful in amassing a fortune in the Western States by means of forged bills, fictitious cheques, etc.; another, that ten years before this the name was given to an apparatus for coining false money; while Lowell (Biglow Papers) says, “I more than suspect the word to be a corruption of the French bagasse.”

Bog. A hobboglin; a person or object of terror; a bugbear. The word appeared only in the early 19th century, and is probably connected with the Scottish bogle, and so with the obsolete bug.

Colonel Bog. A name given in golf to an imaginary player whose score for each hole is settled by the committee of the particular club and is supposed to be the lowest that a good average player could do it in. Beating Bog or the Colonel, is playing the hole in a lesser number of strokes.

During World War I troops on the march were forbidden to sing a catchy song entitled Colonel Bog as the words they substituted for the real ones were not considered edifying.

Bohea (bŏ he'ı). A type of tea much favoured in the 18th century. The name is a corruption of Wu-i, the hills in China upon whose slopes it is grown.

Bohemia, The Queen of. This old public-house sign is in honour of Elizabeth, daughter of James I, who was married to Frederick, elector palatine, for whom Bohemia was raised into a separate kingdom. It is through her that the Hanoverians succeeded to the throne of Great Britain.

Bohemian. A slang term applied to literary men and artists of loose and irregular habits, living by what they can pick up by their wits. Originally the name was applied to the gypsies, from the belief that before they appeared in western Europe they had been denizens of Bohemia, or because the first that arrived in France came by way of Bohemia (1427). When they presented themselves before the gates of Paris they were not allowed to enter the city, but were lodged at La Chapelle, St. Denis. The French nickname for gypsies is cagoux (unsociables).

Bohemian Brethren. A religious sect formed out of the remnants of the Hussites. They arose at Prague in the 15th century, and are the forerunners of the modern Moravians.

Boiling-point. He was at boiling-point. Very angry indeed. Properly the point of heat at which water, under ordinary conditions, boils (212° Fahrenheit, 100° Centigrade, 80° Réaumur).

Bold. Bold as Beauchamp. It is said that Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, with one squire and six archers, overthrew 1001 armed men at Hoggcs, in Normandy, in 1346.

This exploit is not more incredible than that attributed to Captal-de-Buch, who, with forty followers, cleared Meux of the insurgents; called La Jacquerie, 7,000 of whom were slain by this little band, or trampled to death in the narrow streets as they fled panic-struck (1358).

Bold as brass. Downright impudent; without modesty. Similarly we say “brazen-faced.”

I make bold to say. I take the liberty of saying; I venture to say.

Bolero (bo le' ro). A Spanish dance; so called from the name of the inventor.

Bolero (bo ler' o). A Spanish dance; so called from the name of the inventor.

Bolingbroke (bŏ ling bruk'). Henry IV of England; so called from Bolingbroke, in Lincolnshire, where he was born (1367-1413).

Bollandists. Editors of the Acta Sanctorum: begun by John Bollandus, Dutch Jesuit, martyrologist (1596-1665); the first two volumes were published in 1643; these contain the saints commemorated in January. The work is not yet finished, but the sixty-first folio volume was published in 1875.

Bollen. Swollen. The past participle of the obsolete English verb, bell, to swell. Hence: “joints bolne-big” (Golding), and “bolne in pride” (Phaer). The seed capsule or pod of flax or cotton is called a “boll.”

The barley was in the ear, and the flax was bolted. Exod. ix. 31.

Bologna Stone (bo lo' nà). A sulphate of barya found in masses near Bologna. After being heated, powdered, and exposed to light it becomes phosphorescent.
Bolognese School. There were three periods of the Bolognese School in painting—the Early, the Roman, and the Eclectic. The first was founded by Marco Zoppo, in the 15th century, and its best exponent was Francia. The second was founded in the 16th century by Bagnacavallo, and its chief exponents were Primaticcio, Tibaldi, and Nicolo dell' Abate. The third was founded by the Carracci, at the close of the 16th century, and its best masters have been Domenichino, Lanfranco, Guercino, Schi.ione, Guercino. and Alabni.

Boloney (bό lό ni). Originally meaning a Bolognese sausage, the word is now used to describe something pretentious but useless and worthless. "Bunk" and "hooey" are employed in this same way.

Bolshevik (bol'she vik) or (less correctly) Bolshevist. Properly, a member of the Russian revolutionary party that seized power under Lenin in 1917, declared war on capitalism and the bourgeoisie in all lands, and aimed at the establishment of supreme rule by the proletariat. The Bolshevik government was so called because it professed to act in the name of the majority (bol'she is the comparative of the adjective bol'shot, big, large, and bolsheviki = majority).

Bolt. Originally meaning a short thick arrow with a blunt head, is an Anglo-Saxon word, and must not be confused with the old word bolt: 10. Fr. butler, connected with Lat. burra, a coarse cloth meaning a sieve, or to sieve. This latter word is almost obsolete, but is used by Browning:

The curious few
Who care to sit a business to the brain
Not coarsely bolt it like the simpler sort.

Ring and the Book, i, 921.

From meaning an arrow bolt came to be applied to the door fastening, which is of a similar shape, and these meanings (a missile capable of swift movement, and a fastening) have given rise to combinations and phrases of very separated meaning, as will be seen from the following.

Bolted arrow. A blunt arrow for shooting young rooks with a cross-bow; called "bolting rooks." A gun would not do, and an arrow would mangle the little things too much.

Bolt upright. Straight as an arrow.

Chaucer: Miller's Tale, 77.

The fool's bolt is soon spent. A foolish archer shoots all his arrows so heedlessly that he leaves himself no resources in case of need.

Bolstered. The horse bolted. The horse shot off like a bolt or arrow.

To bolt food. To swallow it quickly without waiting to chew it; hence, to bolt a Bill, a political phrase used of Bills that are passed whole before proper time or opportunity has been given for their consideration.

To bolt out the truth. To blurt it out; also to bolt out, to exclude or shut out by bolting the door.

A bolt from the blue. A sudden and wholly unexpected catastrophe or event, like a "thunderbolt" from the blue sky, or flash of lightning without warning and wholly unexpected. Here "bolt" is used for lightning, though, of course, in strict language, a meteorite, not a flash of lightning, is a thunderbolt.

Bolt in tun. In heraldry, a bird-bolt, in pale, piercing through a tun, often used as a public-house sign. The punning crest of Sergeant Bolton, who died 1787, was "on a wreath a tun erect proper, transperced by an arrow fesseways or." Another family of the same name has for crest "a tun with a bird-bolt through it proper." A third, harping on the same string, has "a bolt gules in a tun or." The device was adopted as a public-house sign in honour of some family who own it as a coat of arms.

Bolton. Bate me an ace, quoth Bolton. Give me some advantage. What you say must be qualified, as it is too strong. Ray says that a collection of proverbs was once presented to the Virgin Queen, with the assurance that it contained all the proverbs in the language; but the Queen rebuked the boaster with the proverb, "Bate me an ace, quoth Bolton," a proverb omitted in the compilation. John Bolton was one of the courtiers who used to play cards and dice with Henry VIII, and flattered the king by asking him to allow him an ace or some advantage in the game.

Bolus. Properly, a rather large-sized pill; so called from a Greek word meaning a roundish lump of clay.

Bomb. A metal shell filled with an explosive, From the Gr. bombos, any deep, especially humming, noise (ultimately the same word as boom).

King Bomba. A nickname given to Ferdinand II, King of Naples, in consequence of his cruel bombardment of Messina in 1848, in which the slaughter and destruction of property was most wanton.

Bomba II was the nickname given to his son Francis II for bombarding Palermo in 1860. He was also called Bombalino (Little Bomba).

Bombshell. A word used figuratively in much the same way as bolt in a bolt from the blue.

Bombast literally means the produce of the bombyx, or silk-worm (Gr. bombyx); formerly applied to cottonwool used for padding, and hence to inflated language.

We have received your letters full of love. . . .
And in our maiden council rated them . . .
As bombast and as lining to the time.

Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

Bombastes Furioso (bom bäs' têz fô ri ô' zô). One who talks big or in an ultra-bombastic way. From the hero of a burlesque opera so called by William Barnes Rhodes, produced in 1813 in parody of Orlando Furioso.

Bombay Duck. A fish, the bummalo, which is dried and eaten with curries.
Bombiti. See Barisal Guns.

Bon Gautier Ballads (bon gol' tvi'er). Parodies of contemporary poetry by W. E. Aytoun and Sir Theodore Martin. They first appeared in Tait's, Fraser's, and Blackwood's Magazines in the forties, and were published in volume form in 1885.

Bon mot (bong withhold a pun; a clever repartee.

Bon ton (Fr.). Good manners or manners accredited by good society.

Bon vivant (Fr.). A free liver; one who indulges in the "good things of the table." Bon vivre means much the same, but is rather stronger, suggesting one who makes a pursuit of other pleasures besides those of the table.

Bona Fide (bo' na fi' (Lat.). Without subterfuge or deception; really and truly. Literally, in good faith. To produce bona fides is to produce credentials, to give proof that someone is what he appears to be or can perform that which he says he can.

Bonanza (bo' na' za). This is a Spanish and Portuguese word meaning fair weather at sea, and prosperity generally. It found its way into English through the miners on the Pacific coast of N. America who applied it to any very rich body of ore in a mine. The silver deposits of the Comstock Mine in Nevada were thus called the Bonanza Mines.

Bona-roba (bo' na ro' ba). (from Ital. buona roba, good stuff, fine gown, fine woman). A courtesan; so called from the smartness of her robes or dresses.

We knew where the bona-robas were. 2 Henry IV, iii, 2.

Bond. Wines, and spirits and any dutiable article may be imported and left in bond in warehouses supervised by H. M. Customs and Excise without duty being paid. This enables a merchant to re-export without financial complications, or to import in bulk and pay duty on part of the goods at a time as he requires them. Wines and spirits are sometimes described as "bottled in bond"—i.e. bottled in H. M. warehouses, before there could be any adulteration.

Bondoica (bon dô' ka). One of the many forms of the name of the British Queen, which in Latin was frequently (and in English is now usually) written Boodicea (q. v.). Fletcher wrote a fine tragedy with this name (1616), the principal characters being Caractacus and Bondoica.

Bone. Old thieves' slang for "good," "excellent." From the Fr. bon. The lozenge-shaped mark chalked by tramps and vagabonds on the walls of houses where they have been well received is known among the fraternity as a "bone." Also slang for dice and counters used at cards: and the man who rattles or plays the bones in a negro minstrel show is known as "Uncle Bones."

Bone, To. To filch, as, I boned it. Shakespeare (2 Henry VI, i, 3) says, "By these ten bones, my lord . . ." meaning the tenfingers; and (Hamlet, iii, 2) calls the fingers "pickers and stealers." So "to bone" may mean to finger, that is, "to pick and steal."

Other suggested explanations of the origin of the term are that it is in allusion to the way in which a dog makes off with a bone, and that it is a corruption of the slang "bonnet" (q. v.).

You thought that I was buried deep
Quite decent-like and chary,
But from her grave in Mary-bone,
They've come and boned your Mary!
Hood: Mary's Ghost.

A bone of contention. A disputed point; a point not yet settled. The metaphor is taken from two dogs fighting for a bone.

Bred in the bone. A part of one's nature. "What's bred in the bone will come out in the flesh." A natural propensity cannot be repressed.

I have a bone in my throat. I cannot talk; I cannot answer your question.

I have a bone in my leg. An excuse given to children for not moving from one's seat. Similarly, "I have a bone in my arm," and must be used excusing it for the present.

Napier's bones. See Napier.

One end is sure to be bone. It won't come up to expectation. "All is not gold that glitters."

To give one a bone to pick. To throw a sop to Cerberus; to give a lucrative appointment to a troublesome opponent or a too zealous ally; in order to silence him and keep him out of the way. It is a method frequently resorted to in political life; one whose presence is not convenient in the House of Commons is sent to the Lords, given a Colonial appointment, or a judgeship, etc.

To have a bone to pick with someone. To have an unpleasant matter to discuss and settle. This is another allusion from the kennel. Two dogs and one bone invariably forms an excellent basis for a fight.

To make no bones about the matter. To do it, say it, etc., without hesitation; to offer no opposition, present no difficulty or scruple. Dice are called "bones," and the Fr. flatter len de (to mince the matter) is the opposite of our expression. To make no bones of a thing is not to flatter, or "make much of," or humour the dice in order to show favour. Hence without more bones. Without further scruple or objection.

Bone-lace. Lace woven on bobbins made of trotter-bones.

Bone-shaker. An "antediluvian," dilapidated four-wheel cab; also an early type of bicycle in use before rubber tyres, chain drive, spring saddles, etc., were thought of.

Boney (bo' ni). "If you aren't a good boy, Boney will catch you" was an old threat of the short-tempered nurse, Boney being Napoleon Bonaparte, whose threatened invasion of England was a real scare in the early 19th century.

Bonfire. Originally a bone-fire, that is, a fire made of bones; see the Festivall of 1493.

Boniface. A sleek, good-tempered, jolly landlord. From Farquhar's comedy of The Beaux Stratagem (1707).

St. Boniface. The apostle of Germany, an Anglo-Saxon whose original name was Winfrith or Winfrith. (680-750).

St. Boniface's cup. An extra cup of wine; an excuse for an extra glass. Pope Boniface, we are told in the Ebrietatis Encomium, instituted this indulgence to those who drank his good health after grace, or the health of the Pope of the time being. This probably refers to Boniface VI, an abandoned profligate who was elected Pope by the mob in 896 and held the position for only fifteen days. The only Saint Boniface to be Pope was Boniface I, who died in 422.

Bonne Bouche (Fr.). A delicious morsel; a little-bit.

Bonnet. A player at a gaming-table, or bidder at an auction, to lure others to play or bid, so called because he blinds the eyes of his dupes, just as if he had struck their bonnet over their eyes.

Braid bonnet. The old Scottish cap, made of milled woolen, without seam or lining.

Glengarry bonnet. The Highland bonnet, which rises to a point in front.

He has a green bonnet. Has failed in trade. In France it used to be customary, even in the 17th century, for bankrupts to wear a green bonnet (cloth cap).

He has a bee in his bonnet. See Bee.

Bonnet lairds. Local magnates or petty squires of Scotland, who wore the braid bonnet, like the common people.

Bonnet-piece. A gold coin of James V of Scotland, the king's head on which wears a bonnet.

Bonnet Rouge. The red cap of Liberty worn by the leaders of the French revolution. It is the emblem of Red Republicanism.

Bonnie Dundee. John Graham, of Claverhouse. Viscount Dundee. Born about 1649, he became a noted soldier in the Stuart cause, and was killed at the Battle of Killiecrankie in 1689.

Bonniard. See Chillon.

Bonny-clabber. Sour buttermilk used as a drink. (Irish, bainne, milk; claba, thick or thickened.)

It is against my freehold, my inheritance, My Magna Charta, cor letificat, To drink such balderdash or bonny-clabber! Give me good wine!

Ben Jonson: The New Inn, I, i.

Bono Johnny. John Bull is so called in the East Indies.

Bonus. Something "extra"; something over and above what was expected, due, or earned; something "to the good" (Lat. bonus, good). An extra dividend paid to shareholders out of surplus profits is called a bonus; so is the portion of profits distributed to certain insurance-policy-holders; and also—as was the custom in the case of Civil Servants and others—a payment made to clerks, workmen, etc., over and above that stipulated for to meet some special contingency that had been unprovided for when the rate was fixed.

Bonze. The name given by Europeans to the Buddhist clergy of the Far East, particularly of Japan. In China the name is given to the priests of the Fohists.

Booey. A spiritless fool, who suffers himself to be imposed upon.

Ye bread-and-butter rogues, do ye run from me? An my side would give me leave, I would so hunt ye, Ye porridge-gutted slaves, ye veal-broth boobies!

Beaumont and Fletcher: Humorous Lieutenant, iii, 7.

The player who comes in last in whist-drives, etc.; the lowest boy in the class. Also a species of Gannet, whose chief characteristic is that it is so tame that it can often be taken by hand.

A booby will never make a hawk. The booby, that allows itself to be fleeced by other birds, will never become a bird of prey itself.

To beat the booby. A sailors' term for warming the hands by striking them under the armpits.

Booey-prize. The prize—often one of a humorous or worthless kind—given to the "booby" at card parties, children's parties, etc., i.e., to the player who makes the lowest score.

Booby trap. A trap set to discomfit an unsuspecting victim.—e.g. among children, placing a book on top of a door to fall on whoever opens the door; in war, attaching an explosive charge to the door so that whoever opens it will be killed.

Boogie-woogie (boo'gi woo'gi). A style of piano playing of obscure origin, but probably developed among self-taught Negroes in Chicago during the early 1920s. Consists in maintaining a heavy repetitive pattern in the bass over which the right hand improvises at will.

Boojum. See Snark.

Book (A.S. book; Dan. buke; Ger. buche, a beech-tree). Beech-bark was employed for carving names before the invention of printing. Here on my trunk's surviving frame, Carved many a long-forgotten name. . . . As love's own altar, honour me: Spare, woodman, spare the beechen tree.

In betting the book is the record of bets made by the bookmaker with different people on different horses.

In whist, bridge, etc., the book is the first six tricks taken by either side. The whole pack of cards is sometimes called a "book"—short for "the Devil's picture-book."

Bell, book and candle. See Bell.

Beware of a man of one book. Never attempt to controvert the statement of anyone in his own special subject. A shepherd who cannot read will know more about sheep than the wisest bookworm. This caution is given by St. Thomas Aquinas.

He is in my books, or in my good books. The former is the older form; both mean to be in favour. The word book was at one time used by the word book was at one time used short for "the Book."

He is in my black (or bad) books. In disfavour. See Black Books.

On the books. On the list of a club, the list of candidates, the list of voters, or any official list. At Cambridge University they say "on the boards."

Out of my books. Not in favour; no longer on my list of friends.

The Battle of the Books. The Boyle controversy (q.v.).

That does not suit my book. Does not accord with my arrangements. The reference is to betting-books, in which the bets are formally entered.

The Book of Books. The Bible; also called simply "the Book," or "the good Book."

The Book of Life, or of Fate. In Bible language, a register of the names of those who are to inherit eternal life (Phil. iv, 3; Rev. xx, 12).

To book it. To take down an order; to make a memorandum; to enter in a book.

To bring him to book. To make him prove his words; to call him to account. Make him show what he says accords with what is written down in the indentures, the written agreement, or the book which treats of the subject.

To kiss the book. See Kiss.

To know one's book. To know one's own interest; to know on which side one's bread is buttered. Also, to have made up one's mind.

To speak by the book. To speak with meticulous exactness. To speak literatim, according to what is in the book.

To speak like a book. To speak with great precision and accuracy; to be full of information. Often used of a pedant.

To speak without book. To speak without authority: from memory only, without consulting or referring to the book.

To take one's name off the books. To withdraw from a club. In the passive voice, it means to be excluded, or no longer admissible to enjoy the benefits of the institution. See On the Books, above.

Book-binding. A craft practised since the early Middle Ages when books had become made up of leaves instead of being in a long roll. Most styles of binding are known by the names of their practitioners, but there are others which are known either from the type of design or the name of the patron commissioning them, e.g.:

Aldine. A simple design including a few graceful arabesques, the style in which the Venetian printer Aldus Manutius (fl. 1494-1515) had his wares bound for the general public.

Blind-tooled. A binding on which the ornament is colourless, i.e. the tools are pressed direct on to the leather without gold.

Canevari. A style combining gilt arabesques with a cameo, usually of some classical subject, impressed in the centre in blind. Generally ascribed to the Italian Demetrio Canevari, first half 16th century.

Cathedrale. Bindings executed during the second quarter of the 19th century. Under the influence of the Gothic Revival in France and England, the designs resemble the tracery of church windows, hence reliures à la cathedrale.

Club. Highly ornamental bindings executed at the "Club Bindery," the private shop projected by the Grolier Club, New York, during the first decade of the 20th century.

Cottage. A style peculiar to England in the later 17th century; the frame-work in the gilt design includes at top and bottom a triangle resembling a low gable. Associated with the name of Samuel Meanere, a stationer who (though not himself a binder) was binder by appointment to Charles II.

Dentelle. (Fr.) "Lace" style, so called from the fact that the design in gilt was of an intricacy and delicacy which resembled lace. Associated particularly with the Padeloup family of binders in France, first half 18th century.

Dos à Dos (Fr.) Back to back. Two books share three boards between them and open on opposite sides. Popular in the 17th century for binding books in pairs, such as the Old and New Testaments.

Fanfare (Fr., pomp.). Very rich bindings with an intricate pattern in gold over the whole, working out to the edges from a small oval in the centre which was either left plain or contained the coat of arms of the owner. Particularly brilliant exponent was the French binder Nicolas Eve, late 16th century.

Grolier. Bindings in the Italian arabesque style done for the French statesman Jean de Grolier (1479-1565). They all bear on the upper cover the lettering: J. Grolerii et amicorum.

Harleian. A style of binding used upon the Little Gidding. Nicholas Ferrar set up an English Protestant Nunnery at Little Gidding (Huntingdon) in 1623, at which binding was practised by all the inmates. Many bindings, particularly embroidered ones, are ascribed to them, but without any certainty.

Espalier. An intricate pattern of strapwork in gold is supplemented and heightened by staining the leather or inlaying it with another colour. As these bindings, which date from the second half of the 16th century, are mostly found on books printed at Lyons, they are so called, though it is not certain that they were done there.

Macabre. Bindings executed for Henry III of France after the death of the Princesse de Cleves, and using tears, skulls and bones tooled in silver to express his grief.

Pointillé. In this style all gilt lines are broken into a series of little dots to give a shimmering brilliance. The best exponent was the French binder Le Gascon, mid-17th century.

Roxburghe. Quarter bound in brown leather with crimson paper sides, the style chosen by the Roxburghe Club, an association of wealthy and noble bibliophiles at the beginning of the 19th century.

Sombre. Bindings in black leather tooled entirely in blind, a style affected in the 17th century in England for religious works.

Worton. Bindings executed for Thomas Worton, called the English Grolier because, copying the French collector, he had Thomas Worton et amicorum stamped on his books.

Mid-16th century.

Full bound. Bound fully in leather.

Half bound. Leather back and corners, with cloth or paper sides.

Quart bound. Leather back with cloth or paper sides.

Booking office. In coaching days, when accommodation in the stage coaches was very limited, the traveller had to enter his name in a book kept in the office of the coaching inn, and wait his turn for a place in the coach. For the first few years after the introduction of railways all tickets were written out and entered up in their books by the clerks in the booking offices.

Book-keeper. Clerk who keeps the accounts in merchant's offices, etc.

Book-keeping is the system of keeping debtor and creditor accounts in books provided for the purpose, either by single or by double entry. In the first named each debit or credit is entered only once into the ledger, either as a debit or credit item, under the customer's or salesman's name; in double entry, each item is entered twice into the ledger, once on the debit and once on the credit side.

Waste book. A book in which items are not posted under heads, but as each transaction occurred.

Day book. A book in which are set down the debits and credits which occur day by day. These are ultimately "posted" in the ledger (q.v.).

Bookmaker. A professional betting man who makes a "book" (see above) on horse-races, etc. Also called a bookie.

Bookworm. One always poring over books; so called in allusion to the maggot that eats holes in books, and lives both in and on their leaves.

Boom (boom). A sudden and great demand of a thing, with a corresponding rise in its price. This usage of the word seems to have arisen in America, probably with allusion to the suddenness and rush with which the shares "go off," the same word being used for the rush of a ship under press of sail. The word arises from the sound of booming or rushing water, and the sound made by the billet is known as booming.

The boom was something wonderful. Everybody bought, everybody sold.—MARK TWAIN: Life on the Mississippi, ch. 57.

It is also used of a period of rising prices and prosperity, general or particular.

Also a spar on board ship, or the chained line of spars, balks of timber, etc., used as a barrier to protect harbours, is the Dutch boom, meaning a tree or pole, our beam.

Boon-passenger. A convict on board a transport ship, who was chained to the boom when made to take his daily exercise.

Boomer. The Australian name, in use since the early 19th century, for their national animal, the kangaroo. It is possibly of Tasmanian aboriginal derivation.

Boon Companion. A convivial or congenial companion. A bon vivant is one fond of good living. "Who leads a good life is sure to live well." (Fr. bon, good.)

Boondoggling. An expression used in the early 1930s to denote useless spending, usually referring to the spending of money by the U.S. government to combat the depression.

Boot. An instrument of torture made of four pieces of narrow board nailed together, of a length to fit the leg. The leg being placed therein, wedges were inserted till the victim confessed or fainted.

All your empirics could never do the like cure upon the gout as the rack in England or your Scotch boots.—MARSTON: The Malcontent.

Boot and saddle. The order to cavalry for mounting. It is a corruption of the Fr. boute selle, put on the saddle, and has nothing to do with boots.

I measure five feet ten inches without my boots. The meaning is obvious but there is also an allusion to the chopine (q.v.) or high-heeled boot worn at one time to increase the stature.

Like old boots. Slang for vigorously; "like anything." "I was working like old boots" means "I was doing my very utmost."

Seven-leagued boots. The boots worn by the giant in the fairy tale, called The Seven-leagued Boots. A pace taken in them measured seven leagues.

The boot is on the other foot. The case is altered; you and I have changed places, and in degree, shall he the more deeply measured seven leagues.

You are utterly despondent; a humorous way of saying of dismissal from one's employment.

I will give you that to boot, i.e. in addition. The A.S. bôr (Gothic bota) means advantage, good, profit; as in Milton's "Alas, what boots it with uncessant care" (Lycidas), Alas, what profit is it . . . ?

It also meant compensation paid for injury; reparation. Cp. HOUSE-BOTE.

As anyone shall be more powerful . . . or higher in degree, shall he the more deeply make boot for sin, and pay for every misdeed. Laws of King Ethedred.

Bootless errand. An unprofitable or futile message.

I sent him Bootless home and weather-beaten back. SHAKESPEARE: 1 Henry IV, iii, 1.

When bale is highest boot is nighest. See BALE.

Boot-jack. See JACK.

Boots. A servant at inns, etc., whose duty it is to clean the boots. Dickens has a Christmas Tale (1855) called The Boots of the Holly-tree Inn.

The bishop with the shortest period of service in the House of Lords, whose duty it is to read prayers, is colloquially known as the "Boots," perhaps because he walks into the House in a dead man's shoes or boots, i.e. he was not there till some bishop died and left a vacancy.

Boötes (bô oo'têz). Greek for "the ploughman": the name of the constellation which contains the bright star, Arcturus. See ICARUS. According to ancient mythology, Boötes invented the plough, to which he yoked two oxen, and at death, being taken to heaven with his plough and oxen, was made a constellation. Homer calls it "the wagoner," i.e. the wagoner of "Charles's Wain," the Great Bear.

Wide o'er the spacious regions of the north,
That see Boötes urge his tardy wain.
THOMSON: Winter, 834.

Booty. The spoils of war.

Playing booty. A trick of dishonest jockeys —appearing to use every effort to come in first, but really determined to lose the race.

Mr. Kemble (in the Iron Chest) gave a slight touch of the jockey, and "played booty." He seemed to do justice to the play, but really ruined its success. GEORGE COLMAN THE YOUNGER.

Booze. To drink steadily and continually. Though regarded as slang, this is the M.E. bousen, to drink deeply, probably connected with Dut. biezen, and Ger. bosen, to drink to excess. Spenser uses the word in his description of Gluttony:—

Still as he rode, he somewhat still did eat,
And in his hand did bear a bousing can,
Of which he suppt so oft, that on his seat
His drunken corse he scarce upholden can.

Faerie Queene, 1, iv, 22.

Bor. A familiar term of address in East Anglia to a lad or young man; as, "Well, bor, I saw the maither you spoke of"—i.e. "Well, boy, I saw the lass . . . ." It is connected with the Dut. boer, a farmer, and with -bour of neighbourhood.

Borachio (bô ra'chô). Originally a Spanish wine bottle made of goat-skin; hence a drunkard, one who fills himself with wine.

"A follower of Don John, in Much Ado About Nothing, is called Borachio; he thus plays upon his own name:—

I will like a true drunkard [borachio], utter all to thee.—Act iii, 5.

Borak or Al Borak (bôr' ak) (the lightning). The animal brought by Gabriel to carry Mohammed to the seventh heaven, and itself received into Paradise. It had the face of a man, but the cheeks of a horse; its eyes were like jacinths, but brilliant as the stars; it had the wings of an eagle, spoke with the voice of a man, and glittered all over with radiant light.

Border. In Anglo-Saxon England, a villein of the lowest rank who did menial service for his lord in return for his cottage; the bordars, or bordari, were the labourers, and the word is the Med. Lat. bordarius, a cottager.

Border, The. The frontier of England and Scotland, which, from the 11th to the 15th century, was the field of constant forays, and a most fertile source of ill blood between North and South Britain.

March, march, Ettrick and Teviotdale.
Why the deil dinna ye march forward in order?
March, march, Eskdale and Liddesdale.
All the Blue Bonnets are bound for the border.

Bordar. In Anglo-Saxon England, a villein, the field of constant forays, and a most fertile source of ill blood between North and South Britain.

Bordeaux. The old port of Aquitania, whence wine was shipped to England; and also a county in France.

Border Minstrel. Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832), because he sang of the border.

Border States, The. The five "slave" states (Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri) which lay next to the "free states" were so called in the American Civil War, 1861-65.

Bore. A person who bestows his tediousness on you, one who wears you with his prate, his company, or his solicitations. The derivation of the word is uncertain; in the 18th century it was used as an equivalent for ennui; hence, for one who suffers from ennui, and afterwards for that which, or one who, causes ennui.

In racing terminology to bore is to ride so that another horse is thrust or pushed off the course, a sense in which it is also used of boats in rowing; in pugilistic language it is to cause one's opponent or to the ropes of the ring by sheer weight.

Bore of the Severn. In the Severn and other river estuaries certain winds cause a bore, or great tidal wave that rushes up the channel with violence and noise. In England it is best known in the Severn, Trent, Wye, and Solway Firth, but bores also occur in the Ganges, Indus, and Brahmapootta, in which ast the wave rises to some 12 feet.

Boreas (bōrē'ās). In Greek mythology, the god of the north wind, and the north wind itself. He was the son of Astraeus, a Titan, and Eos, the morning, and lived in a cave of Mount Haeus, in Thrace.

Hence boreal, of or pertaining to the north.

In radiant streams, Bright over Europe, bursts the Boreal morn.

TOMSON: Autumn, 98.

Jorgias (bōr'jāz). A glass of wine with the Jorgias was a great and sometimes fatal honour, for Caesar and Lucretia Borgia, children of Pope Alexander VI, were reputed to be adept in ridding themselves of foes or unwanted friends by inducing them to respond o pledges in poisoned wine.

Jorley or bawley (baw'li). The local name or a fishing-boat at the mouth of the Thames.

Born. Born in the purple (a translation of Gr. morphyrogenitus). The infant of royal parents in opposition to one born in the gutter, or the child of beggars. This refers to the chamber ined with porphyry by one of the Byzantine emperors for her accouchement, and has nothing to do with the purple robes of royalty.

Born with a silver spoon in one's mouth. Born to good luck: born with hereditary wealth. The reference is to the usual gift of a silver spoon by the godfather or godmother of a child. The lucky child does not need to wait for the gift, for it is born with it in its mouth or inherits it at birth. A phrase with a similar meaning is born under a lucky star; his, of course, is from astrology.

In all my born days. Ever since I was born; all my experience.

Not born yesterday. Not to be taken in; wortly wise.

Poets are born, not made. One can never be a poet by mere training or education if one has been born without the "divine afflatus."

A translation of the Latin phrase Poeta nas-titut non fit, of which an extension is Nascimur poetae finium oratores, we are born poets, we are made orators.

Borough (bōr'ō). There are several kinds of civic government classed under this term.

A Municipal Borough is a town with a fully organized municipal government with a mayor and corporation, usually possessing certain privileges granted by royal charter.

A Parliamentary Borough is one that sends it least one member to Parliament.

A Rotten or Pocket Borough was one of the small boroughs (sometimes consisting of but three or four electors) controlled by a wealthy or influential landholder, who as often as not held the right of sitting in Parliament as representative of this borough for some thousands of pounds. These men were frequently called Borough-mongers.

The Borough, used as a proper name, is applied to Southwark. It is also the title of a collection of poetical tales by George Crabbe (1810) about the Suffolk borough of Aldeburgh. One of these tales forms the theme of Peter Grimes, an opera by Benjamin Britten.

The word is sometimes spelled "burgh" and sometimes "boro" but it is always pronounced as above.

Borough English. A custom by which real estate passes to the youngest instead of the eldest son. It is of English, as opposed to French, origin, and was so called to distinguish it from the Norman custom.

If the father has no son, then the youngest daughter is sole heirless. If neither wife, son, nor daughter, the youngest brother inherits; if no brother, the youngest sister; if neither brother nor yet sister, then the youngest next of kin. See Cradle-Holding, and cp. Gavelkind.

The custom of Borough English abounds in Kent, Sussex, Surrey, the neighbourhood of London, and Somerset. In the Midlands it is rare, and north of the Humber . . . it does not seem to occur.—F. Pollock: Macmillan's Magazine, xlvii (1882).

Borowe. See Borrow.

Borrow. Originally a noun (A.S. borg) meaning a pledge or security, the modern sense of the verb depended on the actual giving in pledge of something as security for the loan; a security is not now essential in a borrowing transaction, but the idea that the loan is the property of the lender and must be returned some day is always present. The noun sense is seen in the old oath St. George to borowe, which is short for "I take St. George as pledge," or "as witness"; also in:—

Ye may retain as borrows my two priests.—Scott: Ivanhoe, ch. xxxiii.

Borrowed or borrowing days. The last three days of March are said to be "borrowed from April," as is shown by the proverb in Ray's Collection—"March borrows three days of April, and they are ill." The following is an old rhyme on the same topic:—

March said to April,
I see 3 hoggs [hoggets, sheep] upon a hill:
And if you'll lend me days 3
I'll find a way to make them dee [die].
The first o' them was wind and weet,
The second o' them was snow and sleet,
The third o' them, was sic a freeze
It froze the birds' nebs to the trees,
But when the Borrowed Days were gane
The 3 silly hoggs came hirpling [hopping] hame.

February also (in Scotland) has its "borrowed" days. They are the 12th, 13th and 14th, which are said to be borrowed from January. If these prove stormy the year will be favoured with good weather; but if fine, the year will be foul and unfavourable. They are called by the Scots Faoilteach, and hence faoilteach means execrable weather.

Borrowed time, to live on. To continue to live after every reasonable presumption is that one should be dead, i.e. living on time borrowed from Death.

Borstall (A.S. beork, a hill, and steall, place, or stigel, stile). A narrow roadway up the steep ascent of hills or downs. The word has given the name to the village of Borstal, near Rochester (Kent), and hence to the Borstal system, a method of treating youthful offenders against the law by technical instruction and education in order to prevent their drifting into the criminal classes. The first reformatory of this kind was instituted at Borstal in 1902.

Bossey (Austr.). A cricket term for a googly (q.v.) and so called from the English bowler B. J. T. Bosanquet who toured Australia in 1903-04. The term was also applied to a single bomb dropped from a plane, in World War II.

Bosh. A Persian word meaning worthless. It was popularized by James Morier in his novel Ayesha (1834), and other eastern romances.

I always like to read old Darwin's Love of the Plants: bosh as it is in a scientific point of view. KINGSLEY: Two Years Ago, ch. x.

Bosky. On the verge of drunkenness. This is a slang term, and it is possibly connected with the legitimate bosky meaning bushy, or covered with thickets, as in Shakespeare's:

And with each end of the blue bow dost crown
My bosky acres and my unshrub'd down.
---Tempest, iv, i, 81.

As "bosky acres" were overshadowed or obscured, so can a "bosky man" be said to be.

Bosom Friend. A very dear friend. Nathan says, "It lay in his bosom, and was unto him as a daughter" (2 Sam. xii, 3). Bosom friend, ami de cœur. St. John is represented in the New Testament as the "bosom friend" of Jesus.

Bosom sermons. Sermons committed to memory and learnt by heart; not extempore ones or those delivered from notes. The preaching from "bosom sermons" or from writing, being considered a lifeless practice before the Reformation.

BLUNT: Reformation in England, p. 179.

Bosporus (bos'pór'ús) (incorrectly written Bosphorus) is a Greek compound meaning "the ford of the ox," or "Oxford." Legend says that Zeus greatly loved Io; he changed her into a white cow or heifer from fear of Hera, to flee from whom Io swam across the strait, which was thence called bos poros, the passage of the cow. Hera discovered the trick, and sent a gadfly to torment Io, which was made to wander, in a state of frenzy, from land to land. The wanderings of Io were a favourite subject of story with the ancients. Ultimately, the persecuted Argive princess found rest on the banks of the Nile.

Boss, a master, is the Dut. baas, head of the household. Hence the great man, chief, an overseer.

The word was originally more widely used in the United States than in England, having been attached to political leaders, financial magnates, etc., who—generally by dubious methods—seek to obtain a preponderating influence. Hence boss-rule, and the verb to boss, which has become common in England also.

Boss-eyed. Slang for having one eye injured, or a bad squint, or for having only one eye in all. Hence, boss one's shot, to miss one's aim, as a person with a defective eye might be expected to do; and a boss, a bad shot. Boss-backed, a good old word for "hump-backed," is in no way connected with this. Boss here is a protuberance or prominence, like the bosses on a bridle or a shield.

Boston Tea-party. An incident leading up to the American War of Independence. The British Parliament had passed laws which favoured the London East India Company at the expense of American traders. Three cargoes of tea which arrived at Boston Harbour in 1773, shortly after the legislation, were thrown overboard as a protest by a party of colonists dressed as Indians. This act of defiance is known as the Boston Tea-party.

Botanomancy (bot'án o mā'nē) Divination by leaves. One method was by writing sentences on leaves which were exposed to the wind, the answer being gathered from those which were left; another was through the crackling made by the leaves of various plants when thrown on the fire or crushed in the hands.

Botany Bay. An extensive inlet in New South Wales, discovered by Captain Cook in 1770. It was the first place of his landing upon Australian soil, and Cook himself thus named it on account of the great variety of new plants found there. Botany Bay was wrongly applied as a name of the convict settlement established in 1788 at Sydney Cove. In contemporary parlance the name was applied not only to New South Wales but even to the whole of Australia.

Bothie (both'ē). An Irish or Gaelic word for a hut or cottage. The bothie system is a custom common in Scotland of housing the unmarried servants attached to a farm in a large one-roomed bothie.

The bothie system prevails, more or less, in the eastern and north-eastern districts.—J. BRIG, D.D.

The Bothie of Tober-na-Vuolich (1848) is a long hexameter poem by Arthur Hugh Clough.

Botley Assizes. The joke is to ask a Botley man, "When are the assizes coming on?" The reference is to the tradition that the men of Botley once hanged a man because he could not drink so deep as his neighbours.

Boo-tree. The pipal tree, or Ficus religiosa of India, allied to the banyan, and so called from Pali Bodhi, perfect knowledge, because it is under one of these trees that Gautama attained enlightenment and so became the Buddha. At the ruined city of Anuradhapura in Ceylon is a bo-tree that is said to have been grown from a cutting sent by King Asoka in 288 B.C.

Bottle. The accepted commercial size of a wine bottle is one holding 20½ fluid ounces per quart. Large bottles are named as follows:

Magnum... holding 2 ordinary bottles.
Double-magnum or Jeroboam... 4
Rehoboam... 6
Methuselah... 8
Salmanazar... 12
Balhazar... 16
 Nebuchadnezzar... 20

Bottle Bay. A name given to a strait, which was thence called bos poros, the passage of the cow. Hera discovered the trick, and sent a gadfly to torment Io, which was made to wander, in a state of frenzy, from land to land. The wanderings of Io were a favourite subject of story with the ancients. Ultimately, the persecuted Argive princess found rest on the banks of the Nile.
A three-bottle man. A toper who can drink three bottles of port at a sitting.

Brought up on the bottle. Said of a baby which is artificially fed instead of being nursed at the breast.

Looking for a needle in a bottle of hay, or in a haystack. Looking for a very small article amidst a mass of other things. Bottle is a punning of the Fr. botte, a bundle; as botte join, a bundle of hay.

Methods. I have a great desire to a bottle of hay. Midsummer Night's Dream, iv, i.

To bottle up one's feelings, emotions, etc. To suppress them; to hold them well under control.

To put new wine into old bottles. A saying (pounded on Matt. ix, 17; typical of incongruity. New wine expands as it matures. If put in a new skin (bottle) the skin expands with it; in an old skin, when the wine expands the skin bursts.

Bottle-chart. A chart of ocean surface currents made from the track of sealed bottles thrown into the sea.

Bottle-holder. One who gives moral but no material support. The allusion is to boxing or prize-fighting, where the attendant of each combatant, whose duty it is to wipe off blood, refresh him with water, and do other services to encourage his man to persevere and win, is called the bottle-holder.

Lord Palmerston considered himself the bottle-holder of oppressed States. He was the steadfast partisan of constitutional liberty in every part of the world.—The Times.

Bottle-washer. Chief agent; the principal man employed by another; a factotum. The all-phase—which usually is applied more or less sarcastically—is "chief cook and bottle-washer."

Bottled moonshine. Social and benevolent themes, such as Utopia, Coleridge's Pantasi­rama, the dreams of Owen, Fourier, St. Simon, etc.—New Republic, and so on.

The idea was probably suggested by Swift's satirist philosopher, in Gulliver's Travels, who had been eight years upon a project of extracting dreams out of cucumbers, which were to be put into glass bottles hermetically sealed, and let out to warm air in raw inclement summers.

bottom. In nautical language the keel of a ship, that part of the hull which is below the waves; hence, the hull itself, and hence extended to mean the whole ship, especially in such phrases as goods imported in British bottoms or in foreign bottoms.

A vessel is said to have a full bottom when the lower half of the hull is so disposed as to allow large stowage, and a sharp bottom when it is capable of speed.

Never venture all in one bottom—i.e., "do not put all your eggs into one basket," has illusion to the marine use of the word.

My ventures are not in one bottom trusted.

SHAKESPEARE: Merchant of Venice, ii, 1.

At bottom. Radically, fundamentally: as, we young prodigals lived a riotous life, but was good at bottom, or below the surface.

Talking of a very respectable author who had married a printer's devil, Dr. Johnson told us... "She did not disgrace him; the woman had a bottom of good sense." The word bottom thus introduced was so ludicrous that most of us could not forbear tittering and laughing. . . . Looking awful to make us feel how he could impose restraint . . . he slowly pronounced: "I say the woman was fundamentally sensible." We all sat composed as at a funeral.

BOSWELL'S Johnson.

At the bottom. At the base or root. Pride is at the bottom of all great mistakes.

RUSKIN: True and Beautiful, p. 426.

From the bottom of my heart. Without reservation. If one of the parties . . . be content to forgive from the bottom of his heart all that the other hath trespassed against him.—Prayer Book.

He was at the bottom of it. He really instigated it, or prompted it.

To have no bottom. To be unfathomable; to be unstable.

To get to the bottom of the matter. To ascertain the entire truth; to bolt a matter to its bran.

To knock the bottom out of anything. See Knock.

To stand on one's own bottom. To be independent. "Every tub must stand on its own bottom."

To touch bottom. To reach the lowest depth.

A horse of good bottom means of good stamina, good foundation.

Bottom the Weaver. A man who fancies he can do everything, and do it better than anyone else. Shakespeare has drawn him as profoundly ignorant, brawny, mock heroic, and with an overflow of self-conceit. He is in one part of Midsummer Night's Dream represented with an ass's head, and Titania, queen of the fairies, under a spell, caresses him as an Adonis.

The name is very appropriate, as one meaning of bottom is a ball of thread used in weaving, etc. Thus in Clark's Heraldry we read, "The coat of Badland is argent, three bottoms in fess gules, the thread or."

Bottomless Pit, The. Hell is so called in the book of Revelation, xx, 1. The expression had previously been used by Coverdale in Job xxxvi, 16.

William Pitt was humorously called the bottomless Pitt, in allusion to his remarkable thinness.

Bottomry. A nautical term implying a contract by which in return for money advanced to the owners a ship, or bottom (q.v.), is, in a manner, mortgaged. If the vessel is lost the lender is not repaid; but if it completes its voyage he receives both principal and interest.

Boudicca. The preferred form of Boadicea (q.v.).

Boudoir. Properly speaking, a room for sulking in (Fr. boudoir, to sulk). When the word was introduced into England in the last quarter of the 18th century it was as often applied to a man's sanctum as to a woman's retiring room; now, however, it is used only for a private apartment where a lady may retire, receive her intimate friends, etc.

Bought and Sold, or Bought, Sold, and Done For. Ruined, done for, outwitted.

For Decon, thy master, is bought and sold.

Richard III, v. 3.

It would make a man mad as a buck to be so bought and sold—Comedy of Errors, iii, 1.

Bouillabaisse (boo' ya bas). A soup, for which Marseilles is celebrated, made of fish boiled with herbs in water or white wine.

Boulangerism (boo lonj' izm). This was a sort of political frenzy that swept over France in 1886-87. General Boulanger (1837-91) was a smart soldier who, in 1886, was appointed minister of war. By genuine reforms in the army, but more by a spectacular display of his disastrous sweeping the country in a wave of patriotism and xenophobia, the Boulangist movement died out from lack of any man to lead it. Boulanger fled to exile, and eventually committed suicide in Brussels.

Bouillabaisse (pronounced boor' bon). The Bourbon Kings of France were Henry IV, Louis XIII, XIV, XVI (1589-1793), Louis XVIII and Charles X (1814-30). The family is so named from the seigniory of Bourbon, in the Bourbonnais, in Central France, and is a branch of the Capet stock, through the marriage of Beatrix, heiress of the Bourbons, to Robert, Count of Clermont, sixth son of Louis IX, in 1272. Henry IV was tenth in descent from Louis IX and the twentieth king to succeed him. Bourbons also reigned over Naples and the two Sicilies, and the present royal house of Spain is Bourbon, being descended from Philippe, Duke of Anjou, a grandson of Louis XIV, who became King of Spain in 1700.

It was said of the Bourbons that they forgot nothing and learned nothing.

In the U.S.A. the term Bourbon is used for whisky made from Indian corn, sometimes with rye or malt added. The name comes from Bourbon (pron. bér' bun) County, Kentucky, where the whisky was originally made.

Bourgeois (Fr.). Our burgess; a member of the class between the "gentlemen" and the peasantry. It includes merchants, shopkeepers, and the so-called "middle class.

In typography, bourgeois (pronounced bour' jois) is the name of a size of type between long primer and brevier.

Bourgeoisie (Fr.). The merchants, manufacturers, and master-tradesmen considered as a class.

The Commons of England, the Tiers-Etat of France, the bourgeoisie of the Continent generally are the descendants of this class (artisans) generally called artisans. In political economy, the word bourgeoisie has been applied more particularly to the unimaginative, conventional, and narrow-minded section of the middle classes.

Bouser. See BOOZE.
Boustrapa. A nickname of Napoleon III; in allusion to his unsuccessful attempts at a coup d’état at Boulogne (1840) and Strasburg (1850) and the successful one at Paris (1851).

Boustrophedon (boo ströf’ e dôn). A method of writing found in early Greek inscriptions in which the lines run alternately from right to left and left to right, like the path of oxen in ploughing. (Gr. bous ‘strophi o, ox-turning.)

Bouts-rimés (boo rë mä) (Fr. rhymed-endings). A parlour game which, in the 18th century, had a considerable vogue in literary circles as a test of skill. A list of words that rhyme with one another is drawn up; this is handed to the competitors, and they have to make a poem to the rhymes, each rhyme-word being kept in its place on the list.

Bovey Coal. A lignite found at Bovey Tracy, Devonshire.

Bow (bō) (A.S. boga; connected with the O.Teut. beguan, to bend.)

Draw not your bow till your arrow is fixed. Have everything ready before you begin.

He has a famous bow up at the castle. Said of a braggart or pretender.

He has two strings to his bow. Two means of accomplishing his object; if one fails, he can try the other. The allusion is to the custom of bowmen carrying a reserve string in case of accident.

To be too much of the bow-hand. To fail in a design; not to be sufficiently dexterous. The bow-hand is the left hand; the hand which holds the bow.

To draw a bow at a venture. To attack with a random remark; to make a random remark which may hit the truth.

A certain man drew a bow at a venture and smote the King of Israel.—1 Kings, xxii, 34.

To draw the longbow. To exaggerate. The longbow was the famous English weapon till gunpowder was introduced, and it is said that a good archer could hit between the fingers of a man’s hand at a considerable distance, and could propel his arrow a mile. The tales told about longbow adventures, especially in the Robin Hood stories, fully justify the application of the phrase.

To unstring the bow will not heal the wound (Ital.). René d’Anjou, king of Sicily, on the death of his wife, Isabeau of Lorraine, adopted the emblem of a bow with the string broken, with the words given above for the motto, by which he meant, “Lamentation for the loss of his wife was but poor satisfaction.”

Bow (bou). The fore-end of a boat or ship. (A.S. bōg or bōh, connected with Dan, bōg, Icel. bôgr, a shoulder.)

On the bow. Within a range of 45° on one side or the other of the prow.

Up in the bows, To be. To be thoroughly enraged.

Bow Bells (bô). Born within sound of Bow bells. Said of a true cockney. St. Mary-le-Bow long had one of the most celebrated bell-peals in London. John Dun, mercer, gave in 1472 two tenements to maintain the ringing of Bow bell every night at nine o’clock, to direct travellers on the road to town; and in 1520 William Copland gave a bigger bell for the purpose of “sounding a retreat from work.” Bow Church, in Cheapside, is in the centre of the City. The interior of the church was totally destroyed in an air raid in 1941, but the tower remained almost unharmed though the bells were destroyed.

Bow-catcher (bō). A corruption of “Beau catcher,” a love-curl, termed by the French an accroche cœur. A love-curl worn by a man is a Bell-rope, i.e. a rope to pull the belles with.

Bow-street Runners (bō). Detectives who scourcd the country to find criminals, before the introduction of the police force. Bow Street, near Covent Garden, is where the principal London police-court stands.

Bow-wow Word (bou wou). A word in imitation of the sound made, as hiss, cackle, murmur, cuckoo, etc. Hence the bow-wow school, a term applied in ridicule to philologists who sought to derive speech and language from the sounds made by animals. The terms were first used by Max Müller.

Bowden (bou’ den). Not every man can be vicar of Bowden. Not everyone can occupy the first place. Bowden is one of the best livings in Cheshire.

Bowdlerize (bou’dler ız). To expurgate a book. Thomas Bowdler, in 1818, gave to the world an edition of Shakespeare’s works “in which nothing is added to the original text; but those words and expressions are omitted which cannot with propriety be read aloud in a family.” This was in ten volumes. Bowdler subsequently treated Gibbon’s Decline and Fall in the same way. Hence the words Bowdlerist, Bowdlerizer, Bowdlerism, etc.

Bowels of Mercy. Compassion, sympathy. The affections were at one time supposed to be the outcome of certain secretions or organs, as the bile, the kidneys, the heart, the head, the outcome of certain secretions or organs, as his inward conviction; the heart of affection and understanding; the heart of affection and memory (hence “learning by heart”), the bowels of mercy, the spleen of passion or anger, etc.

His bowels yearned over, upon, or towards him. He felt a secret affection for him.

Joseph made haste, for his bowels did yearn upon his brother.—Gen. xlvi, 30; see also Kings, iii, 26.

Bower. A lady’s private room. (A.S. biur, a chamber.)

But come to my bower, my Glasgerion.

When all men are at rest:

As I am a lade true of my promise,

Hence, bower-woman, a lady’s maid and companion.

Bower, the term used in euchre, is an entirely different word. It is bauer, a peasant or knave.

But the hands that were played
By that heathen Chinee,
And the points that he made,
Were quite frightful to see—
Till at last he put down a right bower
Which the same Nye had dealt unto me.

BRET HARTE: Plain Language from Truthful James.

The right bower is the knave of trumps; the left bower is the other knave of the same colour.

Bower anchor. An anchor carried at the bow of a ship. There are two: one called the best bower, and the other the small bower. Starboard being the best bower, and port the small bower.—SMYTH: Sailor’s Word-book.

Bower of Bliss. In Spenser’s Faerie Queene (Bk. 11) the beautiful enchanted home of Acrasia.

Bowie Knife (bō’i). A long, stout knife with a horn handle and a curved blade some 15 in. long and 11 in. wide at the hilt, carried by hunters in the Western States of America. So called from Colonel James Bowie (d. 1836), with a horn handle and a curved blade some 15 in. long and 1 in. wide at the hilt, carried by hunters in the Western States of America. So called from Colonel James Bowie (d. 1836), one of the most daring characters in the States.

Bowing (bou’ing). We uncover the head when we wish to salute anyone with respect; but the Jews, Turks, Siamese, etc., uncover their feet. The reason for this: With us the chief act of investiture is crowning or placing a cap on the head; but in the East it is putting on the slippers. To take off our symbol of honour is to confess we are but “the humble servant” of the person whom we thus salute.

Bowler Hat. This stiff, felt hat—known in America as a Derby hat—was the invention of a London hatter. The Daily News for August 8th, 1868, says: “Mr. Bowler, of 15 St. Swithin’s Lane has, by a very simple contrivance invented a hat that is completely ventilated whilst, at the same time, the head is relieved of the pressure experienced in wearing hats of the ordinary description.” The last words apply to the hot and heavy top hats until then in universal use.

Bowing, Tom (bō ling). The type of a model sailor; from the character of that name in Smollett’s Roderick Random.

Bowling, Tom (bō ling). The type of a model sailor; from the character of that name in Smollett’s Roderick Random.

The Tom Bowling referred to in Dibdin’s famous sea-song was Captain Thomas Dibdin, brother of Charles Dibdin (1768-1833), who wrote the song, and father of Thomas Frognall Dibdin, the bibliomaniac.

Here a sheer hulk lies poor Tom Bowling,
The darling of the crew.

Bowls. They who play bowls must expect to meet with rubbers. Those who touch pitch must expect to defile their fingers. Those who enter upon affairs of chance, adventure, or dangerous hazard must make up their minds to encounter crosses, losses, or difficulties. The rubber is the final game which decides who is the winner.

Bowral Boy. The name familiarly given to Sir Donald Bradman, the great Australian cricketer, who first played in the Bowral school team.

Bowse. See BROWSE. and fists," and implying training as in athletics, for the purpose of developing righteousness and harmony.

Boy. In a number of connexions "boy" has no reference to age. In India, the colonies, and elsewhere, for instance, a native or negro servant or labourer of whatever age is called a boy. and among sailors the word refers only to experience in seamanship. A crew is divided into able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys or greenhorns. A "boy" is not required to know anything about the practical working of the vessel, but an "able seaman" must know all his duties and be able to perform them.

The Boy, meaning champagne, takes its origin from a shooting-party at which a boy with an iced bucket of wine was in attendance. When the Prince of Wales (Edward VII), who was one of the shots, needed a drink he shouted "Where's the boy?", and thence the phrase found its way into would-be smart parlance. He will say that port and sherry his nice palate always chose. He'll drink but "B. and S." and big magnums of "the boy."

Punch (1882).

Boy Bishop. St. Nicholas of Bari was called "the Boy Bishop" because from his cradle he manifested marvellous indications of piety; the custom of choosing a boy from the cathedral choir on his day (December 6th), as a mock bishop, is very ancient. The boy possessed episcopal honour for three weeks, and the rest of the choir were his prebendaries. If he died during his time of office he was buried in pontificalibus. Probably the reference is to Jesus Christ sitting in the Temple among the doctors while He was a boy. The custom was abolished in the reign of Henry VIII.

Naked boy. See NAKED.

Boy Scouts were started in Great Britain by General Baden-Powell in 1908, with the purpose of training lads to be good citizens with ideals of honour, thoughtfulness for others, cleanliness, obedience and self-reliance. The movement spread to other countries and in 1950 had a membership of over five million young people. Scouts are graded according to age into three classes; Wolf Cubs, 8 to 11; Scouts, 11 and upwards; Rover Scouts over 17. See also GIRL GUIDES.

Boycott. To boycott a person is to refuse to deal with him, to take any notice of him, or even to sell to him. The term arose in 1881, when Captain Boycott, an Irish landlord, was thus ostracized by the Irish agrarian insurgents. One word as to the way in which a man should be boycotted. When any man has taken a farm from which a tenant has been evicted, or is a grabber, let everyone in the parish turn his back on him; have no communication with him; have no dealings with him. You need never say an unkind word to him; but never say anything at all to him. If you must meet him in fair, walk away from him silently. Do him no violence, but have no dealings with him. Let every man's door be closed against him; and make him feel himself a stranger and a castaway in his own neighbourhood.—I. DIETZ, M.P.: Speech to the Land League (February 26th, 1881).

Boyle Controversy. A book-battle between Charles Boyle, fourth Earl of Orrery, and the famous Bentley, respecting the Epistles of Phalaris, which were edited by Boyle in 1695. Two years later Bentley published his celebrated Dissertation, showing that the epistles (see PHALARIS) were spurious, and in 1699 published another rejoinder, utterly annihilating the Boyle partisans. Swift's Battle of the Books (q.v.) was one result of the controversy.

Boyle's law. The volume of a gas is inversely proportional to the pressure if the temperature remains constant. If we double the pressure on a gas, its volume is reduced to one-half; if we quadruple the pressure, it will be reduced to one-fourth; and so on; so called from the Hon. Robert Boyle (1627-91).

Boyle Lectures. A course of eight sermons on natural and revealed religion delivered annually at St. Mary-le-Bow Church, London. They were instituted by the Hon. Robert Boyle, and began in 1692, the year after his death.

Boz. Charles Dickens (1812-70). "Boz... my signature in the Morning Chronicle," he tells us, "was the nickname of a pet child, a younger brother, whom I had dubbed Moses, in honour of the Vicar of Wakefield, which, being pronounced Boses, got shortened into Boz."

Bozzy. James Boswell (1740-95), the biographer of Dr. Johnson.

Bozzaris, Marco. See Leonides of Modern Greece.

Brabançon (bra ban san). The national anthem of Belgium, composed by Van Campenhout in the revolution of 1830, and so named from Brabant, of which Brussels is the chief city.

Braccata. See Gens Braccata; Gallia.

Brace of Shakes. See SHAKES.

Bradamante (brad' a mant). The sister of Rinaldo in Orlando Furioso and Innamorato. She is represented as a wonderful Christian Amazon, possessed of an irresistible spear which unhorsed every knight it struck.

Bradbury. A £1-note, as issued by the Treasury 1914-28, bearing the signature of J. S. Bradbury (subsequently Baron Bradbury), who was at that time Permanent Secretary to the Treasury.

Bradshaw's Guide was started in 1839 by George Bradshaw (1801-53) printer, in Manchester. The Monthly Guide was first issued in December, 1841, and consisted of thirty-two pages, giving tables of forty-three lines of English railway.

Brag. A game at cards; so called because the players brag of their cards to induce the company to make bets. The principal sport of the game is occasioned by any player bragging that he holds a better hand than the rest of the party, which is declared by saying "I brag," and staking a sum of money on the issue. (Hoyle.)
Brag

Brag is a good dog, but Holdfast is a better. Talking is all very well, but doing is far better. Trust none; for oaths are straw, men’s faiths are wafer-cakes. And hold-fast is the only dog, my duck.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry V, ii, 3.

Jack Brag. A vulgar, pretentious braggart, who gets into aristocratic society, where his vulgaritv stands out in strong relief. The character is in Theodore Hook’s novel of the same name.

Braggadocio (brág à dō’ sī ô). A braggart; one who is valiant with his tongue but a great coward at heart. Cpr. ERYTHYNUS. The character is from Spenser’s Faerie Queene, and a type of the “Intemperance of the Tongue.” After a time, like the jackdaw in borrowed plumes, Braggadocio is stripped of all his glories: his shield is claimed by Sir Marinell; his lady is proved by the golden girdle to be the false Florimel; his horse is claimed by Sir Guyon; Talus shaves off his beard and scourges his squire; and the pretender sneaks off amidst the jeers of everyone. It is thought that the poet had the Duke d’Alençon, a suitor of Queen Elizabeth, in his eye when he drew this character (Faerie Queene, ii, 3; iii, 5, 8, 10; iv, 2, 4; v, 3; etc.).

Brahma. A worshipper of Brahma, properly speaking, is the Absolute, or God conceived as entirely impersonal; this theological abstraction was later endowed with personality, and became the Creator of the universe, the first in the divine Triad, of which the other partners were Vishnu, the maintainer, and Siva (or Shiva), the destroyer. As such the Brahmns claim Brahma as the founder of their religious system.

Brahmas in India, holds the sacred name Of piety or lore, the Brahmns claim; In wildest rituals, vain and painful, lest, Brahma, their founder, as a god they boast.

CAMOENS: Lusiad, Bk. vii.

Brahmin. A worshipper of Brahma, the highest caste in the system of Hinduism, and of the priestly order. See Caste.

Brahmo Somaj (Sanskrit, “the Society of Believers in the One God”). A monotheistic sect of Brahmns, founded in 1818 in Calcutta by Ramohun Roy (c. 1777-1833), a wealthy and well-educated Brahmin who wished to purify his religion and found a National Church which should be free from idolatry and superstition. In 1844 the Church was reorganized by Debendro Nath Tagore, and since that time its reforming zeal and influence has gained it many adherents.

Brains Trust. Originally a name applied by James M. Kieran of the New York Times to the advisers of Franklin Roosevelt in his election campaign. Later applied to the group of college professors who advised him in administering the New Deal. In England the name was given to a popular radio programme in which well-known public figures aired their views on questions submitted by listeners.

Brain-wave. A sudden inspiration; “a happy thought.”

Bran. If not Bran, it is Bran’s brother. “Mar e Bran, is e a brachair” (if it be not Bran, it is Bran’s brother) was the proverbial reply of Maccombieh.—SCOTT: Waverley, ch. xiv.

If not the real “Simon Pure,” it is just as good. A complimentary expression. Bran was Fingal’s dog, a mighty favourite. See also BRENNU.

Brand. The merchant’s or excuse mark branded on the article itself, the vessel which contains the article, the wrapper which covers it, the cork of the bottle, etc., to guarantee its being genuine, etc.

He has the brand of villain in his looks. It was once customary to brand convicted persons with a red-hot iron; thus, in the reign of William III convicted criminals were branded with R (rogue) on the shoulders, M (manslayer) on the right hand, and T (thief) on the left; and felons were branded on the cheek with an F. The custom was abolished by law in 1822.

Ranchers whose herds roamed the Western plains of the U.S.A. branded their cattle with a distinctive iron. One enterprising rancher named Maverick made his fortune by declaring that he had no iron, and appropriating any cattle on which no brand was visible. Hence a Maverick is a wanderer, knowing no master.

Brandan, St., or Brendan. A semi-legendary Irish saint, said to have died and been buried at Clonfert (at the age of about 94), in 577, where he was abbot over 3,000 monks.

He is best known on account of the very popular medieval story of his voyage in search of the Earthly Paradise, which was supposed to be situated on an island in mid-Atlantic. The voyage lasted for seven years, and the story is crowded with marvellous incidents, the very birds and beasts he encountered being Christians and observing the fasts and festivals of the Church!

And we came to the Isle of a Saint who had sailed with St. Brendan of yore. He had lived ever since on the Isle and his winters were fifteen score.

TENNYSON: Voyage of Maudene.

Brandenburg. Confession of Brandenburg. A formulary or confession of faith drawn up in the city of Brandenburg in 1610, by order of the elector, with the view of reconciling the tenets of Luther with those of Calvin, and to put an end to the disputes occasioned by the Confession of Augsburg.

Brandon. An obsolete form of brand, a torch. Dominica de brandonibus (St. Valentine’s Day), when boys used to carry about brandons (Cupid’s torches).
Brandy.  A spirit distilled from the fermented juice of the grape, and may be made wherever wine is made. The most famous are those made in the Cognac and Armagnac districts of France.

Brandy Nan.  Queen Anne who was very fond of brandy. On her statue in St. Paul’s Churchyard a wit once wrote:—

Brandy Nan. Brandy Nan, left in the lurch, Her face to the gin-shop, her back to the church.

A “gin palace” used to stand at the southwest corner of St. Paul’s Churchyard.

Brank.  A Scotch word for a gag for scolds. It consisted of an iron framework fitting round the head, with a piece projecting inwards which went into the mouth and prevented the “tongue-wagging.” One is preserved in the vestry of the church of Walton-on-Thames. It is dated 1633, and has the inscription:

Chester presents Walton with a bridle.
To curb women’s tongues that talk too idle.

Brant-goose.  See BREN'T-GOOSE.

Brasenose (bráz’nóz) (Oxford). Over the gate is a brass nose. the arms of the college; but the word is a corruption of braesenhuis, a brasserie or brewhouse, the college having been built on the site of an ancient brewery. For over 450 years the original nose was at Stamford, for in the time of Edward III the students, in search of religious liberty, migrated thither, taking the bronze nose with them. They were soon recalled, but the nose remained on their Stamford gateway till 1890, when, the property coming into the market, it was acquired by the College.

Brass.  Impudence, effrontery. As bold as brass, with barefaced effrontery. Brass is also a slang term for money.

A church brass is a funereal effigy made in latten and fastened down to a tombstone forming part of the floor of a church. Such effigies are mostly of the 14th and 15th centuries and are decorative in design. Rubbings can be made most successfully with cooiber's wax on coarse paper.

The Man of Brass. Talus, the work of Vulcan. He traversed Crete to prevent strangers from setting foot on the island, threw rocks at the Argonauts to prevent their landing, and used to make himself red-hot, and then hag intruders to death.

Brass Hat.  A soldier's name for a staff officer, or an officer of high rank. It dates from the South African War (1899-1902), and refers to the gold oak leaves with which such officers' hats were ornamented on the brim.

To get down to brass tacks. To get down to the essentials, or the tasks which hold the structure together.

Brassbounder.  A premium apprentice on a merchant ship.

Brat.  A child, especially in contempt. The origin of the word is unknown, but it may be from the Welsh breth, swaddling clothes, or Gaelic brat, an apron.

O Israel! O household of the Lord!
O Abraham's brats! O broad of blessed seed!

GASCOIGNE: De Profundis.

Brave.  A fighting man, among the American Indians, was so called.

Alonso IV, of Portugal (1290-1357) was so called.

Bravest of the Brave (Le Brave des Braves). Marshal Ney (1769-1815). So called by the troops of Friedland (1807), on account of his fearless bravery. Napoleon said of him, “That man is a lion.”

Bravery.  Finery is the Fr. braverie. The French for courage is bravoure.

What woman in the city do I name
When that I say the city woman bears
The cost of princes on unworthy shoulders?
Who can come in and say that I mean her? . . .
Or what is he of basest function
That says his bravery is not of my cost?

Brawn.  The test of the brawn's head. A little boy one day came to the court of King Arthur, and, drawing his wand over a boar's head, declared, “There's never a cuckold's knife can carve this head of brawn.” No knight in the court except Sir Cradock was able to accomplish the feat. (Percy's Reliques.)

Bray.  See VICAR.

Brasen Age.  The age of war and violence. It followed the silver age.

To this next came in course the brazen age, A warlike offspring, prompt to bloody rage, Not impious yet. Hard steel succeeded then, And stubborn as the metal were the men.

DRYDEN: Metamorphoses, i.

Brass-faced.  Bold (in a bad sense), without shame.

What a brass-faced varlet art thou!  SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, ii, 2.

Brasen head.  The legend of the wonderful head of brass that could speak and was omniscient is common property to early romances, and is of Eastern origin. In Valentine and Orson, for instance, we hear of a gigantic head kept in the castle of the giant Ferragus (q.v.) of Portugal. It told those who consulted it whatever they required to know, past, present, or to come; but the most famous in English legend is that fabled to have been made by the great Roger Bacon.

It was said if Bacon heard it speak he would succeed in his projects; if not, he would fail. His familiar, Miles, was set to watch, and while Bacon slept the Head spoke thrice: “Time is”; half an hour later it said, “Time was.” In another half-hour it said, “Time's past,” fell down, and was broken to atoms. Byron refers to this legend.

Like Friar Bacon's brazen head, I've spoken,
"Time is," "Time was," "Time's past."

References to Bacon's Brazen Head are frequent in literature. Most notable is Robert Greene's Honorable History of Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay, 1594. Among other allusions may be mentioned.

Bacon trembled for his brazen head.

POPE: Dunciad, iii, 104.

Quoth he, “My head's not made of brass,
As Friar Bacon's noggin was.”  BUTLER: Hudibras, ii, 2.

See also SPEAKING HEADS.
Brazen out, To. To stick to an assertion knowing it to be wrong; to outface in a shameless manner; to disregard public opinion.

Breach of Promise. A contract to marry is as binding in English law as any other contract, and if it is broken the party breaking it is liable to pay damages. The woman who breaks an engagement is just as liable in law as a man. In actions for breach of promise of marriage the plaintiff is entitled to the recovery of any pecuniary loss, such as the cost of a trousseau, and such sentimental or punitive damages as the jury may consider appropriate. See BETROTHAL.

Breaches, meaning creeks or small bays, is to be found in Judges v. 17. Deborah, complaining of the tribes who refused to assist her in her war with Sisera, says that Asher remained "in his breaches," that is, creeks on the seashore.

Spenser uses the word in the same way:—
The heedful Boateman strongly forth did stretch His brawnie armed, and all his body straine, That th' utmost sandy breach they shortly fetch.

In Coverdale's version of the Bible the passage is rendered Ass er sat in the haven of the see, and taried in his porcions.

Bread. Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days (Eccles. xi, 1). When the Nile overflows its banks the weeds perish and the soil is disintegrated. The rice-seed being cast into the water takes root, and is found in due time growing in healthful vigour. Don't quarrel with your bread and butter. Don't foolishly give up the pursuit by which you earn your living.

To break bread. To partake of food. Common in Scripture language. Upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached to them. —Acts xx, 7.

Breaking of bread. The Eucharist. They continued ... in breaking of bread, and in prayer. —Acts ii, 42 and 46.

He took bread and salt, i.e. he took his oath. In Eastern lands bread and salt were formerly eaten when an oath was taken.

To know which side one's bread is buttered. To be mindful of one's own interest.

To take the bread out of someone's mouth. To forestall another; to say something which another was on the point of saying; to take away another's livelihood.

Bread-basket. The stomach.

Bread and cheese. The barest necessities of life.

Breadalbanc. See ALBANY.

Break, To. To bankrupt (q.v.).

To break a bond. To dishonour it.

To break a butterfly on a wheel. To employ superabundant effort in the accomplishment of a small matter. Satire or sense, alas! can Sporus feel. Who breaks a butterfly upon a wheel.

Pope: Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, 307-8.

To break a journey. To stop before the journey is accomplished, with the intention of completing it later.

To break a matter to a person. To be the first to impart it, and to do so cautiously and piecemeal.

To break bread. See BREAD.

To break cover. To start forth from a hiding-place.

To break down. To lose all control of one's feelings: to collapse, to become hysterical. A break-down is a temporary collapse in health; it is also the name given to a wild kind of negro dance.

To break faith. To violate one's word or pledge; to act traitorously.

To break ground. To commence a new project. As a settler does.

To break in. To interpose a remark. To train a horse to the saddle or to harness, or to train any animal or person to a desired way of life.

To break one's fast. To take food after long abstinence; to eat one's breakfast after the night's fast.

To break one's neck. To dislocate the bones of one's neck.

To break on the wheel. To torture on a "wheel" by breaking the long bones with an iron bar. Cf. Coup de Grace.

To break out of bounds. To go beyond the prescribed limits.

To break the ice. To prepare the way; to cause the stiffness and reserve of intercourse with a stranger to relax; to impart to another bit by bit distressing news or a delicate subject.

To break your back. To make you bankrupt; to reduce you to a state of impotence. The metaphor is from carrying burdens on the back.

To break up. To discontinue classes at the end of term time and go home; to separate. Also, to become rapidly decrepit or infirm. "Old So-and-so is breaking up; he's not long for this world."

To break up housekeeping. To discontinue keeping a separate house.

To break with someone. To cease from intercourse.

If thou dost love fair Hero, cherish it; And I will break with her, and with her father, And thou shalt have her. Much Ado, i. 1.

To get a break. To have an unexpected chance; to have an opportunity of advancing oneself in business, etc.

To make a break may mean either to make a complete change, or it may imply the committing of some social error, an unfortunate mistake.

To run up a score in billiards or snooker.

Break. A short solo improvisation in jazz music.

Breakers Ahead. Hidden danger at hand. Breakers in the open sea always announce sunken rocks, sand banks, etc.
Breaking a Stick. Part of the marriage ceremony of certain North American Indians, as breaking a wing glass is part of the marriage ceremony of the Jews.

In one of Raphael's pictures we see an unsuccessful suitors of the Virgin Mary breaking his stick. This alludes to the legend that the several suitors were each to bring an almond stick, which was to be laid up in the sanctuary overnight, and the owner of the stick which budded was to be accounted the suitor which God approved of. It was thus that Joseph became the husband of Mary.

In Florence is a picture in which the rejected suitors break their sticks on Joseph's back.

Breast. To make a clean breast of it. To make a full confession, concealing nothing.

Breath. All in a breath. Without taking breath (Lat. continens spiritum). It takes one's breath away. The news is so astounding it causes one to hold one's breath with surprise.

Out of breath. Panting from exertion; temporarily short of breath.

Save your breath to cool your porridge. Don't talk to me, it is only wasting your breath.

You might have saved your breath to cool your porridge.—Mrs. Gaskell: Libbie Marsh (Era III).

To catch one's breath. To check suddenly the free act of breathing.

"I see her," replied I, catching my breath with joy.

Capt. MARRYAT: Peter Simple.

To hold one's breath. Voluntarily to cease breathing for a time.

To take breath. To cease for a little time from some exertion in order to recover from exhaustion of breath.

Under one's breath. In a whisper or undertone of voice.

To breathe one's last. To die.

Brèche de Roland. A deep defile in the crest of the Pyrenees, some three hundred feet in width, between two precipitous rocks. The legend is that Roland, the paladin, clef the rock in two with his sword Durandal, when he was set upon by the Gascons at Roncesvalles. Then would I seek the Pyrenean Beech

Which Roland clove with huge two-handed sway.

Wordsworth: Aix-la-Chapelle.

Breeches. To wear the breeches. Said of a woman who usurps the prerogative of her husband. Similar to The grey mare is the better horse. See Grey.

Breeches Bible, The. See Bible, specially named.

Breeches buoy. A pair of short canvas breeches forming a cradle in which, by means of a pulley and rope, people can be conveyed from ship to ship or ship to shore.

Breeze, meaning a light gale or strongish wind (arch. figuratively, a slight quarrel) is from the Fr. brise, and Span. brisa, the north-east wind.

Breeze, the small ashes and cinders used in burning bricks, and nowadays worked up into breeze-blocks for building, is the Fr. braise, older form brese, meaning glowing embers, or burning charcoal, and is connected with Swe. brasa, fire, and our brazier. Breeze in breeze-fly is A.S. briosas. So the three words, breeze, are in no way connected.

The breeze-fly. The gad-fly; called from its sting (A.S. briosas; Goth. bry, a sting).

Breezy. A breezy person is one who is open, jovial, perhaps inclined to be a little boisterous.

Brehon Laws (bré' hon). This is the English name for an ancient legal system which prevailed in Ireland from about the 7th century. They cover every phase of Irish life and furnish an interesting picture of the country in those early days.

Brendan, St. See BRANDAN.

Bren-gun. The World War II equivalent of a Lewis (q.v.) machine-gun. It was originally made in Brno, Czechoslovakia, and then manufactured in Enfield, England. The word "bren" is a blend of Brno and Enfield.

Brennus. The name of the Gaulish chief who overran Italy and captured Rome about 390 B.C. is the Latin form of the Celtic word Brenhin, king or war-chief. Breg, a name of frequent occurrence in Welsh history, is the same word.

Brent. Without a wrinkle. Burns says of Jo Anderson, in his prime of life, his "locks were like the raven," and his "bonnie brow was bret."

Brent-hill means the eyebrows. Looking or gazing from under brent-hill, in Devonshire means "frowning at one"; and in West Cornwall to brend means to wrinkle the brows.

Brent-goose. Formerly in England, and still in America, called properly a brant-goose, the Branta bernicla, a brownish-grey goose of the genus branta.

For the people of the village

Saw the flock of brant with wonder.

LONGFELLOW: Hiawatha, pt. xvi, stanza 32.

Brentford. Like the two kings of Brentford smelling at one nosegay. Said of persons who were once rivals, but have become reconciled. The allusion is to The Rehearsal (1672), by the Duke of Buckingham. "The two kings of Brentford enter hand in hand," and the actors, to heighten the absurdity, used to make them enter "smelling at one nosegay" (act ii, sc. 2).

Bressummer (brest' um är), or Brent-summer (Fr. sommier, a lintel or bressummer). A beam supporting the whole weight of the building above it; as, the beam over a shop-front, the beam extending over an opening through a wall when a communication between two contiguous rooms is required; but properly applied only to a bearing beam in the face of a building. Summer, here, is the O.Fr. sommier, for Lat. sagmarius (late Lat. saumarius), a pack-horse, also a beam on which a weight can be laid.

Bretwalda (bret' wol'da). The name given to Egbert and certain other early English kings who exercised a supremacy—often rather shadowy—over the kings of the other English states. See Heptarchy. It means “ruler” or “overlord of the Bretons” or “Britons.”

The office of Bretwalda, a kind of elective chieftainship, of all Britain, was held by several Northumbrian kings, in succession.

Brevet Rank (brev‘ét). Titular rank without the pay that usually goes with it. A brevet major had the title of major, but the pay of captain, or whatever his substantive rank happened to be. (Fr. brevet, dim. of bref, a letter, a document.)

Breviary (bre‘vē-är‘i). A book containing the daily “Divine Office,” those in orders in the Roman Catholic Church are bound to recite. The Office consists of psalms, collects, readings from Scripture, and the life of some saint or saints.

Brew. Brew me a glass of grog, i.e. mix one for me. Brew me a cup of tea, i.e. make one for me. The tea is set to brew, i.e. to draw. The general meaning of the word is to boil or mix; the restricted meaning is to make malt liquor.

As you brew, so you will bake. As you begin, so you will go on; you must take the consequences of your actions; as you make your bed, so you will lie in it.

Boy: What have they appointed to fight?
Boy: Ay, Nicholas; wilt thou not go see the fray?
Nick: No, indeed; even as they brew, so let them bake. I will not thrust my hand into the flame, an I need not. . . . they that strike with the sword shall be beaten with the scabbard.—Porter: Two Angy Women of Abington (1599).

To brew up. To burn. Said of tanks in World War II.

Brewer. The Brewer of Ghent, Jakob van Artevelde (d. 1345): a popular Flemish leader who, though by birth an aristocrat, was a member of the Guild of Brewers.

Brian Boru, or Boroma (bri‘án bo roo‘, bo ro‘ ma‘). This great Irish chieftain was king of Munster in 978 and became chief king of all Ireland in 1002. On Good Friday, 1014, his forces defeated the Danes at the battle of Clontarf, but Brian, who was too old to fight, being almost eighty, was killed in his tent.

Briareus (bri‘är-ë‘ús), or Ægeon. A giant with fifty heads and a hundred hands. Homer says the gods called him Briareus, but men called him Ægeon (Iliad, i, 403). He was the offspring of Heaven and Earth and was of the race of the Titans, with whom he fought in the war against Zeus.

He (Ajax) hath the joints of every thing, but every thing so out of joint that he is a gouty Briareus, many hands and no use, or purblind Argus, all eyes and no sight.—Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, i, 2.

The Briareus of languages. Cardinal Mezzofanti (1774-1849), who is said to have spoken fifty-eight different tongues. Byron called him “a walking polyglot: a monster of languages; a Briareus of parts of speech.”

Bold Briareus. Handel (1685-1759), so called by Pope:

Strong in new arms, lo! giant Handel stands,
Like bold Briareus, with a hundred hands;
To stir, to rout, to shake the soul he comes,
And Jove’s own thunders follow Mars’s drums.

Pope: Dunciad, iv, 63.

Briar-root Pipe. A tobacco-pipe made from the root-wood of the large heath (bruyere), which grows in the south of France.

Bribery and Corruption is a phrase often used rather loosely in English. In English law a bribe is a gift or other material inducement held out to a person to betray a trust or duty. Bribing at an election is a very serious offence, of which briber and bribed are held to be equally guilty. The payment of secret commissions to induce business is forbidden by the Prevention of Corruption Act of 1906. The servant or agent asking for such a bribe is equally punishable with the bidder, the maximum punishment being a fine of £500 with or without imprisonment for a maximum of two years.

Briboci (bri bô‘si). Inhabitants of part of Berkshire and the adjacent counties referred to by Caesar in his Commentaries.

Bric-à-brac. Odds and ends of curiosities. In French, a marchand de bric-à-brac is a seller of rubbish, as old nails, old screws, old hinges, and other odds and ends of small value; but we employ the phrase for odds and ends of vertu. Bricoler in archaic French means faire toute espece de metier, to be Jack of all trades. Bric is the rochet of bric, as fiddle-faddle and scores of other double words in English. Littre says that it is formed on the model of de bric et de brac, by hook or by crook.

Brick. A regular brick. A jolly good fellow; perhaps because a brick is solid, four-square, plain, and reliable.

A fellow like nobody else, and in fine, a brick.—George Eliot: Daniel Deronda, Bk. ii, ch. 16.

To make bricks without straw. To attempt to do something without having the necessary material supplied. The allusion is to the Israelites in Egypt, who were commanded by their taskmasters so to do (Ex. v, 7).

To drop a brick. To make a highly tactless remark.

Brick-and-mortar franchise. A Chartist phrase for the £10 household system, long since abolished.

Brickdusts. See Regimental Nicknames.

Brickfielder (Austr.). A southerly gale experienced at Sydney which used to blow dust into the city from the nearby brickfields.

Brick tea. The inferior leaves of the plant mixed with a glutinous substance (sometimes bullock’s or sheep’s blood), pressed into cubes, and dried. These blocks were frequently used as a medium of exchange in Central Asia.

Bride. The bridal wreath is a relic of the corona nuptialis used by the Greeks and Romans to indicate triumph.

Bride-ale. See Church-ale. It is from this word that we get the adjective bridul.

Bride cake. A relic of the Roman confraratio, a mode of marriage practised by the highest class in Rome. It was performed before ten witnesses by thePontifex Maximus, and the contracting parties mutually partook of a cake made of salt, water, and flour (far). Only those born in such wedlock were eligible for the high sacred offices.

Bride or wedding favours represent the true lover's knot, and symbolize union.

Bride of the Sea. Venice: so called from the ancient ceremony of the wedding of the sea by the Doge, who threw a ring into the Adriatic saying, "We wed thee, O sea, in token of perpetual domination." This took place each year on Ascension Day, and was enjoined upon the Venetians in 1177 by Pope Alexander III, who gave the Doge a gold ring from his own finger in token of the victory achieved by the Venetian fleet at Istra over Frederick Barbarossa, in defence of the pope's quarrel. At the same time his Holiness desired that the doges should throw a similar one into the sea on each succeeding Ascension Day, in commemoration of the event. See Bucentaur.

Bridegroom. In O.E. this word was bridgome (A.S. bryd-guma), from Gothic guma, a man. In M.E. times the -gome became corrupted into grome, and owing to this confusion and the long loss of the archaic guma, the word became connected with grom, or grome, a lad (which gives our groom), and hence the modern bridegroom.

Bridegroom's men. In the Roman marriage by confarreatio, the bride was led to the Pontifex Maximus by scholars, but was conducted home by married men. Polydore Virgil says that a married man preceded the bride on her return, bearing a vessel of gold and silver. See Bride Cake.

Bridewell. A generic term for a house of correction, or prison, so called from the City Bridewell, in Blackfriars, which was built as a hospital on the site of a former royal palace over a holy well of medical water, called St. Bride's (Bridget's) Well. After the Reformation, Bridewell was made a penitentiary for unruly apprentices and vagrants. It was demolished in 1863.

At my first entrance it seemed to me rather a Prison than a House of Correction, till gazing round me, I saw in a large room a parcel of ill-looking mortals stripped to their shirts like hawkers, pounding hemp... From thence we turned to the women's apartment, who we found were shut up as close as ovens. But like so many slaves they were under the care and direction of an overseer who walked about with a very flexible weapon of such hempen journey, women as were unhappily troubled with the spirit of idleness.—NED WARD: The London Spy.

Bridge. A variety of whist, said to have originated in Russia, in which one of the hands ("dummy") is exposed. Auction Bridge is a modification of bridge, in which there are greater opportunities for gambling.

Contract Bridge is a development of Auction Bridge in which the pair of partners cannot score the tricks they win towards making a game unless they have previously contracted to do so. To win a game one of the pairs must score 100 points for tricks as contracted, the value of the tricks being reckoned in points according to whatever suit is trumps. The further ramifications of Contract Bridge call for a modern "Hoyle" rather than a modern "Brewer."

Bridge of Gold. According to a German tradition, Charlemagne's spirit crosses the Rhine on a golden bridge at Bingen, in seasons of plenty, to bless the vineyards and cornfields.

Thou standest, like imperial Charlemagne, Upon thy bridge of gold.

LONGFELLOW: Autumn.

Made a bridge of gold for him; i.e. enabled a man to retreat from a false position without loss of dignity.

Bridge of Jehennam. Another name for Al-Strat (q.v.).

Bridge of Sighs. Over this bridge, which connects the palace of the doge with the state prisons of Venice, prisoners were conveyed from the judgment-hall to the place of execution.

I stood in Venice on the Bridge of Sighs,
A palace and a prison on each hand.
BYRON: Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, iv, 1.

A bridge over the Cam at St. John's College, Cambridge, which resembles the Venetian original, is called by the same name.

Waterloo Bridge, in London, used, some years ago, when suicides were frequent there, to be called The Bridge of Sighs, and Hood gave the name to one of his most moving poems:—

One more unfortunate,
Weary of breath,
Rashly importunate.
Gone to her death!

Bridgehead. In war a small perimeter beyond a bridge seized by assault-troops to keep the enemy at bay while larger forces cross and deploy. A beachhead is a similar perimeter established on shore for a sea-borne landing, and it is often improperly referred to as a "bridgehead."

Bridgewater Treatises. Instituted by the Rev. Francis Henry Egerton, Earl of Bridgewater, in 1829. He left the interest of £8,000 to be given to the author of the best treatise on "The power, wisdom, and goodness of God, as manifested in the Creation." The money was divided between the following eight authors:—Dr. Chalmers, Dr. John Kidd, Dr. Whewell, Sir Charles Bell, Dr. Peter M. Roget, Dean Buckland, the Rev. W. Kirby, and Dr. William Prout.

Bridle. To bite on the bridle is to suffer great hardships. Horses bite on the bridle when trying, against odds, to get their own way.

Bridle road or way. A way for a riding-horse, but not for a horse and cart.

To bridle up. In Fr. se rengorger, to draw in the chin and toss the head back in scorn or pride. The metaphor is to a horse pulled up suddenly and sharply.

Bridport. Stabbed with a Bridport dagger, i.e. hanged. Bridport, in Dorsetshire, was once famous for its hempen goods, and monopolized the manufacture of ropes, cables, and tackling for the British navy. The hangman's rope being made at Bridport gave birth to the proverb.—Fuller: Worthies.
Brief. In legal parlance, a summary of the relevant facts and points of law given to a counsel in charge of a case. Hence, a briefless barrister, a barrister with no briefs, and therefore no clients.

Brief is also the name given to a papal letter of less serious or important character than a bull (q.v.); and, in the paper trade, to foolscap ruled with a marginal line, and either thirty-six or forty-two transverse lines, also to the size of a foolscap sheet when folded in half.

Brig, brigantine (brig, brig' an tän). The terms applied to two smaller types of sailing vessel. A brig was a two-masted craft with both masts square-rigged; the brigantine, also two-masted, had the fore-mast square-rigged and the main-mast fore-and-aft rigged.

Brigade of Guards. See Household Troops.

Brigand. A French word, from the Ital. brigante, pres. part. of brigare, to quarrel. In England brigands were originally light-armed, irregular troops, like the Bashi-Bazouks, and, like them, were addicted to marauding. The Free Companies of France were brigands.

In course of time the Ital. brigante came to mean a robber or pirate; hence the use of brigandine, laterbrigantine, for a sailing vessel, and also brig (q.v.).

Brigantine (brig' an din). The armour of a brigand, consisting of small plates of iron on quilted linen, and covered with leather, hemp, or something of the kind. The word occurs twice in Jeremiah (xlv, 4; li, 3), and in both of these passages the Revised Version reads "coats of mail," while for the first Coverdale gives "breastplates." In the Geneva Version Goliath's coat of mail is called a "brigandine."

Brilliant. A form of cutting of precious stones introduced by Vincenzo Peruzzi at Venice in the late 17th century. Most diamonds are now brilliant-cut, and the word "brilliant" commonly means a diamond cut in this way. In a perfect brilliant there are 58 facets.

Bring. To bring about. To cause a thing to be done.

To bring down the house. To cause rapturous applause in a theatre.

To bring into play. To cause to act, to set in motion.

To bring round. To restore to consciousness or health; to cause one to recover (from a fit, etc.).

To bring to. To restore to consciousness; to resuscitate. There are other meanings.

"I'll bring her to," said the driver, with a brutal grin. "I'll give her something better than camphor."

Mrs. STOWE: Uncle Tom's Cabin.

To bring to bear. To cause to happen successfully.

To bring to book. To detect one in a mistake.

To bring to pass. To cause to happen.

To bring to the hammer. To offer or sell by public auction.

To bring under. To bring into subjection.

To bring up. To rear from birth or an early age. Also numerous other meanings.

Brinvilliers, Marquise de (brin vē'yā), a noted French poisoner. She was born about 1630 and was executed in Paris in 1676. Having ruined her husband, the Marquis, and squandered his fortune, she became the lover of the Seigneur de Sainte Croix, who instructed her in the use of a virulent poison, supposed to have been aqua tofana. With this she poisoned her father and other members of her family in order to obtain possession of the family lands and wealth. Her crimes came to light when she accidentally poisoned Sainte Croix, in 1672.

Briny. I'm on the briny. The sea, which is salt like brine.

Brioche (brē' osh). A kind of sponge-cake made with flour, butter, and eggs. When Marie Antoinette was talking about the bread riots of Paris during October 5th and 6th, 1789, the Duchesse de Polignac naïvely exclaimed, "How is it that these silly people are so clamorous for bread, when they can buy such nice brioches for a few sous?" It is said that our own Princess Charlotte avowed "that she would for her part rather eat beef than starve," and wondered that the people should be so obstinate as to insist upon having bread when it was so scarce.

Brisbane Line. In World War II a defensive position running from north of Brisbane to north of Adelaide, to which it was intended to retire if the Japanese invaded Australia in 1942.

Brises (bri' sē is). The patronymic name of Hippodamia, daughter of Brisius. She was the cause of the quarrel between Agamemnon and Achilles, and when the former robbed Achilles of her, Achilles refused any longer to go to battle, and the Greeks lost ground daily. Ultimately, Achilles sent his friend Patroclus to supply his place; he was slain, and Achilles, towering with rage, rushed to battle, slew Hector, and Troy fell.

Brissetins. A nickname given to the advocates of reform in the French Revolution, because they were "led by the nose" by Jean Pierre Brissot. The party was subsequently called the Girondists (q.v.).

Bristol Board. A stiff drawing-paper with a smooth surface, or a fine quality of cardboard composed of two or more sheets pasted together, the substance of board being governed by the number of sheets. Said to have been first made at Bristol.

Bristol Boy, The. Thomas Chatterton (1752-70), who was born at Bristol, and there composed his Rowley Poems. See ROWLEY.

The marvellous boy.

The sleepless soul that perished in his pride.

WORDSWORTH: Revolution and Independence.

Bristol cream is a particularly fine rich brand of sherry. See BRISTOL MILK.
Bristol diamonds. Brilliant crystals of colourless quartz found in St. Vincent's Rock, Clifton, near Bristol.

Spenser refers to them as "adamants":—

But Axon marched in more stately path,

Proud of his Adamants, with which he shines
And glisters wide, as als of wondrous Bath,
And Bristol's faire.

Faerie Queene, IV, xi, 31.

Bristol fashion. In. Methodical and orderly.

More generally Shipshape and Bristol fashion.

A sailor's phrase: said in Smyth's Sailor's Word Book to refer to the time "when Bristol was in its palmy commercial days... and its shipping was all in proper good order."

Bristol milk. Sherry sack, at one time given by the Bristol people to their friends.

This metaphorical milk, whereby Xeres or Sherry-sack is intended.—Fulcher: Worthy.

Bristol waters. Mineral waters of Clifton, near Bristol, with a temperature not exceeding 74°; formerly celebrated in cases of pulmonary consumption. They are very rarely used now.

Britain. The derivation of this word is not surely known; but its first recorded use is by the Greeks, who probably obtained it through the Greek colony at Massilia (Marseilles). Itan, or etan, in Basque signifies a district or country; the root appears in many names, e.g. Aquitania. Lusitania, Mauretania.

Another suggestion is that it is from the Cymric-Celtic root, brith, meaning "to paint," with allusion to woad-painting of their bodies by the aborigines.

Great Britain consists of "Britannia prima" (England), "Britannia secunda" (Wales), and "North Britain" (Scotland), united under one sway. The term first came into use in 1604, when James I was proclaimed "King of Great Britain."

Greater Britain. The whole British Empire, i.e. Great Britain, the Dominions and Colonies.

Britannia. The first known representation of Britannia as a female figure sitting on a globe, leaning with one arm on a shield, and grasping a spear in the other hand, is on a Roman coin of Antoninus Pius, who died A.D. 161. The figure reappeared on our copper coin in the reign of Charles II, 1665, and the model was Frances Stewart, afterwards created Duchess of Richmond. The engraver was Philip Roetier, 1665.

The King's new medall, where in little, there is Mrs. Stewart's face... and a pretty thing it is, that she should choose her face to represent Britannia by.—Pepys' Diary.

British Council. This was established in 1934 for the purpose of encouraging British cultural interests abroad, including the formation of schools, the introduction of foreign students to this country, and the projection of a knowledge of all aspects of British life and thought through the press, films, distribution of literature, exhibitions, lectures, concerts and plays. The British Council is financed by Parliament, on a Foreign Office vote.

British Empire, Order of the. This order was instituted in 1917 with two divisions, military and civil. It is conferred for services rendered to the Empire, whether at home or abroad and is given to women equally with men. There are five classes: Knight Grand Cross (G.B.E.); Knight Commander (K.B.E.); Commander (C.B.E.); Officer (O.B.E.); and member (M.B.E.). In the case of women D.B.E. (D = dame) takes the place of K.B.E.

British lion. The. The pugnacity of the British nation, as opposed to the John Bull, which symbolizes the substantiality, solidity, and obstinacy of the people, with all their prejudices and national peculiarities.

To twist the tail of the British lion used to be a favourite phrase in America for attempting to annoy the British people and government by abuse and vituperation. This was usually resorted to with the object of currying favour with citizens of Irish birth and getting their votes.

Britisher. A. An American term for a Briton, a native of the British Isles, often with a derogatory implication.

Britomart (brit's omart). In Spenser's Faerie Queene, a female knight, daughter of King Ryence of Wales. She is the personification of chastity and purity. She encounters the "savage, fierce bandit and mountaineer" without injury, and is assaulted by "hag and uniald ghost, goblin, and swart fairy of the mine," but "dashes their brute violence into sudden abandon and blank awe." She finally marries Artegaill.

Spenser got the name, which means "sweet maiden," from Britomartis, a Cretan nymph of Greek mythology, who was very fond of the chase. King Minos fell in love with her, and in his advance for nine months, when she threw herself into the sea.

Britten, to fight like a Briton. To fight with indomitable courage.

To work like a Briton is to work hard and perseveringly. Certainly, without the slightest flattery, dogged courage and perseverance are the strong characteristics of John Bull. A similar phrase is "To work like a Trojan."

Brittany, The Damsel of. Eleanor, daughter of Geoffrey, second son of Henry II of England, and Constance, daughter of Conan IV of Brittany. At the death of Prince Arthur (1203) she was heiress to the English throne, but John confined her in Bristol castle, where she died in 1241.

Broach. To broach a new subject. To start one in conversation. The allusion is to beer barrels, which are tapped by means of a peg called a broach. So "to broach a subject" is to introduce it, to bring it to light, as beer is drawn from the cask after the latter has been broached.

I did broach this business to your highness. Henry VIII, ii, 4.

Broad Arrow. The representation of an arrowhead placed on Government stores, and also upon the uniform of convicts. It was introduced by Henry, Earl of Romney, who was Master General of the Ordnance, 1693-1702 and employed his own cognizance of a phoen, or broad arrow.
Broad Bottom Ministry. An administration formed by a coalition of parties in 1744. Pelham retained the lead; Pitt supported the Government; Bubb Dodington was treasurer of the navy. It held office till 1754.

Broadcasting. This is the term used to describe the sending out of wireless programmes of news, music, etc., to be received by those who have the necessary apparatus to listen in. The first transmitting station for entertainment and educational purposes began broadcasting in 1920. In May, 1922, the Marconi Co. began a programme of speech and music from Marconi House, London (2LO). In October of the same year the British Broadcasting Company came into being, and in 1926 this became the British Broadcasting Corporation (B.B.C.) with a royal charter. In 1950 the number of licences issued amounted to nearly twelve million.

Broadcloth. The best cloth for men’s clothes. So called from its great breadth. It required two weavers, side by side, to fling the shuttle across it. Originally two yards wide, now about forty-four inches; but the word is now used to signify a fine, plain-wove, black cloth.

An honest man, close-button’d to the chin,
Broadcloth without, and a warm heart within.
Cowper: Epistle to Joseph Hill.

Broadside. A large sheet of paper printed on one side only; strictly, the whole should be in one type and one measure, i.e. must not be divided into columns. It is also called a broadsheet.

Van Citters gives the best account of the trial. I have seen a broadside which confirms his narrative.

Macaulay: History.

In naval language, a broadside means the whole side of a ship; and to “open a broadside on the enemy” is to discharge all the guns on one side at the same moment.

Brobbingnag. In Swift’s Gulliver’s Travels, the country of giants, to whom Gulliver was a pigmy “not half so big as a round little worm plucked from the lazy finger of a maid.” Hence the adjective, Brobbingnagian, colossal.

Broken. See Spectre.

Brodie, Steve. He jumped off Brooklyn Bridge 3rd July, 1886. Known as “the man who wouldn’t take a dare,” he made this leap to win a bet of $200.

Brogue. An Irish word, brog, a shoe, connected with A.S. broc, breeches. A brogue is properly a stout coarse shoe of rough hide; and secondarily hose, trousers. The use of brogue for the dialect or manner of speaking may be from this—i.e. “brogue” is the speech of those who wear “brogues”; but it is by no means certain.

Broken Music. In Elizabethan England this term meant (a) part, or concerted music, i.e. music performed on instruments of different classes, such as the, “consorts” given in Morley’s Consort Lessons (1599), which are written for the treble lute, cithern, pandora, flute, treble viol, and bass viol, and (b) music played by a string orchestra, the term in this sense probably originating from harps, lutes, and such other stringed instruments as were played without a bow, not being able to sustain a long note. It is in this sense that Bacon uses the term:

Dancing to song is a thing of great state and pleasure. I understand it that a song be in quire, placed aloft and accompanied with some broken music.—Essays: Of Masques and Triumphs.

Shakespeare two or three times makes verbal play with the term:

Pand.: What music is this?

Serv.: I do but partly know, sir; it is music in parts...

Pand.: . . . . Fair Prince, here is good broken music.

Paris.: You have broke it, cousin; and by my life, you shall make it whole again.

Troilus and Cressida, iii, 1.

Broken on the Wheel. See Break.

Broker. This word meant originally a man who broached wine, and then sold it; hence, one who buys to sell again, a retailer, a second-hand dealer, a middleman. The word is formed in the same way as tapster, one who taps a cask. In modern use some restricting word is generally prefixed: as bill-broker, cotton-broker, ship-broker, stock-broker, etc.

Bromide. A person given to making trite remarks; later, the remark itself. It was first used in this sense by the American novelist Gelett Burgess (1866-1951) in his novel Are You a Bromide? 1906.

Brontës (brōn’tëz). A blacksmith personified; in Greek mythology, one of the Cyclops. The name signifies Thunder.

Not with such weight, to frame the forkly brand,
The ponderous hammer falls from Brontës’ hand.

Hoole: Jerusalem Delivered, Bl. xx.

Broom. The small wild shrub with yellow flowers (Lantia planta genista) from which the English royal dynasty, the Plantagenets, took their name. The founder of the dynasty, Geoffrey of Anjou (father of Henry II) is said to have worn a sprig of it in his hat. The name was officially adopted by Richard of York (father of Richard III) about 1460.

Broom. A broom is hung at the masthead of ships about to be sold—to be “swept away.” The idea is popularly taken from Admiral van Tromp (see PENNANT); but probably this allusion is more witty than true. The custom of hanging up something special to attract notice is very common; thus an old piece of carpet from a window indicates household furniture for sale; a wisp of straw indicates oysters for sale; a bush means wine for sale, etc.

New brooms sweep clean. Those newly appointed to an office are as a rule very zealous and sometimes ruthless in sweeping away old customs.

Brosier-my-dame. A phrase used at Eton for eating out of house and home. When a dame keeps an unusually bad table, the boys agree together on a day to eat, pocket, or waste everything eatable in the house. The censure is well understood, and the hint is generally effective. (Gr. broso, to eat.)
Brother. A fellow-member of a religious order. Friar, from Lat. frater, and Fr. frère, is really the same word.

Also used as the official title of certain members of livery companies, of the members (always a known as "Elder Brethren") of Trinity House (q.v.), and the official mode of address of one barrister to another.

Brother used attributively with another substantive denotes a fellow-member of the same calling, order, corporation, etc. Thus brother birch, a fellow-schoolmaster, brother-blade, a fellow-soldier or companion in arms, brother bung, a fellow licensed victualler, brother mason, a fellow freemason, etc., etc.

Brother Jonathan. When Washington was in want of ammunition, he called a council of officers, but no practical suggestion could be offered. "We must consult brother Jonathan," said the general, meaning His Excellency Jonathan Trumbull, governor of the State of Connecticut. This was done, and the difficulty was remedied. "To consult Brother Jonathan" then became a set phrase, and Brother Jonathan became the "John Bull" of the United States.

Brougham (bróám, brum). In old horse-drawn days this was the name given to a closed four-wheel carriage drawn by one horse, very similar to the old "growler" horse cab. It was named after Lord Brougham (1778-1868), a prominent Regency and Victorian lawyer and politician.

Browbeat. To beat or put a man down with sternness, arrogance, insolence, etc.; from knitting the brows and frowning on one's opponent.

Brown. A copper coin, a penny; so called from its colour. Similarly a sovereign is a "yellow boy."

To be done brown. To be deceived, taken in: to "roast." This is one of many similar expressions connected with cooking. See COOKING.

Browned off. This is a slang phrase that came into general use during World War II, meaning "fed up," bored or disillusioned. Various derivations of the phrase have been suggested, but none of them appears satisfactory.

Brown Bess. A familiar name for the old flint-lock musket formerly in use in the British Army. In 1808 a process of browning was introduced, but the term was common long before this, and probably referred to the colour of the stock. Bess is unexplained; but may be a counterpart to Bill (see below).

Brown Bill. A kind of halbert used by English foot-soldiers before muskets were employed. They were staff weapons, with heads like bill-hooks but furnished with spikes at the top and back. The brown probably refers to the rusty condition in which they were kept; though, on the other hand, it may stand for "burnished" (Dut. brunn, shining), as in the old phrases "my bonnie brown sword," "brown as glass," etc. Keeping the weapons bright, however, is a modern fashion; our fore-fathers preferred the honour of blood stains.

In the following extract the term denotes the soldiers themselves:—

Lo, with a band of bowmen and of pikes,
Brown bills and targeters.

Marlowe: Edward II, I, 1324.

Brown Bomber. Joe Louis (b. 1914), undefeated heavyweight champion of the world from 1937 until his retirement in 1949. On his return in 1950 he was defeated by Ezzard Charles. He began his professional career in 1934, winning 27 fights, all but four by knockouts. He won the heavyweight title from Jim Braddock and successfully defended it more than 22 times before joining up in the U.S. army. Louis is possibly the greatest heavyweight boxer ever known. The phrase applied to him springs from his being a Negro and (presumably) from the lethal power of his punches.

Brown, Jones, and Robinson. The typification of middle-class Englishmen; from the adventures of three Continental tourists of these names which were told and illustrated in Punch in the 1870s by Richard Doyle. These sketches hold up to ridicule the gaucherie, insular ideas, vulgarity, extravagance, conceit, and snobbism that too often characterize the class, and are in themselves an almost unsurpassed example of Victorian snobbery in their senseless and ill-mannered jeers at uneducated people.

Brown study. Absence of mind; apparent thought, but real vacuity. The corresponding French expression explains it—sombre réverie. Sombre and brun both mean sad, melancholy, gloomy, dull.

Invention flags, his brain grows muddy,
And black despair succeeds brown study.

Congreve: An Impossible Thing.

Brownie. The house spirit in Scottish superstition. He is called in England Robin Goodfellow. At night he is supposed to busy himself in doing little jobs for the family over which he presides. Farms are his favourite abode. Brownies are brown or tawny spirits, in opposition to fairies, which are fair or elegant ones. See also Gnome.

It is not long since every family of considerable substance was haunted by a spirit they called Browny, which did several sorts of work; and this was the reason why they gave him offerings ... on what they called "Browny's stone."—Martine: Scotland.

Brownists. Followers of Robert Brown, of Rutlandshire, a vigorous Puritan controversialist in the time of Queen Elizabeth. The later "Independents" held pretty well the same religious tenets as the Brownists. Sir Andrew Aguecheek says:—

I'd as lief be a Brownist as a politician.

Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, iii, 2.

Browse his Jib, To. A sailors' phrase, meaning to drink till the face is flushed and swollen. The jib means the face, and to browse here means "to fatten." A piece of slang formed on the nautical phrase "to bowse the jib," the metaphor signifies that the man is "tight."

Bruin (broo' in). In Butler's Hudibras, one of the leaders arrayed against the hero. His prototype in real life was Talgol, a Newgate butcher who obtained a captaincy for valour at Naseby. He marched next to Orsin (Joshua Gosling, landlord of the bear-gardens at Southwark).

Sir Bruin. The bear in the famous German beast-epic, Reynard the Fox.

Brumaire (brù'már). The month in the French Republican Calendar from October 23rd to November 21st. It was named from brume, fog (Lat. bruma, winter). The celebrated 18th Brumaire (November 9th, 1799) was the day on which the Directory was overthrown and Napoleon established his supremacy.

Brunby. An Australian wild horse. The origin of the word is obscure.

Brummagem (brùm'á jém). Worthless or very inferior metal articles made in imitation of better ones. The word is a French Republican Calendar from October and manufactory of Birmingham, which is the great mart and manufacture of gilt toys, cheap jewellery, imitation gems, and the like.

Brunhild (broon' hild). Daughter of the chieftain-; Siegfried when he saw that his old friend was one of the conspirators engaged in stabbing him to death.

Brunswicker. See Black Brunswickers.

Brunt. To bear the brunt. To bear the worst of the heat, and collision. The “brunt of a battle” is the hottest part of the fight. Cp. FIRE-BRAND.

Brunt is partly imitative (like dint), and is probably influenced by the feel. bruna, to advance with the speed of fire, as a standard in the heat of battle.

Brush. The tail of a fox or squirrel, which is brush-like and bushy.

He brushed by me. He just touched me as he went quickly past. Hence also brush, a slight skirmish.

Give it another brush. A little more attention; bestow a little more labour on it; return it to the file for a little more polish.

To brush up. To renovate or revive; to bring again into use what has been neglected as, “I must brush up my French.”

Brut (brút). A rhyming chronicle of British history beginning with the mythical Brut, or Brute (q.v.), and so named from him. Wace's Le Roman de Brut, of Brut d'Angleterre, written in French about 1150, is a rhythmical version of Geoffrey of Monmouth's History with additional legends. It is here that first mention is made of Arthur's Round Table. Wace's work formed the basis of Layamon's Brut (early 13th cent.), a versified history of England from the fall of Troy to A.D. 689. Layamon's poem contains 32,250 lines; Wace's rather over 14,000. See Arthur.

Brute or Brutus (broot). In the mythological history of England, the first king of the Britons was son of Sylvius (grandson of Ascanius and great-grandson of Æneas). Having inadvertently killed his father, he first took refuge in Greece and then in Britain. In remembrance of Troy, he called the capital of his kingdom Troy-novant (q.v.), now London.

Brutum fulmen (broo' tum ful' men) (Lat.). A noisy but harmless threatening; an innocuous thunderbolt.

The phrase is from Pliny's “Bruta fulmina et vana, at que nulla veniant ratione nature” (II, xliii, 113)—Thunderbolts that strike blindly and harmlessly, being traceable to no natural cause.

The Actors do not value themselves upon the Clap, but regard it as a mere Brutmuli fulmen, or empty Noise, when it has not the sound of the Oaken Plant in it.—ADINSON: Spectator (November 29th, 1711).

Brutus, Junius (broo' tus joo' ni us). In legend, the first consul of Rome, fabled to have held office about 509 B.C. He condemned to death his own two sons for joining a conspiracy to restore to the throne the banished Tarquin. He was—

The public father who the private quelled.

And on the dread tribunal sternly sat.

THOMSON: Winter.

Brutus, Marcus (85-42 B.C.). Caesar's friend, who joined the conspirators to murder him because he made himself a king. And thou, unhappy Brutus, kind of heart, Whose steady arm, by awful virtue urged, Lifted the Roman steel against thy friend.

THOMSON: Winter, 324-6.

Et tu, Brute. Thou, too, Brutus! The reference is to the exclamation of Julius Caesar when he saw that his old friend was one of the conspirators in stabbing him to death.

The Spanish Brutus. Alphonso Perez de Guzman (1258-1320). While he was governor, Castile was besieged by Don Juan, who had revolted from his brother, Sancho IV. Juan, why held in captivity one of the sons of Guzman, threatened to cut his throat unless Guzman surrendered the city. Guzman replied, “Sooner than be a traitor, I would myself lend you a sword to slay him,” and he threw a sword over the city wall. The son, we are told, was slain by the father's sword before his eyes.

Bryanites. See Bible Christians.

Bub. Drink; particularly strong beer.

Drunk with Helicon's waters and double-brewed bub.—PRIOR: To a Person who wrote ill.

Bubastis. Greek name of Bubast, or Pasht, the Diana of Egyptian mythology; she was daughter of Isis and sister of Horus, and her sacred animal was the cat. See Cat.

Bubble, or Bubble Scheme. A project or scheme of no sterling worth and of very ephemeral duration—as worthless and frail as a bubble. The word was in common use in the 18th century to denote a swindle. See Mississippi; South Sea.

The Bubble Act. An Act of George I, passed in 1719, its object being to punish the promoters of bubble schemes. It was repealed in 1825.
Bubble and squeak. Cold boiled potatoes and greens fried up together, sometimes with bits of cold meat as well. They first bubbled in water when boiled, and afterwards hissed or squeaked in the frying-pan.

Bucca (bük' a). A goblin of the wind, supposed by the ancient inhabitants of Cornwall to foretell shipwrecks; also a sprite fabled to live in the tin-mines.

Buccaneer (bük' a nér'). Properly, a seller of smoke-dried meat, from the Brazilian word boque, a gridiron or frame on which flesh was barbecued, which was adopted in France, and boucanier formed from it. Boucanier was first applied to the French settlers in Hayti, whose business it was to hunt animals for their skins and who frequently combined with this business that of a marauder and pirate. Buccaneer thus became applied to any desperate, lawless, piratical adventurer.

Bucentaur (bü sen' tór). The name of the Venetian state-galley employed by the Doge when he went on Ascension Day to wed the Adriatic. The word is Gr. bonis, ox, and centauros, centaur: and the original galley was probably ornamented with a man-headed ox. The spouseless Adriatic mourns her lord, and annual marriage now no more renew’d, The Bucentaur lies rotting unrestored, Neglected garment of her widowhood.

The last Bucentaur, third of the name, was destroyed by the French in 1798. See BRIDE OF THE SEA.

Bucephalos (bull-headed). A horse. Strictly speaking, the favourite charger of Alexander the Great.

Buchan’s Weather Periods (bú’ kan’). Alexander Buchan (1829-1907) was secretary of the Scottish Meteorological Society which, under his influence, built an observatory on Ben Nevis. As a result of many years’ observation of weather and temperatures he worked out a curve of recurrent periods, six cold and two warm, in the year. The cold periods are Feb. 7-10; April 11-14; May 9-14; June 29-July 4; Aug. 6-11; Nov. 6-12. The warm periods are July 12-15; Aug. 12-15. It should be remembered that these dates are the mean of many observations and do not predict the probable weather for every year.

Buchanites. A sect of fanatics who appeared in the west of Scotland in 1783. They were named after Mrs. or Lucky Buchan, their founder, who called herself “Friend Mother in the Lord,” claiming to be the woman mentioned in Rev. xii, and maintaining that she, Rev. Hugh White, a convert, was the “man-child.” I never heard of aewife that turned preacher, except Luckie Buchan in the West.

Scott: St. Ronan’s Well, c. ii.

Buck. A dandy; a gay and spirited fellow; a young man.

A most tremendous buck he was, as he sat there erect, in state, driving his greys.

Thackeray: Vanity Fair, ch. vi. The word is also American slang for a dollar.

Buck-basket. A linen-basket. To buck to wash clothes in lye. When Cade says his mother was “descended from the Ladies,” two men overhear him, and say, “She was a pedlar’s daughter, but not being able to travel with her furred pack, she washes bucks here at home” (2 Henry VI, iv. 2). The word is probably connected with Ger. buche, clothes steeped in lye, and Fr. buer, to steep in lye; and perhaps with A.S. bux, a pitcher.

Buck-bean. The popular name of Menyanthes trifoliata, a water-plant; an Elizabethan translation of the Flemish name bocks boonen (Mod. Dut. bocksbooien), goat’s beans. The name bog-bean, also given to this plant, is considerably later.

Bucket. To. An obsolete slang term for to cheat.

To give the bucket, to get the bucket. To give (or receive) notice of dismissal from employment. Here bucket is synonymous with sack (q.v.).

To kick the bucket. To die. Bucket here is a beam or yoke (O.Fr. buquet, Fr. trébuchet, a balance), and in East Anglia the big frame in which a newly slaughtered pig is suspended by the heels is still called a “bucket.” An alternative theory is offered that the bucket was a pail kicked away by a suicide, who stood on it the better to hang himself.

Bucket-shop. A term (probably from the old slang “to bucket,” above) which originated in America, denoting the office of an “outside” stock-broker, i.e. one who is not a member of the official Stock Exchange. As these offices are largely used for the sole purpose of gambling in stocks and shares as apart from making investments, and as many of them have been run by very shady characters, the name is rarely used except with a bad significance.

Buckhorn. See STICKFISH.

Buckhorse. A severe blow or slap on the face. So called from John Smith, a pugilist of about 1740, whose nickname it was. “Buckhorse” was so insensible to pain that, for a small sum, he would allow anyone to strike him on the side of the face with all his force.

Buckingham. Fuller, in his Worthies, speaks of the beech-trees as the most characteristic feature of this county, and the name is derived from the Bocingas, or dwellers among the beech-trees (A.S. boc), a tribe which anciently inhabited that county.

Of with his head! So much for Buckingham! A famous line, often searched for in vain in Shakespeare’s Richard III. It is not to be found there, but is in Act iv, Sc. iii, of Colley Cibber’s The Tragical History of Richard III, altered from Shakespeare (1700).

Buckle. I can’t buckle to. I can’t give my mind to work. The allusion is to buckling on one’s armour or belt.

To cut the buckle. To caper about, to heel and toe it in dancing. In jigs the two feet buckle or twist into each other with great rapidity. Throth, it wouldn’t have a laugh in you to see the parson dancin’ down the road on his way home, and the minister and methodist praijer cuttin’ the buckle as they went along.—Yeats: Fairy Tales of the Irish Peasantry, p. 98.

To talk buckle. To talk about marriage.
Buckler. See Shields.

Bucklersbury (London) was at one time the noted street for druggists and herbalists; hence Falstaff says:—

I cannot cog, and say thou art this and that, like a many of these lisping hawthorn buds, that come like women in men's apparel, and smell like Bucklersbury in simple time.

Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, iii, 3.

Stow tells us that “the Peperers and Grocers” had their shops there.

Buckley's Chance (Austr.). An extremely remote chance. Two explanations of the phrase's origin exist. According to the first it comes from a convict named Buckley who escaped in 1803 and lived over thirty years with Aborigines. The second explanation derives it from the well-known Melbourne business house of Buckley and Nunn—hence the pun “There are just two chances, Buckley's or None.”

Buckmaster's Light Infantry. See Regimental Nicknames.

Buckram. A strong coarse kind of cloth stiffened with gum; perhaps so called (like Astrakhan, from the Eastern city) from Bokhara. In the Middle Ages the name was that of a valuable fabric that came from the East.

Men in buckram. Hypothetical men existing only in the brain of the imaginer. The allusion is to the vaunting tale of Falstaff to Prince Henry (Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, ii, 4). Hence, “a buckram army,” one the strength of which exists only in the imagination.

Buckshee (buk’ shè). This word undoubtedly comes from baksheesh (q.v.) though in its new usage it means something given away free, something thrown in gratis.

Buck-tooth. A large projecting front-tooth; formerly also called a butter-tooth.

Buckwheat. A corruption of beech-wheat (A.S. boc, beech: see Buckingham), so called because its seeds are triangular, like beechmast. The botanical name is Fagopyrum (beech-wheat).

The buckwheat
Whitened broad acres, sweetening with its flowers
The August wind.

Bryant: The Fountain, stanza 7.

Buddha (bùd’ ā) (Sanskrit, “the Enlightened”).

The title given to Prince Siddhartha or Gautama (q.v.), also called (from the name of his tribe, the Sakhyas) Sakya muni, the founder of Buddhism, who lived from about 623 B.C. to 543 B.C.

Buddhism. The system of religion inaugurated by the Buddha in India in the 6th century B.C. The general outline of the system is that the world is a transient reflex of deity: that the soul is a “vital spark” of deity; and that it will be bound to matter till its “wearer” has, by divine contemplation, so purged and purified it that it is fit to be absorbed into the divine essence.

The four sublime verities of Buddhism are as follows:—

1. Pain exists.
2. The cause of pain is “birth sin.” The Buddhist supposes that man has passed through many previous existences, and all of the heaped-up sins accumulated in these previous states constitute man’s “birth-sin.”
3. Pain is ended only by Nirvana.
4. The way that leads to Nirvana is—right faith, right judgment, right language, right purpose, right practice, right obedience, right memory, and right meditation (eight in all).

The abstract nature of the religion, together with the overgrowth of its monastic system and the superior vitality and energy of Brahminism, caused it to decline in India itself; but it spread rapidly in the surrounding countries and took so permanent a hold that it is computed that at the present time it has some 140 million adherents, of whom 101 millions are in India, and the rest principally in Ceylon, Tibet, China, and Japan.

Esoteric Buddhism. See Theosophy.

Bude or Gurney Light. A very bright light obtained by supplying an argand gas-jet with oxygen, invented by Sir Goldsworthy Gurney (1793-1875) about 1834, and first used in a lighthouse at Bude, Cornwall.

Budge. Lambskin with the wool dressed outwards, worn on the edge of capes, graduates' hoods, and so on. Hence the word is used attributively and as an adjective to denote pedantry, stiff formality, etc.

O foolishness of men! that lend their ears
To those budge-doctors of the stoic fur.

Milton: Comus, 706.

Budge Row, Cannon Street, is so called because it was chiefly occupied by budget-makers.

Budge Bachelors. A company of men clothed in long gowns lined with budge or lambs' wool, who used to accompany the Lord Mayor of London at his inauguration.

Budget. A bagful of news, a large stock of news.

Cry budget. A watchword or shibboleth; short for Mumbudget (q.v.). Slender says to Shallow:—

We have a nay-word how to know one another. I come to her in white and cry mum: she cries budget: and by that we know one another.

Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, v. 2.

Buff. Properly, soft, stout leather prepared from the skin of the buffalo; hence, any light-coloured leather; and hence the figurative use, the bare skin. “To stand in buff” is to stand without clothing in one’s bare skin. “To strip to the buff” is to strip to the skin.
Buff 153  Bull

To stand buff. To stand firm, without finiting. Here buff means a blow or butte.
Cp. Blindman’s buff.

And for the good old cause stood buff,
Against men a bitter kick and cuff.
See Huldras’s Epitaph.

But I must own that buff and outface him. — FIELDING.

The phrase also occurs as to stand buff.

Sheridan, in his School for Scandal, ii, 3, says:—

That he should have stood buff to old bachelor so long, and sink into a husband at last.

Here the allusion is probably nautical; a "bluff shore" is one with a bold and almost perpendicular front.

Buffs. See Regimental Nicknames.

Buffalo Bill. This was the name made famous by William Frederick Cody (1846-1891), one of the world’s greatest showmen.

He was born in Iowa and when little more than a boy was a rider of the Pony Express. (q.v.)

In 1861 he became a scout and guide for the U.S. army, and fought in the Civil War. In 1867 he made a contract to supply the labor erecting the Kansas Pacific railway with buffalo meat, hence his sobriquet. Later on he was fighting once more in the Indian wars and single-handed killed Yellowhand, the Cheyenne chief. In 1883 he organized his Wild West show, which he brought to Europe and fought in the Civil War. In 1867 he rode to London, in the reign of Henry VII, 1915. One of the world’s and served in the Civil War. In 1867 he rode to London, in the reign of Henry VII, 1883. He paid various visits after this and toured the Continent in 1910. He died at Denver. It is no exaggeration to say that his show, with its Indians, cowboys, sharp-shooters and rough-riders has never been surpassed.

Buffer. A chap, a silly old fellow. In M.E. buffer meant a stutterer, and the word is used in I. xxi. 4, in Wycliff’s version, where the Authorized Version reads, “And the tongue of the stammerers shall be ready to speak plainly.”

Buffer of a railway carriage is an apparatus to rebuff or deaden the force of collision.

Buffer State. A small, self-governing state separating two larger states, and thus tending to prevent hostilities between the two. The term seems to have originated on the northwest frontier of India.

Buffoon. Properly, one who puffs out his cheeks, and makes a ridiculous explosion by causing them suddenly to collapse (Ital.
buffone, from buffare, to puff out the cheeks, hence, to jest).

Bug. An old word for goblin, sprite, bogey; probably from Welsh bwy, a ghost. The word is used in Coverdale’s Bible, which is hence cnown as the “Bug Bible” (see Bible, specially named), and survives in boggle, bogey, and in bugaboo, a monster or goblin, introduced into the tales of the old Italian romancers, and bugbear, a scarecrow, or sort of hobgoblin in the form of a bear.

If all that here on earth we dreadfull hold,
Be but as bugs to feeren babes withall.
 See Faerie Queene, II, xii, 25.

Warwick was a bug that feared us all.
See Henry IV, v, 3.

To the world so bugbear is so great
As want of figure and a small estate.
See Satires, iii, 67-68.

Making believe
At desperate doings with a bauble-sword
And other bugaboo and ball."—SHAKESPEARE: 3 Henry IV, v, 3.

Browning: Ring and the Book, v, 949.

In common usage the word bug is applied to almost any kind of insect or germ, though more especially to a beetle or an insect that creeps or crawls. Colloquially it can be used to refer to any mental infection, such as “he has the money bug” of one whose sole interest is making money.

A big bug. A person of importance—especially in his own eyes; a swell; a pompous or conceited man. There is an old adjective bug, meaning pompous, proud.

Dainty sport toward, Dainty sit, come sit,
Sit and be quiet: here are kingy bug-words.

Ford: Perkin Warbeck, III, ii.

Buhl. An incorrect form of Boule (q.v.).

Bulbul. An Eastern bird of the thrush family, noted for its beautiful singing; hence applied to the nightingale. The word is Persian, and was familiarized by Tom Moore.

’Twas like the notes, half-ecstasy, half pain,
The bulbul sings.

Moore: Lalla Rookh (Veiled Prophet, i, 14).

Bull. A blunder, or inadvertent contradiction of terms, for which the Irish are proverbial.
The British Apollo (No. 22, 1708) says the term is derived from one Oldpich Buhl, an Irish lawyer of London, in the reign of Henry VII, whose blundering in this way was notorious,
but there is no corroboration of this story, which must be put down as ben trovato.

There was a M.E. verb bull, to bewilder, to cheat, and there is the O.Fr. boule or bole, fraud, trickery; the word may be connected with one of these.

Slang for a five-shilling piece. “Half a bull” is half a crown. Possibly from bulla (see Pope’s Bull below); but, as bull’s eye was an older slang term for the same thing, this is doubtful. Hood, in one of his comic sketches, speaks of a crier who, being apprehended,
“swallowed three hogs (shillings) and a bull.”

It is also short for bull’s eye (q.v.).

In Stock Exchange phraseology, a bull is a speculative purchase for a rise; also a buyer who does this, the reverse of a bear (q.v.).

A bull-account is a speculation made in the hope that the stock purchased will rise before the day of settlement.

In astronomy, the English name of the northern constellation (Lat. Taurus) which contains Aldebaran and the Pleiades; also the sign of the zodiac that the sun enters about April 22nd and leaves a month later. It is between Aries and Gemini. The time for ploughing, which in the East was performed by oxen or bulls.

At last from Aries rolls the bounteous sun,
And the bright Bull receives him.

Thomson: Spring, 26.

The Pope’s bull. An edict or mandate issued by the Pope, so called from the heavy leaden seal (Lat. bulla) appended to the document. See Golden Bull.

Bull is also the name given to a drink made by the distillings of empty spirit-casks. See Bulling the Barrel.
A bull in a china shop. A maladroit hand interfering with a delicate business; one who produces reckless destruction.

A brazen bull. An instrument of torture. See Phalaris.

He may bear a bull that hath borne a calf (Erasmus: Proverbs)—"He that accustometh hym-selfe to lytle thynges, by lytle and lytle shall be able to go a waye with greater thynges" (Taverner).

To score a bull. See Bull's-eye.

To take the bull by the horns. To attack or encounter a threatened danger fearlessly; to go forth boldly to meet a difficulty. John Bull. See John Bull.

Bull-baiting. Bull- and bear-baiting were popular sports in Tudor and Stuart England. The beasts were tethered and set upon by dogs specially trained for this "sport." In his Diary for June 16th, 1670, John Evelyn describes what he calls "a rude and dirty pastime." Baiting was not prohibited in England until 1835.

Bull-ring. In Spain, the arena where bullfights take place; in England, the place where bulls used to be baited. The name still survives in many English towns, as in Birmingham. See Mayor of the Bull-Ring.

Bull's-eye. The inner disk or centre of a target.

To make a bull's-eye, or to score a bull. To gain some signal advantage; a successful coup. To fire or shoot an arrow right into the centre disk of the target.

A black globular sweetmeat with whitish streaks, usually strongly flavoured with peppermint.

Also, a small cloud suddenly appearing, seemingly in violent motion, and expanding till it covers the entire vault of heaven, producing a tumult of wind and rain (I Kings xviii, 44).

Also, a thick disk or boss of glass. Hence, a bull's-eye lantern, also called a bull's-eye.

Bull sessions. In U.S.A. this phrase is applied to long talks, among men only, about life in general or some particular problem.

Bull and Gate. Bull and Mouth. Public-house signs. A corruption of Boulogne Gate or Mouth, adopted out of compliment to Henry VIII, who took Boulogne in 1544. The public-house sign consisting of a plain (or coloured) bull is usually with reference to the significance of the house of Clare. The sign of the famous Bull and Mouth Inn in Aldersgate St., London, bore the words:

Milo the Cretonian
An ox slew with his fist,
And ate it up at one meal.
Ye gods, what a glorious twist.

The bull and the boar were signs used by the partisans of Clare, and Richard, Duke of Gloucester (Richard III).

Bulldog. A man of relentless, savage disposition is sometimes so called. A "bulldog courage" is one that flinches from no danger. The "bulldog" was the dog formerly used in bull-baiting.

In University slang the "bulldogs" or "bullers" are the two myrmidons (q.v.) of the proctor, who attend his heels like dogs, and are ready to spring on any offending undergraduate.

Boys of the bulldog breed. Britons especially with reference to their pugnacity. The phrase comes from the song, "Sons of the sea, all British born," that was immensely popular at the close of the 19th century.

Bullet. Every bullet has its billet. Nothing happens by chance, and no act is altogether without some effect.

Bulletin. An official report of an officer to his superior, or of medical attendants respecting the health of persons of notoriety. The word is borrowed from the French, who took it from the Ital. bullettino, a passport or lottery ticket, from bulla (see Poet's Bull above), because they were authenticated by an official bulla or seal.

News bulletin is the term used for the periodical broadcasts of news by radio, etc.

Bulling the barrel. Pouring water into a rum cask, when it is nearly empty, to prevent its leaking. The water, which gets impregnated with the spirit and is frequently drunk, is called bull.

Scamen talk of bulling the teapot (making a second brew), bulling the coffee, etc.

Bullion. Gold or silver in the mass as distinguished from manufactured articles or coined money; also, a fringe made of gold or silver wire. The word is from the Fr. bouillon, boiling, and seems to refer to the "boiling," or melting, of the metal before it can be utilized.

Bully. To overbear with words. A bully is a blustering menacer. The original meaning of the noun was "sweetheart," as in—

I kiss his dirty shoe, and from heart-string
I love the lovely bully.

Shakespeare: Henry V, iv, 1.

It is probably to be derived from Dut. boel, a lover; and the later meaning may have been influenced by Dut. bull, a bull, also a clown, and bulderen, to bluster.

Bully-beef. Tinned, compressed beef. Probably from Fr. bouilli, boiled meat.

Bully-rag. To intimidate; bully-ragging is abusive intimidation. According to Halliwell, a rag is a scold, and hence a "ragging" means a scolding.

Bully-rook. Shakespeare uses the term (Merry Wives, 1, iii, 2) for a jolly companion, but it later came to mean a hired ruffian.

Bum. An old word, now almost restricted to schoolboy slang, for the buttocks, posterior. It is an American term for a vagrant; hence a slang word describing any worthless fellow.

Bum-bailiff. The Fr. pouss'cul seems to favour the notion that bum-bailiff is no corruption. These officers, who made an arrest for debt by touching the debtor on the back, are frequently referred to as bums.

Scout me for him at the corner of the orchard,
Like any

Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, iii, 4.

Bum-boat. A small wide boat to carry provisions to vessels lying off shore. Also called "dist-boats," being used for removing filth from ships lying in the Thames.
sumble. A beadle. So called from the officious, overbearing beadle in Dickens's Oliver Twist; hence bumbled, fussy officialism, especially on the part of the parish officers: also parochial official collectively.

summaree. A class of middlemen or fish-robbers in Billingsgate Market, whose business is summareeing, i.e. buying parcels of fish from the salesmen, and then retailing them. The etymology of the word is unknown, but it has been suggested that it is a corruption of bonne marée, good fresh fish, marée being a French term for all kinds of fresh sea-fish.

summer. A full glass, generally connected with a "toast." It may be so called because the surface of the wine "bumps up" in the middle, but it is more likely from the notion that it is a "bumping" or "thumping," i.e. a large glass.

sumpkin. A tootish person. Dut. boomken, a little tree, a small block; hence, a blockhead.

sumptuous. Arrogant, full of mighty airs and graces; apt to take offence at presumed slights. A humorous formation from bump, probably modelled on presumptuous.

sun. A tail. See BUNNY.

Bun. "Hot cross buns" on Good Friday were supposed to be made of the dough needed for the host, and were marked with the cross accordingly. As they are said to keep for twelve months without turning mouldy, some persons still hang up one or more in their house as a "charm against evil."

It may be remarked that the Greeks offered to Apollo, Diana, Hecate, and the Moon, cakes with horns. Such a cake was called a bous, and (it is said) never grew mouldy. The round bun represented the full moon, and the "cross" symbolized the four quarters. Good Friday comes this month: the old woman runs with one a penny, two a penny "hot cross buns." Whose virtue is, if you believe what's said, they'll not grow mouldy like the common bread. Poor Robin's Almanack. 1733.

Buna. The German name for synthetic rubber developed during World War II. It was made by the polymerization of butadrene.

Bunce. A slang term for money; particularly for something extra or unexpected in the way of profit. Thought to be a corruption of bonus (q.v.).

Bunch. Mother. A noted London ale-wife of the late Elizabethan period, on whose name have been fathered many jests and anecdotes, and who is mentioned more than once in Elizabethan drama, e.g.—

Now now mother Bunch, how dost thou? What, dost thou see Queen Wyndiver, dost wrinkle?—DECKER: Satiromastix, iii, 1.

In 1604 was published Pasquil's Jestes, mixed with Mother Bunches Merriments; and in the "Epistle to the Merrie Reader" is given a humorous description of her—

She spent most of her time in telling of tales, and when she laugh'd, she was heard from Aldgate to the Monuments at Westminster, and all Southwark abroad in amazement; she was heard from the Lyons in the Tower, and the Butts and Beares of Parish Garden roar'd louder than the great roaring Megge... She dwelt in Cornhill, and had the charge of all strong Ale... and lived an hundred, seventy and five years, two days and a quarter, and half a minute.

B.B. Other books were named after her, such, for instance, as Mother Bunch's Closet newly Broke Open, containing rare secrets of art and nature, tried and experienced by learned philosophers, and recommended to all ingenious young men and maids, teaching them how to get good wives and husbands.

Bunch of Fives. Slang for the hand or fist.

Bundle Off. Get away. To bundle a person off is to send him away unceremoniously. Similar to pack off. The allusion is obvious.

Bundles for Britain. An organization founded in U.S.A., January 1940, by Mrs. Wales Latham to send comfort parcels to Britain during World War II.

Bundle of sticks. A sop, in one of his fables, shows that sticks one by one may be readily broken; not so when several are bound together in a bundle. The lesson taught is that "Union gives strength."

The symbol was adopted by, and gave its name to the political system of Fascism, from Lat. fases, a bundle of sticks.

Bundling. The curious and now obsolete New England custom of engaged couples going to bed together fully dressed and thus spending the night. It was a recognized proceeding to which no suggestion of impropriety was attached.

Stopping occasionally in the villages to eat pumpkin pies, dance at country frolics, and bundle with the Yankee lasses.—WASHINGTON IRVING: Knickerbocker.

The same custom existed in Wales.

Bung. A cant term for a publican; also for a toper. "Away... you filthy bung," says Doll to Pistol (2 Henry IV, ii, 4).

Bung up. Close up, as a bung closes a cask.

Bungalow. Originally, the house of a European in India, generally of one floor only with a verandah all round it, and the roof thatched to keep off the hot rays of the sun. A dak-bungalow is a caravansary or house built by the Government for the use of travellers. (Hindustani, bangla, of Bengal.)

Bungay. See Friar Bungay.

Go to Bungay with you!—i.e. get away and don't bother me, or don't talk such stuff. Bungay, in Suffolk, used to be famous for the manufacture of leather breeches, once very fashionable. Persons who required new ones, or to have their old ones new-seated, went or sent to Bungay for that purpose. Hence rose the cant saying, "Go to Bungay, and get your breeches mended," shortened into: "Go to Bungay with you!"

My castle of Bungay. See Castle.

Bunkum. Claptrap. A representative at Washington being asked why he made such a flowery and angry speech, so wholly uncalled for, made answer, "I was not speaking to the House, but to Buncombe," which he represented (North Carolina).

When a critter talks for talk's sake, jist to have a speech in the paper to send to home, and not for any other airthly puppus but electioneering, our folks call it bunkum.—HALIBURTON: Sam Slick.
Bunny. A rabbit. So called from the provincial word bun, a tail, especially of a hare, which is said to "cock her bun." Bunny, a diminutive of bun, applied to a rabbit, means the animal with the "little tail."

Bunting. In Somersetshire bunting means sifting flour. Sieves were at one time made of a strong gauzy woollen cloth, which was tough and capable of resisting wear. It has been suggested that this material was found suitable for flags, and that the name for the stuff of which they are now made is due to this.

A "bunt-mill" is a machine for sifting corn.

Bunyan, Paul. A legendary hero of the lumber camps of the north-western U.S.A. His feats—such as cutting the Grand Canyon of the Colorado by dragging his pick behind him—are told and retold with embellishments by the lumbermen; some of them were collected in a curious volume titled, Paul Bunyan Comes West.

Burble (bér'bél). To mutter nonsense. In its modern use this is a word invented by Lewis Carroll (Looking-glass) with the meaning to make a sound somewhere between a bubble and a gurgle.

Burden of a Song. A line repeated at intervals so as to constitute a refrain or chorus. It is the Fr. bourdon, the big drone of a bagpipe, or double-diapason of an organ, used in forte and in piano, with the meaning to "make a sound somewhere between a bubble and a gurgle."

The Jabberwock, with eyes of flame,
   Came whiffling through the tulgy wood,
   And burbled as it came.

Burden of a Song. A line repeated at intervals so as to constitute a refrain or chorus. It is the Fr. bourdon, the big drone of a bagpipe, or double-diapason of an organ, used in forte and in piano, with the meaning to "make a sound somewhere between a bubble and a gurgle."

Burden of Isaiah. "The burden of Babylon; which Isaiah the son of Amoz did see: Burden, here, is a literal translation of the Heb. massa (rendered in the Vulgate by onus), which means "lifting up" either a burden or the voice; hence "utterance," hence a prophecy announcing a calamity, or a denunciation of hardships on those against whom the burden is uttered.

The burden of proof. The obligation to prove something.

The burden of proof is on the party holding the affirmative (because no one can prove a negative, except by reductio ad absurdum).

Burgh. A poetic word for a young lady (cp. Bird), obsolete except in ballads. Burd Helen, who is a heroine of Scottish ballad, is a female personification of the Fr. preux or prudhomme, with this difference, that she is discreet, rather than brave and wise.

Burgher. A name loosely applied in England to dark red wine of more than usual alcoholic strength, but really wine (both red and white) from the province of Burgundy, grown between Dijon and Chasne, south of Beaune.

Burial of an Ass. No burial at all, just thrown on a refuse-heap.

He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem. Jer. xxi, 19.

Buridan's Ass. A man of indecision; like one "on double business bound, who stands in pause where he should first begin, and both neglects." Buridan was a French scholastic philosopher who died about 1360. He is incorrectly reputed to be the father of the well-known sophism:—

If a hungry ass were placed exactly between two haystacks in every respect equal, it would starve to death, because there would be no motive why it should go to one rather than to the other.

Burke. To murder by smothering. So called from William Burke, an Irish navvy, who, with his accomplice William Hare, used to suffocate his victims and sell the bodies to surgeons for dissection. Hanged at Edinburgh, 1829.

To burke a question. To smother it in its birth. The publication was burked, suppressed before it was circulated.

Burma Road, The. This great highway was constructed to open up the western interior of China by communication with the sea. It was made in 1937-39, for a distance of 770 miles from Lashio to Kunming, in Yunnan. During the war it was the chief highway for war supplies to China until the Japanese cut it in 1941. It was recaptured in 1945. Lorries do the entire trip in seven days, and by means of the extension being made and planned, will be able to penetrate far into the country.
burn. His money burns a hole in his pocket. He cannot keep it in his pocket, or forbear sending it.

The burnt child dreads the fire. Once caught, twice shy. "What! wouldst thou have a serpent sting thee twice?"

To burn one's boats. To cut oneself off from all hopes of escape or retreat. The allusion is to Julius Caesar and other generals who burned their boats or ships when they invaded a foreign country, in order that their soldiers might feel that they must either conquer the country or die, as retreat would be impossible.

To burn one's fingers. To suffer loss by speculation or mischance. The allusion is to burning chestnuts from the fire.

To burn the Thames. To set the Thames on fire. See Thames.

You cannot burn the candle at both ends, nor do two opposite things at one and the same time; you cannot exhaust your energies and yet reserve them impaired for something else. If you go to eden late you cannot get up early.

We burn daylight. We waste time in talk instead of action. (Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, ii, 1.)

Burning crown. A crown of red-hot iron on the head of a regicide.

He was adjudged to have his head seared with a burning crown.

Burnt Candledmas. The name given by the Scots to the period around Candelmas Day, i.e., 1355-6, when Edward III marched through the Lothians with fire and sword. He burnt to the ground Edinburgh and Laddington, and then retreated through lack of provisions.

arsa (Gr., a hide). So the citadel of Carthage was called. The tale is that when Dido came to Africa she bought of the natives "as much land as could encompass by a bull's hide." The agreement was made, and Dido cut the hide into thongs, so as to enclose a space sufficient for a citadel. Cp. Doncaster.

The following is a similar story: The Akutsiks of the Russian explorers as much land as they could encompass with a pig's hide; but the Russians, cutting the hide into strips, obtained land enough for the port of town of Yakutsk.

The Indians have a somewhat similar tradition. The fifth incarnation of Vishnu as in the form of a dwarf called Vamen, amen obtained permission to have as much land as he could measure in three paces to build his hut on. The request was laughed at but readily granted; whereupon the dwarf grew so Rodgers that, with three paces, he strode over the whole world.

burst. To inform against an accomplice. A lang variety of "split" (turn king's evidence, npeach). The person who does this splits the whole concern.

I'm bursting to tell you so-and-so. I'm all gog to tell you; I can't rest till I've told you.

On the burst. See Bust.

Burton. Gone for a Burton. It is now difficult to ascertain the origin of this phrase, which, starting among flying men in World War II, has now taken its place in the language. It probably suggests that the missing airman has gone for a pint of Burton ale or stout. Its meaning is always sinister, implying that whoever has gone for a Burton has crashed or come to grief in some way.

Bury the Hatchet. Let bygones be bygones. The "Great Spirit" commanded the North American Indians, when they smoked their calumet or peace-pipe, to bury their hatchets, scalping-knives, and war-clubs, that all thought of hostility might be put out of sight.

Buried was the bloody hatchet; Buried was the dreadful war-club; Buried were all warlike weapons, And the war-cry was forgotten; Then was peace among the nations. LONGFELLOW: Hiawatha, xiii.

Burying at cross roads. See Cross-Roads.

Bus. A contraction of omnibus (q.v.). The word is used by airmen and motorists in a humorous, almost affectionate, way for their conveyances.

Busman's holiday. There is a story that in old horse-bus days a driver spent his holiday travelling to and on a bus driven by one of his pals. From this has arisen the phrase, which means occupying one's spare and free time in carrying on with one's usual work, in other words, a holiday in name only.

Busby. A frizzled wig; also the tall cap of a hussar, artilleryman, etc., which hangs from the top over the right shoulder. It is not known what the word is derived from; Doctor Busby, master of Westminster School from 1638 to 1695, did not wear a frizzled wig, but a close cap, somewhat like a Welsh wig. See Wig.

Bush. One beats the bus, but another has the hare. See Beat the Bush.

Good wine needs no bush. A good article will make itself known without being puffed. An ivy-bush (anciently sacred to Bacchus) was once the common sign of taverns, and especially of private houses where beer or wine could be obtained by travellers.

Some ale-houses upon the road I saw, And some with bushes showing they wine did draw. Poor Robin's Perambulations (1678).

The proverb is Latin, and shows that the Romans introduced the custom into Europe. "Vino vendibili hedera non opus est" (Columella). It was also common to France. "Au vin qui se vend bien, il ne faut point de lierre."

If it be true that good wine needs no bush, 'tis true that a good play needs no epilogue. SHAKESPEARE: As You Like It (Epilogue).

To take to the bush. To become bush-rangers, like runaway convicts, who live by plunder. See Bush, below.

Bush. An Australian term for wild, wooded country, derived from the Dutch bosch. The word was imported from South Africa before 1820, and gave rise to a whole vocabulary—bushman, bush telegraph, bush ranger, etc.
Bushrangers. Originally escaped convicts in Australia who were forced to live in the wilds to escape recapture, in which sense it is found in the Sydney Gazete in 1805. The word has a modern sense of those who take advantage of their fellows, by sharp practice or crime.

Bushmen (Dut. Baschjesman). Natives of South Africa who live in the "bush"; the aborigines of the Cape; dwellers in the Australian "bush"; bush farmers.

Bushmen are the only nomads in the country. They never cultivate the soil, nor rear any domestic animal save wretched dogs.

Livingstone: Travels, ch. ii.

Bush-shanty (Austr.). A hut selling illegal liquor, often in the gold-rush areas. Hence to shanty is to pub-crawl.

Bushwhacker (Austr.). One who lives in the bush. (U.S.A.) a deserter in the Civil War who looted behind the lines.

Bushed. An Australian word meaning "lost." It has wandered so far from its original connotation of "bush" that we find such a phrase as "a small ship became bushed in the great Van Dieman Gulf." Barratt, Coast of Adventure, 1944.

Bush telegraph. In early Australian slang, one who informed the bushrangers (q.v.) of police movements; now widespread to indicate any unofficial and mysterious source of information.

Bushmaster. A large and very poisonous South American snake—Lachesis mutus.

Bushel. To measure other people's corn by one's own bushel. To make oneself the standard of right and wrong; to appraise everything as it accords or disagrees with one's own habits of thought and preconceived opinions. The bushel was measured in a wooden or earthenware container, hence: under a bushel, secretly; in order to hide it.

Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick.—Matt., v. 15.

Business. A.S. bisigness, from bisigian, to occupy, to worry, to fatigue. In theatrical parlance "business" or "biz" means by-play. Thus, Hamlet trifling with Ophelia's fan, Lord Dundreary's hop, and so on, are the special "business" of the actor of the part. As a rule, the "business" is invented by the actor who creates the part, and it is handed down by tradition.

Business to-morrow. When the Spartans seized upon Thebes they placed Archias over the garrison. Pelopidas, with eleven others, banded together to put Archias to the sword. A letter containing full details of the plot was sent to the Spartan polemarch at the banquet table; but Archias thrust the letter under his cushion, saying, "Business to-morrow." But long ere that sun arose he was numbered with the dead.

Mind your own business. Don't get poking your nose into my affairs; your advice is not needed.

The business end. The end of the tool, etc., with which the work is done. The "business end of a tin-tack" is its point; of a revolver its muzzle; and so on.

To do someone's business for him. To ruin him, to settle him for ever; kill him.

To mean business. To be determined to carry out one's project; to be in earnest.

Busiris (bū'st' ris). A mythical king of Egypt who, in order to avert a famine, used to sacrifice to the gods all strangers who set foot on his shores. Hercules was seized by him and would have fallen a victim, but he broke his chain, and slew the inhumanable king. Milton, following Sir Walter Raleigh who in his History of the World, says he was "the first oppressor of the Israelites," gives the name to the Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea.

Vex'd the Red Sea coast, whose waves o'er-threw Busiris and his Memphian chivalry. Paradise Lost, i, 306.

Busker. There is an old verb to busk, meaning to improvise, and it is from this that the word busker is derived, to describe a street or beach singer or performer.

Buskin. Tragedy. The Greek tragic actor: used to wear a sandal some two or three inches thick, to elevate his stature. The whole foot-piece made a buskin, and was called cothurnus. Cp. sock.

Or what (though rare) of later age Ennobled hath the buskined stage.

Milton: II Penseroso, 79.

Buss. To kiss. The word is obsolete; it is used as a vulgarization or abuse. The word is a vulgarization of burst (q.v.).

Busted. Done for; exploded.

To go on the bust. To go on the spree; to paint the town red.

A bust up is a violent quarrel, a row.

Buster. Anything of large or unusual size or capacity; a "whacking great lie."

To come a buster. To come a cropper; to meet with a serious set-back or fall.

In Australia a Southerly Buster is a heavy gale from the south, striking the east coast of Australia and New Zealand.

Butcher. A title given to many soldiers and others noted for their bloodthirstiness. As Mehem Pasha was called dyzzar (the butcher) and is said to have whipped off the heads of his seven wives. He is famous for his defence of Acre against Napoleon I.

The Bloody Butcher. The Duke of Cumberland (1721-65), second son of George II. So called from his barbarities in suppressing the rebellion of the Young Pretender.

The Royalist Butcher. Blaise de Montluc (1502-77), a Marshal of France, distinguished for his cruelties to the Protestants in the reign of Charles IX.
butter. This word is sometimes used figuratively for flattery, soft soap, “wiping down” with winning words. Punch expressively calls “the milk of human kindness churned into butter.” Lat. butyrum. Gr. butyros. Cow-cheese, as distinguished from goat- or ewe-butter.

Buttered ale. A beverage made of ale or eer mixed with butter, sugar, and cinnamon.

He knows which side his bread is buttered. He knows his own interest.

I know what’s what. I know on which side my bread is butter’d.

Jowett.

I utter.

Loth.

Buyks.

Oranges, or butter to our parsnips.

I have increased my wealth gratefully extravagant.

Loth.

Weasture, in fields slippery, sometimes supposed to increase the butter of milk.

She smiles and languishes, you’d think that butter could not melt in her mouth.—Thackeray: Pendennis, i.x.

Soft or fair words butter no parsnips. Aying “Be thou fed,” will find a hungry man. Mere words will not find salt to our orridge, or butter to our parsnips.

Fair words butter no cabbage.

Wyckerley: Plain Dealer, v, 3 (1674).

Fine words, says our homely old proverb, butter no parsnips.—Lowell.

To butter one’s bread on both sides. To be tastefully extravagant and luxurious; also, to mix with the hate and hunt with the hounds, to aim advantages from two sides at once.

Buttercups. So called because they were once supposed to increase the butter of milk. To doubt those cows give the best milk that asture in fields where buttercups abound, not because these flowers produce butter, but because they grow only on sound, dry, old astures, which afford the best food. Miller, his Gardener’s Dictionary, says they were so called “under the notion that the yellow-colour’d butter is owing to these plants.”

Butter-fingers. Said of a person who lets things fall out of his hand. His fingers are slippery, and things slip from them as if they were greased with butter. Often heard on the ricket field.

I never was a butter-fingers, though a bad batter.

H. Kingsley.

butterfly. A light, flippant, objectless young person who fluctuates from pleasure to pleasure. He is in good form when all is bright and fair. every prospect pleases, but is “done for” when the clouds gather.

In the cab-trade the name used to be given to those drivers who took to the occupation only in summer-time, and at the best of the eason.

The feeling of the regular drivers against these butterflies is very strong.

Nineteenth Century (March, 1893, p. 177).

Butterfly kiss. A kiss with one’s eyelashes, that is, stroking the cheek with one’s eyelashes.

Button. The two buttons on the back of a coat, in the fall of the back, are a survival of the buttons on the back of riding-coats and military frocks of the 18th century, occasionally used to button back the coat-tails.

A decoy in an auction-room is colloquially known as a button, because he “buttons” or ties the unwary to bargains offered for sale. The button fastens or fixes what else would slip away.

Buttons. A page, whose jacket in front is remarkable for a display of small round buttons, as close as they can be inserted, from chin to waist.

The tifter of an electric bell brought a large fat buttons, with a stage effect of being dressed to look small.—Howard: Hazard of New Fortunes, ch. vii.

Bachelor’s buttons. See Bachelor.

Dash my buttons. Here, “buttons” means lot or destiny, and “dash” is a euphemistic form of a stronger word.

He has not all his buttons. He is half-silly; “not all there”; he is “a button short.”

The buttons come off the foils. Figuratively, the courtesies of controversy are neglected. The button of a foil is the piece of cork fixed to the end to protect the point and prevent injury in fencing.

Familiarity with controversy . . . will have accustomed him to the misadventures which arise when, as sometimes will happen in the heat of fence, the buttons come off the foils.

Nineteenth Century (June, 1891, p. 925).

The button of the cap. The tip-top. Thus, in Hamlet, Guildenstern says: “On fortune’s cap we are not the very button” (ii, 2), i.e. the most highly favoured. The button on the cap was a mark of honour. Thus, in imperial China the first grade of literary honour was the privilege of adding a gold button to the cap, a custom adopted in several collegiate schools of England; and the several grades of mandarins are distinguished by a different coloured button on the top of their cap. Cp. Panjandrum.

’Tis in his buttons. He is destined to obtain the prize; he is the accepted lover. It used to be common to hear boys count their buttons to know what trade they are to follow; whether they are to do a thing or not, and whether some favourite favours them.

’Tis in his buttons; he will carry it.

Merry Wives of Windsor, iii, 2.

To have a soul above buttons. To be worthy, or, rather, to consider oneself worthy, of better things; to believe that one has abilities too good for one’s present employment. This is explained by George Colman in Sylvester Daggerwood (1795): “My father was an eminent button-maker . . . but I had a soul above buttons . . . and panted for a liberal profession.”

To press the button. To set in motion, literally or figuratively, generally by simple means as the pressing of a button will start electrically-driven machinery or apparatus.

Mediation was ready to come into operation by any method that Germany thought possible if only Germany would “press the button” in the interests of peace.—Sir Edw. Grey to the British Ambassador at Berlin, July 29th, 1914.

To take by the button. To buttonhole. See below.

Buttonhole. A flower or nosegay worn in the buttonhole of a coat.
To buttonhole a person. To detain him in conversation; to apprehend, as, “to take fortune by the button.” The allusion is to a custom, now discontinued, of holding a person by the button or buttonhole in conversation. The French have the same locution: Serrer le bouton (a quelqu’un).

He went about buttonholing and boring everyone.

H. KINGSLEY: Mathilde.

To take one down a buttonhole. To take one down a peg; to lower one’s conceit.

Better mind yourselves, or I’ll take ye down a buttonhole lower.—Mrs. STOWE: Uncle Tom’s Cabin, iv.

Buy. To buy in. To collect stock by purchase; to withhold the sale of something offered at auction, because the bidding has not reached the “reserve price.” On the Stock Exchange buying in is the term used when, a seller having sold stock that he is unable to deliver, the buyer purchases the stock himself in the market and charges the extra cost, if any, to the original seller.

Buy off. To give a person money to drop a claim, put an end to contemplation, or throw up a partnership.

Buy out. To redeem or ransom.

Not being able to buy out his life... Dies ere the weary sun set.

SHAKESPEARE: Comedy of Errors, i, 2.

Buy over. To induce one by a bribe to renounce a claim; to gain over by bribery.

Buy over a person’s head. To outbid him.

Buy up. To purchase stock to such an amount as to obtain a virtual monopoly, and thus command the market; to make a corner, as “to buy up corn,” etc.

Buying a pig in a poke. See Pig.

Buzzuz (öz’fız). Sergeant Buzzuz was the windy, grandiloquent counsel for Mrs. Bardell in the famous breach of promise trial described in Pickwick Papers. He represented a type of barrister that flourished in the early 19th century, seeking to gain his case by abuse of the other side and a distortion of the true facts.

Buzz. To. Either, to empty the bottle to the last drop; or, when there is not enough left in it to allow of a full glass all round the party, to share it out equally. Perhaps a corruption of house. See BOOZE.

Buzz. A rumour, a whispered report.

Yes, that, on every dream,
Each buzz, each fancy... He may enguage his doteage.

SHAKESPEARE: King Lear, i, 4.

Buzzard. In Dryden’s Hind and Panther is meant for Dr. Burnet, whose figure was lusty.

Buzzard called hawk by courtesy. It is a euphemism—a brevet rank—a complimentary title.

The noble Buzzard ever pleased me best; Of small renown, its true; for, not to lie We call him but a hawk by courtesy.

DRYDEN: Hind and Panther, iii, 1221.

Between hawk and buzzard. Not quite the master or mistress nor quite a servant. Applied to “bear-leaders” (q.v.), governesses, and other grown-up persons who used to be allowed to come down to dessert, but not to the dinner-table.

By-and-by now means a little time hence, but when the Bible was translated it meant instantly. “When persecution ariseth... by-and-by he is offended” (Matt. xiii, 12); rendered in Mark iv, 17, by the word “immediately.” Our presently means in a little time or soon, but formerly it meant “at present,” “at once,” and in this sense it is not uncommonly used in U.S.A.

By and large. Taking one thing with another, speaking generally. This is really a nautical phrase. When a vessel was close-hauled, order might be given to sail “by and large,” that is, slightly off the wind, or easier for the helmsman and less likely for the vessel to be taken aback under his steering.

By-blown. An illegitimate child.

It is has been cheated all this while, Abominably and irrepairably,—my name Given to a cur-cart mongrel, a drab’s brat, A beggar’s bye-blown.

BROWNING: Ring and the Book, iv, 612.

By-laws. Local laws. From by, a borough, See BYRLAW. Properly, laws by a town council, and bearing only on the borough or company over which it has jurisdiction.

By-line. A journalist’s signature. When a newspaper reporter progresses from anonymous to signed articles, he is said to have got a by-line.

By-the-by. En passant, laterally connected with the main subject. “By-play” is side or secondary play; “by-roads and streets” are those which branch out of the main thoroughfare. The first “by” means passing from one to another, as in the phrase “Day by day.” Thus “By-the-by” is passing from the main subject to a by or secondary one.

By-the-way. An introduction to an incidental remark thrown in, and tending the same way as the discourse itself.

Bycorne. See BICORN.

Bye Plot (bi). This was a plot hatched in 1603 by a Catholic priest, Watson, who worked up a number of Catholic gentry to secure the person of James I and force him to grant toleration to Catholics and Puritans. The plot was muddled and mismanaged from the outset, Watson was beheaded, his fellow conspirators were imprisoned or banished.

Byerly Turk. See DARLEY ARABIAN.

Bylaw. A local law in the rural districts of Scotland. The inhabitants of a district used to make certain laws for their own observance, and appoint one of their neighbours, called the Bylaw-man, to carry out the pains and penalties. Byr = a burgh, common in such names as Derby, the burgh on the Derwent; Grimsby (q.v.), Grims-town, etc., and is present in by-law (q.v.).

Byron. The Polish Byron. Adam Mickiewicz (1798-1855).

Byzantine. See BURSA.

Byzantine (bi-zan’tin). Another name for the Byzantine art (from Byzantium, the ancient name of Constantinople). That symbolical system which was developed by the early Greek or Byzantine artists out of the Christian symbolism. Its chief features are the circle, jove, and round arch: and its chief symbols hpery, cross, vesica, and nimbus. St.

Sophia, at Constantinople, and St. Mark, at Venice, are excellent examples of Byzantine architecture and decoration, and the Roman Catholic Cathedral at Westminster is a development of the same.

Byzantine Empire. The Eastern or Greek Empire, which lasted from the separation of the Eastern and Western Empires on the death of Theodosius in A.D. 395, till the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453.

Byzantine historians. Certain Greek historians who lived under the Eastern Empire between the 6th and 15th centuries. They may be divided into three groups:—(1) Those whose works form a continuous and complete history of the Byzantine empire;
(2) general chroniclers who wrote histories of the world from the oldest period; and (3) writers on Roman antiquities, statistics, and customs.

C.

C. The form of the letter is a rounding of he Gr. gamma (Γ), which was a modification of the Phœnician sign for gime1, a camel. It originally corresponded with Gr. gamma, as its place in the alphabet would lead one to suppose.

When the French e has a mark under it, husç, called a cedilla, it is to be pronounced as in s.

There is more than one poem written of which every word begins with C. There is one by Hamconius, called "Curnmen shbal rum cum Calvinists," and another by Henry Harder. See ALLITERATION.

Ca’canny. A Scots expression meaning “go missily,” “don’t exert yourself.” It is used in trade-union slang for working to rule, and is the method adopted by workmen for the purpose of bringing pressure on the employers when, in the workmen’s opinion, a strike would be hardly justifiable, expedient, or possible.
C is Scots caw, to drive or impel.

Ca’ira (fit will go). The name, and refrain, of a popular patriotic song in France which became the Carillon National of the French Revolntion (1790). It went to the tune of the Carillon National, which Marie Antoinette was of ever strumming on her harpsichord.

As a rallying cry it was borrowed from Benjamin Franklin, who used to say, in reference to the American revolution, “Ah!
sh! ca ira, ca ira!” (‘twill be sure to do).

The refrain of the French revolutionary version was:—

Ah! ça ira, ça ira, ça ira.
Les aristocrates à la lanterne.

Caaba. See KAAABA.

Cab. A contraction of cabriolet, a small, one-horse carriage, so called from Ital. capriola, a caper, the leap of a kid, from the lightness of the carriage when compared with the contemporary cumbersome vehicles. Cabs were introduced in London about 1823.

Cabal. A junco (q.v.) or council of intrigue­ s. One of the Ministries of Charles II was called a “cabal” (1670), because the initial letters of its members formed the word: Clifford,
Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale. This accident may have popularized the word, but it was in use in England many years before this, and is the Hebrew qabbalah.
See CABBALA.

These ministers were emphatically called the Cabal, and they soon made the appellation so infamous that it has never since . . . been used except as a term of reproach.—MACAULAY: England, I, ii.

Cabbala, Cabalist. See CABBALA.

Caballero. A Spanish knight or gentleman literally, one who rides a horse, caballo; also a grave and stately dance, so called from the ballad to the music of which it was danced.
The ballad begins—

Esta noche le mataron al caballero.

Cabbage. An old slang term for odd bits of cloth, etc., left over after making up suits and sold, appropriated by working tailors as perquisites. Thus the Tailor in Randolph’s
Hey for Honesty (about 1633) says:—

O iron age! that like the ostrich, makes me feed on my own goose . . . . This cross-legged infelicity, sharper than my needle, makes me eat my own cabbage.—Act V, sc. i.

Hence, a tailor is sometimes nicknamed “Cabbage,” and to cabbage means to pilfer, to filch.

Cabbala. The oral traditions of the Jews, said to have been delivered by Moses to the rabbis and from them handed down through the centuries from father to son by word of mouth.
In medieval times the term included the occult philosophy of the rabbis, and the cabbala and its guardians, the cabbalists, were feared as possessing secrets of magical power. The word is the Heb. qabbalah, accepted tradition.

Cabbalist. In the Middle Ages the cabbalists were chiefly occupied in concocting and deciphering charms, mystical anagrams, etc., by unintelligible combinations of certain letters, words, and numbers; in search for the philosopher’s stone; in prognostications, attempted or pretended intercourse with the dead, and suchlike fantasies.

Cabinet Ministers. In British politics, a deliberative committee of the principal members of the Government, who are privileged to consult and advise the sovereign (originally in his private cabinet, or chamber), and who lead, and are responsible to, Parliament. The number of members has varied from a dozen to as many as twenty-two, but it always contains the chief officers of state, viz. the Prime Minister, the First Lord of the Treasury (these offices are often combined), the Lord High Chancellor, Lord President of the Council, Lord Privy Seal, Chancellor of the Exchequer, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Secretaries for Home Affairs, Foreign Affairs, the Colonies, Dominions, Scotland, War, and Air, the President of the Board of Trade, and the Ministers of Labour, Fuel, Education, Health, and Agriculture. Of the other Ministers the following are sometimes included in the Cabinet: the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the Postmaster-General, Ministers of Supply, Food, Pensions, Works, Town and Country Planning, National Insurance, Civil Aviation, Information.

Cabiri (ka bi' ri). The Phœnician name for the seven planets collectively; also mystic and minor divinities worshipped in Asia Minor, Greece, and the islands. (Phœn. kabir, powerful.)

Cable's Length. 100 fathoms; a tenth of a sea-mile—607.56 feet.

Cabochon (ka bō shōng). A term applied to a precious stone, cut in a rounded shape, without facets. Garnets, sapphires, and rubies are the stones most commonly cut en cabochon.

Caboodle (ka bōod'). The whole caboodle, the whole lot. The origin of the word is obscure, but it may come from the Dutch boedel, the whole lot. The origin of the word is obscure, but it may come from the Dutch boedel, possession, household goods, property. In this sense it has long been a common term among New England long-shoremen.

Caboose (ka boos'). On American railroads, a wagon used for transporting workmen or the train crew.

Cachecope Bell (kāsh' a kōp'). In some parts of England it was customary to ring a bell at a funeral when the pall was thrown over a coffin. This was called the cachecope bell, from Fr., cachet, a distinguishing mark, a stamp of individuality.

Lettres de cachet (letters sealed). Under the old French regime, warrants, sealed with the king’s seal, which might be obtained for a consideration, and in which the name was frequently left blank. Sometimes the warrant was to set a prisoner at large, but it was more frequently for detention in the Bastille. During the administration of Cardinal Fleury (1726-43) 80,000 of these cachets are said to have been issued, the larger number being against the Jansenists. In the reigns of Louis XV and XVI fifty-nine were obtained against the one family of Mirabeau. This scandal was abolished January 15th, 1790.

Cacodaemon (kāk ō dé' mōn). An evil spirit (Gr. kakos daimon). Astrologers give this name to the Twelfth House of Heaven, from which only evil prognostics proceed.

Cacoethes (kāk ō eth' ez) (Gr.). A “bad habit.” As soon as he came to town, the political Cacoethes began to break out upon him with greater violence, because it had been suppressed.

Cacoethes loquendi. A passion for making speeches or for talking.

Cacoethes scribendi. The love of rushing into print; a mania for authorship.

Cad. A low, vulgar ill-mannered fellow; also, before the term fell into its present disrepute, an omnibus conductor. The word is, like the Scots cadie (q.v.), probably from cadet (q.v.).

Caddice or Cadis. Worsted yarn or binding, crewel. So named from the O.Fr. cadez, the coarsest part of silk; with which the Fr. cadet, cotton, may be remotely connected. See also CADY.

Cadet. In some English dialects a ghost, a corp (q.v.). In Classical mythology, a larva of the silk-worm. This was called the cachecope bell, from Fr., cache, a hiding mark, a stamp of individuality. Sometimes the warrant was to set a prisoner at large, but it was more frequently for detention in the Bastille. During the administration of Cardinal Fleury (1726-43) 80,000 of these cachets are said to have been issued, the larger number being against the Jansenists. In the reigns of Louis XV and XVI fifty-nine were obtained against the one family of Mirabeau. This scandal was abolished January 15th, 1790.

Cadence, Marks of. See DIFFERENCE.

Cader. In some English dialects a ghost, a bugbear; from cad, a word of uncertain origin which in the 17th century meant a familiar spirit. This has no connexion (as has been suggested) with caddis, a grub, which is probably from caddice (q.v.), the allusion being to the similarity of the caddis-worm to the larva of the silk-worm.

Caddy. In some English dialects a ghost, a bugbear; from cad, a word of uncertain origin which in the 17th century meant a familiar spirit. This has no connexion (as has been suggested) with caddis, a grub, which is probably from caddice (q.v.), the allusion being to the similarity of the caddis-worm to the larva of the silk-worm.

Caddy in tea-caddy is a Malay word (kaiti), and properly denotes a weight of 1 lb. 5 oz. 2 dr., that is used in China and the East Indies.

Cadence, Marks of. See DIFFERENCE.

Cader Idris (kā' der id' ris). Cader in Welsh is “chair,” and Idris is the name of one of the old Welsh giants. The legend is that anyone who passes the night sitting in this “chair” will be either a poet or a madman.

Cadet (kā det'). Younger branches of noble families are called cadets from Fr. cadet, formed on Provencal capet, a diminutive of Lat. caput, a head, hence, little head, little chieftain. Their armorial shields bore the mark of cadency (Lat. cadere, to fall). See DIFFERENCE.
Cadet is a student at the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, with which Woolwich Academy was amalgamated in 1946, or in one of H.M. training ships. From these places the boys are sent (after passing certain examinations) as ensigns or second lieutenants, and into the navy as midshipmen.

Cadger. A sponger; one who lays himself out to obtain drinks, "unconsidered trifles," and so on, without paying for them or standing his share: a whining beggar. Originally an itinerant dealer in butter, eggs, etc., who visited remote farmhouses and made what extra he could by begging and wheedling. The word may be connected with catch, but this is not certain.

Cadi (ká’di). Arabic for a town magistrate or inferior judge.

Cadmus. In Greek mythology, the son of Agenor, king of Phoenicia, and Telephassa; founder of Thebes (Boeotia) and the introducer of the alphabet into Greece. (Cp. Palæmèdes.) The name is Semitic for "the man of the East." Legend says that, having slain the dragon which guarded the fountain of Dirce in Boeotia, he showed its asp teeth, and a number of armed men sprang up surrounding Cadmus with intent to kill him. By the counsel of Athena, he threw a precious stone among them, who, striving for it, killed one another.

Cadmean letters. The sixteen simple Greek letters said, in Greek mythology, to have been introduced by Cadmus (q.v.) from Phoenicia. The Cæmean were those who in pre-Trojan times occupied the country afterwards called Boeotia. Hence the Greek tragedians often called the Thebans Cadmeans.

Cadmean victory. A victory purchased with great loss. The allusion is to the armed men who sprang out of the ground from the teeth of the dragon sown by Cadmus (q.v.), who fell foul of each other, only five escaping death.

Cadogan (kà’dog’an) or Catogan. A fashion of dressing the hair, in which the hair is secured at the back by a ribbon. Worn by men in the mid and late 18th century. Its name comes from a popular portrait of the first Earl of Cadogan. Dashing ladies also affected the fashion, which was introduced at the court of Montbéliard by the Duchesse de Bourbon.

Cadre (kad’er; kad’ri). (Fr., frame.) In military parlance a skeleton of trained or key men, so arranged that the addition of untrained personnel will yield a full-size efficient unit.

Caduceus. A white wand carried by Roman heralds when they went to treat for peace; the wand placed in the hands of Mercury, the herald of the gods, of which poets feign that he could therewith give sleep to whomsoever he chose; wherefore Milton styles it "his opiate rod" in Paradise Lost, xi, 133. It is generally pictured with two serpents twined about it (a symbol thought to have originated in Egypt), and—with reference to the serpents of Asclepius—it was adopted as the badge of the Royal Army Medical Corps.

So with his dread caduceus Hermes led
From the dark regions of the imprisoned dead;
Or drove in silent shoals the lingering train
To Night's dull shore and Pluto's dreary reign.

DARWIN: Loves of the Plants, ii, 291.

Caedmon (kà’d’mon) (d. 680). Anglo-Saxon poet famed for his Hymn. Bede tells us that he was an ignorant man who knew nothing of poetry. Commanded by an angel in a dream to sing the Creation, Caedmon did so. On waking he remembered his verses and composed more. He was received into the monastery of Whitby, where he spent his life praising God in poetry. Except for Caedmon's Hymn, preserved in Bede's Latin, all his work is lost.

Cærite Franchise, The (sè’rit). A form of franchise in a Roman prefecture which gave the right of self-government, but did not confer the privileges of a Roman citizen or entitle the holder to vote. This was a privilege first given to the inhabitants of Cære who, during the Gallic War, had assisted the Romans. Later, cities and citizens who had merited disfranchisement were degraded to the same position, and consequently the term became one of disgrace.

Cæsarian (sè’zar). The cognomen of Caius Julius Cæsar was assumed by all the male members of his dynasty as a part of the imperial dignity, and after them by the successive emperors. After the death of Hadrian (138) the title was assigned to those who had been nominated by the emperors as their successors and had been associated with them in ruling. The titles Kaiser and Tsar are both forms of Cæsarian.

Thou art an emperor, Cæsar, keiser, and Pheezar.
SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, i, 3.
No bending knees shall call thee Cæsar now.
SHAKESPEARE: 3 Henry VI, iii, 1.

Cæsar's wife must be above suspicion. The name of Pompeia having been mixed up with an accusation against P. Clodius, Cæsar divorced her; not because he believed her guilty, but because the wife of Cæsar must not even be suspected of crime. (Suetonius: Julius Cæsar, 74.)

Cæsarian operation. The extraction of a child from the womb by cutting the abdomen; so called because Julius Cæsar was thus brought into the world.

Caftan. See Kaf. Caftan (kà’tàn). A garment worn in Turkey and other Eastern countries. It is a sort of under-tunic or vest tied by a girdle at the waist. Cp. Gaberdine.

Picturesque merchants and their customers, no longer in the big trousers of Egypt, but [in] the long caftans and abas of Syria.

B. TAYLOR: Lands of the Saracen, ch. ix.
Cage. To whistle or sing in the cage. The cage is a jail, and to whistle in a cage is to turn king's evidence, or peach against a comrade. The lift in which miners descend the pit shaft is termed a cage.

Cagliostro (kà' lyos' trò). Count Alessandro di Cagliostro was the assumed name of the notorious Italian adventurer and impostor, Giuseppe Balsamo (1743-95), of Palermo. He played a prominent part in the affair of the Diamond Necklace (q.v.); and among his many frauds was the offer of everlasting youth to all who would pay him for his secret.

Cagmag (kà' mág). Offal, bad meat; also a tough old goose; food which none can relish.

Cagot (ka' gö). A sort of gipsy race living in the Middle Ages in Gascony and Bearn, supposed to be descendants of the Visigoths, and shunned as something loathsome. Cagot was the word for a heretical sect of the Cainites and from this, again, the sinister Cagoulards took their name—French political plotters hiding their infamy beneath masks and hoods.

Cain-coloured Beard. Meaning a repentant person. A sort of gipsy race living in the Middle Ages in Gascony and Bearn, supposed to be descendants of the Visigoths, and shunned as something loathsome.

Cagoule (ka' gloo). This is a North Country and Scottish name for a trap, a tinker, a Gipsy or even a jockey. It comes from the Gaelic ceard, a smith, braizer.

Cais (kà' nitz). An heretical sect of the 2nd century. They denounced the New Testament in favour of The Gospel of Judas, which justified the false disciple and the crucifixion of Jesus; and they maintained that heaven and earth were created by the evil principle, and that Cain had his descendants were the persecuted party.

Caird (kàrd). This is a North Country and Scottish name for a trap, a tinker, a Gipsy or even a jockey. It comes from the Gaelic ceard, a smith, braizer.

Caius (kè's) College (Cambridge). Elevated by Dr. John Kay, or Keye (1510-73), of Norwich, into a college, from its previous status of a hall (Gonville), in 1558. It had been originally established by Edmund Gonville in 1348. The full name is now Gonville and Caius.

Cakes and ale. A good time. Life is not all cakes and ale. Life is not all beer and skittles—all pleasure.

My cake is dough. All my swans are turned to geese. Occisa est regio mihi: Mon affaire est manquée; my project has failed.

The Land of Cakes. Scotland, famous for its oatmeal cakes.

Land o' cakes and brother Scots.—Burns.

To go like hot cakes. To be a great success; to sell well.

To take the cake. To carry off the prize. The reference is to the negro cake walk, the prize for which was a cake. It consists of walking round the prize cake in pairs, while umpires decide which pair walk the most gracefully. From this a dance developed which was popular in the early part of the 20th century before the serious introduction of Jazz.

In ancient Greece a cake was the award of the toper who held out the longest; and in Ireland the best dancer in a dancing competition was rewarded, at one time, by a cake.

A churn-dish stuck into the earth supported on its flat end a cake, which was to become the prize of the best dancer. At length the competitors yielded their claims to a young man who taking the cake, placed it gallantly in the lap of a pretty girl to whom . . . he was about to be married.—BARTLETT and COYNE: Scenery and Antiquities of Ireland, vol. ii, p. 64.

You cannot eat your cake and have it too. You cannot spend your money and yet keep it. You cannot serve God and Mammon.

Calaboose (kàl' à boos). This is a slang term in U.S.A. for a prison. It comes from the Spanish (originally from the Arabic), and is more especially applied to the common jail or lock-up.

Calabra (kàl' à ber). Squirrel fur; perhaps so called because originally imported from Calabria. Ducange says: "At Chichester the 'priest vicars' and at St. Paul's the 'minor canons' wore a calabre amice"; and Bale, in his Image of Both Churches, describes 600 of the 'fair rochet's of Raines [Rennes], and costly grey amices of calabar and cats' tails."

The Lord Mayor and those aldermen above the chair ought to have their coats furred with grey amice, and also with changeable taffeta; and those below the chair with calabre and green taffeta.

HUTTON: New View of London.

Calaimos (kàl' à nos). The most ancient of Spanish ballads. Calaimos the Moor asked a damsel to wife; she consented, on condition that he should bring her the heads of the three paladins of Charlemagne—Rinaldo, Roland, and Oliver. Calaimos went to Paris and challenged the paladins. First Sir Baldwin, the youngest knight, accepted the challenge and was overthrown; then his uncle Roland went against the Moor and smote him.

Calabriaco (kàl' à màng' kò). A Low German word of uncertain origin denoting a glossy woollen fabric, sometimes striped or variegated. The word has been applied attributively to a cat, in which connexion it means striped or tortoiseshell.

Calatrafa, Order of (kàl' á tra' va). A Spanish military Order of Knighthood founded by Sancho III of Castile in 1158 to commemorate the capture of the fortress of Calatrafa from the Moors in 1147. The first knights were the keepers of the fortress; their badge is a red cross, fleury, and is worn on the left breast of a white mantle.

Calceolaria (kàl' sè à lá' rì à'). Little-shoe flowers; so called from their resemblance to fairy slippers (Lat. calceolus).
Calculate is from the Lat. calculi (pebbles), used by the Romans for counters. In the abacus, the round balls were called calculi. The Greeks voted by pebbles dropped into an urn—a method adopted both in ancient Egypt and Syria; counting these pebbles was “calculating the number of voters.”

I calculate. A peculiarity of expression common in the western states of North America. In the southern states the phrase is “I reckon,” in the middle states “I expect,” and in New England “I guess.” All were imported from the Mother Country by early settlers.

“Your aunt sets two tables; I calculate; don’t she?” Susan Warner: Queechy, ch. xix.

The calculator. A number of mathematical geniuses have been awarded this title; among them are—

- Allfragan, the Arabian astronomer. Died 830.
- Jedidiah Buxton (1707-72), of Elmtown, in Derbyshire; a farm labourer of no education who exhibited in London in 1754.
- George Bidder and Zerah Colburn (1804-40), who exhibited publicly.

Inaudi exhibited “his astounding powers of calculating” at Paris in 1880; his additions and subtractions, contrary to the usual procedure, were left to right.

Buxton being asked “How many cubical eighths-of-an-inch there are in a body whose three sides are 23.142,786 yards, 5,642,732 yards, and 54,965 yards?” replied correctly without setting down a figure.

Colburn being asked the square root of 106,929 and the cube root of 268,336.125, replied before the audience had set the figures down.

Caledonia. Scotland; the ancient Roman name, now only in poetry and in a few special connexions, such as the Caledonian Railway, the Caledonian Canal, the Caledonian Ball, etc.

Not thus, in ancient days of Caledon,
Was thy voice mute amid the festal crowd.

O Caledonia. stern and wild,
Meet nurse for a poetic child.

Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel.

Calembour (ka lem boor’). A pun, a jest.

From Wigand von Theben, a priest of Eulenspiegel and Calendar.

He,··, the

Calepin. A peculiarity of expression in the French translations appeared as Calepin.

The French Revolutionary Calendar, adopted in October 5th, 1793, retrospectively as from September 22nd, 1792, and in force in France till January 1st, 1806, consisted of 12 months of 30 days each, with 5 intercalary days, called Sansculotides (q.v.) at the end. It was devised by Gilbert Romme (1750-95), the names of the months having been given by the poet, Fabre d’Eglantine (1755-94).

The Newgate Calendar. See Newgate.

Calender. The Persian calander, a member of a beggimg order of dervishes, founded in the 13th century by Qalandar Yusuf al-Andalusi, a native of Spain, who, being dismissed from another order, founded one of his own, with the obligation on its members of perpetual wandering. This feature has made the calendars prominent in Eastern romance; the story of the Three Calenders in the Arabian Nights is well known.

Calends. The first day of the Roman month. Varro says the term originated in the practice of calling together or assembling the people on the first day of the month, when the pontifex informed them of the time of the new moon, the day of the nones, with the festivals and sacred days to be observed. The custom continued till A.U.C. 450, when the fasti or calendar was posted in public places. See Greek Calendars.

Calepin, A. (kál’ e pin’). A dictionary. (ital. calepino.) Ambrosio Calepio, of Calepio, in Italy, was the author of a famous Latin dictionary (1502), so that “my Calepin” was used in earlier days as my Euclid, my Liddell and Scott, according to Cocker, etc., became common later. Generally called Calepin, but the subjoined quotation throws the accent on the le.

Whom do you prefer
For the best linguist? And I silyly

Calf. Slang for a dolt, a “mutton-head,” a raw, inexperienced, childish fellow. See also Calves.

The golden calf. See Golden (Phrases).

There are many ways of dressing a calf’s head. Many ways of saying or doing a foolish thing; a simpletion has many ways of showing his folly; or, generally, if one way won’t do we must try another. The allusion is to the banquets of the Calves’ Head Club (q.v.).

To eat the calf in the cow’s belly. To be over-ready to anticipate; to count one’s chickens before they are hatched.

To kill the fatted calf. To welcome with the best of everything. The phrase is taken from the parable of the prodigal son (Luke xv, 30).

Calf-love. Youthful fancy, immature love as opposed to a lasting attachment.

Calf-skin. Fools and jesters used to wear a calf-skin coat buttoned down the back. In allusion to this custom, Faulconbridge says insolently to the Archduke of Austria, who had acted most basely to Richard Cœur-de-Lion—

Thou wear a lion’s hide! Doff it for shame,
And hang a calf-skin on those recreant limits. Shakespeare: King John, iii, 1.
Caliban (kāl’i bān). Rude, uncouth, unknown. The allusion is to Shakespeare’s Caliban (The Tempest), the deformed, half-human son of a devil and a witch, slave to Prospero. In this character it has been said that Shakespeare had not only invented a new creation, but also a new language. Coleridge says, “In him [Caliban], as in some brute animals, this advance to the intellectual faculties, without the moral sense, is marked by the appearance of vice.”

Calibum (kal’). Animals, fowl. “All-belonging in the chase, would have killed her. To call a man out. To challenge him; to appeal to a man’s honour to come forth and fight a duel. To challenge the truth of a statement; to refuse to make an appearance on the stage. A call to the Bar. The admission of a law student to the privileges of a barrister. See Bar. Callburn (kāl’i bārn). Same as Escalibur, King Arthur’s well-known sword. Onward Arthur paced, with hand on Calburn’s resistless brand. Scott: Bridal of Triermain.

Calico. So called from Calicut, in Malabar, once the great emporium of Hindustan and, next to Goa, the chief port for trade with Europe.

Calidore, Sir (kāl’ i dōr). In Spenser’s Faerie Queene (Bk. vi) the type of courtesy, and the lover of “fair Pastorella.” He is described as the most courteous of all knights, and is entitled the “all-beloved”; he typifies Sir Philip Sidney or the Earl of Essex.

Caligula (kā lig’ ə lā). Roman emperor (A.D. 37-41); so called because, when he was with the army as a boy, he wore a military sandal called a caliga, which had no upper leather, and was used only by the common soldiers.

Caligula was a voluptuous brute whose cruelty and excesses amounted almost to madness. Hence Horace Walpole coined the word Caligulism. Speaking of Frederick, Prince of Wales, he says:—

—Alas! it would be endless to tell you all his Caligulisms.—Letter to France, November 29th, 1745.

Caligula’s horse. Incitatus. It was made a priest and consul, had a manger of ivory, and drank wine from a golden goblet.

Calipash and Calipee (kāl’i pāsh’, kāl’i pē’). These are apparently fancy terms (though the former may come from the word Carapace) to describe choice portions of the turtle. Calipash is the fatty, dull-greenish substance belonging to the upper shield; calipee is the light-yellow, fatty stuff belonging to the lower shield. Only epicures and aldermen can tell the difference.

Cut off the bottom shell, then cut off the meat that grows to it (which is the calipey or Fowl).

Mrs. RAFFAUD: English Housekeeping (1769).

Caliph (kā’līf). A title given to the successors of Mohammed (Arab. Khalifah, a successor; khalifa, to succeed). Among the Saracens a caliph is one vested with supreme dignity. The caliphate of Bagdad reached its highest splendour under Haroun al-Raschid, in the 9th century. For the last 200 years the appellation has been swallowed up in the titles of Shah, Sultan, Emir, etc. The last Sultan of Turkey claimed the title in a vain attempt to impose his authority on all Moslem lands; it is still used of rulers of Mohammedan States in their capacity as successors of Mohammed.

Calisto and Arcas (kā līs’ tō, ar’ kās). Calisto was an Arcadian nymph metamorphosed into a she-bear by Jupiter. Her son Arcas having met her in the chase, would have killed her, but Jupiter converted him into a he-bear, and placed them both in the heavens, where they are recognized as the Great and Little Bear.

Calixtines (kā lik’s tinz). A religious sect of Bohemians in the 15th century; so called from Calix (the chalice), which they insisted should be given to the laity in the sacrament of the Lord’s Supper, as well as the bread or wafer. They were also called Utraquists (q.v.).

Call. A “divine” summons or invitation, as “a call to the ministry.”

A curtain call. An invitation to an actor to appear before the curtain, and receive the applause of the audience.

A call bird. A bird trained as a decoy.

A call-boy. A boy employed in theatres to “call” or summon actors, when it is time for them to make their appearance on the stage.

A call-box. A public telephone booth.

Call day, or call night. The name given at the Inns of Court to the dates on which students are called to the Bar.

A call of the House. An imperative summons sent to every Member of Parliament to attend. This is done when the sense of the whole House is required.

A call on shareholders. A demand to pay the balance of money due for shares allotted in a company, or a part thereof.

A call to the Bar. The admission of a law student to the privileges of a barrister. See Bar.

A call to the pastorate. An invitation to a minister by the members of a Presbyterian or Nonconformist church to preside over a certain congregation.

Payable at call. To be paid on demand.

The call of Abraham. The invitation or command of God to Abraham, to leave his idolatrous country, under the promise of becoming the father of a great nation.

The call of God. An invitation, exhortation, or warning, by the dispensations of Providence (Isa. xxii, 12); divine influence on the mind to do or avoid something (Heb. iii, 1).

To call. To invite: as, the trumpet calls.

If honour calls, where’er she points the way.

In U.S.A. to call means somewhat ambiguously “to telephone.” “He called me” may mean “he summoned me” or “he telephoned me.”

To call (a man) out. To challenge him; to appeal to a man’s honour to come forth and fight a duel.

To call God to witness. To declare solemnly that what one states is true.

To call in question. To doubt the truth of a statement; to challenge the truth of a statement. “In dubium vocare.”

To call over the coals. See Coals.

To call to account. To demand an explanation; to reprove.
To be called (or sent) to one’s account. To be removed by death. To be called to the judgment seat of God to give an account of one’s deeds, whether they be good, or whether they be evil.

Cut off even in the blossoms of my sin. Unhouseled, disappointed, unaneled; No reckoning made, but sent to my account With all my imperfections on my head; O horrible! O horrible! most horrible.

SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, i. 5.

To call to arms. To summon to prepare for battle. “Ad arma vocare.”

To call to mind. To recollect, to remember.

Calier Herrings. Fresh herrings. The adjective is also applied in Scotland to fresh air, water, etc.

Calligraphy. The art of handwriting. The finest calligraphy in western civilization is the Cancelleresca Corsiva or Cursive Chancellery hand used by the Apostolic Secretaries in the 15th century, the hand on which italic type is based. To-day it is applied generally to the art of the scribe preparing manuscripts such as rolls of honour or professional presentations. A handwriting which is based on a good model and has any artistic pretensions is called a calligraphic hand.

Calliope (kà lì’ò pi) (Gr., beautiful voice). Chief of the nine Muses (q.v.); the muse of epic or heroic poetry, and of poetic inspiration and eloquence. Her emblems are a stylus and wax tablets.

The word is also applied to a steam-organ composed of steam-whistles making a raucous noise.

Callipic Period (kà li’p’ik). An intended correction of the Metonic Cycle (q.v.) by Callippus, the Greek astronomer of the 4th century B.C. To remedy the defect in the Metonic Cycle Callippus quadrupled the period of Meton, making his Cycle one of seventy-six years, and deducted a day at the end of it, by which means he calculated that the new and full moons would be brought round to the same day and hour. His calculation, however, was not absolutely accurate, as there is one whole day lost every 553 years.

Callirhoe (kà lì’r’ ò i). The lover of Chares, a Chariton’s Greek romance entitled the Loves of Chares and Callirrhoe, probably written in the 6th century A.D.

Calomet (kàl’ë mel). Hooper says:—

This name, which means “beautiful black,” was originally given to the Ethiope’s mineral, or black sulphuret of mercury. It was afterwards applied in joke by Sir Theodore Maye rne to the chloride of mercury, in honour of a favourite negro servant whom he employed to prepare it. As calomel is a white powder, his name is merely a jocular misnomer.

Calotte (kà lot’) (Fr.). Régime de la calotte. Administration of government by ecclesiastics. The calotte is the small skull-cap worn over the tonsure.

Régiment de la Calotte. A society of witty and satirical men in the reign of Louis XIV. When any public character made himself ridiculous, a calotte was sent to him to “cover the bald or brainless part of his noodle.”

Calovers (kà lò’ yèr’ à). Monks in the Greek Church, who follow the rule of St. Basil. They are divided into cenobites, who recite the offices from midnight to sunrise; anchorites, who live in hermitages; and recluses, who shut themselves up in caverns and live on alms. (Gr.Kalos and ýròs, beautiful old man).

Calpe (kàl’ pi). Gibraltar, one of the Pillars of Hercules, the other, the opposite promontory in Africa (mod. Jebel Musa, or Apes’ Hill), being anciently called Abyla. According to one account, these two were originally one mountain, which Hercules tore asunder; but some say he piled up each mountain separately, and poured the sea between them.

The pack of hounds introduced into the Peninsula by Wellington’s officers is the Calpe Hunt.

Calumet (kàl’ u mel). This name for the tobacco-pipe of the North American Indians, used as a symbol of peace and amity, is the Norman form of Fr. chalumeau (from Lat. calamus, a reed), and was given by the French-Canadians to certain plants used by the natives as pipe-stems, and hence to the pipe itself.

The calumet, or “pipe of peace,” is about two and a half feet long, the bowl is made of highly polished red marble, and the stem is a reed, which is decorated with eagles’ quills, women’s hair, and so on.

To present the calumet to a stranger is a mark of hospitality and goodwill; to refuse the offer is an act of hostile defiance.

Giche Manito, the mighty,
Smoked the calumet, the Peace-Pipe
As a signal to the nations.

LONGFELLOW: Hiawatha, i.

Calvary. The Latin translation of the Gr. golgotha (q.v.), which is a transliteration of the Hebrew word for “a skull.” The name given to the place of our Lord’s crucifixion. Legend has it that the skull of Adam was preserved here, but the name is probably due to some real or fancied resemblance in the configuration of the ground to the shape of a skull.

The actual site of Calvary has not been determined, though there is strong evidence in favour of the traditional site, which is occupied by the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Another position which has strong claims is an eminence above the grotto of Jeremiah, outside the present wall and not far from the Damascus Gate on the north side of Jerusalem.

A Calvary. A representation of the successive scenes of the Passion of Christ in a series of pictures, etc., in a church. The shrine containing the representations.

A Calvary cross. A Latin cross mounted on three steps (or grises).

Calvary clover. A common trefoil, Medici­cago echinus, said to have sprung up in the track made by Pilate when he went to the cross to see his “title affixed” (Jesus of Nazareth, king of the Jews). Each of the three leaves has a little carmine spot in the centre; in the daytime they form a sort of cross; and in the flowering season the plant bears a little yellow flower, like a “crown of thorns.” Julian tells us that each of the three leaves had in his time a white cross in the centre, and that the centre cross lasts visible longer than the others.

Calvert’s Entire. The 14th Foot, now called the Prince of Wales’s Own (West Yorks. Regiment). Called from their colonel, General Sir Harry Calvert (1763-1826) of a well-known family of brewers, and entire, because three entire battalions were kept up for the good of Sir Harry, when adjutant-general.

Calves. The inhabitants of the Isle of Wight were sometimes so called from a tradition that a calf once got its head firmly wedged in a wooden pale, and, instead of breaking up the pale, the farm-man cut off the calf’s head.

His calves are gone to grass. Said of a spindle-legged man. And another mocking taunt is, “Veal will be dear, because there are no calves.”

Calves’ Head Club. Instituted in ridicule of Charles I, and apparently first mentioned in a tract (given in the Harleian Miscellany) of 1703 by Benjamin Bridgewater, stating that it first met in 1693. It lasted till about 1735. The annual banquet was held on January 30th, and consisted of calves’ heads dressed in sundry ways to represent Charles and his courtiers; a cod’s head, to represent Charles, independent of his kingly office: a pike with little ones in its mouth, an emblem of tyranny; a boar’s head with an apple in its mouth to represent the king preying on his subjects, etc. After the banquet, the Icon Basilike was burnt, and the parting cup “To those worthy patriots who killed the tyrant,” was drunk.

Calvinism. One of the sternest and most uncompromising sects of Christianity, and a joyless seriousness is often to be found among those who follow its tenets. This frequently evinces itself in a rigid sabbatarianism and a suspicion of the theatre and other forms of art.

The five chief points of Calvinism are:

1. Predestination, or particular election.
2. Irresistible grace.
3. Original sin, or the total depravity of the natural man, which renders it morally impossible to believe and turn to God of his own free will.
4. Particular redemption.
5. Final perseverance of the saints.

Calydon (kål’i don). In classical geography, a city in Ætolia, Greece, near the forest which was the scene of the legendary hunt of the Calydonian boar (see Boar). Also, in Arthurian legend, the name given to a forest in the northern portion of England.

Calypso (kål’i sō). In classical mythology, the queen of the island Ogygia on which Ulysses was wrecked. She kept him there for seven years, and promised him perpetual youth and immortality if he would remain with her for ever. Ogygia is generally identified with Gozo, near Malta.

A calypso is a type of popular song evolved by the Negroes of the West Indies.

Cam and Isis. The universities of Cambridge and Oxford; so called from the rivers on which they stand.

May you, my Cam and Isis, preach it long.
“The right divine of kings to govern wrong.”
PoPE: Dunciad, iv, 187.

Cama. The god of young love in Hindu mythology. His wife is Rati (voluptuousness), and he is represented as riding on a sparrow, holding in his hand a bow of flowers and five arrows (i.e. the five senses).

Over hills with peaky tops engrav’d,
And many a tract of palm and rice,
The throne of Indian Cama slowly sail’d
A summer fan’d’d with spice.
TENNISON: The Palace of Art.

Camacho (kám a’chô). A rich but unfortunate man in one of the stories in Don Quixote, who is cheated out of his bride just when he has prepared a great feast for the wedding; hence the phrase “Camaoho’s wedding” to describe useless show and expenditure.

Camargo (kâ mar’gô). Marie-Anne Cuppi (1710-1770). The greatest dancer of the 18th century, flourished in France; from her the modern Society in London devoted to the Ballet takes its name.

Camarilla (kăm a ril’ â). Spanish for a small chamber or cabinet; hence, a clique, a nest of intriguers, the confidants or private advisers of the sovereign.

Camarena. Ne moveas Camarinam (Don’t meddle with Camarina). Camarena, a lake in Sicily, was a source of malaria to the inhabitants, who, when they consulted Apollo about draining it, received the reply, “Do not disturb it.” Nevertheless, they drained it, and ere long the enemy marched over the bed of the lake and plundered the city. The proverb is applied to those who remove one evil, but thus give place to a greater—leave well alone.

Camber. In British legend, the second son of Brute (q.v.). Wales fell to his portion; which is one way of accounting for its ancient name of Cambria.

Cambria (käm’bria). The ancient name of Wales, the land of the Cimbri or Cymry.

Cambria’s fatal day.—GRAY: Bard.
The Cambrian mountains, like far clouds,
That skirt the blue horizon, dusky rise.
THOMSON: Spring, 961-62.

Cambrian Series. The earliest fossiliferous rocks in North Wales, consisting principally of marine sediments which were formed after the close of Archean times and before the Ordovician period. So named by Sedgwick (1836).

Cambri. A kind of very fine white linen cloth, so named from Cambrai (Flem. Kameryk), in Flanders, where for long it was the chief manufacture.

He hath ribands of the colours i’ the rainbow;
inkles, caddisscs, cambricks, and lawns.
SHAKESPEARE: Winter’s Tale, iv, 3.

Cambridge Apostles, The. A debating society founded at Cambridge by John Sterling in 1826, and remarkable for the talent of its undergraduate members and for the success to which they attained in after life. Among Cambuscan colours (boat crews). See Colours.

Cambuscan (kəmˈbʌs kən). In Chaucer’s unfinished Squire’s Tale, the King of Sarra, in Tartary, model of all royal virtues. His wife was Elfeta; his two sons, Algarsife and Cambalo; and his daughter, Canace. Milton refers to the story in Il Penseroso—

He that left half-told
The story of Cambuscan bold.

Cambyses (kəmˈbə sēz). A pompous, ranting character in Thomas Preston’s ‘lamentable tragedy’ of that name (1570).

Give me a cup of sack, to make mine eyes look red: for I must speak in passion, and I will do it in King Cambyses’ vein.

Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, ii, 4.

Camden Society. An historical society founded in 1838 for the publication of early visits; and literary remains connected with English history; and so named in honour of William Camden (1551-1623), the antiquary. In 1897 it amalgamated with the Royal Historical Society, and its long series of publications was transferred to that body.

Camel. The name of Mohammed’s favourite camel was Al Kaswa. The mosque at Koba covers the spot where it knelt when Mohammed fled from Mecca. He considered the kneeling of the camel as a sign sent by God, and remained at Koba in safety for four days. The sweiftest of his camels was Al Adha, who is able to have performed the whole journey from Jerusalem to Mecca in four bounds, and, a consequence, to have had a place in heaven allotted him with Al Borak (q.v.), Balaam’s ass, Tobit’s dog, and the dog of the seven sleepers.

To break the camel’s back. To pile on one thing after another till at last the limit is reached and a catastrophe or break-down caused. The proverb is “It is the last straw that breaks the camel’s back.” See Straw.

It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven. (see Eye). In the Koran we find a similar expression: “The impious shall find the gates of heaven shut; nor shall he enter till a camel shall pass through the eye of a needle.” In the Rabbinical writings is a passage which goes to prove that the word ‘camel’ should not be changed into ‘cable’, as Theophylact suggests: “Perhaps thou art one of the Parnathians, who can make an elephant pass through the eye of a needle.”

It is as hard to come, as for a camel
To thread the postern of a needle’s eye.
Shakespeare: Richard II, v, 5.

Some think to avoid a difficulty by rendering Matt. xix, 24, “It is easier for a cable to go through the eye of a needle...”, but the word is καμήλα and the whole force of the passage rests on the “impossibility” of the thing, as it is distinctly stated in Mark x, 24. “How hard is it for them that trust in their riches, πι τοῖς χρημασί...” It is impossible by the virtue of money or by bribes to enter the kingdom of heaven.

Camelot (kəmˈlət). In British fable, the legendary spot where King Arthur held his court. It has been tentatively located at various places—in Somerset, near Winchester (q.v.), in Wales, and even in Scotland.

Hamner, referring to King Lear, ii, 2, says Camelot is Queen Camel, Somersetshire, in the vicinity of which “are many large moors where are bred great quantities of geese, so that many other places are from hence supplied with quills and feathers.” Kent says to the Duke of Cornwall:

Goose, if I had you upon Sarum Plain,
I'd drive ye cackling home to Camelot.

It seems, however, far more probable that Kent refers to Camelford, in Cornwall, where the Duke of Cornwall resided, in his castle of Tintagel. He says, “If I had you on Salisbury Plain [where geese abound], I would drive you home to Tintagel, on the river Camel.” Though the Camelot of Shakespeare is Tintagel or Camelford, yet the Camelot of King Arthur may be Queen Camel; and indeed visitors are still pointed to certain large entrenchments at South Cadbury (Cadbury Castle) called by the inhabitants “King Arthur’s Palace.”

Cameo (kəmˈi ə). An ornamental carving in relief on a precious or semi-precious stone. It is the opposite of intaglio, which is a raised carving. Onyx cameos, overlaid with their layers of light and dark, were much used by the cameo cutters of Greece and Rome, and have always been the favourite stones for these ornaments. However, amethysts, turquoises and most gems have at some time been cut as cameos. In the nineteenth century, cameos were cut in shells, coral, and jet.

Cameos (1900) by Cyril Davenport, F.S.A., gives further information.

Cameronian Regiment. The 26th Infantry, which had its origin in a body of Camerons (q.v.), in the Revolution of 1688. Now called “The Queen’s Own Cameron Highlanders.”

Cameron Highlanders. The 79th Regiment of Infantry, raised by Allan Cameron, of Errock, in 1793. Now called “The Queen’s Own Cameron Highlanders.”

Cameronian Regiment. The 26th Infantry, which had its origin in a body of Camerons (q.v.), in the Revolution of 1688. Now the 1st Battalion of the Scottish Rifles; the 2nd Battalion is the old No. 90.

Cameronians. The strictest sect of Scottish Presbyterians, organized in 1680, by the Covenant and field preacher, Richard Cameron, who was slain in battle at Aird’s Moss in 1680. He objected to the alliance of Church and State, and seceded from the Kirk, but in 1690 his followers submitted to the General Assembly, and they became merged with the Covenanters.

Camilla (kə milˈə). In Roman legend a virgin queen of the Volscians. Virgil (Eneid, vii, 809) says she was so swift that she could run over a field of corn without bending a single blade, or make her way over the sea without even wetting her feet.

Not so when swift Camilla scours the plain,
Flies o’er the unbending corn and skims along the main.

Camisarde or Camisado (kām' i sard, kām i sa'dō). A night attack; so called because the attacking party wore a camise or camisard over their armour, both to conceal it, and that they might the better recognize each other in the dark.

Camisards. In French history, the Protestant insurgents of the Cevennes, who resisted the violence of the dragoons, long after the revocation of the edict of Nantes (1685), and so called from the white shirts (camisards) worn by the peasants. Their leader was Jean Cavalier (1681-1740), afterwards Governor of Jersey.

Camise. A loose jacket worn by women when dressed in négligé; an underbodice worn immediately beneath a blouse.

Camisole de force. A straight waistcoat. Frequently mentioned in accounts of capital punishments in France.

Camplan, Battle of. In Arthurian legend the battle which put an end to the Knights of the Round Table, and at which Arthur received his death. It was fought by the Earl of Cornwall, from the hand of his nephew Modred, who was also slain. It took place about A.D. 537, but its site (traditionally placed in Cornwall) is as conjectural as that of Camelot (q.v.).

Camlet, camelot. There are two different dress materials to which this word is applied. As far back as the 13th century camlet was a rich stuff originally made of silk and camel's hair:—

After dinner I put on my new camelott suit, the best that I ever wore in my life, the suit costing me above £24.—PEPYS: Diary (June 1st, 1664).

Camelot. As crooked as a cammock. The more it is bowed the better it serves; yet the bow, the more it is bent and the weaker it waxeth.—LYLY: Euphues.

Cammack. As crooked as a cammock. The crook in the head, like a hockey stick or shinty club; also, a piece of timber bent for the knee crook at the head, like a hockey stick or shinty stick. Cammock is a crooked staff, or a stick with a bent head; also, a piece of timber bent for the knee crook at the head, like a hockey stick or shinty stick. Camerig, is a crooked staff, or a stick with a bent head; also, a piece of timber bent for the knee crook at the head, like a hockey stick or shinty stick.

Campeador. The Cid (q.v.).

Camp-followers. The old-time armies, which lived on the country, moved in leisurely progress, accompanied by a number of civilian followers such as washerwomen and sutlers who sold liquors and provisions, etc. These were called camp-followers.

Camp-followers. The old-time armies, which lived on the country, moved in leisurely progress, accompanied by a number of civilian followers such as washerwomen and sutlers who sold liquors and provisions, etc. These were called camp-followers.

Campceiling. A ceiling sloping on one side from the vertical wall towards a plane surface in the middle. A corruption of cam (twisted or bent) ceiling. (Halliwell gives cam, "awry.")

Campeador. The Cid (q.v.).

Camp-followers. The old-time armies, which lived on the country, moved in leisurely fashion and laid up in winter quarters, were accompanied by a number of civilian followers such as washerwomen and sutlers who sold liquors and provisions, etc. These were called camp-followers.

Campania (kām pā' ni ā). A lawless, secret society of Italy organized early in the 19th century. It claimed the right of settling disputes, etc., and was so named from the blouse (Ital. camorra) worn by its members, the Camorristas.

Campaigner. A ceiling sloping on one side from the vertical wall towards a plane surface in the middle. A corruption of cam (twisted or bent) ceiling. (Halliwell gives cam, "awry.") Canaille (kā ni') (Fr., a pack of dogs). The mob, the rabble; a contemptuous name for, the populace generally.

Canard (kǎn' ar) (Fr., a duck). A hoax, a ridiculously extravagant report. Littre says that the term comes from an old expression, rendre un canard à moitié, to half-sell a duck. As this is no sale at all it came to mean "to take in," "to make a fool of." Another explanation is that a certain Cornelissen, to try the gullibility of the public, reported in the papers that he had twenty ducks, one of which he cut up and threw to the nineteen, who devoured it greedily. He then cut up another; then a third, and so on till the nineteenth was gobbled up by the survivor—a wonderful proof of duck voracity.

Canary. Wine from these islands was very popular in the 16th and 17th centuries.

_Hunt_: Farewell, my hearts, I will to my honest knight Falstaff, and drink canary with him.

_Merry Wives of Windsor_, iii, 2.

Canecan. A fast and extremely dexterous dance, sometimes accompanied by extravagant and indecent gestures, and originally performed in the casinos of Paris. The most famous example is in Offenbach's opera _Orpheus in the Underworld._

They were going through a quadrille with all those supplementary gestures introduced by the great Rigelboche, a notorious danseuse, to whom the notorious canecan owes its origin.

Cancel. A leaf printed and inserted in a book to replace that which was originally printed, because of last minute corrections or errors detected after printing. In bibliographical terminology the new leaf being inserted is called the _cancellanda_ and that which it replaces is the _cancellata._

Cancer. One of the twelve signs of the zodiac (the Crab). It appears when the sun has reached its highest northern limit, and begins to go backward towards the south; but, like a crab, the return is sideways (June 21st to July 23rd). According to fable, Juno sent Cancer against Hercules when he combated the Hydra of Lerna. It bit the hero's foot, but Hercules killed the creature, and Juno took it up to heaven.

_Candidaule_ (kán daw' léz). King of Lydia about 710 to 668 B.C. Legend relates that he exposed the charms of his wife to Gyges.

_Candid Camera._ An unseen camera which is used to photograph an unsuspecting subject. Candid camera shots, which are often ridiculous, are much used in pictorial journalism.

_Candidate_ (Lat. candidatus, clothed in white). One who seeks or is proposed for some office, appointment, etc., among the Romans, arrayed themselves in a loose white robe. It was loose that they might scare away evil spirits. He is not fit to hold the candle to him. He is very inferior. The allusion is to link-boys who held candles in theatres and other places of night amusement.

_Candle._ Bell, book, and candle. See Bell.

Fite (or Gay) as the king's candle. "Bariolé comme la chandelier des rois," in allusion to an ancient custom of presenting on January 6th, a candle of various colours at the shrine of the three kings of Cologne. It is generally applied to a woman overdressed, especially with gay ribbons and flowers. "Fine as fivepence."

He is not fit to hold the candle to him. He is very inferior. The allusion is to link-boys who held candles in theatres and other places of night amusement.

_Candlemas._ February 2nd, the feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, when Christ was presented by her in the Temple; one of the quarter days in Scotland. In Catholic churches all the candles which will be needed in the church during the year are consecrated on this day; they symbolize Jesus Christ, called "the light of the world," and "a light to lighten the Gentiles." The Romans had a custom of burning candles to scare away evil spirits.

If Candlemas Day be wet and foul, The half o' winter's come and mair; If Candlemas Day be dry and fair, The half o' winter's come and air.

Scotch Proverb.

The badger peeps out of his hole on Candlemas Day, and, if he finds snow, walks abroad; but if he sees the sun shining he draws back into his hole.

_German Proverb._

Candour, Mrs. In _The School for Scandal_ Sheridan drew the perfect type of female back-biter, concealing her venom under an affectation of frank amiability.

_Caneiphorus_ (kán nef' ôr ús) (pl. _caneiphori_). A sculptured figure of a youth or maiden bearing a basket on the head. In ancient Greece the caneiphori bore the sacred things necessary at the feasts of the gods.

_Canicular Days_ (Lat. _canicula_, dim. of _canis_, a dog). The dog-days (q.v.).
Canicular period. The ancient Egyptian cycle of 1461 years or 1460 Julian years, also called a Sothic period, (q.v.), during which it was supposed that any given day had passed through all the seasons of the year.

Canicular year. The ancient Egyptian year, computed from one heliacal rising of the Dog Star (Sirius) to the next.

Canister Shot. A projectile, used before the invention of the shell, consisting of a container full of shot which disintegrated and showered its contents on the enemy.

Canker. The briar or dog-rose. Put down Richard, that sweet lovely rose. And plant this thorn, this canker. Bolingbroke. Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, i, 3.

Also a caterpillar that destroys leaves, buds, etc.

As killing as the canker to the rose. Milton: Lycidas.

Canmore. See Great Head.

Canna. The place where Hannibal defeated the Romans under Varro and L. Aemilius Paulus with great slaughter in 216 B.C., by means of withdrawing his centre and so enveloping the enemy—one of the most difficult manoeuvres in war to perform. Any fatal battle that is the turning point of a great general’s prosperity may be called his Canna. Thus Moscow was the Canna of Napoleon.

Cannel Coal. A corruption of candle coal, so called from the bright flame unmixed with smoke, which this highly bituminous coal yields in combustion.

Cannibal. A word applied to those who eat human flesh. It is the Sp. Canibales, a corruption of Caribes, i.e. the Caribs, inhabitants of the Antilles, some of whom, when discovered by Columbus, were said to be man-eaters.

The natives live in great fear of the canibals [i.e. Caribals, or people of Cariba].—COLUMBUS.

Cannon. This term in billiards is a corruption of carom, which is short for Fr. carambole, the red ball (caramboler, to touch the red ball). A cannon is a stroke by which the player’s ball touches one of the other balls in such a way as to glance off and strike the remaining ball.

Canny. See Ca’ Canny.

Canoe. Like cannibal, canoe is one of the very few words we get from native West Indian. This is a Haitian word, canoa, and was brought to Europe by the Spaniards. It originally meant a boat hollowed out of a tree-trunk.

Paddle your own canoe. Mind your own business. The caution was given by President Lincoln, but it is an older saying and was used by Capt. Marryat (Settlers in Canada, ch. viii) in 1844. Sarah Bolton’s poem in Harper’s Magazine for May, 1854, popularized it:—

Voyage upon life’s sea,
To yourself be true,
And, whate’er your lot may be,
Paddle your own canoe.

Canon. From Lat. and Gr. canon, a carpenter’s rule, a rule, hence a standard (as “the canons of criticism”), a model, an ordinance, as in Shakespeare’s:—

Or that the Everlasting had not fixed
His canon ‘gainst self-slaughter.

Hamlet, i, 2.

The canon. Canon law (q.v.).

Self-love which is the most inhibited sin in the canon. All’s Well that Ends Well, i, 1.

In music, from the same derivation, a composition written strictly according to rule, for two or three voices which sing exactly the same melody one a few beats after the other, either at the same or a different pitch—as Three Blind Mice.

Also, the body of the books in the Bible which are accepted by the Christian Church generally as genuine and inspired; the whole Bible from Genesis to Revelation, excluding the Apocrypha. Called also the sacred canon and the Canonical Books.

The Church dignitary known as a Canon is a caputial member of a cathedral or collegiate church, usually living in the precincts, and observing the statutable rule or canon of the body to which he is attached. The canons, with the dean at the head, constitute the governing body, or chapter, of the cathedral.

Canon law. A collection of ecclesiastical laws which serve as the rule of church government. The professors or students of canon law are known as canons.

Doubt not, worthy senators! to vindicate the sacred honour and judgment of Moses your predecessor, from the shallow commenting of scholastics and canons.—MILTON: Doctrine of Divorce, Intro.

Canonical dress. The distinctive or appropriate costume worn by the clergy according to the direction of the canon. Bishops, deans, and archdeacons, for instance, wear canonical hats. This distinctive dress is sometimes called simply “canonicals”; Macaulay speaks of “an ecclesiastical in full canonicals.” The same name is given also to the special robes of other professions, and to special parts of such robes, such as the pouch on the gown of an M.D., originally designed for carrying drugs; the lamb-skin hat of a B.A. hood, in imitation of the toga candida of the Romans; the tippet on a barrister’s gown, meant for a wallet to carry briefs in; and the proctors’ and proctors’ tippet, for papers—a sort of sabretache.

Canonical Epistles. The seven catholic epistles, i.e. one of James, two of Peter, three of John, and one of Jude. The epistles of Paul were addressed to specific churches or to individuals.

Canonical hours. The different parts of the Divine Office which follow and are named after the hours of the day. They are seven—viz. matins, prime, tierce, sext, none, vespers, and compline. Prime, tierce, sext, and none are the first, third, sixth, and ninth hours of the day, counting from six in the morning. Compline is a corruption of completorium (that which completes the services of the day). The reason why there are seven canonical hours is that David says, “Seven times a day do I praise thee” (Ps. cxix, 164).

In England the phrase means more especially the time of the day within which persons can be legally married, i.e. from eight in the morning to six p.m.

Canonical obedience. The obedience due by the inferior to the superior clergy. Thus bishops owe canonical obedience to the archbishop of the same province.

Canopus (kàn ô' pus). A seaport in ancient Egypt, 15 miles N.E. of Alexandria. Also the name of the bright star in the southern constellation Argo navis. Except for Sirius this is the brightest star in the heavens.

We drank the Libyan sun to sleep, and lit lamps which out-burn'd Canopus.

Tennyson: Dream of Fair Women.

Canopic vases. Vases used by the Egyptian priests for holding the viscera of bodies embalmed, four being provided for each body. So called from Canopus, in Egypt, where they were first used.

Canopy properly means a gnat curtain. Herodotus tells us (ii. 95) that the fishermen of the Nile used to lift their nets on a pole, and form thereby a rude sort of tent under which they slept secure that gnats would not pass through the meshes of a net. Subsequently the hangings of a bed were so called, and lastly the canopy borne over kings. (Gr. kanops, a gnat.)

Canossa (kà nos’ à). Canossa, in the duchy of Modena, is where, in January, 1077, the Emperor, Henry IV, went to humble himself before Gregory VII (Hildebrand).

Hence, to go to Canossa, to eat humble pie; to submit oneself to a superior after having refused to do so.

Cant. A whining manner of speech; class phraseology, especially of a pseudo-religious nature, to sing, whence "chant".

It seems to have been first used of the whining manner of speech of beggars, who were known as "the canting crew" (q.v.). In Harman's Caveat, or Warning, for Common Cursetors, vulgarly called Vagabonds (1567), we read:—

As far as I can learn or understand by the examination of our language—which is the term peddlers Frenche or Canting—began but within these xxx yeares.

And one of the examples of "canting" that he gives begins:—

Bene Lightmanes to thy quarreromes, in what tipken hast thou lyped in this darkenesse, whether in a lybbe and thrummel? (Good-morrow to thy body, in what house hast thou lain in all night, whether in a bed or in the straw?)

The term was in familiar use in the time of Ben Jonson, signifying "professional slang," and "to use professional slang."

The doctor here...

When he discourses of dissection
Of vena cava and of vena porta...

What does he else but cant? Or if he run
To his judicial astrology,
And trawl the trine, the quartile, and the sextile...

Does he not cant?

Ben Jonson: The Staple of News, IV, iv (1625).

Cant also means insincerity or conventionality in speech or thought.

Kid your mind of cant.

Dr. Johnson.

From this it is extended to include any assumption or affectation of enthusiasm for high thoughts or aims.

Canting crew. Beggars, gipsies, thieves, and vagabonds, who use "cant" (q.v.). In 1696 "E. B. Gent," published the first English Slang Dictionary, with the title "A New Dictionary of the Terms, Ancient and Modern, of the Canting Crew in its several Tribes."

Cantabrian Surge. The Bay of Biscay. So called from the Cantabri who dwelt about the Biscayen shore. Suetonius tells us that a thunderbolt fell in the Cantabrian Lake (Spain) "in which twelve axes were found." (Galba, viii.)

She her thundering army leads To Calpe [Gibraltar]... or the rough Cantabrian Surge.

Akenside: Hymn to the Naiades.

Cantate Sunday (kàn ta' te). Rogation Sunday, the fourth Sunday after Easter. So called from the first word of the introit of the mass: "Sing to the Lord." Similarly "Lutare Sunday" (the fourth after Lent) is so called from the first word of the mass.

Canteen means properly a wine-cellar (Ital. cantina, a cellar). Then a refreshment house in a barrack for the use of the soldiers, whence it has now come to be applied to a communal restaurant for members of a large firm, etc. Then a vessel for holding liquid refreshment, carried by soldiers on the march; and finally a complete outfit of cutlery.

Canter. An easy gallop; originally called a Canterbury pace or gallop, from the ambling gait adopted by mounted pilgrims to the shrine of St. Thomas à Becket at Canterbury.

A preliminary canter. Something which precedes the real business in hand. The reference is to the "trial trip" of horses before the race begins.

To win in a canter. Easily; well ahead of all competitors.

Canterbury Tales. Chaucer set it forth that he was in company with a party of pilgrims going to Canterbury to pay their devotions at the shrine of Thomas à Becket. The party assembled at an inn in Southwark, called the Tabard, and there agreed to tell one tale each, both in going and returning. He who told the best tale was to be treated with a supper on the homeward journey. The work is incomplete, and we have none of the tales told on the way home.

Canucks (ka ņûk’s). The name given in the U.S.A. to Canadians generally, but in Canada itself to Canadians of French descent. The origin is uncertain, but it has been suggested that it is a corruption of Connaught, a name originally applied by the French Canadians to Irish immigrants.

Canvas means cloth made of hemp (Lat. cannabis, hemp). To canvas a subject is to strain it through a hemp strainer, to sift it; and to canvass a borough is to solicit the votes.

Caora (ka ór’ á). A river described by Elizabethan voyagers (see Hakluyt), on the banks of which dwelt a people whose heads grew beneath their shoulders. Their eyes were in their shoulders, and their mouths in the middle of their breasts. Raleigh, in his Description of Guiana, gives a similar account of a race of men. Cp. Blemmyes.
Cap. The word is used figuratively by Shakespeare for the top, the summit (of excellence, etc.); as in They wear themselves in the cap of the time (All's Well, ii, 1), i.e. "They are the ornaments of the age"; a very riband in the cap of youth (Hamlet, iv, 7); Thou art the cap of all the fools alive (Timon, iv, 3); or fortune's cap we are not the very button (Hamlet, ii, 2); etc.

Black cap. See BLACK.

Cap acquaintance. A bowing acquaintance. One just sufficiently known to touch one's cap to.

Cap and bells. The insignia of a professional fool or jester.

Cap and feather days. The time of childhood.

Here I was got into the scenes of my cap and feather days.—COBBETT.

Cap and gown. The full academical costume of a university student, tutor, or master, worn at lectures, examinations, and after "hall" (dinner).

Is it a cap and gown affair?

C. Bede: Verdant Green.

Cap in hand. Submissively. To wait on a man cap in hand is to wait on him like a servant, ready to do his bidding.

Cap money. Money collected in a cap or hat; hence an improvised collection.

Cap of liberty. When a slave was manumitted by the Romans, a small Phrygian cap, usually of red felt, called pileus, was placed on his head, he was termed libertinus (a freedman), and his name was registered in the city tribes. When Saturninus, in 100 B.C., possessed himself of the Capitol, he hoisted a similar cap on the top of his spear, to indicate that all slaves who joined his standard should be free; Marius employed the same symbol against Sulla; and when Caesar was murdered, the conspirators marched forth in a body, with a cap elevated on a spear, in token of liberty.

In the French Revolution the cap of liberty (bonnet rouge) was adopted by the revolutionists as an emblem of their freedom from royal authority.

Cap of Maintenance. A cap of dignity anciently belonging to the rank of duke; the fur cap of the Lord Mayor of London, worn on days of state; a cap carried before the British sovereigns at their coronation. The significance of maintenance here is not known, but the cap was an emblem of very high honour, for it was conferred by the Pope three times on Henry VII and once on Henry VIII. By certain old families also it is borne in the coat of arms, either as a charge or in place of the wreath.

Cater cap. A square cap or mortar-board.

(Fr. quartier.)

College cap. A trenched like the caps worn at the English Universities by students and bachelors of art, doctors of divinity, etc.

Fool's cap. A conical cap with feather and bells, such as licensed fools used to wear. For the paper so called, see FOOLSCAP.

Forked cap. A bishop's mitre.

John Knox cap. An early form of the trencher, mortar-board, or college cap (q.v.), worn at the Scottish Universities.

Monmouth cap. See MONMOUTH.

Phrygian cap. Cap of liberty (q.v.).

Scottish cap. A cloth cap worn in Scotland as part of the national dress.

Square cap. A trenched or mortar-board, like the college cap (q.v.).

Statute cap. A woollen cap ordered by a statute of Queen Elizabeth in 1571 to be worn on holidays by all citizens for the benefit of the woollen trade. To a similar end, persons were at one time obliged to be buried in woollens. Well, better wits have worn plain statute caps.

SHAKESPEARE: Love's Labour's Lost, v, 2.

Trencher cap, or mortar-board. A cap with a square board, generally covered with black cloth, and a tassel, worn with academical dress; a college cap (q.v.).

A feather in one's cap. An achievement to be proud of; something creditable.

I cap to that. I assent to it. The allusion is to a custom among French judges. Those who assent to the opinion stated by any of the bench signify it by lifting their toque from their heads.

I must put on my thinking cap. I must think about the matter before I give a final answer. The allusion is to the official cap of a judge, formerly donned when passing any sentence, but now only when passing sentence of death.

If the cap fits, wear it. If the remark applies to you, apply it yourself. Hats and caps differ very slightly in size and appearance, but everyone knows his own when he puts it on.

Setting her cap at him. Trying to catch him for a sweetheart or a husband. In the days when ladies habitually wore caps they would naturally put on the most becoming, to attract the attention and admiration of the favoured gentleman.

To cap. To take off, or touch, one's cap to, in token of respect; also to excel.

Well, that caps the globe.—C. BRONTÉ: Jane Eyre.

To cap a story. To go one better; after a good story has been told to follow it up with a better one of the same kind.

To cap verses. Having the metre fixed and the last letter of the previous line given, to add a line beginning with that letter, thus:

When lines are long, the wind was cold (D)
Dogs with their tongues their wounds do heal (L).
Like words congealed in northern air (R).
Regions Caesar never knew (W).
With all a poet's ecstasies (Y).
You may deride my awkward pace, etc., etc.

There are parlour games of capping names, proverbs, etc., in the same way, as: Plato, Otway, Young, Goldsmith, etc., "Rome was not built in a day," "Ye are the salt of the earth," "Hunger is the best sauce," "Example is better than precept," "Time and tide wait for no man," etc.
To cap it all. To surpass what has gone before: to make things even worse.

To gain the cap. To obtain a bow from another out of respect.

Such gains the cap of him that makes them fine, but keeps his book uncrossed.

Shakespeare: Cymbeline, iii, 3.

To pull caps. To quarrel like two women, who pull each other's caps. An obsolete phrase, used only of women. In a description of a rowdy party in 18th-century Bath we read:

At length they fairly proceeded to pulling caps, and everything seemed to presage a general battle... they suddenly desisted, and gathered up their caps, ruffles, and handkerchiefs.

To send the cap round. To make a collection. This is from the custom of street musicians, acrobats, etc., of sending a cap round among the onlookers to collect their pennies.

Wearing the cap and bells. Said of a person who is the butt of the company, or one who excites laughter at his own expense. The reference is to licensed jesters formerly attached to noblemen's establishments. See Cap AND Bells above. Their headgear was a cap with bells.

One is bound to speak the truth... whether he mounts the cap and bells or a shovel hat [like a bishop]—Thackeray.

Your cap is all on one side. Many workmen, when they are bothered, scratch their heads and to do this push the cap on one side of the head, generally over the right ear, because the right hand is occupied.

Capful of wind. Olaus Magnus tells us that Eric, King of Sweden, was so familiar with evil spirits that what way soever he turned his cap the wind would blow, and for this he was called Windy Cap. The Laplanders drove a profitable trade in selling winds, as have many ancient and primitive peoples; and even so late as 1814, Bessie Millie, of Pomona (Orkney), used to sell favourable winds to mariners for the small sum of sixpence.

To be capped. A player who has represented England, Scotland, Ireland, or Wales in an international match at any of the major field sports may wear a cap bearing the national emblem. Hence the phrase: He was capped for England.

Capability Brown. Lancelot Brown (1715-83) landscape gardener and architect, one of the founders of the modern or English style of landscape gardening. He received this name because he habitually assured prospective employers that their land held "great capabilities." "

Cap-a-pie (käp a-pë). From head to foot; usually with reference to arming or accounting. From O.Fr. cap a pie (Mod.Fr. de pied en cap).

Armed at all points exactly cap-a-pie.

Shakespeare: Hamlet, i, 2.

I am courtier, cap-a-pê.

Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iv, 3.

Cape. The Cape. Cape of Good Hope Province.

Cape cart. This is the name given to a two-wheeled, hooded, horse-drawn cart originally used in Cape Colony and S. Africa generally.

Cape gooseberry. Although it takes its name from the Cape, this plant originally came from S. America and its botanical name is Physalis peruviana. It is much prized for its decorative bladder-like calyx.

Spirit of the Cape. See Adamastor.

Cape of Storms. See Storms.

Cape Court. A lane adjacent to the Stock Exchange in London where dealers congregate to do business: hence used sometimes for the Stock Exchange itself. Hence also Capel Courtier, a humorous term for a professional stock-dealer. So called from Sir William Capel, Lord Mayor in 1504.

Caper. The weather is so foul not even a caper would venture out. A Manx proverb. A Caper is a fisherman of Cape Clear in Ireland, who will venture out in almost any weather.

To cut capers. To spring upwards in dancing, and rapidly interlace one foot with the other; figuratively, to act in any unusual manner with the object of attracting notice.

Caper here is from It. capra, a she-goat, the allusion being to the erratic way in which goats will jump about.

CUT YOUR CAPERS! Be off with you! I'll make him cut his capers, i.e. rue his conduct.

Caper Merchant. A dancing-master who cuts "capers."

Capet. Hugh Capet, the founder of the Capetian dynasty of France, is said to have been so named from the cappa, or monk's hood, which he wore as lay abbot of St. Martin de Tours. The Capetians reigned over France till 1328, when they were succeeded by the House of Valois; but Capet was considered the family name of the kings, hence, Louis XVI was arraigned before the National Convention under the name of Louis Capet.

Capital. Money or money's worth available for production.

His capital is continually going from him [the merchant] in some shape and returning to him in another.

Adam Smith: Wealth of Nations, Bk. ii, ch. 1.

Active capital. Ready money or property readily convertible into it.

Circulating capital. Wages, or raw material. This sort of capital is not available a second time for the same purpose.

Fixed capital. Land, buildings, and machinery, which are only gradually consumed.

To make capital out of. To turn to account: thus, in politics, one party is always ready to make political capital out of the errors of the other.

Capitano, El Gran (el grân käp i ta' nó) (i.e. the Great Captain). The name given to the famous Spanish general Gonsalvo de Cordova (1453-1515), through whose efforts Granada and Castile were united.

Capiitary (käp it'â lâr i). A collection of ordinances or laws, especially those of the Frankish kings. The laws were known as capitulars because they were passed by a chapter (q.v.).

Capon (kā'pōn). Properly, a castrated cock; but the name has been given to various fish, perhaps originally in a humorous way by friars who wished to evade the Friday fast and so eased their consciences by changing the name of the fish, and calling a chicken a fish out of the coop. Thus we have—

A Crail's capon. A dried haddock.
A Glasgow capon. A salt herring.
A Severn capon. A sole.
A Yarmouth capon. A red herring.

Capon is also an obsolete term for a love-letter, after the Fr. poulet, which means not only a chicken but also a love-letter, or a sheet of fancy notepaper. Thus Henri IV, consulting with Sully about his marriage, says: "My niece of Guise would please me best, though report says maliciously that she loves poulets in paper better than in a fricassee."

Boyet...break-up this capon [i.e. open this love-letter].

SHAKESPEARE: Love's Labour's Lost, iv, 1.

Capicorn (kā'pōr'ī kōrn'). Called by Thomson, in his Winter, "the centaur archer." Anciently, the winter solstice occurred on the entry of the sun into Capricorn, i.e. the Goat: but the stars, having advanced a whole sign to the east, the winter solstice now falls at the sun's entrance into Sagittarius (the centaur archer), so that the poet is strictly right, though we commonly retain the ancient classical manner of speaking. Capricorn is the tenth, or, strictly speaking, the eleventh, sign of the zodiac (December 21-January 20).

According to classical mythology, Capricorn was Pan, who, from fear of the great Typhon, changed himself into a goat, and was made by Jupiter one of the signs of the zodiac.

Captain. The Great Captain. See CAPITANO, EL GRAN.

A led captain. An obsequious person, who dances attendance on the master and mistress of a house, for which service he has a knife and fork at the dinner table.

Captain Armstrong. A name for a cheating jockey—one who pulls a horse with a strong arm, and so prevents his winning.

Captain Cauf's Tail. In Yorkshire, the commander-in-chief of the mummers who used to go round from house to house on Plough Monday (q.v.). He was most fantastically dressed, with a cockade and many coloured ribbons; and he always had a genuine calf's (cauf's) tail affixed behind.

Captain Copperthorne's Crew. All masters and no men.

Capua (kā'pū'ā). Capua corrupted Hannibal. Luxury and self-indulgence will ruin anyone. Hannibal was everywhere victorious over the Romans till he took up his winter quarters at Capua, the most luxurious city of Italy. When he left Capua his star began to wane, and, ere long, Carthage was in ruins and himself an exile. Another form of the saying is—

Capua was the Canae of Hannibal (see CANNAE).

Capuchin (kāp'ū chin). A friar of the Franciscan Order (q.v.) of the new rule of 1525; so called from the capuce or pointed cowl.

Capulet (kāp'ū let). A noble house in Verona, the rival of that of Montague; Juliet is of the former, and Romeo of the latter. Lady Capulet is the beau-ideal of a proud Italian matron of the 15th century (Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet). The expression so familiar, "the tomb of all the Capulets," is from Burke; he uses it in his reflections on the Revolution in France (vol. iii, p. 349), and again in his Letter to Matthew Smith, where he says:—

I would rather sleep in the southern corner of a country churchyard than in the tomb of the Capulets.

Caput Mortuum (kāp'ut mōr'tū m). (Lat., dead head). An alchemist's term, used to designate the residuum left after exhaustive distillation or sublimation; hence, anything from which all that rendered it valuable has been taken away. Thus, a learned scholar paralysed is a mere caput mortuum of his former self. The French Directory, towards its close, was a mere caput mortuum of a governing body.

Caqueux (ka kē). A sort of gipsy race in Brittany, similar to the Cagots of Gascony, and Colliberts of Poitou.

Carabas (kār'ā ba). He is a Marquis of Carabas. An ultra-conservative nobleman, of unbounded pretensions and vanity, who would restore the lavish foolely of the reign of Louis XIV; one with Fortunatus's purse, which was never empty. The character is taken from Perrault's tale of Puss in Boots, where he is Puss's master.

Prêtres que nous vengeons
Levez la dîme et partageons;
Et toi, peuple animal,
Porte encor le hât fédal,
Chapeau bas! Chapeau bas!
Gloire au marquis de Carabas!

Béranger (1816).

The Marquis of Carabas in Disraeli's Vivian Grey is intended for the Marquis of Clancaride.

Carabinier. See CARBINIER.

Caracalla (kār'ā kāl'ē). Aurelius Antoninus, Roman Emperor, 211-17, was so called because he adopted the Gaulish caracalla in preference to the Roman toga. It was a large, close-fitting, hooded mantle, reaching to the heels, and slit up before and behind to the waist. Cfp. CURMANTLE.

Carack. See CARRACK.

Caradoc (kā rád' ok). A Knight of the Round Table, noted for being the husband of the only lady in the queen's train who could wear the mantle of matrimonial fidelity. He appears (as Craddocke) in the old ballad The Boy and the Mantle (given in Percy's Reliques):—

Craddocke called forth his ladye,
And bade her come in;
Saith, Winne this mantle, ladye,
With a little dinne.

Also, in history, the British chief whom the Romans called Caractacus (lived about A.D. 50).
Caran d’Ache (kâ-rân dash’). This was the pseudonym of Emanuel Poiré (1858-1909), a well-known French caricaturist. He was famous in his time as an illustrator of military subjects, and his biting cartoons and caricatures appeared in various papers and magazines.

Carat. A measure of weight, about \( \frac{1}{20} \) of an ounce, used for precious stones; also a proportional measure of gold used to describe the fineness of gold, thus, gold of 22 carats has 22 parts pure gold and 2 parts alloy. The Arabic qirat, meaning the seed of the locust tree, the weight of which represented the Roman siliqua, was \( \frac{1}{10} \) of the golden solidus of Constantine, which was \( \frac{1}{20} \) of an ounce.

Caraway (kár’ á wá’). The flavouring of cakes with caraway seeds was once more common than is now the case. Cakes so flavoured were called caraways, hence Shallow’s invitation to “shall see my orchard, with a dish of caraways.”

Carbineer or Carabineer. A soldier armed with a short light rifle (called a carbine) such as is used by cavalry. The word is from Fr. carabine, which is either from Calabrinus, a Calabrian (in which case the word would originally mean a skirmisher or light horseman), or from late Lat. chadabula, a kind of sallista (a skirmisher). The 6th Dragoon Guards in the British Army are known as the Carabiniers.

Carbonado (kar bon’ à dō’). Grilled meat or fish. Strictly speaking, a carbonado is a piece of meat cut crosswise for the gridiron (Lat. arbo, a coal).

If he do come in my way, so; if he do not—if I come in his willingly, let him make a carbonado of me. Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, v, 3.

Carbonari (kar bo nà’ ré’; singular, carbonaro), his name, assumed by a secret political society in Italy (organized 1808-14), means charcoal burners. Their place of muster they called a “hut”; its inside, “the place for elliing charcoal”; and the outside, the forest.” Their political opponents they called “wolves.” Their object was to convert the kingdom of Naples into a republic. The name was later applied to other secret political societies.

Carcanet (kar’ ká net’). A small chain of jewels for the neck. (Fr. carcan, a collar of old.) The famous collar of Agnes Sorel, swoufite of Charles VII of France (1422-50), which she called her carcanet, was said to have been composed of rough diamonds.

Like captain jewels in a carcanet. Shakespeare: Sonnets.

Carcass. The shell of a house before the oors are laid and walls plastered; the skeleton of a ship, a wreck, etc. The body of a dead animal, so called from Fr. carcasse, Lat. carciosum.

The Goodwins, I think they call the place; a very dangerous flat and fatal, where the carcasses of many a tall ship lie buried.

Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, iii, 1.

The name was also given to an obsolete type of incendiary shell projected from a mortar.

Charlestown, . . . having been fired by a carcass from Copp’s Hill, sent up dense columns of smoke. Lessons: United States.

Card. Slang for a queer fellow, an eccentric, a “character.”

You’re a shaky old card; and you can’t be in love with this Lizzie.

Dickens: Our Mutual Friend, Bk. iii, ch. i.

Perhaps suggested by the phrase, “a sure card.” See below. We thus have such phrases as the following:

A great card. A bigwig; the boss of the season; a person of note.

A knowing card. A sharp fellow, next door to a sharper. The allusion is to cardsharpers and their tricks.

Whose great aim it was to be considered a knowing card.—Dickens: Sketches, etc.

A loose card. A worthless fellow who lives on the loose.

A loose card is a card of no value, and consequently the properest to throw away.—Hoyle: Games, etc.

A queer card. An eccentric person, “indifferent honest”; one who may be “all right,” but whose proceedings arouse mild suspicion and do not inspire confidence.

A sure card. A person one can fully depend on; a person sure to command success. A project to be certainly depended on. As a winning card in one’s hand.

A clear conscience is a sure card.

Lyly: Euphues (1579).

Other phrases are directly from card-games, or from the “card” of a compass, i.e. the dial on which the points of the compass are displayed. The first-named group gives us, among others, such phrases as:

A cooling card. An obsolete expression for something that cools one’s ardour, probably derived from some old game of cards. It is quite common in Elizabethan literature. In Euphues (1579) Lyly calls the letter to Philitas “a cooling card for Philitas and all fond lovers,” and says—

The sick patient must keep a straight diet, the silly sheep a narrow fold, poor Philitus must believe Euphues, and all lovers (he only excepted) are cooled with a card of ten or rather fooled with a vain toy.

A card of ten was evidently an important card; Shakespeare has:

A vengeance on your crafty witt’th’d hide!

Yet I have faced it with a card of ten.

Taming of the Shrew, ii, 2.

which means either to put a bold face on it, or to meet an attack with craft and subtlety.

A leading card. The strongest point in one’s argument, etc.; a star actor. In card games a person leads from his strongest suit.
He played his cards well. He acted judiciously and skilfully, like a whist-player who plays his hand with judgment.

On the cards. Likely to happen, projected, and talked about as likely to occur. This phrase may have allusion to the programme or card of the races, but is more likely to derive from fortune-telling by cards.

That's the card. The right thing; probably referring to card games—"that is the right card to play"—but it may refer to tickets of admission, cards of the races, programmes, etc.

That was my trump card. My best chance, my last resort.

The cards are in my hands. I hold the disposal of events which will secure success; I have the upper hand, the whip-end of the stick.

To ask for one's card. To resign one's job, derived from the National Health Insurance card kept by the employer while the workman is on the job.

To count on one's cards. To anticipate success under the circumstances; to rely on one's advantages.

To go in with good cards. To have good patronage; to have excellent grounds for expecting success.

To play one's best card. To do that which one hopes is most likely to secure victory.

To throw up the cards. To give up as a bad job; to acknowledge you have no hope of success. In some games of cards, as poker, a player has the liberty of saying whether he will play or not, and if his hand is hopelessly bad he throws in his cards and sits out till the next deal.

From the compass card we have the phrase: To speak by the card, to be careful with one's words; to be as deliberate, and have as much claim to be right, as a compass.

Law . . . is the card to guide the world by.

We must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us.—Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. i.

It is possible that this phrase has reference to written documents, such as agreements made between a merchant and the captain of a vessel. To speak by the card may be to speak according to the indentures or written instructions, but when Osric tells Hamlet (v. 2) that Laertes is "the card and calendar of gentry" the card is a card of a compass, containing all its points. Laertes is the card of gentry, in whom may be seen all its points.

Cards. It is said that there never was a good hand at whist containing four clubs. Such a hand is called "The Devil's Four-poster."

In Spain, spades used to be called "cumbiones: clubs, rabbits; diamonds, picas; and hearts, roses. The present name for spades is espados (swords); of clubs, bastos (cudgels); of diamonds, dineros (square pieces of money used for paying wages); of hearts, copas (chalices)."

The French for spade is "pique" (pikemen or soldiers); for club, "trefle" (clover, or husbandmen); of diamonds, carreaux (building tiles, or flagstones); of hearts, cœur.

The English spade is the French form of a pike, and the Spanish name; the club is the French trefoil, and the Spanish name.

Court cards. See COURT.

Cardigan (car' di gán). This is a knitted woolen over-waistcoat, with or without sleeves, and it takes its name from the 7th Earl of Cardigan, who commanded the Light Brigade and led it in the famous charge at Balaklava. The garment appears to have been first worn by our men in the bitter cold of the Crimean winter.

Cardinal. The Lat. cardo means a hinge; its adjective, cardinalis (from which we get "cardinal"), meant originally "pertaining to a hinge," hence "that on which something turns or depends," hence "the principal, the chief." Hence, in Rome a "cardinal church" (ecclesia cardinalis) was a principal or parish church as distinguished from an oratory attached to such, and the chief priest (presbyter cardinalis) was the "cardinal," the body (or "College") of cardinals forming the Council of the Pope, and electing the Pope from their own number. This did not become a stabilized regulation till after the third Lateran Council (1173), since when the College of Cardinals has consisted of six cardinal bishops, fifty cardinal priests, and fourteen cardinal deacons.

The cardinal's red hat was made part of the official vestments by Innocent IV (1245) "in token of their being ready to lay down their life for the gospel."

Cardinal humours. An obsolete medical term for the four principal "humours" of the body, viz. blood, phlegm, yellow bile, and black bile.

Cardinal numbers. The natural, primitive numbers, which answer the question "how many?" such as 1, 2, 3, etc. 1st, 2nd, 3rd, etc., are ordinal numbers.

Cardinal points of the compass. Due north, west, east, and south. So called because they are the points on which the intermediate ones such as NE., NW., NNE., etc., hinge or hang. (Lat. cardo, a hinge.)

The poles, being the points upon which the earth turns, were called in Latin cardines (cardo, a hinge, see CARDINAL above), and the cardinal points are those which lie in the direction of the poles and of sunrise and sunset. Thus, also, the winds that blow due east, west, north, and south are known as the cardinal winds. It is probably from the fact that the cardinal points are four in number that the cardinal humours, virtues, etc., are also four.

Cardinal signs (of the zodiac). The two equinoctial and the two solstitial signs, Aries and Libra, Cancer and Capricorn.

Cardinal virtues. Justice, prudence, temperance, and fortitude, on which all other virtues hang or depend. A term of the Schoolmen, to distinguish the "natural" virtues from the "theological" virtues (faith, hope, and charity).

Care. Care killed the cat. It is said that "a cat has nine lives," yet care would wear them all out.

Hang sorrow, care'll kill a cat.

Ben Jonson: Every Man in his Humour, i, 3.

Care Sunday. The fifth Sunday in Lent. "Care" here means trouble, suffering; and Care Sunday means Passion Sunday (as in Old High Ger. Kar-frigad is Good Friday).

Care Sunday is also known as Carle, or Carling Sunday. It was an old custom, especially in the north, to eat parched peas fried in butter on this day, and they were called Carlings.

Carle-cloth. The fine silk or linen cloth formerly laid over the newly-married in the Catholic Church, or held over them as a canopy.

Carême (kà rám'). Lent; a corruption of quadragesima.

Caricatures mean sketches "overloaded"; hence, exaggerated drawings. (Ital. caricatura from caricare, to load or burden.)

Carillons (ka ril' yonz), in France, are chimes or tunes played on bells; but in England the suites of bells that play the tunes. The word is the O.Fr. quarignon, from late Lat. quattrinto, a chime played on four bells; carillons were formerly rung on four bells; nowadays the number is usually eight, but the "bob maximus" (see Bob) is rung on twelve.

Carle Sunday; Carlings. See Care Sunday.

Carlists (kar' lists). Don Carlos (1788-1855) was the second son of Charles IV of Spain, and in the death of his brother, Ferdinand VII would have become king of Spain had not the Carlist Law been set aside and Ferdinand's daughter Isabella declared Queen. He set up his claim to the throne, the Church sided with him, and for years Spain was rent by a war between the Carlists and the queen's party. The Carlist activities did not cease until the death of Don Carlos II, 1699. The last pretender died childless in 1836, and the following year the party was merged by General Franco in his Falange.

Carlovingians (kar lo' ving' giánz) or Carolinians. So called from Carolus Magnus, or Charlemagne. They were descended from the Frankish lords in Austria in the 7th century, and are of German Emperors 752-911, and of Italian kings (774-961).

Carmagnole (kar ma nyoël). Originally the name of a kind of jacket worn in France in the 18th century, and introduced there from Piedmont, where it was the custom to wear it. It was adopted by the revolutionists, and the name thus came to be applied to them, to the soldiers of the first republic, and to a song and a wild kind of dance that became immensely popular and was almost invariably used at the executions of 1792 and 1793. The first verse of the song is:

Madame Veto avait promis
De faire égorger tout Paris,
Madame Veto avait promis
De faire égorger tout Paris,
Mais son coup a manqué
Grace à nos canonnières.

Dansons la carmagnole, Vive le son, vive le son,
Dansons la carmagnole, Vive le son du canon.

Madame Veto was the people's name for Queen Marie Antoinette, as she was supposed to have inspired the king's unfortunate use of the veto.

The word was subsequently applied to other revolutionary songs, such as Ça ira, the Marseillaise, the Chant du départ; also to the speeches in favour of the execution of Louis XVI, called by Barère, des Carmagnoles.

Carmelites (kar' me litz). Mendicant friars, the first rule of whose Order is said to have been given by John, patriarch of Jerusalem, and to have been formed from the records of the prophet Elijah's life on Mount Carmel. Also called White Friars, from their white cloaks. See Barefooted.

Carmen Sylva (kar' men syl' vá). This was the pen-name of Queen Elizabeth of Rumania (1843-1916). She was a woman of cultivated tastes, a musician, painter, and writer of poems and stories.

Carminative (kar min' ativ). A medicine given to relieve flatulence. The name is a relic of the medieval theory of humours; it is from Lat. carminare, to card, which, in Italian, also meant "to make gross humours fine and thin." The object of carminatives is to expel wind, and they were supposed to effect this by combing out the gross humours as one combs out (or cards) the knots in wool.

Carney. To wheedle, to caress, to coax. An old dialect word of unknown origin.

Carnival. The season immediately preceding Lent, ending on Shrove Tuesday, and a period in many Roman Catholic countries devoted to amusement; hence, revelry, riotous amusement. From the Lat. carnivale, to card wool, which, in Italian, meant "to make gross humours fine and thin." The object of carminatives is to expel wind, and they were supposed to effect this by combing out the gross humours as one combs out (or cards) the knots in wool.

Caroly. To wheedle, to caress, to coax. An old dialect word of unknown origin.

Carol (from O.Fr. carole, which is probably from Lat. choraula, a dance). The earliest meaning of the word in English is a round dance, hence a song that accompanied the dance, hence a light and joyous hymn, a meaning which came to be applied specially to, and latterly almost confined to, such a hymn in honour of the Nativity and sung at Christmas time by wandering minstrels. The earliest extant English Christmas carol dates from the 13th century, and was originally written in Anglo-Saxon; a translation of the first verse is here given. The first printed collection of Christmas carols came from the press of Wynkyn de Worde in 1521; it included the Boar's Head Carol, which is still sung at Queen's College, Oxford. For another example, see Boar's Head.

Lording, listen to our lay—
We have come from far away
To seek Christmas;
In this mansion we are told
He his yearly feast doth hold;
'Tis to-day!
May joy come from God above,
To all those who Christmas love.

Carolingians. See CARLOVINGIANS.

Carolus (kà rō' lus). A gold coin of the reign of Charles I. It was at first worth 20s., but afterwards 23s.

Carouse (ka rouz'). To drink deeply, to make afterwards 23s. used specially of completely emptying a spear's:-

Carpathian island of Carpathus (now Scarpanto), between Rhodes and Crete, who could transform while you have the opportunity. Seize the present, trust to-morrow e'en as you may. —Connington.

probably arose from the similarity of sound between "to drink carouse", and "to drink a rouse."

Carpathian Wizard. Proteus, who lived in the island of Carpathus (now Scarpanto), between Rhodes and Crete, who could transform himself into any shape he pleased. He is represented as carrying a sort of crook in his hand, because he was an ocean shepherd and had to manage a flock of sea-couples.

By the Carpathian wizard's book.

Carpe Diem (kar' pà dî' em). Enjoy yourself while you have the opportunity. Seize the present day. "Dum vivimus, vivamus."

Carpe diem quam minimum credula postere.

Horace: Odes, i, xi, 8.

Seize the present, trust to-morrow e'en as little as you may.—Connington.

Carpet. The magic carpet. The carpet which, to all appearances, was worthless, but which, when he travelled, and it was probably with allusion to the preference shown by non-martial knights for the carpeted drawing-room over the tented field.

You are women
Or, at the best, loose carpet-knights.

Mansinger: Maid of Honour, ii, 5.

Carrack. A large merchant ship which, in Elizabethan times, carried the valuable cargoes from the Spice Islands and the Far East to Portugal, and could readily be fitted out as a man-of-war.

"And now hath Sathanas," seith he, "a tayl Broder than of a carrick is the sayl."

Chaucer: Son nour's Prologue, 23.

Carronade. A piece of ordnance.

Carriage. This used to mean, that which is carried, luggage; also the supports or mount of a piece of ordnance.

And after those days we took up our carriages, and went up to Jerusalem.—Acts xxi, 15.

In Num. iv, 24, where the text gives "burdens," the marginal rendering is "carriage," and the usage is not at all uncommon in the English of that date.

Carriage company. Persons who go visiting in their private carriage.

Seeing a good deal of carriage company.—Thackeray.

Carroonade (kà rô nàd'). A short gun of large calibre like a mortar, having no trunnions and so differing from howitzers, first made in 1779 at the Carron foundry, Scotland. Carronades are fastened to their carriages by a loop underneath, and were chiefly used on ships, to enable heavy shot to be thrown at close quarters.

Carry. Carry arms! Carry swords! Military commands directing that the rifle or drawn sword is to be held in a vertical position in the right hand and against the right shoulder.

Carry coals. See Coals.

To carry everything before one. To be beyond competition; to carry off all the prizes; to be a successful competitor in any form of examination or sport.

To carry fire in one hand and water in the other. To say one thing and mean another; sur le tapis (on the tablecloth)—i.e. before the House, under consideration. The question has been laid on the table of the House, and is now under debate.
to flatter, to deceive; to hul suspicion in order the better to work mischief.
Alteram manus fert aquam, altera ignem.
ALTERA MANUS FERT AQUAM, ALTERA PANEM OSTENSTAT.
From the point already reached, particularly in military parlance. (2) To make a scene, lose one's temper—"he carried on something dreadful."
To carry on. (1) To continue an activity from the point already reached, particularly in military parlance. (2) To make a scene, lose one's temper—"he carried on something dreadful."
To carry one's point. To succeed in one's aim.
Candidates in Rome were balloted for,
and the votes were marked on a tablet by points. Hence, omne punctum ferre
"to be carried nem con.," or to gain every vote; and "to carry one's point" is to carry off the points at which one aimed.
To carry out or through. To continue a project to its completion.
To carry one's bat. Said of a cricketer who "not out" at the close of the game. Hence, figuratively, to outlast one's opponents, to succeed in one's undertaking.
CARRY SWORDS! See CARRY ARMS!
To carry the day. To win the contest; to carry off the honours of the day.
To carry weight. In horse racing, to qualize the weight of two or more riders by dragging to the lighter ones, till both (or all) the riders are made of uniform weight.
He carries weight! He rides a race!
"Tis for a thousand pounds.
COWPER: John Gilpin.
Also, to have influence.
Cart. To put the cart before the horse is to reverse the right order or allocation of things.
This methinks is playnely to sett the carte before the horse.—The Babees Book (Early English Tract Society, p. xxiii).
The phrase has its counterpart in other languages:—
French: Mettre la charrette avant les beaux.
Latin: Carinus bovem trahit Preposituri.
Greek: Hysteron proteron.
German: Die pferde hinter den wagen spannen.
Italian: Metter il carro innanzi al buoi.
Arte. Carte blanche (Fr.). A paper with only the signature written on it, so that the person to whom it is given may write his terms nowing that they will be accepted. Literally, blank paper. It was originally a military usage, referring to unconditional surrender;
but it is now used entirely in a figurative sense, referring absolute freedom of action on one whom it is given.
CARTA DE VISITE (Fr.). A visiting card; originally tended to be used as a visiting card. The card was started in 1857, but it never "caught on," as such, although the small size of photograph became very popular.
Arte (kar tel'). This is a word with several meanings. Originally it was applied only to a written agreement between opponents in a war ranging the exchange of prisoners. From that it was extended to include the ship used for such an exchange. It has since come to mean a working arrangement between rival commercial concerns in one or more countries to regulate the price of the commodity they are interested in, invariably at the expense of the community.
Cartesian Philosophy (kar' tê zhán). The philosophical system of René Descartes (1596-1650), a founder of modern philosophy. The basis of his system is cogito ergo sum. See COGITAT. Thought must proceed from soul, and therefore man is not wholly material;
that soul must be from some Being not material, and that Being is God. As for physical phenomena, they must be the result of motion excited by God, and these motions
he termed vortices.
Carthage of the North (kar' thaj). This was the name given to Lübeck, when it was the head of the Hanseatic League.
Cartaginem esse delendam. See DELENDA
EST CARTHAGO.
Carthaginian faith. Treachery. See PUNICA
FIDES.
Carthusians. An order of monks, founded about 1086 by St. Bruno, of Cologne, who, with six companions, retired to the solitude of La Grande Chartreuse, thirteen miles north-east of Grenoble, and there built his famous monastery. In 1902 the monks were evicted by order of the French government, and in the following year their buildings and property were sold, the monks themselves settling at the Certosa (Charterhouse) near Lucca.
The first English Charterhouse was established in 1178; the monks of the London Charterhouse were among the staunchest opponents of Henry VIII. In 1833 the Carthusians were re-established in the Charterhouse at Parkminster, Sussex. See CHART-REUSE.
Cartoon. Originally a design drawn on cartone (pasteboard) to serve as a model for a work of art, such as a fresco or tapestry. Now applied to a caricature or political sketch.
Cartidge Paper. A stout, rough paper, originally manufactured for cartridges. The word is a corruption of cartouche, from carta (paper).
Carvel-built. A term in shipbuilding applied to a vessel whose planks are set edge to edge and do not overlap. From Caravella (Ital.) a large sailing ship. See CLINKER-BUILT.
Carvilia. See MORGAN LE FAY.
Caryatides (kâr i'ât' i'dz). Figures of women in Greek costume, used in architecture to support entablatures. Caryatæ, in Laconia, sided with the Persians at Thermopylae; in consequence of which the victorious Greeks destroyed the city, slew the men, and made the women slaves.
Praxiteles, to perpetuate the disgrace, employed figures of these women, instead of columns. CP. ATLANTES, CANEPHORUS.
Casabianca, Louis (kas' ä bi' ang' ka). Captain of the French man-of-war, L'Orient. At the battle of Aboukir, having first secured the safety of his crew, he blew up his ship, to prevent it falling into the hands of the English. His little son, Giacomo Jocante, refusing to leave him, perished with his father. Mrs. Hemans made a ballad on the incident, which was also celebrated by the French poets Lebrun and Chenier.

Case. The case is altered. See Plowden.

To case. To skin an animal; to deprive it of its "case." See First Catch Your hare, s. v. Catch.

Case-hardened. Impenetrable to all sense of honour or shame. The allusion is to steel hardened by carbonizing the surface.

Cashier. To dismiss an officer from the army, to discard from society. (Dut. casseren, Fr. casser, to break; Ital. cassare, to blot out.)

The ruling rogue, who dreads to be cashiered, Contrives, as he is hated, to be feared.

Swift: Epistle to Mr. Gay, 137.

Cashmere. See Kerseymere.

Casino (ká se'nó). Originally, a little casa or room near a theatre where persons might retire, after the play was over, for dancing or music.

Cask. A vessel for the storing of wine in bulk. Some local names for casks are as follows:—

Arroba, Spain; basil, Portugal; barile, Italy; barrique, France; Breute, Switzerland; Dreibling, Eimer, or Fuder, Austria; Oxhoft, Hamburg; bochonok, Russia.

Casket Homer. See Homer.

Casket Letters, The. Letters supposed to have been written between Mary Queen of Scots and Bothwell, at least one of which was held to prove the complicity of the Queen in the murder of her husband. Darnley. They were kept in a casket which fell into the hands of the Earl of Morton (1567); they were examined and used as evidence (though denounced as forgeries by the Queen—who was never allowed to see them), and they disappeared after the execution of the Regent, the Earl of Gowrie (1584), in whose custody they had last been. They have never been recovered, and their authenticity is still a matter of dispute.

Casper (kás'pér). A huntsman who sells himself to Zimeel, the Black Huntsman in Weber's opera Der Freischiitz.

Cassandra (ká sán' drá). A prophetess. In Greek legend the daughter of Priam and Hecuba, gifted with the power of prophecy; but Apollo, whose advances she had refused, brought it to pass that no one believed her predictions, although they were invariably correct. She appears in Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida.

A Cassandra of the Crew [gipsies], after having examined my Lines very diligently told me, etc. Spectator, July 30th, 1711.

Cassation. The Court of Cassation, in France, is the highest Court of Appeal, the Court which can cassar (quash) the judgment of other Courts.

Cast. Inhabitants of what is now the Cassiopea hundred, Hertfordshire, referred to by Caesar, in his Commentaries. The name can still be traced in Cassiobury Park, just outside Watford.

Cassiberian (kás i bé' rè' án). Uncle to Cymbeline, mentioned in Shakespeare's play of that name. He is the historical Cassivellanus, a British prince who ruled over the Catuvellenni (in Herts, Bucks, and Berks), about 50 B.C., and was conquered by Cesar.

Shakespeare drew his particulars from Holinshed, where it is Guiderus, not Cymbeline, who refuses to pay the tribute.

Cassiopeia (kás i ó pé' è' á). In Greek mythology, the wife of Cepheus, King of Ethiopia, and mother of Andromeda (q. v.). In consequence of her boasting of her beauty, she was sent to the heavens as the constellation Cassiopeia, the chief stars of which form the outline of a woman seated in a chair and holding up both arms in supplication.

That stared Ethiope queen that strove To set her beauty's praise above The sea-nymphs and their powers offended. Milton: Il Penseroso.

Cassiterides (kás i ter' i dè' z). The tin islands, generally supposed to be the Scilly Islands and Cornwall; but possibly the isles in Vigo Bay are meant. It is said that the Veneti procured tin from Cornwall, and carried it to these islands, keeping its source a profound secret. The Phenicians were the chief customers of the Veneti.

Cast. A cast of the eye. A squint. One meaning of the word cast is to twist or warp. Thus, a fabric is said to "cast" when it warps; the seamen speak of a "casting," or turning the head of a ship on the tack it is to sail. We also speak of a "casting vote" (q. v.).

Cast down. Dejected. (Lat. dejectus.)

To cast a sheep's eye at one. See Sheep.

To cast about. To deliberate, to consider, as, "I am casting about me how I am to meet the expenses." A sporting phrase. Dogs, when they have lost scent, "cast for it," i.e. spread out and search in different directions to recover it.

To cast accounts. To balance or keep accounts. To cast up a line of figures is to add them together and set down the sum they produce. To cast or throw the value of one figure into another till the whole number is totalled.

To cast anchor. To throw out the anchor in order to bring the vessel to a standstill. (Lat. anchoram jacere.)

To cast aside. To reject as worthless.

To cast beyond the moon. To form wild conjectures. One of Heywood's proverbs. At one time the moon was supposed to influence the weather, to affect the ingathering of fruits, to rule the time of sowine, reaping, and slaying cattle, etc.

I talke of things impossible, and cast beyond the moon.—Heywood.
To cast in one's lot. To share the good or bad fortune of another.

To cast in one's teeth. To throw reproach at one. The allusion is to knocking one's teeth out by stones.

All his faults observed.
Set in a note book, learned and conned by rote.
To cast into my teeth.

CASTALY (kä's-tä-lé). A fountain of Parnassus sacred to the Muses. Its waters had the power of inspiring with the gift of poetry those who drank of them.

What was the great Parnassus' self to Thee, Mount Skiddaw? In his natural sovereignty Our British Hill is nobler far; he shrouds his double front among Atlantic clouds, And pours its dreams more sweet than Castaly.

Wordsworth: Miscellaneous Sonnets, v.

Caste (Port. casta, race). One of the hereditary classes of society in India; hence any hereditary or exclusive class, or the class system generally. The four Hindu castes are Brahmins (the priestly order), Shatriya (soldiers and rulers), Vaishya (husbandmen and merchants), Sudra (agricultural labourers and mechanics). The first issued from the mouth of Brahma, the second from his arms, the third from his thighs, and the fourth from his feet. Below these come thirty-six inferior classes, to whom the Vedas are sealed, and who are held cursed in this world and without hope in the next.

To lose caste. To lose position in society. To get degraded from one caste to an inferior one.

Castle. Castle in the air. A visionary project, day-dream, splendid imagining that has no real existence. In fairy tales we often have these castles built at a word, and vanish at a word. The French call them Châteaux d'Esparagne or Châteaux en Asie. See Château.

Castle of Bungay. In Camden's Britannia (1607) the following lines are attributed to Lord Bigod of Bungay on the borders of Suffolk and Norfolk:

'Were I in my Castle of Bungay
Upon the river of Waveney,
I would be care for the King of Cockney.'

The events referred to belong to the reign of Stephen or Henry II. The French have a proverb: Je ne voudrais pas être roi, si j'étais révolt de Bar-sur-Aube, I should not care to be king if I were Provost of Bar-sur-Aube (the most lucrative and honourable of all the provostships of France). A similar idea is expressed in the words:

And often to our comfort we shall find,
The sharded beetle in a safer hold
Than is the full-winged eagle.

Shakespeare: Cymbeline, iii, 3.

Almost to the same effect Pope says:

And more true joy Marcellus exiled feels,
Than Caesar with a senate at his heels.

Castle of Indolence. In Thomson's poem of this name (1748) it is situated in the land of Drowsiness, where every sense is steeped in enervating delights. The owner was an enchanter, who deprived all who entered his domains of their energy and free will.

Castle Terabil (or "Terrible") in Arthurian legends stood in Launceston. It had a steep keep environed with a triple wall. Sometimes called Dunheved Castle.

Castor and Pollux (kas' tór, pol' uks). In Roman mythology, the twin sons of Jupiter and Leda. Jupiter is said to have visited Leda in the form of a swan; she produced two eggs, from one of which sprang Castor and Clytemnestra, and from the other Pollux and Helen. Castor and Pollux, also known as the Dioscuri (q.v.), had many adventures, were worshipped as gods, and were finally placed among the constellations.

Their names used to be given by sailors to the St. Elmo's Fire or Corpshant (q.v.). If only one flame showed itself, the Romans called it Helen, and said that it portended that the worst of the storm was yet to come; but two or more luminous flames they called Castor and Pollux, and said that they boded the termination of the storm.

Casuist. One who resolves casus conscientiae (cases of conscience); figuratively, a hair-splitter. M. de Févre called casuistry "the art of quibbling with God."

Casus belli (kä'sús bel' i). (Lat.). A ground for war; an occurrence warranting international hostilities.

M. Cambon asked me what we should say about the violation of the neutrality of Belgium. I said that was a much more important matter; we were considering what statement we should make in regard to our obligation to-morrow, in effect, whether we should declare violation of Belgian neutrality to be a casus belli.—Sir Eow. Grey to the British Ambassador at Paris, August 2nd, 1914.

Cat. Called a "familiar," from the mediæval superstition that Satan's favourite form was a black cat. Hence witches were said to have a cat as their familiar. The superstition may have arisen from the classical legend of Galinthias who was turned into a cat and became a priestess of Hecate.

In ancient Rome the cat was a symbol of liberty. The goddess of Liberty was represented as holding a cup in one hand, a broken sceptre in the other, and with a cat lying at her feet. No animal is so great an enemy to all constraint as a cat.

In Egypt the cat was sacred to Isis, or the moon. It was held in great veneration, and was worshipped with great ceremony as a symbol of the moon, not only because it is more active after sunset, being the dissolution and contraction of its pupil, symbolical of waxing and waning. The goddess Bast (see Bubastis), representative of the life-giving solar heat, was portrayed as having the head of a cat, probably because that animal likes to bask in the sun. Diodorus tells us that whoever killed a cat, even by accident, was by the Egyptians punished by death, and according to ancient tradition, Diana assumed the form of a cat, and thus excited the fury of the giants.

The male, or Tom. cat was formerly—and in Scotland still is—known as a Gib cat; the female as a Doe cat. The word “cat” has other connotations, e.g., a spiteful woman; hence a spiteful remark is said to be “catty.” In early days “cat” was a slang term for a harlot.

Cat Proverbs and Sayings

A cat has nine lives. A cat is more tenacious of life than many animals. It is a careful, sly, and suspicious beast, and—in the wild state—is strong, hardy, and ferocious; also, after a fall, it generally lights upon its feet without injury, the foot and does being well padded.

Tyb.: What wouldst thou have with me?
Mer. Good king of cats, nothing but one of your nine lives.

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, iii. 1.

A cat has nine lives, and a woman has nine cats’ lives.—Fuller: Gnomologia.

A cat may look at a king. An impertinent remark by an inferior, meaning, “I am as good as you.” There was a political pamphlet published with this title in 1652.

All cats love fish but fear to wet their paws. An old adage, said of one who is anxious to obtain something of value but does not care to incur the necessary trouble or risk. It was to this saying that Shakespeare referred in Macbeth, i. 7:

Letting “I dare not” wait upon “I would,”
Like the poor cat i’ the adage.

Before the cat can lick her ear. Never: before the Greek kalends. No cat can lick her ear. See NEVER.

Care killed the cat. See CARE.

Cat i’ the adage. See ALL CATS LOVE FISH above.

To cat. See SICK AS A CAT below.

To cat the anchor. To hang the anchor on the cathead, a piece of timber outside the ship to which the anchor is hung to keep it clear of the ship.

The decks were all life and commotion; the sailors on the forecastle singing “Ho! cheerily, men!” as they called the anchor.

Cheshire cat. See TO GRIN LIKE A CHESHIRE CAT below.

Dick Whittington and his cat. See WHITTINGTON.

Enough to make a cat laugh, incongruously ridiculous.

Enough to make a cat speak. Said of something (usually good liquor) that will loosen one’s tongue.

Come on your ways; open your mouth; there is that which will give language to your cat, open your mouth!—Shakespeare: Tempest, ii. 2.

Hang me in a bottle like a cat. (Much Ado about Nothing, i. 1.) In olden times a cat was for sport enclosed in a bag or leather bottle, and hung to the branch of a tree, as a mark for bowmen to shoot at. Percy mentions a variant of this “sport” in his Reliques of Ancient English Poetry (1765):

- It is still a diversion in Scotland to hang up a cat in a small cask or firkin, half filled with soot; and then a parcel of clowns on horseback try to beat out the ends of it, in order to show their dexterity in escaping before the contents fall upon them.

It is raining cats and dogs. Very heavily. I know Sir John would go, though he was sure it would rain cats and dogs.

Swift: Polite Conversation, ii.

Like a cat on hot bricks. Very uneasy; not at all “at home” in the situation, whatever it may be.

Muffled cats catch no mice (Ital. Catta guantata non piglia sorce). Said of those who work in gloves for fear of soiling their fingers.

Not room to swing a cat. Swinging cats as a mark for sportsmen was at one time a favourite amusement. There were several varieties of this diversion. See HANG ME IN A BOTTLE above, and TO FIGHT LIKE KILKENNY CATS below. It is probable that the custom of tormenting cats by the ignorant arose from their supposed connexion with witches.

Mrs. Crupp had indignantly assured him that there was no room to swing a cat in the house there; but as he had justly observed to me, “You know, Trotwood, I don’t want to swing a cat. I never do swing a cat. Therefore what does that signify to me?”

Dickens: David Copperfield, ch. xxxv.

Smollett had previously used the phrase in Humphrey Clinker, Lett. xxxvi; and it is quite possible that cat was originally cat, the phrase being a sailor’s expression, and the allusion to a swung hammock or cot.

See how the cat jumps. See “which way the wind blows”; which of two alternatives is likely to be the successful one before you give any opinion of its merit or adhesion to it, either moral or otherwise. The allusion is either to the game called “tip-cat,” in which before you strike you must observe which way the “cat” has jumped up, or to the cruel sport mentioned above. See HANG ME IN A BOTTLE.

He soon saw which way the cat did jump, and his company he offered plump.

The Dog’s-meat Man (Universal Songster, 1825).

Sick as a cat. Cats are very subject to vomiting. Hence one is said to cat, or to shoot the cat in vomiting.

To bell the cat. See BELL.

To fight like Kilkenny cats. To fight till both sides have lost their all; to fight with the utmost determination and pertinacity. The story is that during the Irish rebellion of 1798 Kilkenny was garrisoned by a troop of Hessian soldiers, who amused themselves by tying two cats together by their tails and throwing them across a clothes-line to fight. The authorities resolved to put a stop to the “sport,” but, on the officer on duty approaching, one of the troopers cut the two tails with a sword, and the cats made off. When the officer inquired the meaning of the bleeding tails, he was told that two cats had been fighting and had devoured each other till but one tail.
The phrase has never been satisfactorily accounted for, but it has been said that cheese was formerly sold in Cheshire moulded like a cat that looked as though it was grinning. The humorous explanation is that the cats there know that Cheshire is a County Palatine (q.v.), and that the idea is so funny that they are perpetually amused at it!

To let the cat out of the bag. To disclose a secret. It was formerly a trick among country folk to substitute a cat for a sucking-pig, and bring it in a bag to market. If any greenhorn chose to buy a "pig in a poke" without examination, all very well; but if he opened the sack, "the let the cat out of the bag," and the trick was disclosed.

To lead a cat and dog life. To be always quarrelling, as a cat and dog, whose aversion to each other is intense.

There will be jealousies, and a cat-and-dog life ever tender worse than ever.

C.ULU:

To turn cat-in-pan. To turn traitor, to be turncoat. The phrase seems to be the Fr. ouuer côté en peine (to turn sides in trouble).

When George in pudding-time came o'er and moderate men looked big, sir, I turned a cat-in-pan once more, and so became a Whig, sir.

There is a cunning which we in England call the running of the cat in the pan; which is, when that fitch a man says to another, he lays it as if another said it to him.—BACON: Essays: Of Cunning.

The origin of the term is unknown. Johnson in his Dictionary says:

Imagined by some to be rightly written Catipan, as "running from Catipania. An unknown correspondent

"sugines, very naturally, that it is corrupted from me in the pan.

Neither suggestion is accepted by modern biologists.

Touch not a cat but a glove. The punning ott of the Mackintosh clan, whose crest is a cat-a-mountain salient guardant proper, "for supporters "two cats proper." An ly meaning of "but" was "without."

"Except": for another example of this use, e the Prayer Book Version of Ps. xix. 3.

What can you have of a cat but her skin? id of something that is useless for any purpose but one. In former times the cat's t was used for trimming cloaks and coats, it the flesh is no good for anything.

When the cat's away the mice will play.

dvantage will be taken of the absence of the son in authority. An old proverb, found many languages. It is given in Ray's lection.

1ST NAMES, PHRASES, ETC.

Cat and Fiddle. Several fanciful derivations have been found for this inn sign. There can little doubt that it comes from the nursery rhyme, with a possible reference to the once popular game of tip-cat or trap-ball, and the Rid for a dance that were provided as ctions for customers. It is worth men-ning that the Dunciad (i, 224) refers in empt to Cibber as "the Bear and Fiddle down."

Cat and Kittens. A public-house sign, alluding to the range of pewter-pots of various sizes that were so called. Stealing these pots was termed "cat and kitten sneaking."

Cat and Mouse Act. To play cat and mouse with one is "to have him on a string"; while he is in your power to pretend constantly to let him go, but not actually to do so. During the Suffragette agitation at the beginning of the 20th century an Act was passed in 1912 with the object of rendering nugatory the tactics of imprisoned suffragettes who went on "hunger-strike." Under this Act such "hunger-strikers" could be set at liberty, but were liable to re-arrest as soon as they were sufficiently recovered to undergo the remainder of their sentence. This unenlightened Act was not particularly successful.

Cat-call. A kind of whistle used at theatres by the audience to express displeasure or impatience. A hideous noise like the call of a cat.

I was very much surprised with the great consort of cat-calls ... to see so many persons of quality of both sexes assembled together in a kind of caterwauling.

Spectator, No. 361.

Cat-eyed. Able to see in the dark.

Cat ice. Very thin, almost transparent ice from which the water that was underneath has receded; so slight as to be unable to bear a cat.

Cat-lap. A contemptuous name for tea, or other "soft" drink such as a cat could swallow; a non-alcoholic liquor.

A more accomplished old woman never drank cat-lap.—SCOTT: Redgauntlet, ch. xii.

Cat o' mountain. The wild-cat; also the leopard, or panther; hence a wild, savage sort of man.

Cat-nap. To snatch a few minutes sleep in a chair or in a car, between one's appointments or activities, from the propensity of cats for dozing off wherever they are and in any position.

Cat-o'-nine-tails. A whip with nine lashes, used for punishing offenders, briefly called a cat. Popular superstition says that it has nine tails because a flogging by a "trinity of trinities" would be both more sacred and more efficacious. Lilburn was scourged, in 1637, with a whip having only three lashes, but there were twenty knots in each tail, and, as he received a lash every three paces between the Fleet and Old Palace Yard, Cook says that 60,000 stripes were inflicted. Titus Oates was scourged, in the reign of James II, with a cat having six lashes, and, between Newgate and Tyburn, received as many as 17,000 lashes. Thrashing in the British army and navy is no longer employed, but a modified form of it is still, though rarely, used as a civil punishment for crimes committed with violence.

Cat Slane. The name given to certain monoliths in Scotland (there is one near Kirkliston, Linlithgow), so called from Celtic cath, a battle, because they mark the site of some battle. They are not Druidical stones.
Cat's-brains. This curious name is given to a geological formation of sandstone veined with chalk. It is a phrase frequently met with in old agricultural deeds and surveys.

Cat's cradle. A game played with a piece of twine by two children. The suggestion that the name is a corruption of cratch-cradle, or the manger cradle in which the infant Saviour was laid (cratch is the Fr. crèche, a rack or manger), is unsupported by any evidence.

Cat's eye. A gem which possesses chatoyancy, or a changeable lustre. The true, or semi-precious cat's eye is a kind of quartz.

To live under the cat's foot. To be under petticoat government; to be henpecked. A mouse under the paw of a cat lives but by sufferance and at the cat's pleasure.

To be made a cat's paw of, i.e. the tool of another, the medium of doing another's dirty work. The allusion is to the fable of the monkey who wanted to get some roasted chestnuts from the fire, and used the paw of his friend, the cat, for the purpose.

I had no intention of becoming a cat's paw to draw European chestnuts out of the fire.—Com. RODGERS.

At sea, light air during a calm causing a ripple on the water, and indicating a storm, is called by sailors a cat's paw, and seamen affirm that the frolics of a cat indicate a gale.

Cat's whisker. In the old-fashioned crystal wireless sets this was the name given to the fine wire that made contact with the crystal.

Catacomb (kát' á kóm). A subterranean gallery for the burial of the dead, especially those at Rome. The origin of the name is unknown, but it does not appear to have been used till about the 5th century of our era (though the catacombs themselves were in existence, and used for burial, long before), and then only in connexion with one cemetery, that of St. Sebastian, on the Appian Way. This was called the Cæmterium Catacumbas, or, shortly, Catacumbas, which name in course of time was applied equally to similar cemeteries. Catacumbas was probably, therefore, a place-name, denoting the site of this particular cemetery.

Cataian (kát' á yan). A native of Cathay or China; hence, a thief, liar, or scoundrel, because the Chinese had the reputation of being such.

I will not believe such a Cataian, though the priest of the town commended him for a true man. SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives, ii. 1.

Catalogue raisonné (rá' zó ná). A catalogue of books, paintings, etc., classed according to their subjects and often with explanatory notes or comments.

Catamaran (kát'á má rán'). A scraggy old woman, a vixen; so called by a play on the first syllable. It properly means a raft consisting of three logs lashed together with ropes; used on the coasts of Coromandel and Madras.

No, you old catamaran, though you pretend you never read novels.... THACKERAY: Lovel the Widow, ch. i.

Catastrophe (kát tás' tró fí) (Gr. kata, downwards, strephen, to turn). A turning upside down. Originally used of the change which produces the dénouement of a drama, which is usually a "turning upside down" of the beginning of the plot.

All the actors must enter to complete and make up the catastrophe of this great piece.

Sir T. BROWNE: Religio Medici.

Pat, he comes, like the catastrophe of the old comedy.—King Lear, i. 2.

Catch. Catch as catch can. Get by hook or crook all you can; a phrase from the child's game of this name, or from the method of wrestling so called, in which the wrestlers are allowed to get a grip anyhow or anywhere.

All must catch that catch can.

JOHNSON: Rambler, No. 197.

Catch me at it. Most certainly I shall never do what you say.

"Catch me going to London!" exclaimed Vixen.

MISS BRADDON: Vixen.

Catch weights. A term in racing, wrestling or boxing, meaning without restrictions as to weight.

First catch your hare. It is generally believed that Mrs. Glasse, in the Art of Cookery, gave this direction; but the exact words are, "Take your hare when it is eased, and make a pudding.... etc." To "case" means to take off the skin, as in All's Well, iii. 6.

"We'll make you some sport with the fox ere we case him." "First catch your hare," however, is a very old phrase, and in the 13th century Bracton (Bk. iv, tit. i, ch. xxii, sec. 4.) has these words:—

Vulgariter dicitur, quod primo opopertur cervum capere, et postea, cum captus fuerit, illum excoriare (it is vulgarly said that you must first catch your deer, and then, when it is caught, skin it).

Hannah Glasse, who was the author of The Art of Cookery made Plain and Easy, 1747, and various other books of a similar nature, was habit-maker to the Prince of Wales, 1757.

To be caught bending. To be caught at a disadvantage. If you catch a small boy bending over it is easy to smack him on that portion of his anatomy provided by nature for the purpose. Some time about 1903 one of George Robey's songs declared:

What hel! If I catch you bending!

To be caught napping. To suffer some disadvantage while off one's guard. Pheasants, hares, and other animals are sometimes surprised "napping."

To catch a crab. A rowing phrase used when the oarsman fails to catch the water with the oar. He is then struck by the handle of the oar as it is caught in the water and rises.

To catch a tartar. To catch a troublesome prisoner; to have dealings with a person who is more than a match for one; to think that one is going to manage a person, only to find it is no easy job.

We are like the man who boasted of having caught a Tartar when the fact was that the Tartar had caught him.—Cautions for the Times.
To catch on. To make its way; to become popular. As in:
One can never tell what sort of song will catch on with the public, but the one that does is a little gold mine.

To be caught out. To be unmasked in a lie or subterfuge, from ball games in which to have a catch caught by a fieldsman puts the striker out.

To catch the Speaker's eye. To find the eye of the Speaker fixed on you; to be observed by the Speaker. In the House of Commons the member on whom the eye of the Speaker has fixed has the privilege of addressing the House.

To lie upon the catch. To lie in wait; to try to catch one tripping.

You'll catch it. You'll get severely punished. Here "it" stands for the undefined punishment, such as a whipping, a scolding, or other unpleasant consequence.

Catchpenny. A worthless article puffed up to catch the pennies of those who are foolish enough to buy it.

Catchpole. A constable; a law officer whose business it was to apprehend criminals. This is nothing to do with a pole or staff, nor with poll, the head, but is medial Lat. hoppipullus, one who hunts or chases fowls paullus a fowl.

Catchword. A popular cry, a word or a phrase adopted by any party for political or other purposes. "Three acres and a cow," "Your food will cost you more," are good examples.

In printing, the first word on a page which is printed at the foot of the preceding page is known as the catchword. The first book so printed was a Tacitus, by John de Spira, 1469.

Printers also use the same name for the main words in a dictionary; i.e. those at the tart of each article, printed in bold type so as to catch the eye.

In theatrical parlance, the cue, i.e. the last word or so of an actor's speech, is called the atchword.

Catchmen (kæt kə'men). One taught by word of mouth (Gr. katechein, to din into the ears). Those about to be baptized in the early Church were first taught by word of mouth, and then catechized on their religious aims and duties.

Caterers, or Catherans (kætə'rænz). Highland and Scottish freebooters; the word occurs in Scottish romances and ballads.

Cater-cousin. An intimate friend; a remote kinsman. The name probably has reference to persons being catered for together, or boarded together, who would naturally become more or less intimate; "friends so familiar that they eat together."

His master and he, saving your worship's reverence, be scarce, cater-cousin.

SHAKESPEARE: Merchant of Venice, ii, 2.

Caterpillar. Caterpillar Club. An unofficial club started by the Irvin Parachute Company, during the 1939-45 war, who presented a small gold caterpillar pin to any R.A.F. airman who had baled out in action, on his supplying the number of the parachute which had saved his life. A similar organization known as the Goldfish Club existed for those who had been forced to use their rubber dinghies.

Caterpillar traction. This is a device for moving a heavy load over soft ground where wheels will sink. Round the wheels passes an endless band of linked plates which forms a track along which the vehicle progresses. The device is much used for agricultural vehicles and for tanks and other military vehicles.

Cats'gut. Cord of various thicknesses, made from the intestines of animals (usually sheep, but never cats), and used for strings of musical instruments and racquets for ball games. Why it should have been called cat's-gut has never been satisfactorily explained, but it may be a corruption of kit-gut, kit being an old word for a small fiddle. In support of this we have the following from Cartwright's The Ordinary (1634):—

_Hearsay:_ Do you not hear her guts already squeak like kit-strings?

_Slicer:_ They must come to that within this two or three years: by that time she'll be true perfect cat.

_Act i, 2._

_Here's a tune indeed! pish,_
I had rather hear one ballad sung i' the nose now
Than all these simpering tunes played upon cat's-guts
And sung by little kitlings.

_MIDDLETON: Women Beware Women*, iii, 2.

Shakespeare, however, definitely gives cat's-gut its true origin:—

Now, divine air! Now is his soul ravished! Is it not strange that sheep's guts should Hale souls out of men's bodies? Well, a horn for my money, when all's done.—Much Ado, ii, 3.

_Catgut scraper._ A fiddler.

Catharine, St. St. Catharine was a virgin of royal descent in Alexandria, who publicly confessed the Christian faith at a sacrificial feast appointed by the Emperor Maximinus, for which confession she was put to death by torture by means of a wheel like that of a chaff-cutter. Hence Catharine wheel, a sort of firework: in the form of a wheel which is driven round by the recoil from the explosion of the various squibs of which it is composed.

Catharine-window. A wheel-window, sometimes called a rose-window, with radiating divisions.

The Order of St. Catharine. A Russian order founded for ladies of the nobility by Peter the Great after his naval victory of Aland in 1714, and so named in compliment to his wife, Catharine.

To braid St. Catharine's tresses. To live a virgin.

Thou art too fair to be left to braid St. Catharine's tresses.—_LONGFELLOW: Evangeline._

Catharine Théot (tă'ō). This French visionary was somewhat like our Joanna Southcott, calling herself The Mother of God and changing her name to Theos (God). In the height of the Revolution she preached the worship of the Supreme Being and announced that Robespierre was the forerunner of The Word. Robespierre himself believed in her, and she called him her well-beloved son and chief prophet. She was guillotined in 1793, being just seventy years of age.

Cathay (kà'thà'). Marco Polo's name for a country in Eastern Asia, roughly identical with Northern China; from Ki-tah, the name of the ruling race in those parts in the 10th century. Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay. TENNYSON: Locksley Hall.

Cathedrals of the Old Foundation. The ancient cathedrals that existed in England before Henry VIII founded and endowed new cathedrals out of the revenues of the dissolved monasteries. These latter are known as Cathedrals of the New Foundation; they are Chester, Gloucester, Peterborough, Bristol, and Oxford.

Catherine. See CATHARINE.

Catholic. The word (Gr. katholikos, general, universal) means general, universal, comprehensive—a sense which is seen in such a sentence as Wordsworth's:—

Cathedral.Down the years of my life
Credal and test
Vanish before the unreserved embrace
Of catholic humanity.

Ecclesiastical Sonnets, III, xxxvi.

Hence from the Church point of view, it distinguishes first the whole body of Christians as apart from "Jews, heretics, and infidels"; secondly, a member of a Church which claims the Apostolic Succession and direct descent from the earliest body of Christians; and thirdly, a member of the Roman Catholic Church, i.e. the Western or Latin branch of the ancient Catholic (or universal) Church.

Alphonso I, King of Asturias, 739-757, was surnamed The Catholic on account of his zeal in erecting and endowing monasteries and churches. See CATHOLIC KING.

A man of catholic tastes is one who is interested in a wide variety of subjects.

Catholic Church. The entire body of Christians considered as a whole, as distinguished from the Churches and sects into which it has divided. At the Reformation the Western Church was called by the Reformers the Roman Catholic Church, and the Established Church of England was called the "Protestant Church," or the "Reformed National Church." Many members of the Anglican Church still consider and call themselves Catholics.

Catholic and Apostolic Church. The name given to the followers of Edward Irving (1792-1834), and to the Church founded by him in 1829. Also called Irvingites.

Catholic Epistles. Those Epistles in the New Testament not addressed to any particular church or individual; the general epistles, viz. those of James, Peter, and Jude, and the first of John; 2 John is addressed to a "lady," and 3 John to Gaius, and these are usually included.

Catholic King, or His Most Catholic Majesty. A title given by the Pope to Ferdin-and, King of Aragon (1474-1516), for expelling the Moors from Spain, and thereafter used as the appellation of the kings of Spain. Cp. RELIGIOUS.

Catholic League. A confederacy of Catholics formed in 1614 to counter-balance the Evangelic League of Bohemia. The two Leagues kept Germany in perpetual disturbance, and ultimately led to the Thirty Years War (1618-48).

Catholic Roll. A document which English Roman Catholics were obliged to sign on taking their seats as Member of Parliament. It was abolished, and a single oath prescribed to all members by the 29, 30Victoria, c. 19 (1866).

Catholicicon (kà thol'i kòn). A panacea, a universal remedy.

Meanwhile, permit me to recommend,
As the matter admits of no delay,
My wonderful catholicicon.

Catholicos (kà thol'i kòs). The head of the Assyrian Nestorians. Now called the Patriarch of Armenia.

Catiline's Conspiracy (kà'tlînlin). Lucius Sergius Catilina, 64 B.C., conspired with a large number of dissolve young nobles to plunder the Roman treasury, extirpate the senate, and fire the capitol. Cicero, who was consul, got full information of the plot, and delivered his first Oration against Catiline November 8th, 63, whereupon Catilina quitted Rome. Next day Cicero delivered his second Oration, and several of the conspirators were arrested. On December 4th Cicero made his third Oration, respecting what punishment should be accorded to the conspirators. And on December 5th, after his fourth Oration, sentence of death was passed. Catilina tried to escape into Gaul, but, being intercepted, he was slain fighting, 62 B.C.

Cato (kà'tò). He is a Cato. A man of simple life, severe morals, self-denying habits, strict justice, brusque manners, blunt of speech, and of undoubted patriotism, like the Roman censor of that name (234-149 B.C.).

Cato Street Conspiracy. A scheme entertained by Arthur Thistlewood (1770-1820) and other conspirators to overthrow the Government by assassinating the Cabinet Ministers (February 1820). So called from Cato Street (now Horace Street), Edgware Road, where their meetings were held.

Catsup. See KETCHUP.

Caucasian (kàw'kà shán). This is the term employed to designate the white or European race of mankind. It originated with Blumenfeld (1752-1840) who, in 1775, selected a Georgian skull as the perfect type—a view that has since proved wrong. The term is, however, still retained in modern ethnology, though with certain reservations.

Caucus (kàw'kús). An American word, first recorded as having been used in Boston about 1750, introduced into English political slang and popularized by Joseph Chamberlain about 1878. In America it means a meeting of some division, large or small, of a political or legislative body, for the purpose of agreeing upon a united course of action in the main assembly. In England it is applied apropos to an inner committee or organization which seeks to manage affairs behind the backs of its party. The origin of the word is unknown, but it may be connected with the Algonquin word *cau-cau-as-u, one who advises.

In all these places is a several commander, which they call *weseowance, except the *Chickahomanians, who are governed by the priests and their assistants, or their Elders called *cau-cau-wassoughes.—Capt. Jos. Smith's "Travels in Virginia"; 6th Voyage (1666).

Caudillo (kaw' dîl' yô). The title adopted by Gen. Franco, head of the Falangist government in Spain. It was taken in imitation of Mussolini's "Duce" and Hitler's "Führer," like them meaning "Leader."

Caudine Forks (kaw' din). A narrow pass in the mountains near Capua, now called the Valley of Arpaia. It was here that the Roman army, under the consuls T. Veturius Calvinus and Sp. Postumius, fell into the hands of the Samnites (321 B.C.), and were made to pass under the yoke.

Hard as it was to abandon an enterprise so very dear to him ... he did not hesitate to take the more prudent course of passing under (sic) the Caudine Forks of the Monroe doctrine, and leave Maximilian and the French bondholders to their fate. Standard, November 17th, 1866.

Caudle. Any sloppy mess, especially that means something sweet...

"alley" which seeks a "caul."

Caught *rapping. A woman's hair, now called a *caul."

Caul. Any membranous covering, especially that means something sweet.

Cauld-lad, The, of Hilton Hall. A house-spirit, who moved about the furniture during the night. Being resolved to banish him, the inmates left for him a green cloak and hood, before the kitchen-fire, which so delighted him that he never troubled the house any more; but sometimes he might be heard singing:—

"Here's a cloak, and here's a hood.
The caul'd-lad of Hilton will do no more good.

Caurus (kaw' rûs). The Latin name for the west-north-west wind, Anglicized by Chaucer as Chorus.

... the sonne is hid when the sterres ben clusted by a swifte winde nighete Chorus.—BOETHIUS: Bk. i, Mett. iii.

The ground by piercing Caurus seared.

THOMSON: Castle of Indolence, ii, 78.

Causa causans (kaw' zà kaw' tânz). The initiating cause; the primary cause.

Causa causata. The cause which owes its existence to the causa causans; the secondary cause.

Causa vera (a) The immediate predecessor of an effect; (b) a cause verifiable by independent evidence. (Mill.)

In theology God is the causa causans, and creation the causa causata. The presence of the sun above the horizon is the causa vera of daylight, and his withdrawal below the horizon is the causa vera of night.

Cause, The. A mission; the object or project. To make common cause. To work for the same object. Here "cause" is the legal term, meaning pro or con, as it may be, the cause or side of the question advocated.

Cause célèbre (Fr.). Any famous law case or trial.

Aristotelian causes are these four:

(1) The Efficient Cause. That which immediately produces the effect.

(2) The Material Cause. The matter on which (1) works.

(3) The Formal Cause. The Essence of "Form" (= group of attributes) introduced into the matter by the efficient cause.

(4) The Final or Ultimate Cause. The purpose or end for which the thing exists or the causal change takes place. But God is called the ultimate Final Cause, since, according to Aristotle, all things tend, so far as they can, to realize some Divine attribute.

God is also called The First Cause, or the Cause Causeless, beyond which even imagination cannot go.

Causerie (kô' zër e). Gossip, small-talk; in journalism a chatty kind of essay or article, a set of gossipy paragraphs. (Fr. causerie, te-chat.)

Caution. So-and-so's a caution, meaning that he is odd in his ways, likely to do something unexpected, often with a quaint twist to it. The phrase is originally American, and had a somewhat wider application:—

"The way the icy blast would come down the bleak shore was a caution."

His wife was what the Yankees call a Caution.

MORTIMER COLLINS: Vivien (1870).

Caution money. A sum deposited before entering college, or an Inn of Court, etc., by way of security for good behaviour.

Cavalier. A horseman; whence a knight, a gentleman (Span. caballero, b and v being interchangeable in that language.)
Personages styled The Cavalier.

Eon de Beaumont (1728-1810), French diplomat and secret agent; Chevalier d'Eon.

Charles Bredel (1677-1744), Flemish landscape painter.

Francesco Cairo (Cavaliere del Cairo) (1598-1674), Italian historical and portrait painter.

Jean le Clerc, le chevalier (1587-1633), French painter.

Giov. Battista Marini (1569-1625), Italian poet; il cavaliere.

Andrew Michael Ramsay (1686-1734), Scottish-French writer.

Cavalier or Chevalier de St. George. James Francis Edward Stuart, called "the Pretender," or "the Old Pretender" (1688-1765).

The Young Cavalier or the Bonnie Chevalier. Charles Edward, the "Young Pretender" (1720-85).

The Laughing Cavalier. Name given to the famous portrait of an unknown gallant, by the Dutch painter Franz Hals, now in the Wallace Collection, London.

Cavalier. Adherents of Charles I. Those of the opposing Parliament party were called Roundheads.

Cavaliere servente (kâv l'i ˈsêr venˈtê) (Ital.). A cavalier in attendance; especially a man who devotes himself to running about after a married woman; much the same as a cicisbeo (q.v.).

An English lady asked of an Italian,

'What were the actual and official duties Of those persons some women set a value on Which hovers off about some married beauties,

Call’d "cavaliere servente"," Pygmalion

Whose statues warm (I fear, alas! too true ’tis)

Beneath his art. The dame, press’d to disclose them

Said—"Lady, I beseech you suppose them." "

BYRON: Don Juan, IX, li.

Cave of Adullam. See Adullamites.

Caveat (kâ vˈē ət). Lat. "let him beware"; a notice directing the recipient to refrain from some act pending the decision of the Court. Hence, to enter a caveat. To give legal notice that the opponent is not to proceed with the suit in hand until the party giving the notice has been heard; to give a warning or admonition.

Caveat emptor. Lat. "let the purchaser beware"; i.e. the buyer must keep his eyes open, for the bargain he agrees to is binding.

The full legal maximum is:—

Caveat emptor, quia ignarore non debuit quod jus alienum emit—Let a purchaser beware, for he ought not to be ignorant of the nature of the property which he is buying from another party.

Carel. A parcel or allotment of land; originally, a lot (that is cast). From Dut. kavel, a lot, whence kavel, to assign by lot.

Cavendish (kâvˈ ə n dish). It is not now known who was the Cavendish who gave his name to this tobacco, which is sometimes called Negro-head. Sweetened with syrup or molasses, it is a softened tobacco pressed into quadrangular cakes. It is used for smoking or chewing.

Caviare (kâ vər ˈər). The roe of the sturgeon, pickled, salted, and prepared for use as a relish. Caviare is an acquired taste and, as a rule, it is not appreciated by people until they have got used to it; hence Shakespeare’s caviare to the general (Hamlet, ii, 2), above the taste or comprehension of ordinary people.

He [Colbert] must, I think, be caviare to the Whigs. " Hazlitt: Table-talk.

Cavo-rilievo (kaˈ və r ˈi l ˈi v ə). "Relief," cut below the original surface, the highest parts of the figure being on a level with the surface.

Caxon. A worn-out wig; also a big cauliflower wig, worn out or not. It has been suggested that the word is from the personal name Caxon.

People scarce could decide on its phiz.

Which looked wisest—the caxon or jowl. PETER PINDAR: The Portfolio.

Caxton, William. Father of English printing, hence his name is widely applied to branded articles in the printing and paper trades. Born in the Weald of Kent, he learnt his printing in Cologne and Bruges. He set up shop at the Sign of the Red Pale in the shadow of Westminster Abbey about 1476 and died about 1491, by which time he had printed about a hundred books.

Cayuse. An Indian pony. The Cayuses were a Red Indian tribe. Since about 1880 the word has meant "a horse of little value."

Cean (ˈsē ən). The Cean poet. Simonides, of Ceos.

The Cean and the Teian muse.

'BYRON: Don Juan (Song: The Isles of Greece). Cecilia, St. (se ˈsil a). A Roman who underwent martyrdom in the 3rd century. She is the patron saint of the blind, being herself blind; she is also patroness of musicians, and "inventor of the organ."

At length divine Cecilia came,

Inventress of the vocal frame.

DRYDEN: Alexander’s Feast.

According to tradition an angel fell in love with her for her musical skill. Her husband saw the heavenly visitant, who gave to both a crown of martyrdom which he brought from Paradise.

St. Cecilia’s Day is November 22nd, on which the Worshipful Company of Musicians, a Livery Company of London, meet and go in procession for divine service in St. Paul’s Cathedral.

Cecil’s Fast. A dinner off fish. William Cecil, Lord Burghley, chief minister to Queen Elizabeth for nearly forty years, introduced a Bill to enjoin the eating of fish on certain days in order to restore the fish trade.

Cecil, St. An English name of St. Calixtus, who is commemorated on St. Paul’s Cathedral.

Cecil, St. An English name of St. Calixtus, who is commemorated on October 14th, the day of the Battle of Hastings.

Brown Willis tells us there was a tablet once in Battle parish church with these words:—

This place of war is Battle called, because in battle here

Quite conquered and o’erthrown the English nation were.

This slaughter happened to them upon St. Cecil’s day, etc.

Ceiling. This is the term applied to the maximum height to which an aeroplane can climb. The phrase has also been extended to mean the highest prices that can be reached for any article. Also used in aeronautical circles to denote the height of the cloud base above ground level. Ceiling zero means that the clouds or mist are down to the ground itself, or so near it as to make the task of take-off or landing of aircraft impracticable except by instruments.

Celebart. See SYLLOGISM.

Celestial City. Heaven is so called by John Bunyan in his Pilgrim’s Progress.

Celestial Empire, China: a translation of the Chinese Tien Chao, literally "heavenly dominion," alluding to the belief that the old Emperors were in direct descent from the gods. Hence the Chinese themselves are sometimes spoken of as Celestials.

Celestines. An order of reformed Benedictine monks, founded about 1254 by Pietro di Murreno who, in 1294, became Pope as Celestine V.

Celt (selt, keit). A piece of stone, ground artificially into a wedge-like shape, with a cutting edge. Used before the employment of bronze and iron, for knives, hatchets, and chisels.

Celtic (sel’tik, kel’tik). Applied to the peoples and languages of the great branch of the Aryans which includes the Irish, Manx, Welsh, ancient Cornish, Breton, and Scottish Gaels. Anciently the term was applied by the Greeks to the peoples of Western Europe generally, but when Caesar wrote of the Celts he referred to the people of middle Gaul only. The word Celt probably means a warrior: fable accounts for it by the story of Celtina, daughter of Britannus, who had a son by Hercules, named Celtus, who became the progenitor of the Celts.

Cemetery properly means a sleeping-place (Gr. kairometerion, a dormitory). The Persians call their cemeteries "The Cities of the Silent."

Cenci. See Beautiful Parricide.

Cenomanni (sen’ ô ma’ ni). The name given to the inhabitants of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge by Caesar in his Commentaries.

Cenotaph (sen’ ō taf) (Gr. kenesos, empty, taphos tomb). A sepulchral monument raised to the memory of a person buried elsewhere. By far the most noteworthy to all of British race is that in Whitehall, designed by Sir E. Lutyens, which was dedicated on November 11th, 1920, to those who fell in World War I. It has since been adapted to commemorate those who fell in the World War II.

Among the noted cenotaphs of the ancients are those of:-

A. AES to Deiphobus (Aenid, i, 6; v, 505).

A. CORNELIUS to Hector (Aenid, i, 3; v, 302).

ARISTOTLE to Hermias and Eubulus (Diogenes Laeritus).

The Athenian to the poet Euripides.

Callimachus to Sopha, son of Diocles (Epigram of Callimachus, 22).

Catullus to his brother (Epigram of Catullus, 103).

Dido to Sicharos (Justin, viii, 6).

The Roman to Diogenes Laeritus in Germany, and to Alexander Severus, the emperor, in Gaul (Suetonius: Life of Claudius; and the Anthologia).

Statius to his father (The Sylva of Statius, v, Epicedium 3). 3.

Xenocrates to Lysicrates (Anthologia).

Centaur. Mythological beast, half horse and half man. Centaurs are said to have dwelt in ancient Thessaly: a myth the origin of which is probably to be found in the expert horsemanship of the original inhabitants. See Ixion.

The Thessalian centaurs were invited to a marriage feast, and, being intoxicated, behaved with great rudeness to the women. The Lapithae took the women’s part, fell on the centaurs, and drove them out of the country.

Cent Nouvelles Nouvelles (son noo vel’ noo vel’). This collection of “a hundred new tales” first appeared in a MS dated 1456. It is on much the same lines as the Decameron and tells in French some of the stories already made familiar by the Italian novelists. Saintsbury calls it the best of all the late medieval prose works.

Cento (Lat., a patchwork). Poetry made up of lines borrowed from established authors. It was an art freely practised in the decadent period of Greece and Rome, and Ausonius, who has a nuptial idyll composed from verses selected from Virgil, composed rules governing their manufacture. Among well-known examples are the Homerozentones, the Cento Virgilianus by Proba Falconia (4th cent.), and the hymns made by Metellus out of the Odes of Horace. Of modern centos the following portion of a Shakespearean cento that appeared in English, November, 1919, may serve as an example:-

Let fame that all hunt after in their lives
Among the buzzing pleased multitude
For present comfort and for future good,
Taint not thy mind: nor let thy soul contrive
With all the fierce endeavour of your wit
To woo a maid in way of marriage,
As it is common for the younger sort,
The Juniac, the lover, and the poet:
Thus bad begins, and worse remains behind.
I see a man’s life is a tedious one,
For it appears, by manifest proceeding,
There's nothing serious in mortality.
Life's but a walking shadow, a poor player,
And one man in his time plays many parts,
As an unperfect actor doth the stage.

Centre Party. In politics, the party occupying a place between two extremes: the left centro is the more radical wing, and the right centro the more conservative. In the French Revolution the Centre of the Legislative Assembly included the friends of order.

In the Fenian rebellion, 1866, the chief movers were called Head Centres, and their subordinates Centres.

Centurion (sen’ tû’ ri on) (Lat. centum, a hundred). A Roman officer who had the command of 100 men. There were sixty centurions, of varying ranks, to a legion, the chief being the first centurion of the first maniple of the first cohort; his title was Primus pilus prior, or Primipilus. The centurion’s emblem of office was a vine-staff.

Cephalus and Procris (sef’ a lus, prok’ ris). Cephalus was husband of Procris, who, out of jealousy, deserted him. He went in search of her, and rested awhile under a tree. Procris, knowing of his whereabouts, crept through some bushes to ascertain if a rival was with him; and he, hearing the noise and thinking it to be made by some wild beast, hurled his javelin into the bushes and slew her. When the unhappy man discovered what he had done, he slew himself in anguish of spirit with the same javelin.

Pyramus: Not Shafalus to Procrus was so true.

Thisbe: As Shafalus to Procrus, I to you.

Cepheus (sɛ̀ rÕz). A northern constellation; named from Cepheus, King of Ethiopia, husband of Cassiopeia and father of Andromeda.

Cepola (sep' ồ lâ'). Devices of Cepola. Quips of law are so called from Bartholomew Cepola whose law-quirks, therefore, how to elude the most express law, and to perpetuate lawsuits ad infinitum, have been frequently reprinted—once in 8vo, in black letter, by John Petit, in 1503.

Cerberus (sɛ̀ r' bɛ̀ rus). A grim, watchful keeper, house-porter, guardian, etc. Cerberus, according to Roman mythology, is the three-headed dog that keeps the entrance of the infernal regions. Hercules dragged the monster to earth, and then let him go again. Orpheus lulled Cerberus to sleep with his lyre; and the Sibyl who conducted Aeneas through the Inferno, also threw the dog into a profound sleep with a cake seasoned with poppies and honey. See under Sop.

The origin of the fable of Cerberus may be found in the custom of the ancient Egyptians of guarding graves with dogs.

Ceremonious, The. Pedro IV of Aragon (1336-87) was so surnamed.

Ceremony (Lat. ceremonia). By way of accounting for this word, which is probably connected with Sanskrit karman, a religious action, a rite, Livy tells that when the Romans fled before Brennus, one Albinus, who was carrying his wife and children in a cart to a place of safety, overtook at Janiculum the Vestal virgins bending under their load, took them up and conveyed them to Circe, in Etruria. Here they remained, and continued to perform their sacred rites, which were consequently called "Circe-monia."

Master of the Ceremonies. A Court official, first appointed by James I, to superintend the reception of ambassadors and strangers of rank, and to prescribe the formalities to be observed in levees and other official, first appointed by James I, to superintend the reception of ambassadors and other important persons.

Chad. A small gnome whose bald head and large nose were depicted on a child's birthday card. Its origin (about 1945) is unknown.

Chadband (châd' bând). This synonym for a religious hypocrite is taken from the character in Dickens's Bleak House—a gluttonous, unctuous, illiterate rogue, minister of some indeterminate sect.

Chadpennies. Lichfield cathedral is dedicated to St. Mary and St. Chad; the Whitsuntide offerings used to be devoted to the upkeep of the building and were called Chadpennies.

Chaff. An old bird is not to be caught nith the building and were called Chadpennies. Chadband is not to be deluded by humbug. The reference is to throwing chaff instead of bird-seed to allure birds. Hence, perhaps—

You are chaffing me. Making fun of me. A singular custom used to exist in Notts and Leicestershire some half a century ago. When a husband illtreated his wife, the villagers emptied a sack of chaff at his door, to intimidate that "thrashing was done within."

Chair, The. The office of chief magistrate in a corporate town; the office of a professor, etc., as "The chair of poetry, in Oxford, is now vacant."

The word is furthermore applied to...
of a committee or public meeting. Hence the chairman himself. When debaters call out "Chair," they mean that the chairman is not properly supported, and his words not obeyed as they ought to be. Another form of the same expression is, "Pray support the Chair."

Below the chair. Said of one who has not yet reached the presidential position, as of an alderman who has not yet served the mayoralty.

Passed the chair. One who has served the chief office.

To take the chair. To become the chairman or president of a public meeting. The chairman is placed in some conspicuous place, like the Speaker of the House of Commons, and his decision is absolutely final in all points of doubt. Usually the persons present nominate and elect their own chairman; but in some cases there is an ex officio chairman.

As a slang expression, to be in the chair may mean to be host or to be called on to pay for a round of drinks.

Chair of St. Peter. The office of the Pope of Rome, founded by St. Peter, the apostle; but St. Peter's Chair means the Catholic festival held in commemoration of the two episcopates founded by the apostle, one at Rome, and the other at Antioch (January 18th and February 22nd).

Chalk. Chalk it up. Put it to his credit.

I'll chalk out your path for you—i.e. lay it down or plan it out as a carpenter or shipbuilder plans out his work with a piece of chalk.

I can walk a chalk as well as you. I am no more drunk than you are. The allusion is to one of the tests given to men suspected of drunkenness. They are required to walk along a line chalked on the floor, without deviating to the right or left.

I cannot make chalk of one and cheese of the other. I must treat both alike; I must show no favouritism.

I know the difference between chalk and cheese. Between what is worthless and what is valuable, between a counterfeit and a real article. Of course, the resemblance of chalk to cheese has something to do with the saying, and the alliteration helps to popularize it.

The tapster is undone by chalk, i.e. credit. The allusion is to the old tavern-keeper's custom of scoring on a door or board the amounts owed him by his customers. This was common enough early in the 19th century, when milk scores, bread scores, as well as beer scores, were general.

I beat him by a long chalk. Thoroughly. In allusion to the ancient custom of making merit marks with chalk, before lead pencils were so common.

Walk your chalk. Get you gone. Lodgings wanted for the royal retinue used to be taken arbitrarily by the marshal and sergeant-chamberlain, the inhabitants were sent to the right about, and the houses selected were notified by a chalk mark. When Marie de' Medicis, in 1638, came to England, Sieur de Labat was employed to mark "all sorts of houses commodious for her retinue in Colchester." The phrase is "Walk, you're chalked," corrupted into "Walk your chalk."

At one time it was customary for a landlord to give the tenant notice to quit by chalking the door.

The prisoner has cut his stick, and walked his chalk, and is off to London.—C. Kingsley: Two Years Ago, I.

Challenge. This meant originally an accusation or charge, and secondarily a claim, a defiance. It comes through French from the Lat. calumnia, a false accusation, and is thus etymologically the same word as "calumny."

Challenging a jury. This may be to object to all the jurors from some informality in the way they have been "arrayed" or empanelled, or to one or more of the jurors, from some real or supposed disqualification or bias of judgment. In the first case it is a challenge to the array, and this must be based on some default of the sheriff, or his officer who arrayed the panel.

If any member of the jury is thought not qualified to serve, or if he is supposed to be biased, he may be challenged. In capital cases a prisoner may challenge persons without assigning any reason, and in cases of treason as many as thirty-five.

Cham (kām). The sovereign prince of Tartary, now written "khan."

Fetch you a hair off the great Cham's beard.—Shakespeare: Much Ado About Nothing, ii, 1.

The great Cham of Literature. An epithet applied to Dr. Johnson (1709-84) by Tobias Smollett.

Chambré (shom' brā). From French chambre, a room. Used of wine which has been warmed to raise it from cellar temperature to the temperature of the room in which it is to be served, which for red wine is ideal.

Chambre Ardente (shombr ar dont') (Fr.). In French history, the name given to certain Courts of Justice held under the ancien régime, for trying exceptional cases, such as charges of heresy, poisoning, etc. They were usually held at night, and both then and when held in the daytime were lighted by torches. These courts were devised by Cardinal Lorraine. The first was held in the reign of Francis I, for trying heretics. Brinvilliers and her associates were tried in a darkened court in 1680.

The same name is given to the room or hall in which a lying-in-state takes place, because it is usually furnished with lighted candles.

Chameleon. You are a chameleon, i.e. very changeable—shifting according to the opinions of others, as the chameleon, to a very limited extent, can change its hue to that of contiguous objects.

As the chameleon, who is known
To have no colours of its own,
But borrows from his neighbour's hue,
His white or black, his green or blue.

Prior.

Champ de Mars (shon dé mars). Clovis and the early Frank kings held meetings in March when feudal gifts and fees were paid and homage received. It was this ancient custom that was seized upon in the French Revolution when, in the summer of 1790, an enormous amphitheatres were dug by the Paris citizens, and the Federation of Freedom sworn at the altar of the Fatherland.

Napoleon I gave the name of Champ de Mai to the assembly he called together on May 1st, 1815, when he proclaimed the result of the plebiscite ratifying the liberal Acte additionnel on his return from Elba.

Champak (chäm' pák). An Indian magnolia (Michelia Champaca). The wood is sacred to Buddha, and the strongly scented golden flowers are worn in the black hair of Indian women.

The Champak odours fail. Shelley: Lines to an Indian Air.

Champerty (chäm' pér tē) (Lat. campi partitio, division of the land). A bargain with some person who undertakes at his own cost to recover a property on condition of receiving a share thereof if he succeeds.

Champerty is treated as a worse offence; for by this a stranger supplies money to carry on a suit, on condition of sharing in the land or other property.—Parsons: Contracts (vol. ii, pt. ii, ch. 3, p. 284).

Champion of England. A person whose office it is to ride up Westminster Hall on a Coronation Day, and challenge anyone who disputes the right of succession. The office was established by William the Conqueror, and was given to Marmion and his male descendants, with the manor of "broad Scrivelsby." De Ludlow received the office and manor through the female line; and at the Coronation of Richard II Sir John Dormoke succeeded through the female line also. Since then the office has continued in the Dormoke family, but the actual riding and challenge has been discontinued since the coronation of George IV. Instead, the Champion bears the king's standard at the coronation.

Chance. See MAIN CHANCE.

To chance your arm, or your luck. To run a risk in the hope of "bringing it off" and obtaining a profit or advantage of some sort.

Chancel means a lattice screen. In the Roman law courts the lawyers were cut off from the public by such a screen. (Lat. cancellus).

Chancel of a church. That part of a church which contains the altar, and the seats set apart for the choir. It is generally raised a step or more above the floor of the nave.

Chancellerly. "The chancelleries of Europe" is a favourite journalistic phrase. The word chancellerly is applied to the office attached to an embassy or consulate, where dispatches are drafted and written, incoming dispatches decoded and considered, and all the embassy clerical work carried through.

Chancellor. A petty officer (cancellarius) in the Roman law courts stationed at the chancel (q.v.) as usher of the court. In the Eastern Empire he was a secretary or notary, subsequently invested with judicial functions. The office was introduced into England by Edward the Confessor, and under the Norman kings the chancellor was made official secretary of all important legal documents. In France the chancellor was the royal notary, president of the councils, and keeper of the Great Seal.

Chancellor, Dancing. See DANCING.

The Lord Chancellor, or the Lord High Chancellor. The highest judicial functionary of Britain, who ranks above all peers, except princes of the blood and the Archbishop of Canterbury. He is "Keeper of the Great Seal," is called "Keeper of His (or Her) Majesty's Conscience," and presides on the Woolsack in the House of Lords, and in the Chancery Division of the Supreme Court.

Chancellor of the Exchequer. The minister of finance in the Cabinet; the highest financial official of State in the kingdom.

Chancery. One of the three divisions of the High Court of Justice. It is concerned with Equity and is presided over by the Lord Chancellor. All its work is done in London.

To get a man's head into chancery is to get it under your arm, where you can pummel it as long as you like, and he cannot get it free without great difficulty. The allusion is to the long and exhausting nature once characteristic of Chancery suits. If a man once got his head there, the lawyers could punish him to their hearts' content.

When I can perform my mile in eight minutes, or a little less, I feel as if I had old Time's head in chancery.—Holmes: Autocrat, ch. vii.

A Ward in Chancery is the term applied to a minor whose guardianship is vested in the Court of Chancery for any one of various legal reasons. It is contempt of court to marry a ward of Chancery without the court's consent.

Change. Ringing the changes. Repeating the same thing in different ways. The allusion is to bell-ringing. For the sharper's meaning of the term, see RINGING.

To know how many changes can be rung on a peal, multiply the number of bells in the peal by the number of changes that can be rung on a peal consisting of one bell less, thus: 1 bell no change; 2 bells, 1 by 2 = 2 changes; 3 bells, 2 by 3 = 6 changes; 4 bells, 6 by 4 = 24 changes; 5 bells, 24 by 5 = 120 changes; 6 bells, 720 changes, etc.

Changeling. A peevish, sickly child. The notion used to be that the fairies took a healthy child, and left in its place one of their starveling elves which never thrived.

The king doth keep his revels here to-night:
Take heed the queen come not within his sight; For Oberon is passing fell and wrath,
Because that she as her attendant hath A lovely boy, stolen from an Indian king:
She never had so sweet a changeling.

Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, ii, 1.

Chant du départ (shon dû dà par). After the Marseillaise, this was the most celebrated song of the French Revolution. It was written by M. J. Chenier, for a public festival, 1794, to commemorate the taking of the Bastille. The music is by Méhul. A mother, an old man, a child, a wife, a girl, and three warriors sing a verse in turn, and the sentiment of each is,
"We give up our claims on the men of France for the good of the Republic." Cp. Car-Magnole.

La république nous appelle.
Sachons vaincre ou sachons périr;
Un Français doit vivre pour elle,
Pour elle un Français doit mourir.

Chantage. Blackmail; money accepted by low-class journals to prevent the publication of scandals, etc. Chantage is the common name in France for this form of subsidy; and the word has been used in the same way in England.

Chanticleer. The cock, in the tale of Reynard the Fox, and in Chaucer's Nonne Prestes Tale; also in Rostand's well-known play of this name produced in Paris in 1910. (Fr. chanter-clair, to sing clairment, i.e. distinctly.) My wings began to crow like chanticleer.

Shakespeare: As You Like It, ii, 7.

Chantrey Bequest. When Sir Francis Leggatt Chantrey (1781-1841), the sculptor, died he left a sum yielding about £3,000 a year to the Royal Academy, of which the President was to receive £500, and the remainder was to be devoted to the purchase for the nation of works of art executed in Great Britain.

Chaonian Bird (kā ʻō ni ʻan). This is the poetic name for a dove, and takes its origin from the legend that the dove bore the oracles of Chaonia.

Chaonian food. Acorns. So called from the oak trees of Chaonia or Dodona. Some think beech-mast is meant, and tell us that the bells of the oracle were hung on beech-trees, not on oaks.

Chap. A man, properly a merchant. A chapman (O.E. ceap-mann) is a merchantman or tradesman. "If you want to buy, I'm your chap." A good chap-man or chap became in time a good fellow. Hence, A good sort of chap, a clever chap, etc.

An awkward customer is an analogous phrase.

Chap-book. A cheap little book containing tales, ballads, lives, etc., sold by chapmen.

Chapeau bras (shāp ʻō bra). A soft three-cornered flat silk hat which could be folded and carried under the arm (Fr. chapeau hat, bras, arm). It was used in France with the court dress of the 18th century.

Chapeau de Paille (Fr., straw hat). This is the name given to Rubens's portrait of Susanna Fourment, the sister of his second wife. It is in the National Gallery, London, and was one of the chief paintings round which the pro- and anti-cleaning controversy raged in London in 1947. The title is of obscure origin since in the painting the girl is not wearing a straw hat.

Chapel. Originally, a chest containing relics, or the shrine thereof, so called from the capella (little cloak or cope) of St. Martin, which was preserved by the Frankish kings as a sacred relic. The place in which it was kept when not in the field was called the chapelle, and the keeper thereof the chapellen. Hence, the name came to be attached to a sanctuary, or a private place of worship other than a parish or cathedral church; and is also used for a place of worship not connected with the State, as a Methodist Chapel, a Baptist Chapel, etc.

In printing-house parlance a chapel is an association of journeymen (compositors, machine-men, etc.), who meet periodically to discuss matters of common interest connected with their work, to decide upon the course of action to be taken in cases of disputes or differences between themselves and their employers, etc. The chairman is known as the "father of the chapel." The origin of the term is obscure; an accepted but far from certain derivation, traces it back to the early days of printing, when presses were set up in the chapels attached to abbeys, as those of Caxton in Westminster Abbey. Cp. Monk; Friar.

Chapel of ease. A place of worship for the use of parishioners residing at a distance from the parish church.

Chaperon (shāpʻé rôn). A married or elderly woman who attends a young unmarried girl in public places and acts as her guide, adviser, and, when necessary, protector. So called from the Spanish hood worn by duennas in former times.

To chaperon. To accompany a young unmarried woman in loco parentis, when she appears in public or in society.

Chapter. From Lat. caput, a head. The chapter of a cathedral, composed of the canons (see CANON) and presided over by the dean; is so called from the ancient practice of the canons and monks reading at their meetings a capitulum (cp. CAPITULARY) or chapter of their Rule or of Scripture. Ire ad capitulum meant "to go to the (reading of the) chapter," hence, to the meeting, hence to the body which composed the meeting.

Chapter of accidents. Series of unforeseen events. To trust to a chapter of accidents is to trust that something unforeseen may turn up in your favour.

Chapter of possibilities. A may-be in the course of events.

To the end of the chapter. To the end of a proceeding. The allusion is obvious.

To give chapter and verse. To give the exact authority of a statement, as the name of the author, the title of the book, the date, the chapter referred to, and any other particular which might render the reference easily discoverable.

Char (char). This is a common abbreviation for "charwoman," a woman who chars or shares, i.e. works by the hour or day at house-cleaning. The word comes from O.E. cerr, cerran, meaning to turn. It has come back to England from U.S.A. in the form of "chore," a monotonous but necessary task, household or otherwise.

The Army slang word "char," meaning tea appears to come from the Hind. cha, with various Indian and Chinese words of similar sound, all meaning tea.
Character. An oddity. One who has a distinctive peculiarity of manner: Sam Weller is a character, so is Pickwick.

In character. In harmony with personality or habitual behaviour.

Out of character. Not in harmony with a person's actions, writings, profession, age, or status in society.

Chare Thursday. Another form of Shear or Shere Thursday; the same as Maundy Thursday (q.v.).

Charge, To. To make an attack or onset in battle.

Curate in charge. A curate placed by a bishop in charge of a parish where there is no incumbent, or where the incumbent is suspended.

To charge oneself with. To take upon oneself the onus of a given task.

To charge a person. To accuse him formally of a crime or misdemeanour. It must be answered before the appropriate court or authority.

To give charge over. To set one in authority over.

I gave my brother Hanani . . . . charge over Jerusalem.—Neh. vii, 2.

To give in charge. To hand over a person to the charge of a policeman.

To have in charge. To have the care of something.

To return to the charge. To renew the attack.

To take in charge. To “take up” a person given in charge; to take upon oneself the responsibility of something; to make an arrest.

Charge-sheet. The form setting out in correct language and according to Law the specific charges which an accused person has to answer. Evidence cannot be admitted in court which is not relevant to the charge on the charge-sheet: if it becomes apparent that the accused has been guilty of a further—but different—crime than that for which he is on trial, such crime must be made the subject of a fresh charge at another time. But a man found guilty may ask for other crimes of a similar nature to that on the charge-sheet to be taken into consideration in assessing his sentence; in this way he can admit to crimes which he is suspected of having committed but for which he cannot be brought to book for want of evidence, thus enabling him when he comes out of prison to make a fresh start in life without fear of his undiscovered crimes being suddenly pinned on him.

Chargé d’Affaires. The proxy of an ambassador, or the diplomatic agent where none higher has been appointed.

Charing Cross. The original “Charing Cross” was erected in the centre of the ancient village of Charing, which stood midway between the cities of London and Westminster, by Edward I to commemorate his Queen, Eleanor, because it was there that her coffin was halted for the last time on its progress from Harby, Notts, where the Queen died, to Westminster, where she was buried.

The present cross is a copy (made to scale) by E. M. Barry, R.A., of the original one that was demolished by the Puritans in 1647, and that stood on the south side of Trafalgar Square on the site now occupied by the equestrian statue of Charles I. It was erected in 1865 in the courtyard of Charing Cross Station.

Chariot. According to Greek mythology, the chariot was invented by Erichthonius to conceal his feet, which were those of a dragon.

Chariot of the gods. So the Greeks called Sierra Leone, in Africa, a ridge of mountains of great height. A sierra means a saw, and is applied to a ridge of peaked mountains.

Her palmy forests, mingling with the skies, Leona’s rugged sleep behind us flies.

Salem.—Neh. vii, 2.

Chariots or cars. That of ADEMITUS was drawn by lions and wild boars. BACCHUS by panthers. CERES by winged dragons. CYBELE by lions. DIANA by stags. JUNO by peacocks. NEPTUNE by sea-horses. PLUTO by black horses. The SUN by seven horses (the seven days of the week). VENUS by doves.

Charity. Charity begins at home. “Let them learn first to show piety at home” (1 Tim. v, 4).

Cold as charity. An ironic allusion to unsympathetic benevolence.

Charivari (shā rī va’ ri). The clatter made with pots and pans, whistling, bawling, hissing, and so on. Our concert of “marrow-bones and cleavers”; the German KATZENMUSIK, got up to salute with ridicule unequal marriages. The name was taken as that of a satirical journal founded in Paris by Charles Philipon in 1832, and hence in 1841 Punch adopted as its sub-title THE LONDON CHARIVARI.

Charlatan (shar’ lá tăn). This word comes originally from the Italian ciarlare, to prate, to chatter, to babble. It is usually applied to one who sells quack remedies and covers his ignorance in a torrent of high-sounding and often meaningless words.

Saltimbancoes, Quacksalvers, and Charlatans deceive the people in lower degrees.—SIR T. BROWN, VULGAR ERRORS, 1646.

Charlatans and impostors have always thriven on the ignorance and credulity of mankind, and it is to draw a fine distinction in roguery to differentiate between them. A charlatan, however, is one who, such as a quack or astrologer, claims to possess special knowledge of medicine or more abstruse matters; the impostor pretends to be something or someone he really is not.

It is difficult to make choice among the charlatans of history. Nostradamus (1503-66) was an astrologer and physician who, in 1555, brought out a book of prophecies so vague in their terms that whether they were fulfilled or not is mere matter of conjecture.
John Partridge (1644-1715) was a good example of the English breed, rendered forever a laughing-stock by Swift's skit on his astrological achievements. Cagliostro (Joseph Balsamo, 1743-95) was rather an impostor than a charlatan, though he shined in either category. Perhaps the most striking example of modern charlatantry was Sequoia, a white man posing as Red Indian, who toured Britain about 1890, in a coach with attendant Redskins and a brass band, drawing teeth "painlessly" (all squawks drowned by the band) and supplying an "Indian oil" to cure all manner of aches and pains.

Charlemagne (shar · man) (742-814) was the great king of the Franks in 771, and in 800 founded the Holy Roman Empire. He ruled over nearly all western Europe and was noted for his work as a law-giver, administrator, protector of the Church and promoter of education. Charlemagne and his Paladins are the centre of a great series of chivalric romances. (See PALADINS, LA SOYENSE.) We are told that the great emperor was a feet in height, and of correspondingly enormous strength, so that with his hands alone he could bend three horseshoes at once. He was buried at Aix la Chapelle (Aachen), but according to legend of education.

applied to some object that averts ill luck or brings good. Volumes have been written about charms, for since the earliest dawn of intelligence mankind has sought to propitiate the beneficent powers or placate the malevolent ones. There are still all kinds of charms in use, often half-ashamedly—touching wood to avert ill luck, avoiding the number thirteen, thrice-footing at the New Year, and so forth; these are but a few relics of more credulous days. A good selection of charms is to be found described in Brand’s Antiquities.

Charon’s Toll. A coin, about equal to a penny, placed in the mouth or hand of the dead by the ancient Greeks to pay Charon (see Styx) for ferrying the spirit across the river Styx to the Elysian fields.

Chartism. The political system of the Chartists, a body consisting principally of working men who, in 1838, demanded the People’s Charter, which included universal suffrage, vote by ballot, equal representation, and the abolition of the property qualification for members of Parliament. The Chartists disappeared as a party about 1849.

Chartreuse. A greenish or yellowish liqueur, made of brandy, and various aromatic herbs. When the monks returned to La Chartreuse after their expulsion during the French Revolution they found the place in ruins and all their property alienated. To supply the wants of the community they concocted and sold the liqueur and before long were making a large revenue. This has always been spent on the maintenance of Carthusian houses, though the greater proportion of it has been devoted to charity. The recipe has now been sold and the production of the liqueur commercialized. See CARTHUSIANS.

Charybdis (kā rib’ dis). A whirlpool on the coast of Sicily. Scylla and Charybdis are employed to signify two equal dangers. Thus Horace says an author trying to avoid Scylla, drifts into Charybdis, i.e. seeking to avoid one fault, falls into another.

The Homeric account says that Charybdis dwelt under an immense fig-tree on the rock, and that thrice every day he swallowed the waters of the sea and thrice threw them up again; but later legends have it that he stole the oxen of Hercules, was killed by lightning, and changed into the gulf.

Thus when I shun Scylla, your father, I fall into Charybdis, your mother.—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, iii, 5.

Chase. A small, unclosed deer-forest held, for the most part, by a private individual, and protected only by common law. Forests are royal prerogatives, protected by the “Forest Law.”

An iron frame used by printers for holding sufficient type for one side of a sheet, where it is held tight by quoins, or small wedges of wood, is also called a “chase.” Here the word is the French chasse, from Lat. capsa, a case; the other chase given above is O. Fr. chacier, from Lat. captiare, to chase, itself from capere, to take.

Chasidim (chā’s ī dim). After the Babylonish captivity the Jews were divided into two groups—those who accepted and those who rejected the Persian innovation. The former were called chasidim (pietists), and the latter zadikim (the upright ones).

Chastity Girdle. A padded, metal appliance in the shape of a belt that a man could fasten around his wife in such a way as to preclude possibility of unfaithfulness during his prolonged absence. It is said to have come into vogue in the times of the Crusades when men set forth on protracted journeys and campaigns. One or two examples only are to be found in museums.

Chasuble (chāz’ ū bel). This is one of the most richly ornamented ecclesiastical garments, some of the older examples being embroidered with exquisite workmanship. The chasuble is the principal vestment worn by the priest when saying Mass. It is supposed to represent the seamless coat of Christ, and is a rectangular, sleeveless garment, with thumb hole for the head in the middle, thus hanging down both back and front to the hips and knees.

And ye, lovely ladies, with your longe fynges,
That ye han silke and scandal to sowe, what tyme is,
Chesibies for chapelwynes cherches to honoure.

Château (shā tō). French for castle, mansion, country seat, and hence, an estate in the country.

The wines of the Bordeaux district of France are all named after the château of the estate on which they are grown. A Château-bottled wine is one bottled on the estate by the proprietor, which he only does in years when he is satisfied with the quality.

Château en Espagne, a castle in the air (q.v.).

Chatelaine (shā’t e lān). Originally the mistress of a château, a chatelaine now usually signifies a brooch or clasp from which a variety of objects hung on short chains. They are the things which the mistress of a castle was likely to use—keys, a watch, scissors, knives and trinkets. Chatelaines have been made in gold, silver, enamel, and cut steel, and in imitations of these materials. Since 1900 they have been little used, and their use during the century before was a fashionable affectation. In 1947 a fashion for so-called chatelaines arose in the U.S.A. These were ornaments formed of two or more brooches, preferably old and valuable, pinned across the corsage and joined by chains.

Chatelaine’s (shā’t e lān’z). This was a famous ordinary in Covent Garden, established soon after the Restoration and a favourite resort of wits and men of fashion. Mention of the place occurs in many plays, etc., of the period. Met their servant coming to bring me to Chatelain’s... and there with music and good company... mighty merry till ten at night.

Pepys’s Diary, 22/4/1668.

Sparkish. Come, but where do we dine?
Horner. Even where you will.
Sparkish. At Chatelaine’s.

Wycherley: The Country Wife.

Chatterbox. A talkative person. Shakespeare speaks of the clack-dish. “His use was to put a ducat in her clack-dish” (Measure for Measure, iii, 2)—i.e. the box or dish used by beggars for collecting alms, which the holder clatters to attract attention. We find also chatter-basket in old writers, referring to the child’s rattile.

Chatterpie. A familiar name for the magpie; also used figuratively for a chatterbox (q.v.).

Chauvinism (shō’vin izm). Blind and pugnacious patriotism of an exaggerated kind; unreasoning jingoism. Nicholas Chauvin, a soldier of the French Republic and Empire, was madly devoted to Napoleon and his cause. He was introduced as a type of exaggerated bellicose patriotism into quite a number of plays (Scribe’s Le Soldat laboureur, Cogniard’s La Cocarde tricolore, 1831, Bayard and Dumanoir’s Les Aides de camps. Charet’s Concise Chauvin, are some of them), and his name was quickly adopted on both sides of the Channel.

Chawbacon. A contemptuous name for an uncouth rustic, supposed to eat no meat but bacon.

Che sera, sera (châ sa ra’, sa ra’). What shall be, will be. The motto of the Russells (Bedford).

What doctrine call ye this, Che sera, sera: What will be, shall be? MARLOWE: Dr. Faustus, i, 48.

Cheap as a Sardinian. A Roman phrase referring to the great crowds of Sardinian prisoners brought to Rome by Tiberius Gracchus, and offered for sale at almost any price.

Cheap jack. A travelling vendor of small wares, who is usually ready to “cheapen” his goods, i.e. take less for them than the price he first named.

Cheapside bargain. A weak pun, meaning that the article was bought cheap or under its market value. Cheapside, is on the south side of the Cheap (or Chepe), one of the principal market-places of Old London, so called from A.S. ceapian, to buy, cypan, to sell. ceap, a price or sale.

Cheater. Originally an Escheator or officer of the king’s exchequer appointed to receive dues and taxes. The present use of the word shows how these officers were wont to fleece the people. Cp. CATCHPOLE; also the New Testament word “publicans,” or collectors of the Roman tax in Judæa, etc.

Checkmate. A term in chess meaning to place your adversary’s king in such a position that, had it been any other piece, it could not escape capture. Figuratively, “to checkmate” means to foil or outwit another; “checkmated,” outmanœuvred. The term is from the Arabic shah mat, the king is dead, the phrase having been introduced into Old Spanish and Portuguese as xaque mate.

Checks. To hand in one’s checks. See HAND.

Cheek. Cheek by jowl. Side by side, close together. Check is the A.S. ceace, and jowl is from A.S. ceæfl, jaw, which became in M.E. chowl, and was confused with M.E. cholle, from A.S. ceolur, throat.

I’ll go with thee, cheek by jowl.—SHAKESPEARE: Midsummer Night’s Dream, iii, 2.

To cheek, or to give cheek. To be insolent, to be saucy.

None of your cheek. None of your insolence. We say a man is very cheeky, meaning that he is saucy and presumptuous.

To have the cheek. To have the face or assurance. “He hadn’t the cheek to ask for more.”

Cheese. Tusser in his Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry (1573) says that a cheese, to be perfect, should not be like (1) Gehazi, i.e. dead white, like a leper; (2) not like Lot’s wife, all salt; (3) not like Angus, full of eyes; (4) not like Tom Piper, “hoven and puffed,” like the cheeks of a piper; (5) not like Crispin, leathery; (6) not like Lazarus, poor; (7) not like Esau, hairy; (8) not like Mary Magdalene, full of whey or maudlin; (9) not like the Gentiles, full of maggots or gentils; and (10) not like a bishop, made of burnt milk; this last is a reference to the old phrase, the bishop hath put his foot in it. See Bishop.

A green cheese. An unripe cheese; also a cheese that is eaten fresh (like a cream cheese) and is not kept to mature.

Big cheese. (Slang). The boss, or person of importance.

Bread and cheese. Food generally, but of a frugal nature. “Come and take your bread and cheese with me this evening”—that is, come and have a light supper, anything that’s going.

Cheese it! Stop it! Stow it! Also (in thieves’ slang) clear off, make yourself scarce.

Cheesed off. Army slang for disgusted, disgruntled.

Hard cheese. Hard lines; rotten luck.

He is quite the cheese or just the cheese—i.e. quite the thing. Here “cheese” is the Persian and Urdu chiz (or cheez), meaning “thing.” The phrase is of Anglo-Indian origin; but it has been popularly treated as being connected with the Eng. cheese, and thus we get the slang varieties, That’s prime Stilton, or double Gloster—i.e. slap up. Hence such phrases as:—

It is not the cheese. Not the right thing; said of something of rather dubious propriety or morals.

Who ever heard of a young lady being married without something to be married in? Well, I’ve heard Nudity is not the cheese on public occasions!

CHAS. READE: Hard Cash, ii, 186.
The moon made of green cheese. See Moon.

'Tis an old rat that won't eat cheese. It must be a wondrously toothless man that is inaccessible to flattery; he must be very old indeed who can abandon his favourite indulgence; only a very cunning rat knows that cheese is a mere bait.

Cheesemongers. An old popular name (before the Peninsular War) for the Ist Lifeguards; either because up to that time they had never served overseas, or (traditionally) because when the regiment was remodelled in 1788 certain commissions were refused on the ground that the ranks were composed of tradesmen instead of, as formerly, gentlemen. It is said that at Waterloo the commanding officer, when leading the regiment to a charge, cried, "Come on, you damned cheesemongers!" since when the name was accepted as a compliment rather than a reproach.

Cheeseparer. A skinflint; one who would pare or shave off very thinly the rind of his cheese so as to waste the smallest possible quantity. The tale is told of a man who chose his wife out of three sisters by the way they ate their cheese. One pared it—she (he said) was mean; one cut it off extravagantly thick—she was wasteful; the third sliced it off in a medium way, and there his choice fell.

Cheese-toaster. A sword; also called a "toasting-fork," etc.

Put up thy sword betime,
Or I'll so maul you and your toasting-iron
That you shall think the devil is come from hell
Shakespeare: King John, iv, 3.

The sight of the blade, which glistened by moonlight in his face, checked, in some sort, the ardour or his assailant, who desired he would lay aside his toaster, and take a bout with him at equal arms.—Smollett: Peregrine Pickle, ch. xxiv.

Cheesewring. The Devil's. A mass of eight stones, towering to the height of thirty-two feet, in the Valley of Rocks, Lynmouth, Devon, so called because it looks like a gigantic cheesewress. The Kilmarth Rocks, and part of Hugh Lloyd's Pulpit present somewhat similar piles of stone.

Chef d'Oeuvre (Fr., literally, a chief work). A masterpiece.

Chemosh (kē' mosh). The national god of the Moabites; very little is known of his cult, but human beings were sacrificed to him in times of crisis.

Next, Chemosh, the obscene dread of Moab's sons, From Aror to Nebo, and the wild Of southmost Abarim.
Milton: Paradise Lost, i, 406-8.

Chequers (cek' ěrz). A public-house sign. The arms of Fitzwarren, the head of which house, in the days of the Henrys, was invested with the power of licensing vintners and publicans, may have helped to popularize this sign. It is indicated that the house was duly licensed; but it has been found on houses in Pompeii, and probably referred to some game, like draughts, which might be indulged in on the premises. Gayton, in his Notes on Don Quixote (p. 340), in speaking of our public-house signs, refers to our notices of "billiards, kettle-noddy-boards, tables, trunks, shovel-boards, fox-and-goose, and the like." Also, payment of doles, etc., used to be made at certain public-houses, and a chequer-board was provided for the purpose. In such cases the sign indicated the house where the parish authorities met for that and other purposes.

Chequers, the country seat of the Prime Minister of England for the time being, was presented to the nation for this purpose by Sir Arthur and Lady Lee (Lord and Lady Lee of Fareham) in 1917, and was first officially occupied by the then Prime Minister (Mr. David Lloyd George) in January, 1921. It is a Tudor mansion, standing in a large and wooded estate in the Chilterns, about three miles from Princes Risborough.

Cheronean (kē rō nē' an). The Cheronean Sage. Plutarch, who was born at Cheraonea, in Boeotia (A.D. 46-120).

Cherry. Cherry-breeches or cherry-pickers. Familiar names for the 11th Hussars. See Cherubims.

Cherry fairs. The old counterpart of the modern tea-gardens; cherry-orchards where sales of fruit were held, such gatherings frequently developing into boisterous scenes. From their temporary character they came to be used as typifications of the evanescence of life; thus Gower says of this world, "All is but a cherry-fayre," a phrase frequently met with.

This life, my son, is but a cherry-fayre.—MS. Bodl. 221 (quoted by Halliwell).

Cherry trees and the cuckoo. The cherry tree is strangely mixed up with the cuckoo in many cuckoo stories, because of the tradition that the cuckoo must eat three good meals of cherries before he is allowed to cease singing.

Cherubims. The name once given popularly to the 11th Hussars. It seems inevitable that "Cherry bums" should be applied to men with cherry-pink uniform breeches.

Cheshire Cat. To grin like a Cheshire cat. See Cat.

Chess. "The game of the kings"; the word chess being the modern English representative of Persian shah (see Checkmate), a king. This word in Arabic was pronounced shag, which gave rise to the late Lat. scaccus, whence the O.Fr. esche, Mod.Fr. échecs, and E. chess. Derivatives in other languages are seacco (Ital.), jaque (Span.). xaque (Port.), schach (Ger.).

Chestnut. A stale joke. The term is said to have been popularized in America by a Boston actor named Warren, who, on a certain apposite occasion, quoted from The Broken Sword, a forgotten melodrama by William Dimond. first produced in 1816 at Covent Garden. Captain Xavier, a principal character, is for ever repeating the same yarn, with variations. He was telling about one of his exploits connected with a cork-tree, when Pablo corrected him. "A chestnut-tree, you mean, captain." "Bah!" replied the captain; "I say a cork-tree." "A chestnut-tree," insisted Pablo. "I must know better than you," said the captain; "it was a cork-tree, I say." "A chestnut," persisted Pablo. "I have heard you tell the joke twenty-seven times, and I am sure it was a chestnut!"

Chestnut Sunday. A Sunday in spring, generally that immediately before or after Ascension Day, is so called in the London district, because about that time the chestnut avenue at Hampton Court bursts into bloom.

Cheval (she vâl) (Fr., a horse).

Cheval de bataille (Fr., literally "horse of battle"). One's strong argument; one's favourite subject.

Cheval de frise. An apparatus consisting of a bar carrying rows of pointed stakes, set up so that the bar can revolve. It was used in warfare as a defence against enemy cavalry. and is so called because first employed by the Frisians—who had few or no horses—in the siege of Groningen, Friesland, in 1594. A somewhat similar engine had been used before, but was not called by the same name. In German it is "a Spanish horserman" (einSpanischer Reiter).

Cheval glass. A large, swinging mirror, long enough to reflect the whole of the figure; so called from the "horse," or framework, which supports it.

Chevalier de St. George. See Cavalier.

Chevalier d'industrie. A man who lives by his wits and calls himself a gentleman; an adventurer, swindler.

Be cautiously upon your guard against the infinite number of fine-dressed and fine-spoken chevaliers d'industrie and avanturiers, which swarm at Paris.—CHESTERFIELD: Letters to his Son, cx (April 26th, 1750).

Cheveril (chev'er il). He has a cheveril conscience. An accommodating one; one that will easily stretch like cheveril or kid leather.

Oh, here's a wit of cheveril, that stretches from an inch narrow to an ell broad!—SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, ii, 4.

Your soft cheveril conscience would receive, If you might please to stretch it.

SHAKESPEARE: Henry VIII, ii, 3.

Chevy Chase. There had long been a rivalry between the families of Percy and Douglas, which showed itself by incessant raids into each other's territory. Percy of Northumberland one day vowed he would hunt for three days in the Scottish border, without condescending to ask leave of Earl Douglas. The Scots warden said in his anger, "Tell this vaunter he shall find one day more than sufficient." The ballad called Chevy Chase mixes up this hunt with the battle of Otterburn, which, Dr. Percy justly observes, was "a very different event."

Chian Painter, The. See Apelles.

Chiaroscuro (kyar os koo’ rô). A style of painting to represent only two colours, now called "black and white"; also the production of the effects of light and shade in drawings, paintings, etc.

Chiaroscuro . . . is the art of representing light in shadow and shadow in light, so that the parts represented in shadow shall still have the clearness and warmth of those in light; and those in light, the depth and softness of those in shadow.—Chambers's Encyclopaedia, ii, p. 171.

Chic (shik). A French word of uncertain origin meaning the knack of being able to do anything well. In English the word is applied more especially to good taste in dressing, to smartness and style, to being "just right" in appearance.

The word may be connected with German schick, skill, tact, but this is by no means certain.

Chicane (shi kân). A term used in bridge for a hand containing no trumps. Its general meaning is the use of mean, petty subterfuge, especially legal dodges and quibbles. It is a French word which, before being used for sharp practice in lawsuits, meant a dispute in games, particularly mail, and originally the game of mail itself. It seems to be ultimately from Persian chaugan, the crooked stick used in polo.

Chichivache (chich’ e vash). A fabulous animal that lived only on good women, and was hence all skin and bone, because its food was so extremely scarce; the antitype to Bicorn (g.v.). Chaucer introduced the word into English from French; but in doing so he changed chichivache (thin or ugly face) into chichivache (lean or meagre-looking cow), and hence the animal was pictured as a kind of bovine monstrosity.

O noble wyves, full of heigh prudence, Let noon humilitie your tongues nayle: Ne lat no clerk have cause or diligence To write of you a story of such mervayle As of Griseldes, pacient and kynde, Lest Chichivache you swolwe in hir entraile. CHAUCER: Envoy to the Clerk's Tale.

Lydgate wrote a poem entitled Bycorne and Chichevache.

Chicken. Children and chicken must always be pickin'. Are always hungry and ready to eat food.

Curses like chickens come home to roost. See CURSES.

Don't count your chickens before they are hatched. Don't anticipate profits before they come. One of Aesop's fables describes a market woman saying she would get so much for her eggs, with the money she would buy a goose; the goose in time would bring her so much, with which she would buy a cow, and so on; but in her excitement she kicked over her basket and all her eggs were broken. "Don't crow till you are out of the wood" has a similar meaning. Cp. ALNASCHAR'S DREAM.

Mother Carey's chickens. See MOTHER CAREY.

She's no chicken. She's not so young as she used to be.
Chicken

Where the chicken got the axe. See To get it in the neck, under Neck.

Chicken of St. Nicholas. So the Piedmontese call our "ladybird," the little red beetle with spots of black. The Russians know it as "God's little cow," and the Germans, who say it is sent as a messenger of love, "God's little horse."

Chicken-hearted or chicken-livered. Cowardly. Young fowls are remarkably timid, slightest cause of alarm.

Catholic Church, one who has been baptized: others consider the phrase to mean one converted by special grace and adopted into the holy family of God's Church.

The children or babes in the wood. The earlier, the play or the ballad. The story is, in fact, Lord Byron himself, who was only twenty-one when he began, and twenty-eight when he died during the night, and his cattle died, and he himself perished in gaol. After seven years the ruffian was taken up for highway robbery, and confessed the whole affair.

Children. Three hundred and sixty-five at a birth. It is said that a Countess of Hennebe was accused a beggar of adultery because she carried twins, whereupon the beggar prayed that the countess might carry as many children as there are days in the year. According to the legend, this happened on Good Friday, 1276. All the males were named John, and all the females Elizabeth. The countess was forty-two at the time.

Chillians (ki' ii 'asts) (Gr. chilias, a thousand). Those who believe that Christ will return to this earth and reign a thousand years in the midst of His saints. Originally a Judaistic theory, it became a heresy in the early Christian Church, and though it was condemned by St. Damasus, who was Pope from 366 to 384, it was not extirpated. Article xli of the English Church, as published in 1553, further condemned Chiliasm; this Article was omitted in 1562. Millenarians is another name for the Chiliasm.

Chillingham Cattle. A breed of cattle preserved in the Northumberland park of the Earl of Tankerville, supposed to be the last remnant of the wild oxen of Britain.

Chillon (she' yoong). Prisoner of Chillon. François de Bonnivard (d. about 1570), a Genevan prelate and politician. Byron makes him one of six brothers, all of whom suffered for their opinions. The older and two younger died on the battlefield; one was burnt at the stake; three were incarcerated in the dungeon of Chillon, on the edge of the Lake of Geneva—of these, two died, and François, who had been imprisoned for "republican principles" by the Duke-Bishop of Savoy, was set at liberty by "the Bearnais" after four years' imprisonment.

Chilminar and Baalbec (kil min ar', bal' bek). Two cities built, according to Eastern legend, by the Genii, acting under the orders of Jan ben Jan, who governed the world long before the time of Adam. Chilminar, or the "Forty Pillars," is Persepolis. They were intended as lurking places for the Genii to hide in.

Chilo. One of the "Seven Sages of Greece" (q.v.).

Chiltern Hundreds. There are three, viz. Stoke, Desborough, and Burnham, Bucks. At one time the Chilterns, between Bedford and Hertford, etc., were much frequented by robbers, so a steward was appointed by the Crown to put them down. The necessity has long since ceased, but the office remains; and, since 1740, when a Member of Parliament wishes to vacate his seat, one way of doing so is by applying for the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds; for no member of Parliament may resign his seat, but if he accepts an office of profit under the Crown he is obliged to be re-elected if he wishes to remain a member. The Stewardship of the Manor of Northstead (Yorks) is used in the same way. The gift of both is in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; it was refused to a member for Reading in 1842.
The Stewardships of Old Sarum (Wilts), East Hendred (Berk's), Poyning (Sussex), Hempole (York's), were formerly used for the same purpose, as were (till 1838) the Escheatorships of Munster and Ulster.

Chinamani. China-man. A yearly tax of two shillings on every fireplace in England and Wales: first levied in 1663 and abolished in 1689.

Chimney Money or Hearth Money. A yearly tax of two shillings on every fireplace in England and Wales: first levied in 1663 and abolished in 1689.

Chimney Pot Hat. The cylindrical black silk hat, usually known as the top-hat or silk hat.

China Clay. A mineral, obtained largely from Cornwall, used in the manufacture of porcelain, and by papemakers to obtain finish and consistency, also for coating art and chromo papers.

Chinaman. A left-hander's googly, a cricketing term (see Googly).

China Town. A part of any city where the population is Chinese, the most famous being in the United States.

Chindit (chin' dit). Stylized lions characteristic of Burmese and Malayan sculpture and religious architecture. Adopted as the insignia of the troops operating in the Malay jungle behind the Japanese lines under Brigadier Wingate in the 1939-45 war, who hence were familiarly known as Chindits.

Chinese Gordon. General Gordon (killed at Khartoum in 1885), who in 1863 was placed in command of the Ever-Victorious Army (q.v.) and in the following year succeeded, after thirty-three engagements, in putting down the Taiping rebellion, which had broken out in 1851. For this service Gordon was rewarded by the Emperor with the yellow jacket and peacock's feather of a mandarin of the first class.

When the Mahdi's rebellion broke out in the Sudan, Gordon was sent to assist the Egyptian army, and defended Khartoum for nearly a year. Wolseley was sent to relieve him but arrived at Khartoum two days too late, Gordon having been killed on Jan. 26th, 1885.

Chingachgook. The Indian chief in Fenimore Cooper's Last of the Mohicans, Pathfinder, Deerslayer, and Pioneer. Called in French Le Gros Serpent.

Chink. Money, so called because it chinks, or jangles in the purse. It was formerly in good repute as a synonym of coin.

Have chinks in thy purse.—TUSSER: Five Hundred Points (1573).

I tell you, he that can lay hold of her Shall have the chinks.

SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, i, 5.

Chintz. A plural word that has erroneously become singular. The Hindi chint (from Sanskrit chitra, variegated) was the name given in the 17th century to the painted and stained calico imported from the East; but as the plural (chints) was more common in commercial use than the singular it came to be taken for a singular, and was written chinee or chine and finally chintz.

Chios (ki' os). The man of Chios. Homer, who lived at Chios, near the Ægean Sea. Seven cities claim to be his place of birth— Smyrna, Rhodos, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Agos, Athens.

Chip. A carpenter is known by his chips. A man is known to be a carpenter by the chips in his workshop, so the profession or taste of other men may be known by their manners or mode of speech.

A chip of the old block. A son or child of the same stuff as his father. The chip is the same wood as the block. Burke applied the words to William Pitt.

To have a chip on one's shoulder. To be seeking a quarrel. A person who is always ready to take offence is said to go about with a chip on his shoulder.

Brother Chip. Properly a brother carpenter, but in its extended meaning applied to anyone of the same vocation as oneself.

The ship's carpenter is, at sea, commonly addressed as "Chips."

Saratoga Chips. Potatoes sliced thin while raw, and fried crisp. Sometimes called chipped potatoes, but more generally "chips."

Such Carpenters, Such Chips. As the workman, so his work will be.

Chiron (ki'ron). The centaur who taught Achilles and many other heroes music, medicine, and hunting. Jupiter placed him in heaven among the stars as Sagittarius (the Archer).

In the Inferno Dante gives the name to the keeper of the lake of boiling blood, in the seventh circle of hell.

Chirping Cup. A merry-making glass or cup of liquor. Wine that maketh glad the heart of man, or makes him sing for joy.

A chirping cup is my matin song.

And my vesper bell is my bowl; Ding dong! A Friar of Orders Grey.

The chirping and moderate bottle. BEN JONSON.

He takes his chirping pint, and cracks his jokes.

POPE: Moral Essays, iii.

Chisel. I chiselled him means, I cheated him, or cut him out of something.

Chivalry (shiv' al ri). This is a general term for all things pertaining to the romance of the old days of knighthood. The word is of similar origin to cavalry, coming from Fr. cheval, a horse, and chevalier, a horseman. Chivalry embodied the Middle Age conception of the ideal life, where valour, courtesy, generosity and dexterity in arms were the summit of any man's attainment.

For him behoveth to be of such chivalric and so adventurous that he com by hymselfe and enquere after the seint Graal that my feire daughter kepeth.

Merlin (E.E.T.S., iii).

A great literature arose out of chivalry—The Roland epics, those of Charlemagne, and...
Chivy

Chop

Arthur. It was, perhaps, prophetic of the fate of chivalry itself that in every case these great epics end in tragedy:

The paladins of Charlemagne were all scattered by the battle of Roncesvalles.

The champions of Dietrich were all assassinated at the instigation of Chriemhild, the bride of Ethel, King of the Huns.

The Knights of the Round Table were all exterminated in the fatal battle of Camlan.

The flower of chivalry. See Flower.

Chivy. To chase or urge someone on, also a chase in the sense of "Prisoners' Base." "One boy "sets a chivy" by leaving his base, when one of the opposite side chases him, and if he succeeds in touching him before he reaches "home," the boy touched becomes a prisoner.

The word is a variant spelling of chase in the game of boys.

Chivy or chivvy. Slang for the face. An example of rhyming slang (q. v.). Here the full term to rhyme with face is Chivy Chase.

Chloe (klō′ē). The shepherdess beloved by Daphnis in the pastoral romance of Longus, entitled Daphnis and Chloe, and hence a generic name among romance writers and pastoral poets for a rustic maiden—not always of the artless variety.

In Pope's Moral Essays (ii) Chloe is intended for Lady Suffolk, mistress of George II. "Content to dwell in decencies for ever"; and Prior uses the name for Mrs. Centlivre.

Chock-full. Chock-a-block. Absolutely full; no room for any more. It is a very old expression in English, dating back at least to Chaucer's time, though, apparently, not used by him. It does not seem to have any etymological connexion with choke (as though meaning "full enough to choke one"); but this spelling—as well as chuck—has been in common use.

Art was holding some grand market; streets and inn had been chockfull during the sunny hours.—CARLYLE, in Froude's Jane W. Carlyle, vol. i, letter Ixxvii.

Chocolate. The produce of the cocoa-berry was introduced into England from Central America in the early 16th century as a drink; it was sold in the London coffee-houses from the middle of the 17th century. The Cocoa Tree was one of the most famous coffee-houses of the early 18th century.

Chocos (Austr.). A diminutive of chocolate soldiers, applied to militiamen and conscripts in World War II.

Choice. Choice spirit. A specially select or excellent person, a leader in some particular capacity. From Antony's speaking of Cæsar and Brutus as—

The choice and master spirit of this age.

SHAKESPEARE: Julius Cæsar, iii, 1.

Choice spirit of the age. Figuratively used for a gallant of the day; one who delights to exaggerate the whims of fashion.

Hobson's choice. See Hobson.

Of two evils choose the less. The proverb is given in John Heywood's collection (1546), but it is a good deal earlier, and occurs in Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde (ii, 470) as—

Of harms two, the lesse is for to chese.

Thomas à Kempis (Imit. Christi, iii, 12) has—

De duobus malis minus est semper eligendum (Of two evils the less is always to be chosen).

which is an echo of Cicero's

Ex malis eligere minima oportere (Of evil one should select the least).—De Officis, iii, 1.

Choke. May this piece of bread choke me, if what I say is not true. In ancient times a person accused of robbery had a piece of barley bread, over which Mass had been said, given him. He put it in his mouth uttering these words, and if he could swallow it without being choked he was pronounced innocent. Tradition ascribes the death of Earl Godwin to choking with a piece of bread after this solemn appeal. See Corsned.

The narrowing of a shot-gun barrel to effect greater range and concentration of shot is called the choke. The barrel habitually used second is often choked, as by then a bird missed with the first barrel is farther away.

Choke-pear. A kind of pear with a rough, astringent taste. From this the term was applied to anything that stopped speaking, such as an unanswerable argument or a biting sarcasm.

He gave him a choke-pear to stoppe his breath. LYL.: Euphues.

Pardon me for going so low as to talk of giving choke-pears. RICHARDSON: Clarissa.

Choker. Formerly a broad neck-cloth, worn in full dress, and by waiters and clergymen; now a high, stiff collar or a necklace worn tight round the neck.

Chop. The various modern uses of chop represent two or three different words. To chop, meaning to cut a piece off with a sudden blow, is a variant spelling of chap, a cleft in the skin, and to chop, to open in long slits or cracks. From this we get—

Chops of the Channel. The short broken motion of the waves, experienced in crossing the English Channel; also the place where such motion occurs. In this use, however, the word may be chops, the jaw (see below), because the Chops of the Channel is an old and well-understood term for the entrance to the Channel from the Atlantic.

Chop house. An eating-house where chops and steaks are served.

I dine at the Chop-House three days a week, where the good company wonders they never see you of late.—STEELE: Spectator, No. 306 (22 Feb., 1712).

In the three following phrases chop comes from the same root as chap in chapman (q. v.), and signifies to barter, exchange, or sell.

To chop and change. To barter by rule of thumb; to fluctuate, to vary continuously.

To chop an article also means to dispose of it arbitrarily, even at a loss.

To chop logic. To bandy words; to altercate. Bacon says, "Let not the council chop with the judge."

How now, how now, chop logic! What is this? "Proud," and "I thank you," and "I thank you not," And yet "not proud."

SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, iii, 5.
The wind chops about. Shifts from point to point suddenly. Hence, choppy, said of a variable wind, and of the rough sea produced by such; and to chop round.

How the House of Lords and House of Commons chopped round.—Thackeray: The Four Georges (George I).

Chop, the face, and chops, the jaws or mouth, is a variant spelling of chop (as in Bath chop, the lower part of a pig's face, cured). From this come Chop-fallen, or chop-fallen. Crest-fallen; down in the mouth.

Down in the chops. Down in the mouth; in a melancholy state; with the mouth drawn down.

To lick one's chops. To relish in anticipation.

Finally, in the slang phrase first chop, meaning excellent, the word is the Hindi k'wai-rase, meaning "the quick ones." In pidgin English (q.t.) chop means "quick."

Choragus (kō-rāgūs). The leader of the chorus in the ancient Athenian drama.

At Oxford the title is given to the assistant of the Professor of Music, but formerly to the officer who superintended the practice of music. See Corypheus.

Choriambic Metre. Horace gives us a great variety, but the main feature in all is the prevalence of the choriambus (— | — | —). Specimen translations in two of these metres are subjoined:

2. When you, with an approving smile,
   Praise those delicate arms, Lyly, of Telephus,
   Ah me! how you stir up my bile!
   Heart-sick that for a boy you should forsake me thus.

Chouans (shoo’ ong). French insurgents of the Royalist party during the Revolution. Jean Cottereau was their leader, nicknamed Chouan (a corruption of Fr. chat-huant, a screech-owl), because he was accustomed to warn his companions of danger by imitating the screech of an owl. Cottereau (killed 1794) was followed by George Cadoudal (executed 1800). See also Companions of Jehu; Vendée.

Choughs Protected. See Birds.

Chouse (chouz). This is a rather odd word, meaning to cheat or swindle. It has an interesting origin, coming from the Turkish ch'au-sh, an interpreter, messenger, etc. The interpreter of the Turkish embassy in England in 1609 defrauded his government of £4,000, and the notoriety of the swindle caused the word chius or chouse to be adopted.

Dapper. What do you think of me,
That I am a Chausore?

Face. What's that?

Dapper. The Turk was here—
As one would say, do you think I am a Turk?

Ben Jonson: Alchemist, i. 2.

You shall choose him out of horses, clothes, and money, and I'll wink at it.—Dryden: Wild Gallant, ii, 1.

Chriemhild. See Kriemhild.

Chrisom or Chrism signifies properly "the white cloth set by the minister at baptism on the head of the newly anointed with chrism"—a composition of oil and balm (Gr. chrisma, anointing, unction). In the Form of Private Baptism this is direction: "Then the minister shall put the white vesture, commonly called the chrisome, upon the child, and the child thus baptized is called a chrisom or christos child. If it dies within the month, it is shrouded in the vesture; and hence, in the bills of mortality, even to 1726, infants that died within the month were termed chrisoms.

A' made a finer end and went away an it had been any chrisom child.—Shakespeare: Henry V, ii, 5.

Chriess-cross, or Christ-cross, Row. The alphabet in a hornbook, which had a cross like the Maltese cross (‡) at the beginning and end.

Sir Ralph. I wonder, wench, how I thy name might know.

Mall. Why, you may find it, sir, in th' Chriesscross row.

Sir Ralph. Be my schoolmistress, teach me how to spell it.

Mall. No, faith, I care not greatly, if I tell it;
My name is Mary Barnes.

Porter: Two Angry Women of Abington, v, 1 (1599).

The word appears as Christ-cross, criss-cross, etc., and Shakespeare shortened it to cross-row:—
He hearkens after prophecies and dreams;
And from the cross-row plucks the letter G,
And says a wizard told him that by G
His issue disinherited should be.

Richard III, i, i.

As the Maltese cross was also sometimes used in place of XII to mark that hour on clocks the word has occasionally been used for noon:—
The feskewe of the Diall is upon the Chriess-crosse of Noone.—The Puritan Widow, iv, 2 (Anon, 1607).

Christendom. All Christian countries generally; formerly it also meant the state or condition of being a Christian. Thus, in Shakespeare's King John, the young prince says:—

By my christendom!

So I were out of prison and kept sheep,
I should be merry as the day is long.

Act iv, sc. 1.

Christian. A follower of Christ. So called first at Antioch (Acts xi. 26). Also the hero of Bunyan's allegory, Pilgrim's Progress. He flees from the City of Destruction, and journeys to the Celestial City. He starts with a heavy burden on his back, but it falls off when he stands at the foot of the cross.

Christian Brothers. A secret society formed in London in the early 16th century to distribute the New Testament in English. The name is now better known as that of the teaching congregation of laymen, founded in 1684 by St. John Baptist de la Salle.

Most Christian King. The style of the King of France since 1469, when it was conferred on Louis XI by Pope Paul II. Previously to that the title had been given in the 8th century to Pepin le Bref by Pope Stephen III (714-68), and again in the 9th century to Charles le Chauve.

Christiana (kris' ti an'). The wife of Christian in Pt. ii of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, who journeyed with her children and Mercy from the City of Destruction some time after her husband.

Christinos. Supporters of the Queen-Regent Christina during the Carlist wars in Spain, 1833-40.

Christmas. December 25th is Christmas Day. In England, from the 7th to as late as the 13th century, the year was reckoned from Christmas Day; but in the 12th century the Anglican Church began the year on March 25th, a practice which was adopted by civilians at the beginning of the 14th century, and which remained in force till the reformation of the calendar in 1752. Thus, the civil, ecclesiastical, and legal year, which was used in all public documents, began on Christmas Day till the end of the 13th century, but the historical year had, for a very long time before then, begun on January 1st.

Christmas box. A small gratuity given on Boxing Day (the day after Christmas Day). Boxes placed in churches for casual offerings used to be opened on Christmas Day, and the contents, called the "dole of the Christmas box," or the "box money," were distributed next day by the priests. Apprentices used, also, to carry a box round to their masters' customers for small gratuities.

Christmas cards. These are of comparatively recent origin, the earliest having, it is said, been designed in 1844 by W. C. T. Dobson, R.A., a painter of pretty works of that nature.

Christmas decorations. The great feast of Saturn was held in December, when the people decorated the temples with such green things as they could find. The Christian custom is the same transferred to Him who was born in Bethlehem on Christmas Day. The holly or holy-tree is called Christ's-thorn in Germany and Scandinavia, from its use in church decorations and its putting forth its berries at Christmas time. The early Christians gave an emblematic turn to the custom, referring to the "righteous branch," and justifying the custom from Isaiah Ix, 13— "The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee; the fir-tree, the pine-tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary."

The custom of having a Christmas tree decorated with candles and hung with presents came to England with the craze for German things that followed Queen Victoria's marriage to Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha in 1840. Santa Claus (whose name has not even yet become anglicized) with his reindeer had been unknown until then.

Christopher, St. Legend relates that St. Christopher was a giant who one day carried a child over a brook, and said, "Chykle, thou hast put me in grete peryll. I might bere no greater burden." To which the child answered, "Marvel thou nothing, for thou hast borne all the world upon thee, and its sins likewise." This is an allegory: Christopher means Christ-bearer; the child was Christ, and the river was the river of death.

Christy Minstrels. For many years the mid-Victorian publics of London and New York were entertained and delighted by the troupe of black-faced minstrels organized by an American. Edwin Christy (1815-62). To the accompaniment of various stage-negro antics they sang plantation songs and cracked innocent jokes with Bones, Sambo, and the rest. They were succeeded by the Moore and Burgess, and other troupes of the same genre.

Chronicle of Worcester. Early in the 12th century a monk of Worcester, named Florence, wrote a chronicle from the creation to the year 1118, when he died. The work was carried on until 1141, and it was printed in London in 1592. With all its inevitable defects and errors it serves as a key to the Saxon chronicle.

Chronicle small beer. To. To note down events of no importance whatsoever.

She was a wight, if ever such wight were . . . To suckle fools and chronicle small beer.

Shakespeare: Othello, ii, 1.

Chronogram. A sentence or inscription in which certain letters stand for a date or epoch. In this double Chronogram upon the year 1642, (one part in Latin and the other in English of that Latin) the capitals in each produce the total of 1642.

J.V. De VVs lAm pr0plVVs sls regl regnourVlVe hVlC VnIverso.

Chronon-hoton-thologos (kró' non hó' tonthol' ógos). A burlesque pomposo, King of Queerummania, in Henry Carey's farce of the same name—"the most tragical tragedy ever tragedized"—(1734). The name is used for any bombastic person who delivers an inflated address. See ALDBORONTEPHO S C HOPHORNIO.

Chrysippus. Nisi Chrysippus fuisse, Porticus non esset. Chrysippus of Soli was a disciple of Zeno the Stoic and Cleanthes, his successor. He did for the Stoics what St. Paul did for Christianity—that is, he explained the system, showed by plausible reasoning its truth, and how it was based on a solid foundation. Stoicism was founded by Zeno; but if Chrysippus had not advocated it, it would never have taken root.
Chum. A crony, a familiar companion, properly a bedfellow. The word first appeared in the 17th century; its origin has not been ascertained.

To chum in with. To be on very intimate and friendly terms with.

Church. This is the A.S. circe, or cirice, which comes through W. Ger. kirike, from Gr. kuriakon, a church, the neuter of the adjective kuriakos, meaning of, or belonging to, the Lord.

The Anglican Church. Since the Reformation the English branch of the Protestant Church which, since 1532, has been known as the “Established Church of England,” because established by Act of Parliament. It disavows the authority of the Pope, and rejects certain dogmas and rules of the Roman Church.

The Catholic Church. The Western Church called itself so when it separated from the Eastern Church. It is also called the Roman Catholic Church, to distinguish it from the Anglican Church or Anglican Catholic Church, a branch of the Western Church.

The Established Church. The State Church, the Church officially recognized and adopted by any country. In England it is Episcopal (see Anglican Church above), in Scotland Presbyterian, but in Wales, since the establishment of the Church of England in Wales by Act of Parliament in 1539, there is no Established Church.

Church of North America (Episcopal). Established November 1784, when Bishop Seabury, chosen by the Churches of Connecticut, was consecrated in Scotland. The first convention was held at Philadelphia in 1787.

Church of Scotland. See Presbyterian, which became the established religion of Scotland on the abolition of Episcopal in 1638. The head of the Church is the Moderator, and it is regulated by four Courts: the General Assembly, Synod, Presbytery, and Kirk Sessions.

Church-ale. The word “ale” is used in such composite words as bride-ale, clerk-ale, church-ale, kimbler-ale, Midsummer-ale, Scot-ale, Whitsun-ale, etc., for revel or feast, ale being the chief liquor given.

The multitude call Church-ale Sunday their revel-eyng day, which day is spent in bulbeating, bearbeating, dying, and drunkenness.—W. Kerze (1579).

The Church Invisible. Those who are known to God alone as His sons and daughters by adoption and grace. See Church Visible.

There is . . . a Church visible and a Church invisible: the latter consists of those spiritual persons who fulfil the notion of the Ideal Church—the former is the Church as it exists in any particular age, embracing within it all who profess Christianity.—F. W. Robertson: Sermons (series IV. ii).

The Church Militant. The Church as consisting of the whole body of believers, who are said to be “waging the war of faith” against “the world, the flesh, and the devil.” It is therefore militant, or in warfare.

Church scot. A tribute paid on St. Martin’s Day (November 11th) in support of the clergy in Anglo-Saxon times. It was originally paid in corn, but later other goods in kind, or money, were taken.

The Church Triumphant. Those who are dead and gone to the next. Having fought the fight and triumphed, they belong to the Church triumphant in heaven.

The Church Visible. All ostensible Christians; all who profess to be Christians; all who have been baptized and admitted into Church Communion. See Church Invisive.

The Seven Churches of Asia. See Seven.

To church a woman. To read the appointed service when a woman comes to church after a confinement to return thanks to God for her “safe deliverance” and restored health.

To go into the Church. To take holy orders, or become an “ordained” clergyman.

Churchwarden. A long clay pipe, such as churchwardens used to smoke a century or so ago when they met together in the parish tavern, after they had made up their accounts in the vestry, or been elected to office at the Easter meeting.

Churchyard cough. A deep, chesty cough which sounds like a presage of death.

Churriguereque (chu rig er esk’). Overornate, as applied to architecture. The word, frequently used by Richard Ford (1796-1858) in his writings on Spain, derives from Jose Churriguera (1650-1723) a Spanish architect of the baroque school.

Ci-devant (si de vong) (Fr.). Former, of times gone by. As Ci-devant governor—i.e., once a governor, but no longer so. Ci-devant philosophers means philosophers of former days. In the time of the first French Republic the word was used as a noun, and meant a nobleman of the ancien régime.

Cicero (sis’er ô). The great Roman orator, philosopher, and statesman (106-43 B.C.), Marcus Tullius, said by Plutarch to have been called Cicero from Lact. cicer (a wart or vetch), because he had “a flat excrescence on the tip of his nose.”

The Cicero of France. Jean Baptiste Massillon (1663-1742), a noted pulpit orator.

The Cicero of Germany. Johann III, elector of Brandenburg. (1455-99.)

The Cicero of the British Senate. George Canning (1770-1827).

The German Cicero. Johann Sturm, printer and scholar (1507-89).

Cicerone. A guide to point out objects of interest to strangers. So called from the great orator Cicero, in the same way as Paul was called by the men of Lystra. “Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker.”
Cicisbeo (chich is bá' ô). A dangler about women; the professed gallant of a married woman. C.p. CAVALIERE SERVENTE. Also the knot of silk or ribbon which is attached to fans, walking-sticks, umbrellas, etc. Cicisbeism, the practice of dangling about women.

Cid (sid). A corruption of seyyid, Arabic for lord. The title given to Roderigo or Ruy Diaz de Bivar (born about 1040, died 1099), also called El Campeador, the national hero of Spain and champion of Christianity against the Moors. His exploits, real and legendary, form the basis of many Spanish romances and chronicles, as well as Corneille's tragedy, Le Cid (1636).

Cid Hamet Benengeli. The supposititious author upon whom Cervantes fathered The Adventures of Don Quixote.

Of the two bad cassocks I am worth . . . I would have given the latter of them as freely as even Cid Hamet offered his . . . to have stood by.—STERNF.

Cigars and Cigarettes. The word cigar comes from cícada, the Spanish cigar-shaped beetle. The natives of Cuba were already smoking tobacco in this form when the white men first invaded their country. Cigars as we know them were introduced into U.S.A. by General Putnam, in 1762, on his return from the capture of Havana by the Earl of Albemarle, and this fashion of smoking soon spread to Europe. Cheroots (from the Tamil shuruuu, a roll) are made from tobacco grown in S. India or the Philippines, and are merely rolled, with the ends cut square. Cigarettes originated in Spain (Borrow called them paper cigars, and the Spanish call them cigarillos, little cigars), and at first were rolled by the smoker as he needed them. It was not until the late 19th century that they were sold rolled and in packets. Even ready-made cigarettes in Spain to-day are designed to be untwisted at the ends and re-rolled before smoking.

Cimmerian Darkness (si mér' i na). Homer (possibly from some story as to the Arctic night) supposes the Cimmerians to dwell in a land “beyond the ocean stream,” where the sun never shone. (Odys., xi, 14.)

I carried am into waste wilderness.

Waste wilderness, amongst Cymerean shades,

Where endless pains and hideous heinousse,

Is round about me heart in darksome glades.

SPENSER: Virgil's Gnat.

In dark Cimmerian desert ever dwell.

Milton: L'Allegro.

The Cimmerians were known in post-Homeric times as an historical people on the shores of the Black Sea, whence the name Crimea.

Cinch (sinch). This word, which comes from the Spanish, is the term used in western U.S.A. for the strong leather or canvas girth of a saddle or pack. From that it came to mean a tight grip; and by an easy transition a sure thing, a safe proposition.

Cinchona (sin chó' na) or Quinine. So named from the wife of the Conte del Chinchon, vicerey of Peru, who was cured of a tertian fever by its use, and who brought it to Europe in 1640. Linnaeus erroneously named it Cinchona for Chinchona. See PERUVIAN BARK.

Cincinnatus (sin si ná' tus). A legendary Roman hero of about 500 to 430 B.C., who, after having been consul years before, was taken from his plough to be Dictator. After he had conquered the Æquians and delivered his country from danger, he laid down his office and returned to his plough.

The Cincinnati were members of a society of officers of the American Army after the peace of 1783 “to perpetuate friendship, and to raise a fund for relieving the widows and orphans of those who have fallen during the war.” On their badge was a figure of Cincinnatus. The society dissolved itself, as it was regarded with suspicion by the populace.

The Ohio city of this name, originally called Losantiville, was rechristened in 1790 in honour of Gen. St. Clair, governor of the North West Territory, who was president of the society of Cincinnati.

Cinderella (sin der rel' a). Heroine of a fairy tale of very ancient, probably Eastern, origin, that was mentioned in German literature in the 16th century and was popularized by Perrault's Contes de ma mère l'oye (1697). Cinderella is drudge of the house, dirty with housework, while her elder sisters go to fine balls. At length a fairy enables her to go to the prince's ball; the prince falls in love with her, and she is discovered by means of a glass slipper which she drops, and which will fit no foot but her own.

The glass slipper is a mistranslation of pantoufle en vair (a fur, or sable, slipper), not en verre. Sable was worn only by kings and princes, so the fairy gave royal slippers to her favourite.

Cinquecento (ching' kwé chen' tó). The Italian name for the sixteenth century (1501-1600), applied as an epithet to art and literature with much the same significance as Renaissance or Elizabethan. It was the revival of the classical or antique, but is generally understood as a derogatory term, implying debased or inferior art.

Cinque Ports, The. Originally the five seaports, Hastings, Sandwich, Dover, Romney, and Hythe, which were granted special privileges from the 13th to the 17th centuries, and even later, in consideration of their providing ships and men for the defence of the Channel. Subsequently Winchelsea and Rye were added.

Cinter (sin' ter). This is frequently confused with the word "centre", though it comes from the same original as the French ceinture, a girdle. A cinter, or centre, is the wooden shape on which an arch is built.

Cipher. This word comes from the Arabic cifr, meaning zero, naught. Through various ways it has come to be used for a message so set forth on paper as to be comprehensible only to one acquainted with that particular and secret system of writing. The simplest cipher is that once employed by Julius Cèsar, who used certain letters in place of the right ones, e.g. d for a, e for b, and so on through the alphabet. Later ciphers used numbers or invented characters to replace letters. In more recent years the most complicated systems of ciphering have come into use by spies, diplomatic observers, etc., but experts claim that no cipher has yet been invented that cannot be “broken down” by close study and the application of certain recognized methods.

Circe (sèr'sè). A sorceress in Greek mythology, who lived in the island of Aëa. When Ulysses landed there, Circe turned his companions into swine, but Ulysses resisted this metamorphosis by virtue of a herb called moly (q.v.), given him by Mercury. Who knows not Circe, The daughter of the Sun, whose charmed cup Whoever tasted lost his upright shape, And downward fell into a grovelling swine?
Milton: Comus, 50-53.

Circle. Great circle. Navigation, whether on the sea or in the air, is principally done with the aid of a great circle. This is a line on the earth’s surface which lies in a plane through the centre of the earth, or any circle on the earth’s surface which divides the world into two equal parts. The shortest line between any two points on the earth’s surface is on a great circle, hence the ascertaining of great circles is of the utmost importance in nautical or aerial navigation.

Circle of Ulloa. A white rainbow or luminous ring sometimes seen in Alpine regions opposite the sun in foggy weather. Named from Antonio de Ulloa (1716-95), a Spanish naval officer who founded the observatory at Cadiz and initiated many scientific enterprises.

Circuit. The journey made through the counties of Great Britain by the judges twice a year. There are six circuits in England, two in Wales, and three in Scotland. Those in England are called the South-Eastern, Midland, Northern, North-Eastern, Oxford, and Western Circuit; those of Wales, the North Wales and Chester, and the South Wales Division; and those of Scotland, the Southern, Western, and Northern.

Circumlocution Office. A term applied in ridicule by Dickens in Little Dorrit to our public offices, because each person tries to shuffle off every act to someone else; and before anything is done it has to pass through so many departments and so much time elapses that it is hardly worth having bothered about it. Whatever was required to be done, the Circumlocution Office was beforehand with all the public departments in the art of perceiving—How not to do it.—Dickens: Little Dorrit, ch. x.

Cist (kist) (Gr. kiste, Lat. cista). A chest or box. Generally used as a coffer for the remains of the dead. The Greek and Roman cist was a deep cylindrical basket made of wickerwork. The basket into which voters cast their tablets was called a “cist”; but the mystic cist used in the rites of Ceres was latterly made of bronze. Cp. KIST OF WHEISTLES.

Cistercians. A monastic order, founded at Cistercium or Citeaux by Robert, abbot of Môlème, in Burgundy, in 1098, as a branch of the Benedictines; the monks are known also as Bernardines, owing to the patronage of St. Bernard of Clairvaux about 1200. In 1664 the order was reformed on an excessively strict basis by Jean le Bouthillier de Rance.

Citadel (Ital. citadella, a little city). In fortification, a small strong fort, constructed either within the place fortified, or at its most inaccessible spot, to give refuge for the garrison, that it may prolong the defence after the place has fallen, or hold out for the best terms of capitulation. Citadels generally command the interior of the place, and are useful, therefore, for overawing a population which might otherwise strive to shorten a siege.

Citizen King, The. Louis Philippe of France. So called because he was elected King of the French (not king of France) by the citizens of Paris. (Born 1773, reigned 1830-48, died 1850.)

City. Strictly speaking, a large town with a corporation and cathedral; but any large town is so called in ordinary speech. In the Bible it means a town having walls and gates.

The eldest son of the first man [Cain] built a city (Gen. iv, 17)—not, of course, a Nineveh or a Babylon, but still a city.—Rawlinson: Origin of Nations, pt. i, ch. i.

The City of a Hundred Towers. Pavia, in Italy; famous for its towers and steeples.

The City College. An old irony. Newgate.

The City of Bells. Strasburg.

The City of Brotherly Love. A somewhat ironical, but quite etymological, nickname of Philadelphia (Gr. philadelphia means “brotherly love”).

The City of David. Jerusalem. So called in compliment to King David (2 Sam. v, 7, 9).

The City of Destruction. In Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress, the world of the unconverted.

The City of God. The Church, or whole body of believers; the kingdom of Christ, in contradistinction to the City of Destruction (q.v.). The phrase is that of St. Augustine; one of his chief works bearing the title, De Civitate Del.

The City of Lanterns. A supposititious city in Lucian’s Vera Historia, situate somewhere beyond the zodiac. Cp. LANTERN-LAND.

The City of Legions. Cæsarleon-on-Usk, where King Arthur held his court.

The City of Lilies. Florence.

The City of Palaces. Agrippa, in the reign of Augustus, converted Rome from “a city of brick huts to one of marble palaces.”

Marmoream se reliquerque quam latericiam accipserat.—Suetonius: Aug. xxix.

Calcutta is called the “City of Palaces.”
City of Refuge. Moses, at the command of God, set apart three cities on the east of Jordan, and Joshua added three others on the west, whether any person might flee for refuge who had killed a human creature inadvertently. The three on the east of Jordan were Bezer, Ramoth, and Golan; the three on the west were Hebron, Shechem, and Kadesh (Deut. iv, 43; Josh. xx, 1-5).

By Mohammedans, Medina, in Arabia, where Mohammed took refuge when driven by conspirators from Mecca, is known as "the City of Refuge." He entered it, not as a fugitive, but in triumph 622 A.D. Also called the City of the Prophet.

The City of St. Michael. Dunfries, of which city St. Michael is the patron saint.

The City of Saints. Montreal, in Canada, is so named because all the streets are named after saints. Salt Lake City, Utah, U.S.A., also is known as the "City of the Saints," from the Mormons who inhabit it.

The Cities of the Plain. Sodom and Gomorrah. Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom.—Gen. xiii, 12.

The City of the Golden Gate. San Francisco. See Golden Gate.

The City of the Prophet. Medina. See City of Refuge.

The City of the Seven Hills. Rome, built on seven hills (Urbis septacollis). The hills are the Aventine, Caelian, Capitoline, Esquiline, Palatine, Quirinal, and Viminal.

The Aventine Hill was given to the people. It was deemed unlucky, because here Remus was slain. It was also called "Collis Diane," from the Temple of Diana which stood there.

The Caelian Hill was given to Cælius Vibenna, the Tuscan, who came to the help of the Romans in the Sabine war.

The Capitoline Hill of "Mons Tarpeius," also called "Mons Saturni," on which stood the great castle or capitol of Rome. It contained the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

The Esquiline Hill was given by Augustus to Mecenas, who built thereon a magnificent mansion.

The Palatine Hill was the largest of the seven. Here Romulus held his court, whence the word "palace" (palatum).

The Quirinal Hill was where the Quirés or Curés settled. It was also called "Cabalinus," from two marble statues of a horse, one of which was the work of Phidias, the other of Praxiteles.

The Viminal Hill was so called from the number of osiers (vignes) which grew there. It contained the Temple of Jupiter Viminalis.

The City of the Sun. Baalbec, Rhodes, and Heliopolis, which had the sun for tutelary deity, were so called. It is also the name of a treatise on the Ideal Republic by the Dominican friar Campanella (1568-1639), similar to the Republic of Plato, Utopia of Sir Thomas More, and Atlantis of Bacon.

The City of the Three Kings. Cologne; the reputed burial-place of the Magi (q.v.).

The City of the Tribes. Galway; because it was anciently the home of the thirteen "tribes" or chief families, who settled there in 1232 with Richard de Burgh.

The City of the Violated Treaty. Limerick; because of the way in which the Paficication of Limerick (1691) was broken by England.

The City of the Violet Crown. Athens is so called by Aristophanes (Ioar de kina.—Etyes, 1323 and 1329; and Acharnians, 637. Macaulay refers to Athens as the "violet-crowned city." Ion (a violet) was a representative king of Athens, whose four sons gave names to the four Athenian classes; and Greece, in Asia Minor, was called Ionia. Athens was the city of "Ion crowned its king" or "of the Violet crowned."

Civil List. The grant voted annually by Parliament to pay the personal expenses of the Sovereign, the household expenses, and the pensions awarded by Royal bounty; before the reign of William III it embraced all public expenditure, except that on the army and navy.

Civil Service Estimates. The annual Parliamentary grant to cover the expenses of the diplomatic services, the post office and telegraphs, education, the collection of the revenue, and other expenses neither pertaining to the Sovereign nor the armed services.

Civil war. War between citizens (civiles). In English history the term is applied to the war between Charles I and his Parliament; but the War of the Roses was a civil war also. In America, the War of Secession (1861-65).

Civis Romanus sum (siv'is rō mā' nus sūm). "I am a Roman citizen," a plea which sufficed to arrest arbitrary condemnation, bonds, and scourging. Hence, when the centurion commanded Paul "to be examined by scourging," he asked, "Is it lawful for you to scourge a Roman citizen, and uncondemned?" (1) No Roman citizen could be condemned unheard; (2) by the Valerian Law he could not be bound; (3) by the Sempronian Law it was forbidden to scourge him, or to beat him with rods. See also Acts xvi, 37, etc.

The phrase later gained an English fame from the peroration of Palmerston's greatest speech, in 1850: "As the Roman, in days of old, held himself free from indignity when he could say Civis Romanus sum, so also a British subject, in whatever land he may be, shall feel confident that the watchful eye and the strong arm of England will protect him against injustice and wrong."

Clivie Street (siv' i). In the 1939-45 War this was the term by which men in the Services referred to civilian life.

Clabber Napper's Hole. Near Gravesend; said to be named after a freebooter; but more likely the Celtic Caerber l'arber (water-town lower camp).

Clack Dish. A dish or basin with a movable lid. Some two or three centuries ago beggars used to proclaim their want by clacking the lid of a wooden dish. Can you think, I get my living by a bell and clack-dish? . . . . How's that? Why, begging, sir.

MIDDLETON: Family of Love (1608).
Clam. A bivalve mollusc like an oyster, which burrows in sand or mud. In America especially clams are esteemed as a delicacy. They are gathered only when the tide is out, hence the name Haplocladia, "at high tide." The word is also used as slang for the mouth, and for a close-mouthed person.

Close as a clam. Mean, close-fisted; from the difficulty with which a clam is made to open its shell and give up all it has worth having.

Clan. The system whereby the head of the family, or clan, had entire jurisdiction over its members is said to have arisen in Scotland in the early 11th century. The legal power and hereditary jurisdiction of the head of a clan was abolished in 1747, following the '45 rebellion. Nevertheless the heads of certain clans, notably McLeod, still exercise considerable authority over their members and hold punctually attended gatherings. The phrase a gathering of the clans has been taken into slang use to imply any coming together of like-minded persons, usually for convivial purposes.

Clan-na-Gael, The (klăn' na ġăl'). An Irish Fenian organization founded in Philadelphia in 1881, and known in secret as the "United Brotherhood": its avowed object being to secure "the complete and absolute independence of Ireland from Great Britain, and the complete severance of all political connexion between the two countries, to be effected by unceasing preparation for armed insurrection in Ireland."

Clapboard. From Ger. klappholz (holz, wood), meaning small pieces of split oak used by cooper s for cask staves. In the U.S.A. a roofing board, made thin at one edge and overlapping the next one, a weatherboard.

In England the word was formerly used by cooper s in the same way as in Germany, and also for wainscoting.

Clapperclaw. To jangle, to claw or scratch; to abuse, revile; originally meaning to claw with a clapper of some sort.

Now they are clapper-clawing one another; I'll go look on.—Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, v. 4.

Clapper-dudgeons. Abram-men (q.v.), beggars from birth. The clapper is the tongue of a bell, and in cant language the human tongue. Dudgeon is the hilt of a dagger; and perhaps the original meaning is one who knocks his clap dish (or CLACK DISH, q.v.) with a dudgeon.

Clap-trap. Something introduced to win applause; something really worthless, but sure to take with the groundlings. A trap to catch applause.

Claque (kläk'). A body of hired applauders at a theatre, etc.; said to have been originated or first systematized by a M. Sauton, who, in 1820, established in Paris an office to ensure the success of dramatic pieces. The manager ordered the required number of claquaіeurs, who were divided into commissaires, those who commit the pieces to memory and are noisy in pointing out its merits; rieurs, who laugh at the puns and jokes; pleureurs, chiefly women, who are to hold their pocket-handkerchiefs to their eyes at the moving parts; chahouteurs, who are to keep the audience in good humour; and bissus, who are to cry "bis" (encore).

Claque is also the French for an opera-hat, and Thackeray uses it with this sense:—

A gentleman in black with ringlets and a tuft stood gazing fiercely about him, with one hand in the arm-hole of his waistcoat and the other holding his claque.—Pendennis, ch. xxv.

Clare, Order of St. A religious order of women, the second that St. Francis instituted. It was founded in 1212, and took its name from its first abbess, Clara of Assisi. The nuns are called Minoresses and Poor Clares, or Nuns of the Order of St. Francis. See Franciscans.

Clarenteur. The Constitutions of Clarendon. Laws made by a general council of nobles and prelates, held at Clarendon, in Wiltshire, in 1164, to check the power of the Church, and restrain the prerogatives of ecclesiastics. These famous ordinances, sixteen in number, define the limits of the patronage and jurisdiction of the Pope in these realms.

Clarendon type. A bold-faced, condensed type, such as that used for the "catch-words" which head these articles.

Claret. The English name for the red wines of Bordeaux, originally the yellowish or light red wines as distinguished from the white wines. The name—which is not used in France—is the O.Fr. clairet, diminutive of clair, from Lat. clarus, clear. The colour receives its name from the wine, not vice versa.

Claret cup. A drink made of claret, brandy, lemon, borage, sugar, ice, and carbonated water.

To broach one's claret, or to tap one's claret jug. To give one a bloody nose.

Clarke, Nobby Clarke is the British Army name for every man of the name of Clarke. It originated in the dressy—or "nobby"—turn-out affected by clerks and other blackcoat workers in the early 19th century.

Classics. The best authors. The Romans were divided by Servius into five classes. Any citizen who belonged to the highest class was called classicus; all the rest were said to be infra classem (unclassed). From this the best authors were termed classici auctores (classic authors), i.e. authors of the best or first class. The high esteem in which Greek and Latin were held at the revival of letters obtained for these authors the name of classic, emphatically; and when other first-rate works are intended some distinctive name is added, as the English, French, Spanish, etc., classics.

Classic Races. The five chief horse-races in England, all for three-year-olds, are: The One Thousand Guineas, for fillies only, and the Two Thousand Guineas, for fillies only, and the Two Thousand Guineas, for fillies only, both run at Newmarket. The Oaks, for fillies only, and the Derby, for fillies and colts, both run at Epsom. The St. Leger, for fillies and colts, run at Doncaster.

Claude Lorraine (i.e. of Lorraine). This incorrect form is generally used in English for the name of Claude Gelee (1600-82), the French landscape painter, born at Chamagne, in Lorraine.

Clauve Rolls. See Close Rolls.

Clavie. Burning of the Clavie on New Year’s Eve (old style) in the village of Burghhead, on the southern shore of the Moray Firth. The clavie is a sort of bonfire made of casks split up. One of the casks is split into two parts of different sizes, and an important item of the ceremony is to join these parts together with a huge nail made for the purpose. Hence the name, from clavus (Lat.), a nail. Chambers minutely describes the ceremony, suggests that it is a relic of Druid worship. The two unequal divisions of the cask probably symbolize the unequal parts of the old and new year.

Claw. The sharp, hooked nail of a bird or beast, or the foot of an animal armed with claws. To claw is to lay one’s hands upon things; to clutch, to tear or scratch as with claws; formerly it also meant to stroke, to tickle; hence to please, flatter, or praise. Thus Claw me I will claw thee, means, “praise me, and I will praise you,” or, “scratch my back, and I’ll scratch yours.”

Laugh when I am merry, and claw no man in his humour.—Shakespeare: Much Ado, i, 3.

Claw-backs. Flatterers. Bishop Jewel speaks of “the Pope’s claw-backs.”

Clay, Feet of. An unexpected flaw in the character of an admired person. The phrase arises from the image in Nebuchadnezzar’s dream, (Daniel ii, 31, 32) of which the head was of gold, the breast and arms of silver, the belly and thighs of brass, the legs of iron, and the feet of iron and clay.

Claymore. The two-edged sword anciently used by Scottish Highlanders; from Gaelic claidheimh (a sword), and mor (great).

I’ve told thee how the Southrons fell Beneath the broad claymore.

AYTOUN: Execution of Montrose.

Clean. Free from blame or fault.

Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me.—Psalm lii, 10.

Used adverbially, it means entirely, wholly; as, “you have grown clean out of knowledge,” i.e. wholly beyond recognition. Cautioun hadde cleane forgotten to crye and to wepe. PiERS PLOWMAN, xx.

The people . . . passed clean over Jordan.

Joshua iii, 17.

A clean tongue. Not abusive, not profane, not foul.

Cleanliness is next to godliness. An old saying, quoted by John Wesley (Sermon xci, On Dress), Matthew Henry, and others. The origin is said to be found in the writings of Phinehas ben Yair, an ancient Hebrew rabbi.

To clean down. To sweep down, to pull down.
Clear

"Guam" (a small island of the Ladrone group) as the hypothetical destination. Hence, the phrase meant to clear out for just anywhere.

To clear the air. To remove the clouds, mists, and impurities; figuratively, to remove the misunderstandings or ambiguities of a situation, argument, etc.

To clear the court. To remove all strangers, or persons not officially concerned in the suit.

To clear the decks. To prepare for action by removing everything not required; playfully used as of eating everything estable on the dinner-table, etc.

To clear the dishes. To empty them of their contents.

To clear the land. A nautical phrase meaning to have good sea room.

To clear the room. To remove from it everything or person not required.

To clear the table. To remove what has been placed on it.

To clear up. To become fine after rain or cloudiness; to make manifest; to elucidate or to have good sea room.

Clear (the adjective). Used adverbially, clear has much the same force as the adverb clean (q.v.).—wholly, entirely; as, "He is gone clear away," "Clear out of sight."

A clear day. An entire, complete day.

"The bonds must be left three clear days for examination," means that they must be left for three days not counting the first or the last.

A clear head. A mind that is capable of understanding things clearly.

A clear statement. A straightforward and intelligible statement.

A clear style (of writing). A lucid method of expressing one's thoughts.

A clear voice. A voice of pure intonation, neither husky, mouthy, nor throaty.

Clear grit. The right spirit, real pluck; also the genuine article, the real thing. Originally a piece of American slang.

In Canadian politics the name Clear-grits was given in the early 80s of last century to the Radicals.

Clearing house. The office or house where bankers do "clearing," that is, the exchanging of bills and cheques and the payment of balances, etc. Also, the house where the business of dividing among the different railway companies the proceeds of traffic passing over several lines for one covering payment was carried through. In London, the bankers' clearing house has been in Lombard Street since 1775. Each bank sends to it daily all the bills and cheques not drawn on its own firm; these are sorted and distributed to her respective houses, and the balance is settled by transfer tickets.

A "clearing banker" is a banker who has been entrée of the clearing house.

Cleave. Two quite distinct words, the one meaning to stick to, and the other to part from or to part asunder. A man "shall cleave to his wife" (Matt. xix, 5). As one that "cleaveth wood" (Ps. cxxi, 7). The former is the A.S. elfan, to stick to, and the latter is cleofan, to split.

Clement, St. Patron saint of tanners, being himself a tanner. His day is November 23rd, and his symbol is an anchor, because he is said to have been martyred by being thrown into the sea tied to an anchor.

Clench and Clinch. The latter is a variant of the former, which is the M.E. clenchen, from A.S. (be-)clencan, to hold fast. In many uses the two words are practically synonymous, meaning to grasp firmly, to fasten firmly together, to make firm; but clenched is used in such phrases as "he clenched his fists," "he clenched his nerves bravely to endure the pain," "to clench one's teeth"; while clinch is used in the more material senses, such as to turn the point of a nail in order to make it fast, and also in the phrase "to clinch an argument." In business, "to clinch a deal" is to ratify it, to make it certain.

That was a clincher. That argument was not to be gainsaid; that remark drove the matter home, and fixed it.

Cleopatra (klä ə pät' rə). (69-30 B.C.). She was Queen of Egypt, being joint ruler with and wife of her brother Ptolemy Dionysius. In 48 B.C. she was ousted from the throne but in 47 was reinstated by Julius Cæsar, who was captivated by her charms. In 41 Mark Antony fell under her spell and repudiated his wife Octavia for her sake. Fighting with Octavian, Mark Antony was defeated at Actium and committed suicide. Cleopatra also killed herself by means of the bite of an asp.

Cleopatra and her pearl. It is said that Cleopatra made a banquet for Antony, the costliness of which excited his astonishment; and, when Antony expressed his surprise, Cleopatra took a pearl ear-drop, which she dissolved in a strong acid, and drank to the health of the Roman triumvir, saying, "My draught to Antony shall far exceed it." There are two difficulties in this anecdote—the first is, that vinegar would not dissolve a pearl; and the next is, that any stronger acid would be wholly unfit to drink.

A similar story has been told of Sir Thomas Gresham. It is said that when Queen Elizabeth visited the Royal Exchange he pledged her health in a cup of wine in which a precious stone worth £15,000 had been crushed to atoms. Heywood refers to this in his play If you know not me you know nobody (1604):

Here fifteen thousand pounds at one clap goes
Instead of sugar; Gresham drinks the pearl
Unto his queen and mistress.

Cleopatra's Needle. The obelisk so called, now in London on the Thames Embankment, was brought there in 1878 from Alexandria, whither it and its fellow (now in Central Park, New York) had been moved from Heliope... by Augustus about 12 B.C. It has no connexion with Cleopatra, and it has carved on it hieroglyphics that tell of its erection by Thothmes III, a Pharaoh of the 18th dynasty who lived many centuries before her time.

Cleopatra's nose. It was Blaise Pascal (1623-62) who said, "If the nose of Cleopatra had been shorter, the whole face of the earth would have been changed" (Pensées viii, 29); the allusion, of course, being to the tremendous results brought about by her enslavement through her charm and beauty, first of Julius Cæsar and then of Mark Antony.

Clergy. Ultimately from Gr. kleros, a lot or inheritance, with reference to Deut. xviii, 2, and Acts i, 17; thus, the men of God's lot or inheritance. In St. Peter's first epistle (ch. v, 3) the Church is called "God's heritage" or lot. In the Old Testament the tribe of Levi is called the "lot or heritage of the Lord."

Benefit of Clergy. See Benefit.

Clerical Titles. Clerk. As in ancient times the clergyman was about the only person who could write and read, the word clerical, as used in "clerical error," came to signify an orthographical error. As the respondent in church was able to read, he received the name of clerk, and the assistants in writing, etc., are so termed in business. (Lat. clericus, a clergyman.)

Curate. One who has the cure of souls. As the cure of the parish used to be virtually entrusted to the clerical stipendiary, the word curate was appropriated to this assistant.

Parson. The same word as person. As Blackstone says, a parson is "persona ecclesia, one that hath full rights of the parochial church."

Though we write "person" differently, yet 'tis but "person": that is the individual person set apart for the service of such a church, and 'tis in Latin persona, and personatus is a personage. Indeed with the canon laws, personatus is any dignity or preferment in the church.—Selden: Table-talk.

Rector. One who has the parsonage and great tithes. The man who rules or guides the parish. (Lat., a ruler.)

Vicar. One who does the "duty" of a parish for the person who receives the tithes. (Lat. vicarius, a deputy.) Incumbents and Perpetual Curates are now termed Vicars.

The French clerk, said by one of the four letters in this word, was appropriated to this assistant. The same word as clerk, in writing, etc., are so termed in business. (Lat. clericus, a clergyman.)

Clio (kli' i o). The name given to a particular kind of humorous verse invented by E. Clerihew Bentley. It is usually satirical and often biographical, consisting of four Rhymed lines of uneven length. For inclusion in this Dictionary Mr. Bentley suggested the following:—

Clerihew

It was a weakness of Voltaire's
To forget to say his prayers,
And one which, to his shame,
He never overcame.

He also wrote:—

Sir Christopher Wren
Said, "I'm going to dine with some men.
If anyone calls,
Say I'm designing St. Paul's."

Clerkenwell (klark' en wél). At the holy well in this district the parish clerks of London used to assemble yearly to play some sacred piece.

Client. In ancient Rome a client was a plebian under the patronage of a patrician, who was therefore his patron. The client performed certain services, and the patron was obliged to protect his life and interests. The word in English means a person who employs the services of a legal adviser to protect his interests.

Climacteric (kli'mák'tér ik). It was once believed by astrologers that the 7th and 9th years, with their multiples, especially the odd multiples (21, 27, 35, 45, 49, 63, and 81), were critical points in life; these were called the Climacteric Years and were presided over by Saturn, the malevolent planet 63, which is produced by multiplying 7 and 9 together, was termed the Grand Climacteric, which few persons succeeded in out-living.

There are two years, the seventh and the ninth, that commonly bring great changes in a man's life, and great dangers; wherefore 63, that contains both these numbers multiplied together, comes not without heaps of dangers.—Levius Lenius.

Climax means a ladder (Gr.), and is the rhetorical figure in which the sense rises gradually in a series of images, each exceeding its predecessor in force or dignity. Popularly, but erroneously, the word is used to denote the last step in the gradation, the point of highest development.

Clinch, Clincher. See CLENCH.

Clinker-built, said of a ship whose planks overlap each other, and are riveted together. The opposite to clinker-built is carvel-built (q.v.).

Clio (kli' o) was one of the nine Muses, the inventress of historical and heroic poetry.

Addison adopted the name as a pseudonym, and many of his papers in the Spectator are signed by one of the four letters in this word, probably the initial letters where they were written—of Chelsea, London, Islington, Office. Cp. Notarikon.

Clipper. A fast sailing-ship; in Smyth's Sailor's Word Book (1867) said to be "formerly applied to the sharp-built raking schooners of America, and latterly to Australian passenger-ships."

The name is now applied almost exclusively to a transatlantic flying-boat.

She's a clipper. Said of a stylish or beautiful woman.

Clippie (klip' i). The name given familiarly to the women bus-conductors during and after World War II.

Cliquot (klé' kó). A nickname of Frederick William IV of Prussia (1795-1861), so called from his fondness for champagne.
Cloacina (klō′ə sī′ nā). Goddess of sewers. (Lat. cloaca, a sewer.)

Then Cloacina, goddess of the tide,
Whose sable streams beneath the city glide,
Indulged the modish flame: the town she roved,
A mortal scavenger she saw, she loved.
Gay: Trivia, ii.

Cloak and Sword Plays. Swashbuckling plays, full of fighting and adventure. The name comes from the Spanish comedies of the 16th-century dramatists, Lope de Vega and Calderon—the Commedia de capa y espada; but whereas with them it signified merely a drama of domestic intrigue and was named from the rank of the chief characters, in France—and, through French influence, in England—it was applied as above.

Knight of the Cloak. Sir Walter Raleigh.
So called from this throwing his cloak into a saddle for Queen Elizabeth to step on as she was about to enter her barges.

Clock. So church bells were once called. (Ger. Glocke; Fr. cloche; Medieval Lat. cloaca.)

Clock. The tale about St. Paul's clock striking thirteen is given in Walcott's Memorials of Westminster, and refers to John Hatfield, who died 1770, aged 102. He was a soldier in the reign of William III, and was accused before a court-martial of falling asleep on duty upon Windsor Terrace. In proof of his innocence he asserted that he heard St. Paul's clock strike thirteen, which statement was confirmed by several witnesses.

A strange incident is related concerning the striking of Big Ben. On the morning of Thursday, March 14th, 1861, "the inhabitants of Westminster were roused by repeated strokes of the new great bell, and most persons supposed it was for the death of a member of the royal family. It proved, however, to be due to some derangement of the clock, for at our five o'clock ten and twelve strokes were struck instead of the proper number."

It was within twenty-four hours of this that the Duchess of Kent (Queen Victoria's mother) was declared by her physicians to be dying, and early on the 16th she was dead.

Clotho. A rustic, a farmer's labourer, who hops or walks amongst the clods, infantry are called "clodhoppers" or "foot-loggers," because they have to walk.

Clod Almanac. A primitive almanac or calendar, originally made of a four-square block of wood; the sharp edges were divided by notches into three months each, every week being marked by a bigger notch. The faces contained the saints' days, the festivals, the phases of the moon, and so on, sometimes in Runic characters, whence the clock was also called "Runic staff." They were not uncommon, and specimens may be seen in the British Museum, the Bodleian, the Ashmolean, and other places at home and abroad.

Clogs are also wooden shoes.

"Clogs to clogs is only three generations"

An old Lancashire saying, implying that sooner a man may prosper and raise himself out of poverty, his grandson will be wearing clogs, and back where the family started from.

Cloister. He retired into a cloister, a monastery. Almost all monasteries have a cloister or covered walk, which generally occupies three sides of a quadrangle. Hence cloistered, confined, withdrawn from the world in the manner of a recluse:—

I cannot praise a fugitive, and cloistered virtue, unreclaimed and unbathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat.—Milton: Areopagitica.

Cloatie. Auld Clootie, Old Nick. The Scotch call a cloven hoof a cloot, so that Auld Clootie is Old Cloven-foot.

And maybe, Tam, for a' my cant.
My wicked rhymes an' drunken rant
I'll gie auld Clootie Cloatie's haunts.
An unco slip yet,
An' snugly sit, amang the saunts.
At Davie's hip ye!
Burns: Reply to a Trimming Epistle.

Close Rolls. Mandates, letters, and writs of a private nature, addressed, in the Sovereign's name, to individuals, and folded or closed and sealed on the outside with the Great Seal.

Close Rolls contain all such matters of record as were committed to close writs. These Rolls are preserved in the Tower.—JACOB: Law Dictionary.

Patent Rolls (q.v.) are left open, with the seal hanging from the bottom.

Close-time for Game. See Sporting Seasons.

Cloth. The. This word was formerly applied to the customary garb of any trade, and is akin in usage to the word livery. About the 17th century it became restricted to the clergy; the clerical office; thus we say "having respect for the cloth."

Cloth-yard. A measure for cloth, differing slightly from the yard of to-day.

Cloth-yard shaft. An arrow a cloth-yard in length.

Clotho. One of the Three Fates in classic mythology. She presided over birth, and drew from her distaff the thread of life; Atropos presided over death and cut the thread of life; and Lachesis spun the fate of life between birth and death. (Gr. klotho, to draw thread from a distaff.)

Cloud. A dark spot on the forehead of a horse between the eyes. A white spot is called a star, and an elongated star is a blaze. See Blaze.

Arrippa. He [Antony] has a cloud on his face.
Enobarbus. He were the worse for that were he a horse.
Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, iii, 2.

A clouded cane. A malacca cane clouded or mottled from age and use. These canes were very fashionable in the first quarter of last century and earlier.

Sir Plume of amber: snuff-box justly vain,
And the nice conduct of a clouded cane.
Pope: Rape of the Lock, iv, 123.

Every cloud has a silver lining. There is some redeeming brightness in the darkest prospect; "while there is life there is hope."

He is in the clouds. In dreamland; entertaining visionary notions and so having no distinct idea about the matter in question.

He is under a cloud. Under suspicion, in disrepute.
The Battle above the Clouds. A name given to the battle of Lookout Mountain, part of the Battle of Chattanooga fought during the American War of Secession on November 24th, 1863. The Federals under Grant defeated the Confederates, and part of the fight took place in a heavy mist on the mountains; hence the name.

To blow a cloud. See Blow.

Cloven Foot. To show the cloven foot, i.e. to show a knavish intention; a base motive. The allusion is to Satan, represented with the legs and feet of a goat, and, however he might disguise himself, he could never conceal his cloven feet. See Bag o' Nails; CLOOTIE.

Clover. He's in clover. In luck, in prosperous circumstances, in a good situation. The allusion is to cattle feeding in clover fields.

Clown. It is probable that the circus clown, in his baggy costume and whitened face with grotesque red lips and odd little tuft of black hair, is a relic of the devil as he appeared in the medieval miracle plays. He has come to us, with his drolleries and antics, through a succession of fools and jesters. Of the many famous clowns that have amused generations of children and grown-ups, two figures are outstanding—Joseph Grimaldi (1779-1837) and, in recent times the Swiss Grock (Charles Adrien Wettach). See HARLEQUIN.

Club. In England the club has played an important part in social life, especially during the 18th century. John Aubrey (1626-97) says "we now use the word clubbe for a sodality in a tavern." Clubs came into vogue in the reign of Queen Anne, as we see from the Tatler and Spectator. Some of them were political, such as the "October," the "Saturday," and the "Green Ribbon," at which adherents or opponents of the ministry of the day gathered. But the social clubs where culture and conversation had their parent in Dr. Johnson whose Ivy Lane Club (founded in 1749) and Literary Club (1763) gathered many of the leading men of the day and set a standard for the times. For many years clubs met in taverns and coffee-houses, and it was not until the Regency that they began to occupy their own premises. In the first quarter of the 19th century a great number came into existence, some such as Watiets, being solely gambling centres. The first ladies' club was the Alexandra (1883) to which no man—not even the Prince of Wales—was allowed admittance. Among the principal London clubs are the following, with their dates of foundation:

- Army and Navy, 1838.
- Athenueum, 1824.
- Bath, 1894.
- Beefsteak, 1876.
- Boodle's, 1763.
- Brooks's, 1764.
- Carlton, 1832.
- Cavalry, 1890.
- Conservative, 1840.
- Constitutional, 1883.
- Devonport, 1875.
- Garrick, 1831.
- Guards, 1813.
- Junior Army & Navy, 1911.
- Junior Carlton, 1864.
- Lansdowne, 1935.
- Lyceum, 1904.
- M.C.C., 1787.
- Marlborough, 1868.
- National Liberal, 1882.
- Reform, 1832.
- Royal Automobile, 1897.
- Savage, 1857.
- Savile, 1868.
- Thatched House, 1869.
- Travellers, 1819.
- Turf, 1868.
- United Services, 1815.
- White's, 1893.

In France clubs assumed great political importance at the time of the Revolution. They dated from about 1782. The Club des Cordeliers numbered Danton and Desmoulins among its members. The most famous was the Club des Jacobins. From these two the Mountain party emerged. They disappeared with the coming of the Directory in 1799.

Club-bearer, The. In Greek mythology, Periphetes, the robber of Argolis, is so called because he murdered his victims with an iron club.

Club-land. The West End of London round St. James's, where the principal clubs are situated; the members of such clubs.

Club-law. The law of might or compulsion through fear of chastisement; "might is right"; "do it or get a hiding."

Club Parliament. The Parliament held at Nottingham in 1426, during the quarrel between the Duke of Gloucester and Cardinal Beaufort, so called because the members, being forbidden to wear swords, came armed with cudgels, or "bats." Also called the Bats Parliament.

Clue. I have not yet got the clue; to give a clue, i.e. a hint. A clue is a ball of thread (A.S. cleowen). The only mode of finding the way out of the Cretan labyrinth was by a skin of thread, which, being followed, led the right way.

Clumsy. A Scandinavian word, meaning originally "numbed with cold," and so "awkward," "unhandy." Pier Plowman has "thou clomsest for cold," and Wyclif has "with clomsid hands" (Jer. xlvi, 3).

Cluricaune. An elf in Irish folklore. He is of evil disposition and usually appears as a wrinkled old man. He has knowledge of hidden treasure and is the fairies' shoemaker. Another name for him is Leprchaun or Lepracaun (q.v.).

Clydesdale Horses. See SHIRE HORSES.

Cluy of the Clough. A noted archer and outlaw, supposed to have lived shortly before Robin Hood, who with Aine and Bell William of Cloudesly, forms the subject of one of the ballads in Percy's Reliques, the three becoming as famous in the north of England as Robin Hood and Little John in the midland counties. Their place of resort was in England Forest, near Carlisle. Cluy of the Clough means Clement of the Cliff. He is mentioned in Ben Jonson's Alchemists (I, ii, 46).

Clytie. In classical mythology, an ocean nymph, in love with Apollo. Meeting with no return, she was changed into the heliotrope, or sunflower, which, traditionally, still turns to the sun, following him through his daily course.

Cnidian Venus, The. The exquisite statue of Venus by Praxiteles, formerly in her temple at Cnidus. It is known through the antique reproduction now in the Vatican.

Coach. When railways replaced the old forms of road travel in the 30s and 40s of the last century, they took over the old coaching Coal of Arms. Originally, a surcoat worn by knights over their armour, decorated with devices by which the wearer could be described and recognized; hence the heraldic device of a family. The practice of bearing on the armour or its covering some distinguishing mark is of very ancient date. It was introduced into England by the Crusaders who in the Holy Land were forced to cover their armour with cloth to ward off the fierce sun: at that time its rules and customs were codified, and "heraldry" was brought almost to a science.

Cob. A short-legged, stout variety of horse, rather larger than a pony, from thirteen to nearly fifteen hands high. The word means big, stout. It also meant a tuft or head (from cop), hence eminent, large, powerful. The "cob of the county" is the great boss thereof. A rich cob is a plutocrat. Hence also a male, as a cob-swan.

Cobalt. From the Ger. Kobold, a gnome, the demon of mines. This metal, from which a silver ore is found in the A.S. and a cobber makes a large, powerful, deep blue pigment is made, was so called by miners partly because it was thought to be useless and partly because the arsenic and sulphur with which it was found in combination had bad effects both on their health and on the silver ores. Its presence was consequently attributed to the ill offices of the mine demon.

Cobber (Austr.). A friend or companion; possibly from the old Suffolk to cob, to form a friendship.

Cobber Kain—Flying Officer E. J. Kain, D.F.C., was the first New Zealand air ace; he was killed on active service in June 1940.

Cobbler. A drink made of wine (sherry), sugar, lemon, and ice. It is sipped up through a straw. See Cobbler's PUNCH.

This wonderful invention, sir, ... is called cobbler—Sherry cobbler, when you name it long: cobbler when you name it short—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit, xiii.

A cobbler should stick to his last. Let no one presume to interfere in matters of which he is ignorant.

Ne supra crepidam sutor judicaret. Plays, xxvi, x, 85.

The tale goes that a cobbler detected a fault in the shoe-latchet of one of Apelles's paintings, and the artist rectified the fault. The cobbler next ventured to criticize the legs; but Apelles answered, .. Keep to your trade"—you understand about shoes, but not about anatomy.

Cobbler's toast. Schoolboys' bread and butter, toasted on the dry side and eaten hot.

Coburg. A corded or ribbed cotton cloth made in Coburg (Saxony), or an imitation thereof. Chiefly used for ladies' dresses.

Cobweb. The net spun by a spider to catch its prey. Cob, or cop, is an old word for a spider, so called from its round, stubby body; it is found in the A.S. atocoroppe, poisonous spider.

Cochineal (koch' i näl). A red dye used for colouring materials and also food. It is made from the insect of the same name, which acquires its colour from feeding on the cactus. Cochineal was brought to Europe by the Spaniards, soon after the conquest of Mexico, in 1518.

Cock (noun). In classical mythology the cock was dedicated to Apollo, the sun-god, because it gives notice of the rising of the sun. It was dedicated to Mercury, because it summons men to business by its crowing. And to Esculapius, because "early to bed and early to rise, makes a man healthy."

According to Mohammedan legend the Prophet found in the first heaven a cock of such enormous size that its crest touched the second heaven. The crowing of this celestial bird arouses every living creature from sleep except man. The Moslem doctors say that Allah lends a willing ear to him who reads the Koran, to him who prays for pardon, and to the cock whose chant is divine melody. When this cock ceases to crow, the day of judgment will be at hand.

Peter Le Neve affirms that a cock was the warlike ensign of the Goths, and therefore used in Gothic churches for ornament.

The weathercock is a very old symbol of vigilance. From its position at the top of a steeple or tower it can be seen far and wide. As the cock heralds the coming day, so does the weathercock tell the wise man what the weather will likely be.

A cock and bull story. A long, rambling, idle, or incredible yarn; a canard. There are various so-called explanations of the origin of the term, but the most likely is that it is connected with the old fables in which cocks, bulls, and other animals discoursed in human language on things in general. In Bentley's Boyle Lecture (1692) occurs the passage:—

That cocks and bulls might discourse, and hinds and panthers hold conferences about religion. The "hind and panther" allusion is an obvious reference to Dryden's poem (published five years before), and it is possible that the "cocks and bulls" would have had some meaning that was as well known to contemporaries but has been long since forgotten. See also the closing chapter of Sterne's Tristram Shandy; the last words in the book are:—

"L—d! said my mother, what is all this story about?—A cock and a bull, said Yurick—And one of the best of its kind, I ever heard."

The French equivalents are faire un coq à l'âne et un conte de ma mère l'oie (a mother goose tale), and it is worth noting that in Scotland a satire or lampoon and also a rambling, disconnected story used to be called a cockalane, direct from the Fr. coq à l'âne.

A cock of hay or haycock. A small heap of hay thrown up temporarily. (Ger. kocke, a heap of hay; Norw. kock, a heap.)

By cock and pie. We meet with cock's bones, cock's wounds, cock's mother, cock's body, cock's passion, etc., where we can have no doubt that the word is a minced oath, and stands for God. The pie is the table or rule in the old Catholic office, showing how to find out the service for each day (from Med. Lat. piae).

By cock and pie, sir, you shall not away to-night.—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV, v, I.
Cock and Pie (as a public-house sign) is probably "The Cock and Magpie."

Cock and Bottle. A public-house sign, probably meaning that draught and bottled ale may be had on the premises. If so, the word "cock" would mean the tap.

Cock of the North. George, fifth Duke of Gordon (1740-1836), who raised the Gordon Highlanders in 1795, is so called on a monument erected to his honour at Fochabers, in Morayshire.

The brambling, or mountain finch, is also known by this name.

Cock of the walk. The dominant bully or master spirit. The place where barndoor owls are fed is the walk, and if there is more than one cock, they will fight for the supremacy of this domain.

Every cock crows on its own dunghill, or lika cock crows on its ain midden. It is easy to brag of your deeds in your own castle when safe from danger and not likely to be put to the proof.

Nourish a cock, but offer it not in sacrifice. This is the eighteenth Symbolic Saying in the Protetries of Lamlash. The cock was sacred to Minerva, and also to the sun and moon, and it would be impious to offer a sacrilegious offering to the gods. What is therefore consecrated to God cannot be employed in sacrifice.

That cock won’t fight. See Cock-Fighting.

The red cock will crow in his house. His house will be set on fire.

"We’ll see if the red cock crow not in his bonnie barnyard ae morning." "What does she mean?" and Manning. . . . "Fire-raising," answered the . . . lomine.—Scott: Guy Manning, ch. iii.

To cry cock. To claim the victory; to assert oneself to be the superior. As a "cock of the walk" (q.v.) the chief or ruler of the whole walk, so to cry cock is to claim this cockship.

Cock-boat. A small ship’s boat; a very light or frail craft.

That bow no more we can the maine-land see.
Have care, I pray, to guide the cock-bote well.

This "cock-bote" had previously (III, vii, 27) been called a "little bote" and a "shalllop." Cocke or cocke, is an obsolete word for a small boat, and is probably connected with cog, an early kind of ship, from Scan. kog, cogre, a small vessel without a keel. Originally a wicker frame covered with leather or oil-cloth. The Welsh fishers used to carry them on their back. Cock is here the M.E. cog or cogge, and O.Fr. coque or cogue, a kind of boat. Cog was once used in English for a small boat, as by Chaucer:—

This messagere adoun him gan to bye,
And fond Jasson, and Erices also,
That in a cogge to londe were y-go,
Hem to refreschen and to take the ey.

Legend of Good Women, I, 1479.

Cock-crow. The Hebrews divided the night into four watches: (1) The "beginning of the watches" or "even" (Lam. ii, 19); (2) "The middle watch" or "midnight" (Judges vii, 9); (3) "The cock-crowing"; (4) "The morning watch" or "dawning" (Exod. xiv, 24).

Ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, in the morning.—Mark xiii, 35.

The Romans divided the day into sixteen parts, each one hour and a half, beginning at midnight. The third of these divisions (3 a.m.) they called gallicinium, the time when cocks begin to crow; the next was conticinium, when they ceased to crow; and fifth was diluculum, dawn.

If the Romans sounded the hour on a trumpet three times it would explain the diversity of the Gospels: "Before the cock crow" (John xiii, 38, Luke xxii, 34, and Matt. xxvi, 34); but "Before the cock crow twice" (Mark xiv, 30)—that is, before the trumpet has finished sounding.

Apparitions vanish at cock crow. This is a Christian superstition, the cock being the watch-bird placed on church spires, and therefore sacred.

The morning cock crow loud,
And at the sound it [the Ghost) shrank in haste away,
And vanished from our sight.

SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, i, 2.

Cock-eye. A squint. Cock-eyed, having a squint; cross-eyed. There seems to be no connexion between this and the Irish and Gaelic caog, a squint; it may mean that such an eye has to be cocked, as the trigger of a gun is cocked, before it can do its work effectively; or it may be from the verb to cock in the sense of "turning up"—as in to cock the nose.

Cock-eyed is also slang for nonsensical.

Cock-fighting was introduced into Britain by the Romans. It was a favourite sport both with the Greeks and with the Romans.

In the 12th century it was the sport of schoolboys on Shrove Tuesday. The cockpit at Whitehall was added by Henry VIII, and the "royal diversion," as it was called, was very popular with James I and Charles II. Cock-fighting was made illegal in Britain in 1849; it continued in New York until the 1870s.

That beats cock-fighting. That is most improbable and extraordinary. The allusion is to the extravagant tales told of fighting-cocks.

That cock won’t fight. That dodge won’t answer; that tale won’t wash. The allusion is to a bet being made on a favourite cock, which, when pitted, refuses to fight.

To live like fighting-cocks. To live in luxury. Fighting-cocks used to be high fed in order to aggravate their pugnacity and increase their powers of endurance.

Cock-horse. To ride a cock-horse. A cock-horse is really a hobby-horse, but the phrase means to sit astride a person’s foot or knee while he jogs it up and down.

Cock Lane Ghost. A tale of terror without truth; an imaginary tale of horrors. In Cock Lane, Smithfield (1762), certain knockings were heard, which Mr. Parsons, the owner, declared proceeded from the ghost of Fanny Kent, who died suddenly, and Parsons wished people to suppose that she had been murdered by her husband. All London was agog with this story. Royalty and the nobility made up parties to go to Cock Lane to hear the ghost: Dr. Johnson and other men of learning and repute investigated the alleged phenomena; but in the end it was found that the knockings were produced by Parsons’s daughter (a girl twelve years of age) rapping on a board which she took into her bed. Parsons was condemned to stand in the pillory. Cp. STOCKWELL GHOST.

Cock Lorell’s Bote. A pamphlet published by Wynkyn de Worde about 1510, satirizing contemporary lower-middle-class life and introducing all sorts of rogues and vagabonds in the guise of a crew which takes ship and sails through England.

Cock-pit. The arena in which game-cocks were set to fight; also the name of a 17th-century theatre built about 1618 on the site of a cock-pit in Drury Lane; and of that of the after part of the orlop deck of an old man-of-war, formerly used as quarters for the junior officers and as a sick-bay in time of war.

Captain Hardy, some fifty minutes after he had left the cock-pit, returned; and, again taking the hand of his dying friend and commander, congratulated him on having gained a complete victory.—SOUTHEY: Life of Nelson, ch. ix.

In aeroplanes the space where the pilot sits is called the cockpit.

The judicial committee of the Privy Council was also so called, because the council-room is built on the old cock-pit of Whitehall palace.

Great consultations at the cockpit about battles, duels, victories, and what not.—Poor Robin’s Almanack, 1730.

Cock-pit of Europe. Belgium is so called because it has been the site of more European battles than any other country; among them, Oudenaarde (1708); Ramillies (1706); Fontenoy (1745); Fleurus (1794); Jemmapes (1792); Ligny, Quatre Bras and Waterloo (1815); Mons, Ypres and the continuous battles of the World War I; the invasion of the country by the Germans, 1940-45.

Cockshut, or Cockshut time. Twilight; the time when the cockshut, i.e. a large net employed to catch woodcocks, used to be spread. The net was so called from being used in a glade through which the woodcocks might shoot or dart.

Let me never draw a sword again,
Nor prosper in the twilight cockshut light
When I would fleece the wealthy passenger...
If I, the next time that I meet the slave,
Cut not the nose from off the coward’s face.

edem of Feversham, iii, 2 (1952).

See also Shakespeare’s Richard III, v. 3.

Cocky. A free flogging or “chey” at something. The allusion is to the once popular Shrove-Tuesday sport of shying or casting stones or sticks at cocks.

The phrase became popular in military circles during the World War II to imply an ill-considered, ill-prepared attempt at something.

Cock sure. As sure as a cock: meaning either “with all the assurance (brazen-faced impudence) of a game-cock,” or “as sure as the cock is to crow in the morning,” or even “with the security and certainty of the action of a cock, or tap, in preventing the waste of liquor.”

Shakespeare employs the phrase in the sense of “sure as the cock of a firelock.”

We steal as in a castle, cock-sure.—Henry IV, ii. 1. And the phrase “Sure as a gun” seems to favour the latter explanation.

Cock (verb). In the following phrases, all of which connote assertiveness, obtrusiveness, or aggressiveness in some degree, the allusion is to game-cocks, whose strutting about, swaggering, and ostentatious pugnacity is proverbial.

To cock the ears. To prick up the ears, or turn them as a horse does when he listens to a strange sound.

To cock the nose or cock up the nose. To turn up the nose in contempt. See Cock YOUR EYE.

To cock up your head, foot, etc. Lift up, turn up your head or foot.

To cock your eye. To shut one eye and look with the other in a somewhat impertinent manner; to glance at questioningly. Cp. Cock-EYE.

To cock your hat. To set your hat more on one side of the head than on the other; to look knowing and pert.

To cock a snook. To make a long nose; to put the thumb to the nose and spread wide the fingers. This is a very ancient gesture of disrespect, contempt, or defiance.

Cock-a-hoop. Variously explained as being referable (a) to an old custom of taking the cock (i.e. the spigot) out of the barrel and setting it on the hoop thereof before commencing a regular drinking bout, and (b) to the Fr. chapeau, a tattooed crest, hence a specially feathered, and so specially lovely or valuable, game-cock.

And having routed a whole troop With victory was cock-a-hoop.

BUTLER: Hudibras, i. 3.

To sit cock-a-hoop. Boastful, defiant, like a game-cock with his houpe or crest erect; eagerly expectant.

Cocked hat. A hat with the brim turned, like that of a bishop, dean, etc. It is also applied to the chapeau bras (q.v.) and the military full-dress hat, pointed before and behind, and rising to a point at the crown, the chapeau à cornes. “Cock” in this phrase means to turn; cocked, turned up.

Knocked into a cocked hat. In the game of ninepins, three pins were set up in the form of a triangle, and when all the pins except these three were knocked down, the set was technically said to be “knocked into a cocked hat.” In modern colloquial usage, to knock someone into a cocked hat is to beat him in a contest of skill, etc.

Cockade. A badge worn on the head-dress of menservants of Royalty and of those holding His Majesty’s commission, such as Cockade 221  Cockney

na\nal and military officers, diplomatists, lord-lieutenants, high sheriffs, etc. The English cockade is black and circular in shape with a projecting fan at the top, except for naval officers, for whom the shape is oval without the fan. This form of cockade was introduced from Hanover by George I; under Charles II the cockade had been scarlet, but Charles II changed it to white, and thus the white cockade became the badge of the Pretenders, William III adopting an orange cockade (as Prince of Orange). From Fr. coardre, a plume, cocarde, or bunch of ribbons, originally worn by French soldiers serving in the French army, and used to fix the flaps of the hat in a cox ked position.

To mount the cockade. To become a soldier.

Cockaigne. Land of (kok 'a n'). An imaginary land of idleness and luxury, famous in medieval story, and the subject of more than one poem, one of which, an early translation of a 13th-century French work, is given in Ellis's Specimens of Early English Poets. In this "the houses were made of barley sugar and cakes, the streets were paved with pastry, and the shops were provided with nothing.
London has been so called (see Cockney), but Boileau applies the name to Paris.
Allied to the Ger. kuchen, a cake. Scotland
s called the "land of cakes."

Cockatoo. Old Australian slang for a convict serving his sentence on Cockatoo Island, Sydney, which began to be used for that purpose in 1839. Also used of small farmers in Australia who were described as "just picking up the grains of a livelihood like cockatoos do maize."

Cockatrice. A fabulous and heraldic monster with the wings of a fowl, tail of a dragon, and head of a cock. So called because it was said to be produced from a cock's egg hatched by a serpent. According to legend, the very look of this monster would cause instant death.
In consequence of the cockatrice,
the priest, the shells were considered amulets written by George

Cockle. According to Cockle. All right, according to Cockle. According to established rules, according to what is correct. Edward Cocker (1631-75) published an arithmetical work which ran through sixty editions. The phrase,
"According to Cockle," was popularized by Murphy in his farce, The Apprentice (1756).

Cockle. A bivalve mollusc, the shell of which was worn by pilgrims in their hats (see Cockle Hat). The polished side of the shell was scratched with some crude drawing of the lion, the unicorn, or some other subject connected with the pilgrimage. Being blessed by the priest, the shells were considered amulets against spiritual foes, and might be used as drinking vessels.

Cockle-boat. See Cock-boat.

Cockle hat. A pilgrim's hat, especially the hat of a pilgrim to the shrine of St. James of Compostella, in Spain; his symbol was really a scallop-shell, but the word cockle was more usually applied to it.
And how shall I your true love know
From many another one?
Oh, by his cockle hat and staff.
Old Ballad: The Friar of Orders Grey.

Hot cockles. See Hot.

The Order of the Cockle. An order of knighthood created by St. Louis in 1269, in memory of a disastrous expedition made by sea for the succour of Christians. Perrot says it scarcely survived its foundation.

To cry cockles. To be hanged; from the gurgling noise made in strangulation.

To warm the cockles of one's heart. Said of anything that pleases one immensely and gives one a gratifying sensation, such as does a glass of really good port. (Lat. coelae cordis, the ventricles of the heart.)

Cockney. This is the M.E. cokeney, meaning "a cock's egg" (−ey = A.S. eg, an egg), i.e.
a small egg with no yolk that is occasionally laid by hens; hence applied originally to a foolish, spott, cockered child:
I made thee a wanton and thou hast made me a fool,
I brought thee up like a cockney and thou hast handled me like a cock's-comb, I made more of thee than became a father and thou less of me than beseemed a child.

L y: Euphues (1578).

• From this the word came to signify a foolish or effeminate person; hence, by the country-dwellers—the majority of the population—it was applied to townsmen generally, and finally became restricted to its present meaning, one born within sound of Bow Bells, London;
one possessing London peculiarities of speech, etc.; one who, hence, is—or is supposed to be —wholly ignorant of country sports, country life, farm animals, plants, and so on.

As Frenchmen love to be bold, Flemings to be drunk, Welchmen to be called Britons, and Irishmen to be costermongers; so cockneys, especially she cockneys, love not aquatic wine when'tis good for them.

—Dekker and Webster: Westward Hoe, ii, 2 (1607).

Shakespeare uses the word for a squeamish woman:—
Cry to it, nuncle, as the cockney did to the eels, when she put them into the paste alive.—King Lear, i, 4.

The Cockney School. A nickname given by Lockhart (see quotation below) to a group of writers including Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Shelley, and Keats. It was a term of opprobrium, on account of the kind of rhymes they used in their verse, which smacked too much of everyday life instead of the classic purity preferred by the critics.

If I may be permitted to have the honour of christening it, it may be henceforth referred to by the designation of the "Cockney School."—Lockhart:

The king of cockneys. A master of the revels chosen by students of Lincoln's Inn on Childermas Day (December 28th).
Cocktail. An aperitif, or short drink taken before a meal, concocted of spirits (usually gin, bitters, flavouring, etc. There are many varieties of cocktail, most of them of U.S.A. origin. Champagne cocktail is champagne flavoured with Angostura bitters and brandy; soda cocktail is soda-water, sugar, and bitters. Did ye ever try a brandy cocktail, Cornel—THACKERAY: The Newcomes, xiii.

Cocky. Bumptious, overbearing, conceited; like a little bantam cock.

Coconut. Milk in the coconut. See Milk.

Cocqecigrues. At the coming of the Coqecigrues. More correctly Coquecigrues (kok'se groo). These are fabulous animals of French legend, and they have now become labels for an idle Cod. You can't cod me. You can't deceive me, or take a rise out of me.

Codger. A familiar and somewhat disrespectful term applied to an elderly man, generally one with some minor eccentricities. Originally a mean, stingy old chap: probably a variant of cadger (q.v.).

Codille (ko'cil'). Triumph. A term in the game of ombre. When one of the two opponents of ombre has more tricks than ombre, he is said to have won codille, and takes all the stake that ombre played for. Thus Belinda is said, in the Rape of the Lock, to have been "between the jaws of ruin and Codille." She wins with the "king of hearts," and she wins codille.

Coehorn (ko'horn'). Small howitzer of about 41 inches calibre: so called from Baron van Coehorn, of Holland. These guns were in use in the early 18th century.

Cenobites or Cenobites (sen'ô bit). Monks who live in common, in contradistinction to hermits or anchorites. (Gr. koinos bios.)

Ceur de Lion (kór de lô on). Richard I of England; called the lion-hearted from the prodigies of personal valour performed by him in the Holy Land. (1157, 1189-99.)

The traditional stage pronunciation of this is kôr de lô' on.

Coffee. The Turkish word is qahwah, which is pronounced kahveh and is applied to the infusion only, not to the plant or its berries. Coffee was introduced into England in 1641; the first coffee-house in this country was opened at Oxford in 1650, and the first in London dates from the following year.

It was an old custom in the Ardennes to take ten cups of coffee after dinner, and each cup had its special name. (1) Cafè, (2) Gloria, (3) Pousse Cafè, (4) Goutte, (5) Regoutte, (6) Surgoutte, (7) Rincette, (8) Re-rincette, (9) Sur-rincette, and (10) Coup de l'etier.

Gloria is coffee with a small glass of brandy in lieu of milk: those following it have an ever-increasing quantity of alcohol; and the last is the "stirrup cup."

Pousse cafè is now a common term for a liqueur after coffee.

Coffin. A raised crust, like the lid of a basket. Hence Shakespeare speaks of a "custard coffin" (Taming of the Shrew, iv, 3). (Gr. kophines, a basket.)

Of the paste a coffin will I rear. SHAKESPEARE: Titus Andronicus, v. 2.

To drive a nail into one's coffin. To do anything that would tend to cut short one's life; to put a spoke in one's wheel.

Care to our coffin adds a nail, no doubt; But every grin so merry draws one out.

PETER PINDAR: Expostulatory Odes, xv.

Cog. A boat. See COCK-BOAT.

Coggeshall (kog'shal). A Coggeshall job. The saying is, that the Coggeshall (Essex) folk wanted to divert the current of a stream, and fixed hurdles in the bed of it for the purpose. Another tale is that a mad dog bit a wheelbarrow, and the people, fearing it would go mad, chained it up in a shed. Cp. GOTHAM.

Cogito, ergo sum. The axiom formulated by Descartes (1596-1650) as the starting-place of his system of philosophy: it means "I think, therefore I am." Descartes, at the beginning, provisionally doubted everything, but he could not doubt the existence of the ego, for the mere fact that I doubt presupposes the existence of the I; in other words, the doubt could not exist without the I to doubt.

He [Descartes] stopped at the famous formula, "I think, therefore I am." Yet a little consideration will show this formula to be full of snares and verbal entanglements. In the first place, the "therefore" has no business there. The "I am" is assumed in the "I think," which is simply another way of saying "I am thinking." And, in the second place, "I think" is not one simple proposition, but three distinct assertions rolled into one. The first of these is "something called I exists"; the second is "something called thought exists"; and the third is, "the thought is the result of the action of the I."

Now, it will be obvious to you, that the only one of these three propositions which can stand the Cartesian test of certainty is the second.—HUXLEY: Descartes' Discourse on Method.

Cohort (ko'hört). The sixth part of a legion in the Roman army, numbering 420 infantry and 300 cavalry; the word is used, however, to describe any large armed force.

The Assyrian came down like a wolf on the fold. Byron: Destruction of Sennacherib.

Coif. Originally, a close-fitting mail cap worn under his helmet by a knight; afterwards, the special head-dress of serjeants-at-law—hence sometimes called SERJEANTS OF THE COIF. It seems to have been a white hood, and its final representative was the white border to the wigs worn by serjeants, the patch of black silk in the centre of the crown representing the cornered cap that was worn above it.
It was also, in the 13th century, a cap worn to hide the tonsure, by any renegade priest who chose to remain illegally as an advocate in the secular courts.

Coin. Paid in his own coin. Tit for tat.

To coin money. To make money with rapidity and ease.

See Angel, Bawbee, Carolus. Cross and Pure Crown, Dollar, Farthing, Florin, Groat, Guinea, Mancus, Penny, Pieces of Eight, Shilling, Sovereign, etc.

Coke. Coke upon Littleton. Eighteenth-century slang for a mixture of tent and brandy. Tent was a deep-red Spanish wine. Coke upon Littleton is the lawyers’ name for the reprint and translation of Littleton’s Tenures (about 1465), published in 1628 with a commentary by Sir Edward Coke (1552-1634).

Go and eat coke. A vulgar exclamation of contempt or impatience.

To cry coke. To cry peccavi; to ask for mercy.

Colbronde or Colbrand. The Danish giant slain by Guy of Warwick. By his death the last Dannebrog was delivered from Danish tribute.

I am not Samson, nor Sir Guy, nor Colbrand. To mow ‘em down before me.

Shakespeare: Henry VIII, v, 4.

Colecannon (kōl kān’ōn). Potatoes and cabbage pounded together and then fried in butter (Irish). “Col” is cole or cale, i.e., cabbage.

About 1774 Isaac Sparks, the Irish comedian, founded in Long Acre a Colecannon Club.—The Athenaeum, January 20th, 1875.

Cold. Dose in cold blood. (Fr. sang froid.) Not in the heat of temper; deliberately, and with premeditation. The allusion is to the ancient notion that the blood grew hot and cold, and this difference of temperature ruled the temper.

Cold-blooded animals. As a rule, all invertebrate animals, and all fishes and reptiles, are cold-blooded, the temperature of their blood being about equal to the medium in which they live.

Cold chisel. A steel chisel made in one piece and so tempered that it will cut cold metal when struck with a hammer.

Cold-drawn oil. Oil that is extracted or expressed without the use of heat.

To have cold feet is to be timorous or cowardly. An expression originating in the U.S.A. in the 1890s.

To show or give one the cold shoulder is to assume a distant manner towards a person, to indicate that you wish to cut him.

The persuasion of cold steel is persuasion enforced at the point of the sword or bayonet.

Cold-water ordeal. An ancient method of testing guilt or innocence. The accused, being tied under the arms, was thrown into a river. If he sank to the bottom he was held to be guiltless, and drawn up by the cord; but if he floated the water rejected him, because of his guilt.

Cold without. An elliptical expression, meaning spirits mixed with cold water without sugar.

Cold-Bath Fields. A district of Clerkenwell, London, so called from the baths established there, in 1697, for the cure of rheumatism, convulsions, and other nervous disorders.

The Fields were famous for the prison which was established there in the time of James I and not finally closed till 1886.

As he went through Cold-Bath Fields he saw a solitary cell;
And the Devil was pleased, for it gave him a hint For improving his prisons in Hell.

Colleridge: The Devil’s Thoughts.

Coldbrand. See Colbronde.

Coldstream Guards. The second of the five regiments of Foot Guards. It was raised by General Monk in 1659-60 and in January, 1660, marched under him from Coldstream in Berwickshire with the object of bringing back Charles II to the throne. In 1661 the regiment was constituted as the 2nd Regiment of Foot-guards. The name Coldstream has no plural.

Cole. An old canting term for money. Cp. Coaling.

My lusty rustic, learn and be instructed. Cole is, in the language of the witty, money; the ready, the rhino.

—Shadwell: Squire of Alsatia, IV, xvi (1688).

To post or tip the cole. To pay or put down the cash.

If he don’t tip the cole without more ado, give him a taste of the pump, that’s all.—Harrison Ainsworth: Jack Sheppard.

Cole, King. A legendary British king, described in the nursery rhyme as “a merry old soul” fond of his pipe, fond of his glass, and fond of his “fiddlers three.” Robert of Gloucester says he was father of St. Helena (and consequently grandfather of the Emperor Constantine); and Colchester has been said to have been named after him, though it is more probable that the town is named from Lat. colonia.

Colettes. See Franciscans.

Colin Clout. A name which Spenser assumes in The Shepherd’s Calendar, and in the pastoral entitled Colin Clout’s Come Home Again, which represents his return from a visit to Sir Walter Raleigh, “the Shepherd of the Ocean.” Skelton had previously (about 1520) used the name as the title of a satire directed against the abuses of the Church; he says:—

And if ye stand in doute
Who brought this ryme aboute,
My name is Colyn Cloute.

Colin Tampon. The old nickname of a Swiss, as John Bull is of an Englishman, Brother Jonathan of a North American, and Monsieur Crapaud of a Frenchman.

Coliseum. See Colosseum.

Collar. Against the collar. Somewhat fatiguing. When a horse travels uphill the collar distresses his neck, so forest travellers often find the last mile or so “against the collar,” or distressing.

In collar. In harness. The allusion is to a horse’s collar, which is put on when about to go to work.
Collar

Out of collar. Out of work, out of a place.

To collar. To seize (a person) by the collar; to steal; to appropriate without leave; to acquire (of possessions).

To collar the bowling. In cricket, to hit the bowlers all over the field so that they become more easy to score off through losing their length.

To collar the cole. To steal the money. See COLE.

To slip the collar. To escape from restraint; to draw back from a task begun.

To work up to the collar. To work tooth and nail; not to shirk the work in hand. A horse that lets his collar lie loose on his neck without bearing on it does not draw the vehicle at all, but leaves another to do the real work.

Collar-day. A day on which the knights of the different orders when present at levees or other Court functions wear all their insignia and decorations, including the collar. There are about thirty-five collar-days in the year.

Collar of SS. A decoration restricted to the Lord Chief Justice, the Lord Mayor of London, the Kings-of-Arms, the Heralds, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Sergeant Trumpeter. It is composed of a series of golden S's joined together, and was originally the badge of the adherents of the House of Lancaster.

Collectivism. The opposite of Individualism. A system in which the government would be the sole employer, the sole landlord, and the sole paymaster. Private property would be abolished, the land, mines, railways, etc., would be nationalized; everyone would be obliged to work for his living, and the State obliged to find the work.

College. The Lat. collegium, meaning collegership or partnership, hence a body of collegues, a fraternity. In English the word has a very wide range, as, College of the Apostles, College of Physicians, College of Surgeons, Heralds' College, College of Justice, etc.; and on the Continent we have College of Foreign Affairs, College of War, College of Cardinals, etc.

In old slang a prison was known as a college, and the prisoners as collegues. Newgate was "New College," and to take one's final at New College was to be hanged. The King's Bench Prison was "King's College," and so on.

College port. The vintage port laid down in university college cellars for the special use of the senior Common Room. The excellence of this is often a source of college pride.

Coliberts. A sort of gipsy race, similar to the Cagots of Gascony and the Cagoux of Brittany, who lived on boats on the rivers, chiefly in Poitou, now nearly extinct. In feudal times a collibert was a serf partly free, but bound to certain services. (Lat. colibertus, a fellow freedman.)

Collins (kol'inz). A word sometimes applied to the "bread-and-butter letter" one writes after staying at another person's house. In Pride and Prejudice Mr. Collins appears as a bore and snob of the first water; after a protracted and unwanted visit at the Bennetts' his parting words are: "Depend upon it, you will speedily receive from me a letter of thanks for this as well as for every other mark of your regard during my stay in Hertfordshire."

Tom Collins. See Tom.

Colly, my Cow. Colly is an old term of endearment for a cow, and properly refers only to a polled cow, one deprived of its horns. It is from Scan. kolla, a beast without horns (Icel. kollr, a shaven crown).

Collywobbles. The gripes, or stomach-ache, usually accompanied with sundry rumblings in the stomach.

Cologne (ko lön). The three kings of Cologne. The three Wise Men of the East, the Magi (q.v.), Caspar, Melchior, and Balthazar, whose bones, according to mediaeval legend, were deposited in Cologne Cathedral.

Eau de Cologne. See EAU DE COLOGNE.

Colombier. A standard size of drawing and plate papers measuring 23½ by 34¼ inches. The name is derived from an ancient water-mark of a dove (Fr. colombe), the emblem of the Holy Ghost.

Colonel. Regiments in the British Army have two Colonels: (i) Honorary Colonel, a courtesy title accepted by a member of the Royal Family, elder statesman or member of the peerage associated with the territory from which the regiment is raised; (ii) Colonel, a senior officer, usually of General rank, who has served in the Regiment, and who becomes its titular head and its spokesman vis-a-vis the War Office. The commanding officer of a battalion is a lieutenant-colonel.

Colonnade, The. See CYNIC TUR.

Colophon. The statement containing information about the date, place, printer, and edition which, in the early days of printing, was given at the end of the book but which now appears on the title page. From Gr. kolophon, the top or summit, a word which, according to Strabo, is from Colophon, a city of Ionia, the inhabitants of which were such excellent horsemen that they would turn the scale of battle to the side on which they fought; hence To add a colophon means "to supply the finishing stroke."

The volume was uninjured . . . from title-page to colophon.—SCOTT: The Antiquary.

The term is now loosely applied to a printer's or publisher's house device, such as the Belle Sauvage appearing on the title-page of this volume.

Coloquintida, St. (kol o kwim' ti dá). Charles I was so called by the Levellers (q.v.), to whom he was as bitter as gall, or coloquintida (colocynth), the bitter-apple.

Colorado (U.S.A.). The river (and hence the State) was so named by the Spanish explorers from its coloured (i.e. reddish) appearance.
Colorado beetle. This beetle, which is the terror of the potato-grower, for it will devastate whole fields, was first observed in the Rocky Mountain regions in 1859. It has since spread over large areas of America and has made its way to Europe, despite the most stringent precautions taken by the governments of the countries threatened.

Colosseum (ko lō sē’üm). The great Flavian amphitheatre of ancient Rome, said to be so named from the colossal statue of Nero that stood close by in the Via Sacra. It was begun by Vespasian in A.D. 72, and for 400 years was the scene of the gladiatorial contests.

The ruins remaining are still colossal and extensive, but quite two-thirds of the original building have been taken away at different times and used for building material.

Byron, adapting the exclamation of the 8th-century pilgrims (and adopting a bad spelling), says:—

While stands the Coliseum, Rome shall stand:
When falls the Coliseum, Rome shall fall;
And when Rome falls—the world.

Childe Harold, IV, cxxv.

The name has since been applied to other amphitheatres and places of amusement. Cp. PALLADIUM.

Colossus or Colossus (ko los’us) (Lat. and Gr. or a gigantic statue). The Colossus of Rhodes, completed probably about 280 B.C., was a representation of the sun-god, Helios, and commemorated the successful defence of Rhodes against Demetrius Poliorcetes in 304 B.C. It was one of the Seven Wonders of the World; it stood 105 ft. high, and is said to have been made by the Rhodian sculptor Chares, pupil of Lysippus from the warlike engines abandoned by Demetrius. The story that it was built striding across the harbour and that hips could pass full sail, between its legs, rose to neither Strabo nor Pliny makes mention of it; though both describe the statue minutely.

So, near proud Rhodes, across the raging flood,
Stupendous form! the vast Colossus stood,
While at one foot the thronging galleys ride,
A whole hour’s sail scarce reached the further side;
Beware his brazen thighs, in loose array,
Ten thousand streamers on the billows play,
On the Prospect of Peace.
He doth bestride the narrow world
Like a Colossus.

Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, i, 2.

Colour. Phrases.

A man of colour. An old-fashioned term for a Negro, or, more strictly speaking, one with Negro blood.

His coward lips did from their colour fly. Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, i, 2). He was nable to speak. As cowards run away from their regimental colour, so Caesar’s lips, when he was ill, ran away from their colour and turned pale.

I should like to see the colour of your money. Should like to have some proof that you have any; I should like to receive payment.

Off colour. Not up to the mark; run down; ruddy; tainted.

To change colour. To blush; especially to look awkward and perplexed when found out in some deceit or meanness.

To colour up. To turn red in the face; to blush.

To come off with flying colours. To be completely triumphant, to win “hands down.” The allusion is to a victorious fleet sailing into port with all the flags flying at the mastheads.

To come out in one’s true colours. To reveal one’s proper character, divested of all that is meretricious.

To describe (a matter) in very black colours. To see it with a jaundiced eye, and describe it accordingly; to describe it under the bias of strong prejudice.

To desert one’s colours. To become a turncoat; to turn tail. The allusion is to the military flag.

To get one’s colours. To be rewarded for athletic achievement by the privilege of wearing some special garment, (as cap and blazer in cricket) decorated with or composed of one’s school or college colours. See CAPPED, FLANNELS.

To give colour or some plausible colour to the matter. To render it more plausible; to give it a more specious appearance.

To paint in bright or lively colours. To see or describe things in couleur de rose.

To put a false colour on a matter. To misinterpret it, or put a false construction on it.

To sail under false colours. To act hypocritically; to try to attain your object by appearing to be other than you are. The term is a nautical one, and refers to the practice of pirates approaching their unsuspecting prey with false colours at the mast.

To see things in their true colours. To see them as they really are.

Under colour of. Under pretence of; under the alleged authority of.

Wearing his colours. Taking his part; being strongly attached to him. The idea is from livery.

With colours nailed to the mast. Holding out to the bitter end. If the colours are nailed to the mast they cannot be lowered in sign of defeat or submission.

With the colours. Said of a soldier who is on the active strength of a regiment, as opposed to one in the reserve.

Colours. Technical Terms.

Accidental colours. Those colours seen on a white ground after looking for some time at a bright object, such as the sun. The accidental colour of red is bluish green, of orange dark blue, of violet yellow, and the converse.

Complementary colours. Colours which, in combination, produce white light. The colour transmitted is always complementary to the one reflected.
Colour

Fast colours. Colours which do not wash out in water.

Fundamental colours. The seven colours of the spectrum: violet, indigo, blue, green, yellow, orange, and red.

Primary, or simple colours. Colours which cannot be produced by mixing other colours. Those generally accepted as primary are red, yellow, and blue, but violet is sometimes substituted for the last named.

Secondary colours. Those which result from the mixture of two or more primary colours, such as orange, green, and purple.

National colours. See Flags.

Regimental colours. The flags peculiar to Regiments, once carried in battle, on which they are entitled to embroider their battle-honours—the names of actions in which they distinguished themselves, and associated with the unit by permission of the King. These flags are now laid up on the outbreak of war in the Cathedral or great church of the territory from which the Regiment is raised. The Royal Regiment of Artillery has no colours, regarding its guns with special veneration instead (to allow one's guns to be captured by the enemy being the same disgrace as having one's colours captured). The Regimental colours of Napoleon's Army were the famous eagle standards, copied from the eagles of the Roman legions; the capture of a Napoleonic eagle was such an unusual feat that Regiments which did so (such as the Scots Greys) usually incorporated the eagle into their Regimental device.

Colours. In Symbolism, Ecclesiastical Use, etc.

Black:

In _blazonry_ (as in dress), signifying prudence, wisdom, and constancy; it is engraved by perpendicular and horizontal lines crossing each other at right angles.

In art, signifying evil, falsehood, and error.

In Church decoration it is used for Good Friday.

As a mortuary colour, signifying grief, despair, death.

(In the Catholic Church violet may be substituted for black.)

In metals it is represented by lead.

In precious stones it is represented by the diamond.

In planets it stands for Saturn.

Blue:

Hope, love of divine works; (in dresses) divine contemplation, piety, sincerity.

In _blazonry_, azure, signifying chastity, loyalty, fidelity; it is engraved by horizontal lines.

In art (as an angel's robe) it signifies fidelity and faith; (as the robe of the Virgin Mary), modesty and (in the Catholic Church) humility and expulsion.

In Church decoration, blue and green are used differently for ordinary Sundays, and blue for all weekdays after Trinity Sunday.

As a mortuary colour it signifies eternity (applied to death), immortality (applied to man).

In metals it is represented by tin.

In precious stones it is represented by sapphire.

In planets it stands for Jupiter.

Pale Blue:

Peace, Christian prudence, love of good works, a serene conscience.

Green:

Faith, gladness, immortality, the resurrection of the just; (in dresses) the gladness of the faithful.

In _blazonry_, vert, signifying love, joy, abundance; it is engraved from left to right.

In art, signifying hope, joy, youth, spring (among the Greeks and Moors it signifies victory).

In Church decoration it signifies God's bounty, mirth, gladness, the resurrection, and is used indifferently with blue for ordinary Sundays.

In metals it is represented by copper.

In precious stones it is represented by the emerald.

In planets it stands for Venus.

Pale Green:

Baptism.

Purple:

Justice, royalty.

In _blazonry_, purpure, signifying temperance; it is engraved by lines slanting from right to left.

In art, signifying royalty.

In metals it is represented by quicksilver.

In precious stones it is represented by amethyst.

In planets it stands for Mercury.

Colour _sergeant_.

Originally the senior non-commissioned officer of a military unit, who had charge of the regimental colours in the field. It is now a rank, bearing a sergeant's chevrons but carrying with it extra pay, and is awarded for special responsibilities greater than those of a sergeant but not sufficient to deserve warrant officer's rank. The equivalent in the Royal Regiment of Artillery, which does not bear colours, is staff sergeant.

_Colporteur_. A hawker or pedlar; so called because he carries his basket or pack round his neck (Fr. _col_, neck, _porter_, to carry). The term is more especially applied to hawkers of religious books.

_Colt_. A person new to office; an awkward young fellow who needs "breaking in"; specifically, in legal use, a barrister who attended (a sergeant-at-law at his induction).

I accompanied the newly made Chief Baron as his _col._—Pollock.

In cricket a _colt team_ is made up of a club's most promising young players.

The word is used as an abbreviation for "_Colt's Revolver_," patented by Col. Sam Colt (U.S.A.) in 1835; and it is also an old nautical term for a piece of knotted rope 18 inches long for the special benefit of ship boys; a cat-o'-nine-tails.

To _colt_. Obsolete slang for to besoof, gull, cheat.

_Harebrain_: We are fools, tame fools!

_Bellamore_: Come, let's go seek him.

He shall be hanged before he _colts_ us so basely.

_Beaumont and Fletcher_: Wit Without Money, iii, 2.

The verb is still used in provincial dialects for making a newcomer pay his footing.

_Colt-pixy_. A pixy, puck, or mischievous fairy. _To colt-pixy_ is to take what belongs to the pixies, and is specially applied to the gleaning of apples after the crop has been gathered in.

_Colt's-tooth_. The love of youthful pleasure. Chaucer uses the word "coltish" for skittish, and his Wife of Bath says—

He was, I trove, a twenty winter old.
And I was fayre, if I shal see ye sooth;
But yet I had alway a coltis tooth.

Horses have _colt's_ teeth at three years old, a period of their life when their passions are strongest.

Well, wid, Lord Sands;
Your colt's tooth is not cast yet.

_Shakespeare_: _Henry VIII_, i, 3.

_Her merry dancing days are done;_ she has a _colt's tooth_ still, I warrant.

_King_: _Orpheus and Eurdice_.

_Columbine_. A stock character in old Italian comedy, where she first appeared about 1560, and thence transplanted to English pantomime. She was the daughter of Pantaloone (_q.v._), and the sweetheart of Harlequin (_q.v._), and, like him, was supposed to be invisible to mortal eyes. Columbina in Italian is a pet name for a lady-love, and means dove-like.

_Columbus of the Skies_, The. Sir William Herschel (1738-1822), discoverer of Uranus, was so called. The name has also been applied to Galileo (1564-1642), Tycho Brahe (1546-1601), and Sir Isaac Newton (1642-1727).

_Colurnn_. _The Column_ of Marcus Aurelius. Erected at Rome in memory of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. Like that of Trajan (_q.v._), this column is covered externally with spiral bas-reliefs representing the wars carried on by the emperor. It is a Roman Doric column of marble on a square pedestal, and (omitting the statue) is 95 ft. in height.

Sixtus V caused the original statue of this column to be replaced, in 1589 by a figure of St. Paul.

_The Column at Boulogne_, or _The Column of the Grand Army_; a marble Doric column, 176 ft. high, surmounted by a bronze statue of Napoleon I, to commemorate the camp of Boulogne, formed 1804-5 with the intention of invading England.

_The Duke of York's Column_, in London, at the top of the Waterloo Steps leading from Waterloo Place into the Mall. Erected in 1830-3 in memory of Frederick, Duke of York, second son of George III, who died in 1827. It is of the Tuscan order, was designed by R. Wyatt, and is made of Aberdeen granite. It is 124 ft. in height; it contains a winding staircase to the platform, and on the summit is a statue of the duke by Sir R. Westmacott.

_Columns, or Pillars, of Hercules_. See _PILLAR_.

_The Column of July_. Erected in Paris in 1840, on the spot where the Bastille stood, to commemorate the revolution of July, 1830, when Charles X abdicated. It is a bronze Corinthian column, 13 ft. in diameter, and 154 ft. in height, and is surmounted by a gilded statue of Liberty.

_The London Column_. See _MONUMENT_.

_The Nelson Column_. In Trafalgar Square, London; was erected in 1843. The foundations, by Landseer, were added in 1867. It is a Corinthian column of Devonshire granite on a square base, copied from a column in the temple of Mars Ultor (the avenging god of war) at Rome; it stands 145 ft. high, the statue surmounting it (by E. H. Baily, R.A.) being 17 ft. high. The following reliefs in bronze are on the sides of the pedestal:@—(North) the battle of the Nile, where Nelson was wounded; (south) Nelson's death at the battle of Trafalgar; (east) the bombardment of Copenhagen; and (west) the battle of St. Vincent.

_The Column of the Place Vendôme_. Paris, 1806-10; made of marble encased with bronze, and erected in honour of Napoleon I. The spiral outside represents in bas-relief the battles of Napoleon I, ending with Austerlitz in 1805. It is 142 ft. in height and is an imitation of Trajan's Column. In 1871 the statue of Napoleon, which surmounted it, was hurled to the ground by the Communards, but in 1874 a statue of Liberty was substituted.
Trajan's Column. At Rome; made of marble A.D. 114, by Apollodorus. It is a Roman Doric column of marble, 127½ ft. in height, on a square pedestal, and has inside a spiral staircase of 185 steps lighted by 40 windows. It was surmounted by a statue of the Emperor Trajan, but Sixtus V supplanted the original statue by that of St. Peter. The spiral staircase represents in bas-relief the battles of the emperor.

Coma Berenices. See Berenice.

Comazant (kom' a zánt). Another name for Corporant (q.v.).

Comb. A crabtree comb. Slang for a cudgel. To smooth your hair with a crabtree comb, is to give the head a knock with a stick.

Reynard's wonderful comb. This comb existed only in the brain of Master Fox. He said it was made of the Panthera's bone, the perfume of which was so fragrant that no one could resist following it; and the wearer of the comb was always cheerful and merry. (Reynard the Fox.)

To comb out. To disentangle the hair, or remove foreign bodies from it, with a comb. During World War I the term was given a slang use in connexion with the English recruiting campaigns under the Military Service Acts. A comb-out was a thorough clearing out or clean sweep of men of military age in offices, works, etc., and getting them into the Army.

To comb the cat. An old military and naval phrase for untangling the cords of a cat-o'-nine-tails by drawing it through the fingers.

To comb your noddle with a three-legged stool (Taming of the Shrew, i, 1) is to beat you about the head with a stool. Many stools, such as those used by milkmaids, are still made with three legs; and these handy weapons seem to have been used at one time pretty freely, especially by angry women.

To cut someone's comb. To take down a person's conceit. In allusion to the practice of cutting the combs of capons.

To set up one's comb. To be cockish and vainglorious.

Come. A loss of prestige or position.

Can you come that? Can you equal it? Here, "come" means to arrive at, to accomplish.

Come February, Michaelmas, etc. A colloquialism for "next February," etc. Come Lammas-eve at night shall she be fourteen. Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i, 3.

Come home. Return to your house; to touch one's feelings or interest.

I doe now publish my Essayes: which, of all my other essays, seem to bee most direct: for that as it seems, they come home to men's businesse and bosome.—Bacon: Epistle Dedicatory to the Essays, 1625.

Come inside. A humorously scornful remark at one time made to one who was talking nonsense or behaving in a foolish manner. The allusion is to a picture in Punch showing a lunatic looking over the wall of an asylum at an angler fishing; and, when he hears that the latter has been there all day without getting a bite and proposes still to remain, the lunatic feelingly invites him to "come inside" to the asylum.

Come out. Said of a young woman after she has been presented at Court, or has entered into society as a "grown up" person. She "comes out into society."

Don't try to come it over me. Don't try to boss me or order me about; don't set yourself in a position above me.

Has he come it? Has he lent the money? Has he hearkened to your request? Has he come over to your side?

If the worst comes to the worst. See Worst.

Marry come up. See Marry.

To come a cropper. See Cropper.

To come down a peg. See Peg.

To come down handsome. To pay a good price, reward, subscription, etc.

To come down upon one. To reproach, to punish severely, to make a preemptory demand.

To come it strong. To lay it on thick; to exaggerate or overdo. See Draw it Mild.

To come off. To occur, to take place, as "my holiday didn't come off after all."

To come off with honours. To proceed to the end successfully.

To come over one. To wheedle one to give something; to cheat or overreach one; to conquer or get one's own way.

To come round. See Coming.

To come short. Not to be sufficient. "To come short of" means to miss or fail of attaining.

To come the old soldier over one. To attempt to intimidate or bully one by an assumption of authority.

To come to. To amount to, to obtain possession. "It will not come to much." To regain consciousness after a fainting-fit, etc.

To come to blows. To start fighting.

To come to grief, to hand. See Griev;

To come to pass. To happen, to befall, to come about.

What thou hast spoken is come to pass.—Jer. xxxii, 24.

It came to pass in those days that there went out a decree.—Luke ii, 1.

To come to stay. An expression used to conquer or get one's own way.

To come to the hammer, the point, the scratch. See Hammer; Point; Scratch.

To come under. To fall under; to be classed under.
To come up smiling. To laugh at discomfiture or punishment; to emerge from disaster unruffled.

To come up to. To equal, to obtain the same number of marks, to amount to the same quantity.

To come upon the parish. To live in the workhouse; to be supported by the parish.

What's to come of it? What's to come of him? A contracted form of become.

To come of a good stock is to be descended from a good family.

He is coming round. Recovering from sickness; recovering from a fit of the sulks; returning to friendship; he is coming round to my way of thinking, he is beginning to think as I do.

Comedy means a village song (Gr. komé-ōde), referring to the village merry-making, in which songs still take a conspicuous place. The Greeks had certain festal processions of great licentiousness, held in honour of Dionysus in the suburbs of their cities, and termed komoi or village revels. On these occasions an ode was generally sung, and this ode was the foundation of Greek comedy. C. P. Tragedy.

The Father of Comedy. Aristophanes (about 450-380 B.C.), the Athenian dramatist.

Comet Wine. A term denoting wine of superior quality. A notion prevailed that the grapes of "comet years," i.e. years in which remarkable comets appear, are better in flavour than those of other years.

The old gentleman yet nurses some few bottles of the famous comet year (i.e. 1811), emphatically called comet wine.—The Times.

Command Night. In theatrical parlance, a night on which a certain play is performed by Royal command.

Commandment. The ten commandments. A common piece of slang in Elizabethan days for the ten fingers or nails.

Could I come near your beauty with my nails
I'd set my ten commandments in your face.

Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI, i, 3.

The eleventh commandment. An ironical expression, signifying "Thou shalt not be found out."

Commando (kó man'do). A living in commendam is a living temporarily held by someone until an incumbent is appointed. The term was specially applied to a bishop who, when accepting the bishopric, had to give up all his preferments, but to whom such preferments were commendam by the Crown till they could be properly transferred. This practice was abolished by Act of Parliament in 1836.

Commendation Ninepence. This was a bent silver ninepenny piece, commonly used in the 17th century as a love-token, giver and receiver saying, "To my love, from my love." Sometimes the coin was broken, each keeping a part.

Like commendation ninepence, crookèd,
With "To and from my love" it looked.

Hudibras.

Commissar (kom'i sar). An official in the U.S.S.R. who has charge of a separate branch of government administration. The Council of People's Commissars is composed of the chairman, his deputy, and people's commissars for Foreign Affairs, Armed Forces, Foreign Trade, Posts, Finance, etc. They are responsible to the Supreme Council of the U.S.S.R.

Committee. A committee of the whole house, in Parliamentary language, is when the Speaker leaves the chair and all the members form a committee, where anyone may speak once or more than once. In such cases the chair is occupied by the Chairman of Committees, elected with each new Parliament.

A joint committee is a committee nominated partly by the House of Lords and partly by the House of Commons.

A standing committee is a committee which continues to the end of the current session. To this committee are referred all questions which fall within the scope of its appointment.

Commodore. A corruption of "commander" (Fr. commandeur; Dut. kommandeur). A naval officer ranking above a captain and below a rear-admiral, ranking with brigadier in the army. By courtesy the title is given to the senior captain when two or more ships are in company; also to the president of a yacht club.

In the United States Navy the office has been abolished since 1899, but the title was retained as a retiring rank for captains.

Common. Short for common land, which is public property. A common cannot be enclosed and denied to the use of the public without an Act of Parliament. Until the late 18th and early 19th centuries every village in England had its common lands, divided into strips of which each villager had the use of one or more to cultivate for his own use. When the crops had been taken in from these, the whole area was thrown open for the common grazing of cattle, etc. By various Acts of Parliament these common lands were taken from the villagers and enclosed by larger farmers, etc., only the less fertile portions being left uncultivated and given over to the common grazing purposes of the community.

In Scotland an Act of 1695 gave power to divide the common land among the persons who had rights thereon.

Common Pleas. Civil actions at law brought by one subject against another—not by the Crown against a subject. The Court of Common Pleas was for the trial of civil (not capital) offences; in 1875 it was abolished, and in 1880 it was represented by the Common Pleas Division and merged in the King's Bench Division.

The first complete English Book of Common Prayer (known as the First Prayer-book of Edward VI) appeared in 1549; this was revised in 1552 and 1559; slight alterations were made at the Hampton Court Conference (1604), and it received its final form, except for some very minor changes after the Savoy Conference of 1662.

In 1927 a revised Prayer Book was accepted by the Houses of Convocation and the Church Assembly. It was, however, rejected by the House of Commons on the grounds that the proposed changes weakened the Protestant character of the book.

Common sense. Natural intelligence; good, sound, practical sense; general sagacity. Formerly the expression denoted a supposed internal sense held to be common to all five senses or one that acted as a bond or connecting medium for them.

Commons. To put someone on short commons. To stint him, to give him scanty meals. In the University of Cambridge the food provided for each student at breakfast was called his commons; hence food in general or meals.

To come into commons. To enter a society in which the members have a common or general dinner table. To be removed from the society is to be discommoded.

He [Dryden] was in trouble [at Cambridge] on July 19th, 1652, when he was discommoded and gated for a fortnight for disobedience and contumacy.—SAINTSBURY: Dryden, ch. 1.

Commonwealths, Ideal. The most famous ideal, or imaginary, Commonwealths are those sketched by Plato in the Republic (from which all the others derive), by Cicero in his De Republica, by St. Augustine in his De Civitate Dei (The City of God), by Dante in his De Monarchia, by Sir Thomas More in Utopia (1516), by Bacon in the New Atlantis (a fragment, 1616), by Campanella, a Dominican friar (about 1630), and by Samuel Butler in Erewhon (1872).

To these some would add Johnson's Rasselas (1759), Lytton's Coming Race (1871), Bellamy's Looking Backward (1888), Wm. Morris's News from Nowhere (1891), H. G. Wells's In the Days of the Comet (1906) and The World Set Free (1914).

Communist. An adherent of communism.

Communism means a self-supporting society distinguished by common labour, common property, and common means of intelligence and recreation.—G. J. HOLYOAKE: in "The Labour World," No. 11, 1890.

Companion Ladder. The ladder leading from the poop to the main deck, also the staircase from the deck to a cabin.

Companions of Jehu. The Chouans (q.v.) were so called, from a fanciful analogy between their self-imposed task and that appointed to Jehu, on being set over the kingdom of Israel. Jehu was to cut off Ahab and Jezebel, with all their house, and all the priests of Baal. The Chouans were to cut off all who assassinated Louis XVI, and see that his brother (Jehu) was placed on the throne.

Comparisons are Odorous. So says Dogberry. (Much Ado About Nothing, iii. 5.)

"We own your verses are melodious, But then comparisons are odious.

SWIFT: Answer to Sheridan's "Simile."

Compass, Mariner's. See Mariner's Compass.

Complementary Colours. See Colours.

Complex. A combination of memories and wishes which exercise an influence on the personality.

Inferiority complex. A term applied to a supposed feeling of inferiority in persons who appear over-conscious of their own shortcomings.

To have a complex about something. To have a strong feeling either for or against something: to be over-concerned about it.

Compline (kom' plin). The last of the seven R.C. canonical hours, said about 8 or 9 p.m., and so called because it completes the series of the daily prayers or hours. From M.L. and O.Fr complie, Lat. completa (hora).

In ecclesiastical Lat. vesperinus, from vespers, means evening service, and completinus seems to be formed on the same model.

Complutensian Polyglot. See Bible, specially named.

Compos mentis. See Non Compos mentis.

Compostella (kom pos tel'ä). The city in Spain where are preserved the relics of St. James the Great; a corruption of Giacompostolo (James the Apostle). Its full name is Santiago (i.e. St. James) de Compostella. See JAMES, ST.

Compostella, Sacred chickens of. See ADEPT.

Comrades. Literally, those who sleep in the same chamber (camera). It is a Spanish military term derived from the custom of dividing soldiers into chambers, and the early form of the word in English is cameredo.

Comus (ko' mus). In Milton's masque of this name, the god of sensual pleasure, son of Bacchus and Circe. The name is from the Gr. komos, carousal.

In the masque the elder brother is meant for Viscount Brackley, the younger brother is Thomas Egerton, and the lady is Lady Alice Egerton, children of the Earl of Bridgewater, at whose castle in Ludlow it was first presented in 1634.

Con amore (kon a morʹ i) (Ital.). With heart and soul: as, “He did it con amore”—i.e., lovingly, with delight, and therefore in good earnest.

Con spirito (Ital.). With quickness and vivacity: a musical term.

Conan (kō' nan). The Thersites of Fingal (in Macpherson’s Ossian): brave even to rashness.

Blow for blow or claw for claw, as Conan said. Conan made a vow never to take a blow without returning it: when he descended into the infernal regions, the arch fiend gave him a club, which Conan instantly returned, saying “Claw for claw.”

Conceptionists. See Franciscans.

Concert Pitch. The degree of sharpness or flatness adopted by musicians acting in concert, that all the instruments may be in accord. In England “concert pitch” is usually slightly higher than the pitch at which instruments are generally tuned.

Hence the figurative use of the term: to screw oneself up to concert pitch is to make oneself absolutely ready, prepared for any emergency or anything one may have to do.

Conchy. See Conscientious Objector.

Concierge (kon' se ärj) (Fr.). The door-keeper of a public building, an hotel, or a house divided into flats, etc.

Conciergie (Fr.). The office or room of a concierge, a porter’s lodge; a state prison.

During the Revolution it was the prison where the chief victims were confined prior to execution.

Conclamatio. Amongst the ancient Romans, the loud cry raised by those standing round a death-bed at the moment of death. It probably had its origin in the idea of calling back the departed spirit, and was similar to the Irish howl over the dead. “One not howled over” (corpus nondum conclamatum) meant one at the point of death; and “one howled for” was one given up for dead or really deceased. Hence the phrase conclamatum est. he is dead past all hope, he has been called and gives no sign. Virgil makes the palace ring with howls when Dido burnt herself to death.

Lamentis, gemitque, et femineo ululato,
Texta fremunt. Aeneid, iv, 667.

Conclave. Literally, a set of rooms, all of which can be opened by one key (Lat. con clavis). The word is applied to the little cells erected for the cardinals who meet to choose a new Pope; hence, the assembly of cardinals for this purpose; hence, any private assembly for discussion. The conclave of cardinals dates back to 1271. Some days after the death of a Pope the cardinals assembled in Rome enter the conclave apartments of the Vatican and are there locked in in such stringent seclusion that no contact whatsoever occurs between them and the outside world. Votes are taken morning and evening until one candidate has secured a two-thirds majority of the votes. He is then acclaimed Pope.

Shakespeare used the word for the body of cardinals itself:—
And once more in my arms I bid him [Cardinal Campeius] welcome.
And thank the holy conclave for their loves. Henry VIII, ii, 2.

To meet in solemn conclave is a phrase used to describe any gathering to decide matters which are important to them.

Concordat (kon kôr' dât). An agreement made between a ruler and the Pope; as the Concordat of 1801 between Napoleon and Pius VII; the Concordat of 1516 between François I and Leo X to abolish the “pragmatic sanction”; and the Germanic Concordat of 1448 between Frederick III and Nicholas V. In 1929 a concordat between the Papacy and the Italian government established the Vatican State.

Concrete Numbers. See Abstract.

Condominium (kon dô min' i úm). This is a political phrase to describe the joint government or sovereignty of two or more powers over a region or country. An example of this is the condominium of the New Hebrides shared by Britain and France.

Condottieri. Leaders of mercenaries and military adventurers, particularly from about the 14th to 16th centuries. The most noted of these brigand chiefs in Italy were Guarnieri, Lando, Francesco of Carmagnola, and Francesco Sforza. The singular is Condottiere.

Confederate States. The eleven States which seceded from the Union in the American Civil War (1861-66)—viz. Georgia, North and South Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, Florida, Texas. They were all readmitted into the Union between 1866 and 1870.

Confederation of the Rhine. Sixteen German provinces in 1806 dissolved their connexion with Germany, and allied themselves with France. It was dissolved in 1813.

Confession, Seal of. Confession is a collective term for the whole administration of the R.C. sacrament of penance. The priest who bears the penitent’s confession is bound under the most binding vows not to divulge anything he hears in the confessional, nor can he be forced to reveal in the witness-box of a court of law any information he may have thus obtained.

Confusion Worse Confounded. Disorder made worse than before.

With ruin upon ruin, rout on rout,
Confusion worse confounded. Milton: Paradise Lost, ii, line 996.

Congé (kon jâ') (Fr., leave). “To give a person his congé” is to dismiss him from your service. “To take one’s congé” is to give notice to friends of your departure. This is done by leaving a card at the friend’s house with the letters P.P.C. (pour prendre congé, to take leave) inscribed on the left-hand corner.

Congé d’élire (Fr., leave to elect). A royal warrant given to the dean and chapter of a diocese to elect the person nominated by the Crown to their vacant see.
The tradition is that a Congleton parish clerk sold the church Bible to buy a bear, so that the townsmen could have some fun at bear-baiting.

Congregationalists. Those Protestant Dissenters who maintain that each congregation is an independent community, and has a right to make its own laws and choose its own minister. They derive from the Puritans and Independents of the time of Queen Elizabeth.

Congress (kon'gres). In its particular sense this word is applied to the supreme legislative body of the U.S.A., composed of the Senate and the House of Representatives (96 senators and 435 representatives). Senators are elected for 6 years, representatives for 2 years. The President can veto any legislation passed by Congress, but if it be passed again by a two-thirds majority it becomes law.

The Indian National Congress was founded in 1885, but after various vicissitudes was reformed by Gandhi in 1920 for the purpose of winning the independence of India. This was gained in 1947 with the formation of the Republic of India, and Dominion of Pakistan.

Congreve Rockets. A special kind of rocket invented in 1805 for use in war by Sir William Congreve (1772-1828). He was Controller of the Royal Laboratory at Woolwich.

Congreves. Predecessors of Lucifer matches, also invented by Sir Wm. Congreve. The splints were first dipped in sulphur, and then tipped with chlorate of potash paste, in which gum was substituted for sugar, and there was added a small quantity of sulphide of antimony. The match was ignited by being drawn through a fold of sandpaper with pressure. Cp. PROMETHEANS; LUCIFERS.

Conjuring Cap. I must put on my conjuring cap—i.e. your question requires deliberate thought, and I must reflect on it. Tradition says that Eric XIV, King of Sweden (1560-77), was a great believer in magic, and had an "enchanted cap" by means of which he pretended to exercise power over the elements. When a storm arose, his subjects used to say "The king has got on his conjuring cap."

Conker (con'ker). This is a children's name for a horse-chestnut, and is possibly derived from the French conque, a shell. Schoolboys thread the chestnuts on a string and then play conkers by each taking his turn at striking his opponent's conker with his own until one or other is destroyed.

Another curious slang use of this word is conk, meaning a nose, hence conky a big- or beak-nosed person.

The phrase to conk out, meaning to break down to cease to fire (of a motor) is probably onomatopoetic.

Connecticut (kô net'i küt), is the Mohegan dialect word Quonaughicut, meaning "long tidal river."

Conqueror. The title was applied to the following:-
Alfonso I. of Portugal. (About 1109-1185.)
Aurungzebe the Great. The most powerful of the Moguls. (1619, 1659-1707.)
James I of Aragon. (1206, 1213-76.)
Mohammed II, Sultan of Turkey. (1430-81.)
Othman or Osman I. Founder of the Turkish power. (1259, 1299-1326.)
Francisco Pizarro. Conquistador. So called because he conquered Peru. (1475-1541.)
William, Duke of Normandy. So called because he obtained England by conquest. (1027, 1066-87.)

The phrase to conk out, meaning to break down, to cease to fire (of a motor) is probably onomatopoetic.

Have you the conscience to [demand such a price]? Can your conscience allow you to [demand such a price]?

In all conscience. As, "And enough too, in all conscience." Meaning that the demand made is as much as conscience would tolerate without accusing the person of actual dishonesty; to the verge of that fine line which separates honesty from dishonesty.

My conscience! An oath. I swear by my conscience.

To make a matter of conscience of it. To treat it according to the dictates of conscience, to deal with it conscientiously.

To speak one's conscience. To speak one's own mind, give one's own private thoughts or opinions.

By my troth, I will speak my conscience of the king. —SHAKESPEARE: Henry V, i. 4.

Conscientious objector. One who takes advantage of a conscience clause (q.v.), and so does not have to comply with some particular requirement of the law in question. The name used to be applied specially to those who would swear legally that they had a conscientious objection to vaccination.
In the two World Wars the term was applied to those who obtained exemption from military service on grounds of conscience. These were also known as Conchies and C.O.s.

Conscript Fathers. In Lat. Patres Conscrip the Roman senate. Romulus instituted a senate consisting of a hundred elders, called Patres (Fathers). After the Sabines joined the state, another hundred were added. Tarquinius Priscus, the fifth king, added a third hundred, called Patres Minorum Gentium. When Tarquinius Superbus, the seventh and last king of Rome, was banished, several of the senate followed him, and the vacancies were filled up by Junius Brutus, the first consul. The new members were enrolled in the senatorial register, and called Conscripti; the entire body was then addressed as Patres [et] Conscripti or Patres, Conscripti.

Consentes Divi. The twelve chief Roman deities—Jupiter, Apollo, Mars, Neptune, Mercury, and Vulcan.

Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, and Venus.

Ennius puts them into two hexameter verses:

Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercury, Jovis, Neptunus, Vulcanus, Apollo.

Called "consentes," says Varro.

Quia in consilium Jovis adhibebantur.—De Lingua Latina, vii, 28.

Consenting Stars. Stars forming configurations for good or evil. In Judges v, 20, we read that "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera," i.e. formed unlucky or malignant configurations.

... Scourge the bad revolving stars
That have consented unto Henry's death.

SHAKESPEARE: 1 Henry VI, i, 1.

Conservative. One who wishes to preserve the union of Church and State, and not radically to alter the constitution. The word was first used in this sense in January, 1830, by Wilson Croker in the Quarterly Review—"We have always been conscientiously attached to what is called the Tory, and which might with more propriety be called the Conservative, party" (p. 276).

Canning, ten years previously, had used the word in much the same way in a speech delivered at Liverpool in March, 1820.

Conservators of the Public Liberties. Officers hoven in England to inspect the treasury and correct abuses in administration, under an enactment of 1244. Conservators were also appointed in ports to take action in the event of breaches of the peace at sea. The word is band to-day only in such phrases as The Thames Conservancy Board which is concerned with the maintenance of amenities on that river.

Consistory. An ecclesiastical court. In the church of Rome it is the assembly in council of the Pope and cardinals; in England it is a diocesan court, presided over by the chancellor of the diocese.

Consolidated Fund. In 1751 an Act was passed for consolidating the nine loans bearing different interests, into one common loan bearing an interest of three per cent. In 1889 this interest was reduced to two and three-quarter per cent.; and in 1903 to two and a half per cent. The fund is pledged for the payment of the interest of the national debt, the civil list, the salaries of the judges, ambassadors, and other high officials, etc.

Consols. A contraction of Consolidated Fund. See above.

Constable (Lat. comes-stabuli) means "Master of the Horse" (with which office, however, it now has no connexion in Britain). Cp. MARSHAL. The Constable of France was the title of the principal officer of the household of the early Frankish kings, and from being the head grooms of the stable he ultimately became commander-in-chief of the army, supreme judge of all military matters and matters pertaining to chivalry, etc. The office was abolished in 1627.

Constable is also a term for the governor of a fortress, as the Constable of the Tower of London.

The Constable of England, or Lord High Constable, was a similar official in existence before 1066, but since 1521 the title has been granted only temporarily, for the purposes of Coronations.

The Lord High Constable of Scotland was an office instituted about 1147 by David I. Conferred by Robert Bruce in 1321 on Sir Gilbert Hay, created Earl of Erroll, heritably, in which family the office still remains.

Drink the constable. See Morocco.

To overrun or outrun the constable. To get into debt; to spend more than one's income; to talk about what you do not understand.

Quoth Hudibras, Friend Ralph, thou hast
Outrun the constable at last;
For thou hast fallen on a new Dispute, as senseless as untrue.

Butler: Hudibras, i, 3.

Who's to pay the constable? Who is to pay the score?

Constantine, Donation of. See Decretals.

Constituent Assembly. The first of the national assemblies of the French Revolution; so called because its chief work was the drawing up of a new constitution for France. It sat from 1788 to 1791.

After the chaos resultant on the World War II a National Constituent Assembly of 522 deputies was elected in France, according to the constitution promulgated in October, 1945.

Constitution. The fundamental laws of a state; the way in which a state is organized or constituted—despotic, aristocratic, democratic, monarchic, oligarchic, etc.

To give a nation a constitution. To give it fixed laws, and to limit the powers of the nominal ruler or head of the state, so that the people are not subject to arbitrary government or caprice. A despotism or autocracy is solely under the unrestricted will of the despot or autocrat.

Apostolic Constitutions. A doctrinal code relating to the Church, the duties of Christians, etc., contained in eight books of doubtful date, possibly as early as the 3rd century, but certainly later than the time of the Apostles, to whom at one time they were attributed.

Consummatum est (kon som' a tum est) (Lat.). It is finished: the last words of our Lord on the cross (John xix, 30).

Meph.: O, what will I not do to obtain his soul? Faust.: Consummatum est; this bill is ended.

And Faustus hath bequeathed his soul to Lucifer. MARLOWE: Doctor Faustus, v, 74.

Contango (kon tang' go). In Stock Exchange parlance, the sum paid by the purchaser of stock to the seller for the privilege of deferring the completion of the bargain till, the next, or some future, settling day. Cp. Backwardation.

Contemplate. To meditate or reflect upon; to consider attentively. The word takes us back to the ancient Roman augurs, for the templum (whence our temple) was that part of the heavens which he wished to consult. Having mentally divided it into two parts from top to bottom, he watched to see what would occur; and this watching of the templum was called contemplating.

Contempt of Court. Refusing to conform to the rules of the law courts. Consequential contempt is that which tends to obstruct the business or lower the dignity of the court by indirection. Direct contempt is an open insult or resistance to the judge or others officially employed in the court.

Contempibles, The Old. The original Expeditionary Force of 160,000 men that left England in August, 1914, to join the French and Belgians against Germany. The soldiers gave themselves this name as a compliment, from an army order that was said to have been given at Aix on August 19th by the Kaiser to his generals.

It is my royal and imperial command that you exterminate the treacherous English, and walk over General French’s contemptible little army.

It is only fair to add that this “order” is almost certainly apocryphal.

Confenement (kon ten’ e ment). A word used in Magna Charta, the exact meaning of which is not ascertainable, but which probably denoted the lands and chattels connected with a tenement; whatever betfits the social position of a person, as the arms of a gentleman, the merchandise of a trader, the ploughs and wagons of a peasant, etc.

In every case the contenement (a word expressive of chattels necessary to each man’s station) was exempted from seizure.—HALLAM: Middle Ages, Pt. ii, ch. viii.

Contests of Wartburg. Sometimes called The Battles of the Minstrels, these were annual contests held at the Wartburg, a castle in Saxe-Weimar, for a prize given for the best poem. Some 150 of these poems are still extant, the best being by Walter von der Vogelweid (1168-1230). The most famous representation of these contests is in Wagner’s opera the Meistersingers. It was in this same castle that Luther translated the Bible into German.

Continece of a Scipio. It is said that a beautiful princess fell into the hands of Scipio Africanus, and he refused to see her, “lest he should be tempted to forget his principles.” Similar stories, whether fable or not, are told of many historical characters, including Cyrus and Alexander.

Continental. Not worth a Continental. Worthless. No more valuable than the bank-notes issued by the American Continental Congress during the War of Independence and until the adoption of the Constitution, which were backed by no reserves whatever.

Continental System. A name given to Napoleon’s plan for shutting out Great Britain from all commerce with the continent of Europe. He forbade under pain of war any nation of Europe to receive British exports, or to send imports to any of the British dominions. It began November 21st, 1806.

Contingent. The quota of troops furnished by each of several contracting powers, according to agreement. The word properly means something happening by chance; hence we call a fortuitous event a contingency.

Continuity Man, Girl. The technique of cinematography allows of a play, etc., being photographed in scenes and incidents not necessarily in sequence. Each scene, etc., is, moreover, “shot” many times. It is therefore essential that the greatest care be taken to see that every detail of costume, scenery, etc., is correct when one scene or incident is “shot” several times. With poor continuity an actress may be wearing a ring when she sits down to dinner, and later in the same meal be found without one. It is the task of the continuity man or girl to see that such a mistake is averted.

Contra (Lat.). Against. Generally in the phrase pro and contra or pro and con (q.v.). In bookkeeping a contra is an entry on the right-hand, or credit side, of the ledger. See Per Contra.

A contra-account is one kept by a firm which both buys from and sells to the same client, so that the transactions cancel out as paper entries.

Contra bonos mores (Lat.). Not in accordance with good manners; not comme il faut (q.v.).

Contra jus gentium (Lat.). Against the law of nations; specially applied to usages in war which are contrary to the laws or customs of civilized peoples.

Contra mundum (Lat.). Against the world at large. Used of an innovator or reformer who sets his opinion against that of everyone else, and specially connected with Athanasius in his vehement opposition to the Arians.

Contretemps (Fr.). A mischance, something inopportune. Literally, “out of time.”

Conventicle. The word was applied originally by the early Christians to their meeting-places, but it was soon used contemptuously by their opponents, and it thus acquired a bad or derisive sense, such as a clandestine meeting with a sinister intention; a private meeting of monks to protest against the election of a proposed abbot, for instance, was called a Conventicle; a gudgeon, meeting, or meeting-place, of Dissenters (q.v.).

Conventicle Act. An Act passed in 1664 declaring that a meeting of more than five persons held for religious worship and not in accordance with the Book of Common Prayer was a seditious assembly. It was repealed by the Toleration Act (1689).

Convention. The. Two Parliaments were so called: one in 1660, because it was not held by the order of the king, but was convened by General Monk: and that convened on January 22nd, 1689, to confer the crown on William and Mary.

In the U.S.A. a convention is a meeting of a number of persons, as delegates, for any common purpose. The meeting held by a political party for the purpose of selecting a candidate for the presidential election is called a National Convention. In the French Revolution the National Convention was the sovereign assembly convened by the Constitu-ten Assembly. It governed France from Sept., 1792, to Oct., 1795.

Convey. A polite term for steal. Thieves are, by a similar euphemism, called conveyers.
(Lat. con-velo, to carry away.)

Convey, the wise as it call, Steal! foh! a fico for the phrase.—SHAKESPEARE: Merry Wives of Windsor, i, 3.
Bolingbroke: Go, some of you, convey him to the Tower.

Rich. II: O, good! "Convey." Conveyers are ye all,
That rise thus nimbly by a true king's fall.
Richard II, iv, 4.

Cooing and Billing, like Philip and Mary on a shilling. The reference is to coins struck in 1555, in which Mary and her consort are placed face to face, and not cheek by jowl, the usual way.

Still amorous, and fond, and billing.
Like Philip and Mary on a shilling.

Hudibras, Pt. iii, 1.

Cook. Cooking. Terms belonging to cuisine applied to man under different circumstances:
Sometimes he is well basted; he boils with rage, is baked with heat, and burns with love or jealousy. Sometimes he is buttered and well buttered; he is often cut up, devoured with a flame, and done brown. We dress his joke for him; sometimes he is eaten up with care; sometimes he is fried. We cook his goose for him, and sometimes he makes a goose of himself. We make a hash of him, and at times he makes a hash of something else. He gets into hot water, and sometimes into a mess.
Is made into mincemeat, makes mincemeat of his money, and is often in a pickle. We are often asked to roast him, sometimes he gets well roasted, is sometimes set on fire, put into a steak, or is in a stew no one knows why.
A "soft" is half-baked, one severely handled is well peppered, to falsify accounts is to cook or salt them, wit is Attic salt, and an exaggerated statement must be taken sum grano salis.

A pert young person is a sauce box, a shy lover is a spoon, a rich father has to fork out, and is sometimes dished of his money.

A conceited man does not think small beer (or small potatoes) of himself, and one's mouth is called a potato-trap. A simpleton is a cake, a gudgeon, and a piggon. Some are cool as a cucumber, others hot as a quail.
A chubby child is a little dumpling. A woman may be a duck; a courtier was called a mutton or laced mutton, and a large, coarse hand is a mutton fist. A greedy person is a pig, a fat one is a sausage, and a shy one, if not a sheep, is certainly sheepish; while a Lubin casts sheep's eyes at his lady-love. A coward is chicken-hearted, a fat person is crummy, and a cross one is crusty, while an aristocrat belongs to the upper crust of society. A Yeoman of the Guard is a beef-eater, a soldier a red herring, or a lobster, and a stingy, ill-tempered old man is a crab. A walking advertiser between two boards is a sandwichman. An alderman in his chain is a turkey hung with sausages. Two persons resembling each other are like as two peas. A chit is a mere sprat, a delicate maiden a tit-bit, and a colourless countenance is called a whey-face. Anything unexpectedly easy is a piece of cake.

What's cooking? What is in hand, what's doing.

Cook your goose. See Goose.

Cooked. The books have been cooked. The ledger and other trade books have been tampered with, in order to show a false balance.

Cookie-pusher (U.S.A.). A young and junior diplomat whose most onerous duties appear to consist in handing round plates at official receptions.

Cool. Cool card; cooling card. See Card.

Cool hundred, thousand (or any other sum).
The whole of the sum named. Cool, in this case, is merely an emphatic; it may have originally had reference to the calmness and deliberation with which the sum was counted out and the total made up.

He had lost a cool hundred, and would no longer play.—FIELDING: Tom Jones, VIII, xii.

Cool tankard or cool cup. A drink made of wine and water, with lemon, sugar, and borage; sometimes also slices of cucumber.

Coon, A. Short for raccoon, a small North American animal, about the size of a fox, valued for its fur. The animal was adopted as a badge by the old Whig party in the United States about 1840. In the 19th century the word was slang for a Negro.

A coon's age. Quite a long time; a "month of Sundays" (U.S. slang).

A gone coon. A person in a terrible fix;
one on the verge of ruin. The coon being hunted for its fur is a "gone coon" when it is treed and so has no escape from its pursuers.

To go the whole coon. An American equivalent of the English "to go the whole hog." See Hog.

Coop. U.S. slang for prison.

To fly the coop is to escape from prison.
Cooper. Half stout and half porter. The term arose from the old practice at breweries of allowing the cooper a daily portion of stout and porter. As they did not like to drink porter after stout, they mixed the two together.

Coot. A silly coot. Stupid as a coot. The coot is a small waterfowl.

Bald as a coot. The coot has a strong, straight, and somewhat conical bill, the base of which tends to push up the forehead, and there dilates, so as to form a remarkable bare patch.

Cop. To catch, lay hold of, capture. To “get copped” is to get caught by the police, whence cop and copper (q.v.), a policeman. Perhaps connected with Lat. capere, to take, etc.

A fair cop is applied to the case of a criminal caught in flagrante delicto.

The word is used for catching almost anything, as punishment at school, or even an illness, fever, or cold:—

They thought I was sleepin’, ye know,
And they sed as I’d copped it o’ Jim;
Well, it come like a bit of a blow,
For I watched by the deathbed of him.

Sims: Dagoset Ballads (The Last Letter).

The East Anglian word to cop meaning to throw or toss (whence cup-halpenny, a name for chuck-farthing) is not connected with this.

Copenhagen (ko pen ha’ gen).” This was the name of the horse ridden by the Duke of Wellington at Waterloo “from four in the morning till twelve at night.” He was a rich chestnut, 15 hands high. Pensioned off in the paddocks of Strawfielday, Copenhagen lived to the age of twenty-seven; his skeleton is in the United Services Museum, Whitehall.

Copernicanism. The doctrine that the earth moves round the sun, in opposition to the doctrine that the sun moves round the earth: so called after Nicolas Copernicus (1473-1543), the Prussian astronomer. Cp. PTOLEMÄIC SYSTEM.

Whereas it has come to the knowledge of the Holy Congregation that that false Pythagorean doctrine allalong opposed to Holy Scripture, on the motion of the earth and the immobility of the sun, taught by Nicholas Copernicus. . . . This congregation has decreed that the said book of Copernicus be suspended until it be corrected.—Decree of the Holy Congregation of the Index, 1616.

Cophetua (ko fe’ ū a). An imaginary king of Africa, of great wealth, who “disdained all womankind,” and concerning whom a ballad is given in Percy’s Reliques. One day he saw a beggar-girl from his window, and fell in love with her. He asked her name; it was Penelope, called by Shakespeare Zenelophon (Love’s Labour’s Lost, iv, 1). They lived together long and happily, and at death were universally lamented.

King Cophetua loved the beggar-maid.

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, ii, 1.

Copper. Among the old alchemists copper was the symbol of Venus.

The name is given to the large vessel used for laundry purposes, cooking, etc., which was formerly made of copper but is now more usually of iron; also to pence, halfpence, farthings, cents, etc., although nowadays they are made of bronze; true copper coinage has not been minted in England since 1860.

In slang a copper is a policeman, i.e. one who “cops,” or catches, offenders.

Copper captain. A “Brummagem,” or sham, captain: a man who “swanks about” with the title but has no right to it. Michael Perez is so called in Rule a Wife and have a Wife, by Beaumont and Fletcher.

To this copper-captain was confided the command of the troops.—W. Irving: Knickerbocker.

Copper Nose. Oliver Cromwell; also called “Ruby Nose,” “Nosey,” and “Nose Almighty,” no doubt from some scorbutic tendency which showed itself in a big red nose.

Copper-nose Harry. Henry VIII. When Henry VIII had spent all the money left him by his miserly father, he minted an inferior silver coin, in which the copper alloy soon showed itself on the more prominent parts, especially the nose of the face; and hence the people soon called the king “Old Copper-nose.”

Copperheads. Secret foes. Copperheads are poisonous snakes of North America (Trigonoccephalus contortrix), which, unlike the rattlesnakes, give no warning of their attack. The name was applied by the early colonists to the Indians, then to the Dutch (see Washington Irving’s History of New York), and, finally, in the Civil War to the pro-Southerners among the Northerners, the covert friends of the Confederates.

Copts. The Jacobite Christians of Egypt, who have been since the Council of Chalcedon in 451 in possession of the patriarchal chair of Alexandria. The word is probably derived from Coptos, the metropolis of the Thebaid. These Christians conduct their worship in a dead language called “Coptic” which is descended from ancient Egyptian.

The Copts (or Egyptians) circumcise, confess to their priests, and abstain from swine’s flesh. They are Jacobites in their creed.—S. Olín: Travels in Egypt, vol. i, ch. viii.

Copus (kō’ pūs). University slang for a drink made of beer, wine, and spice heated together, and served in a “loving-cup.” Variously accounted for as being dog-Latin for cupellus (a cup of hippocras), or short for episcopus, in which case it would be the same as the drink “bishop.” (q.v.).

Copy. A printer’s term for original MS., typescript, or printed matter that is to be set up in type.

That’s a mere copy of your countenance. Not your real wish or meaning, but merely one you choose to present to me.

Copyhold estate. Land held by a tenant by virtue of a copy of the roll made by the steward of the manor from the court-roll kept in the manor-house. It was ended by legislation in 1925.

Copyright. The exclusive right of multiplying for sale copies of works of literature, art, etc., or substantial parts thereof, allowed to the author or his assignees. The first copyright Act in England is that of 1709; modifications and additions to it were made at various times, and in 1842 a new Act was passed granting copyright for forty-two years after publication or until the expiration of seven years from the death of the author, whichever should be the longer.

The question of international copyright was settled by the Berne Convention of 1908, to which all countries subscribed except U.S.A., Russia, and China. To carry out the articles of the convention so far as Great Britain was concerned the Copyright Act of 1911 was passed, by which protection was granted for 50 years from the death of the author or the publication of the work, whichever date was the later. In U.S.A. protection of copyright can be secured only by the complete production of the work in U.S.A. It lasts for 28 years, with right to renew for another similar period.

The Act of 1911 deals also with the copyright in photographs, engravings, architectural designs, musical compositions, phonograph records, etc. A copy of every copyright book has to be presented to the British Museum and, on application being made, to the Bodleian, the Cambridge University Library, the Trinity Library as Editor, Dublin, and the National Library of Wales at Aberystwyth. Before the Act of 1842 Sion College, Glasgow, Aberdeen, and St. Andrews Universities, and King's Inn, Dublin, also had compulsory presentation copies.

Coq à l’âne. See COCK, A COCK AND BULL STORY.

Corah (kór’a), in Dryden’s Absalom and Achitophel (q.v.), is meant for Titus Oates. See Numb. xvi.

Sunk were his eyes, his voice was harsh and loud;
Sure signs he neither choleric was, nor proud;
His long chin proved his wit; his saint-like grace
A church vermillion, and a Moses’ face.
His memory, miraculously great,
Could plots, exceeding man’s belief, repeat.

DRIED: Absalom and Achitophel, i, 646.

Coral. The Romans used to hang beads of red coral on the cradles and round the necks of infants, to “preserve and fasten their teeth,” and to prevent the falling sickness. It was considered by soothsayers as a charm against lightning, whirlwind, shipwreck, and fire. Paracelsus says it should be worn round the neck of children as a preservative against fits, sorcery, charms, and poison,” and Norse legend says that it is fashioned beneath the waves by Marmendill. The bells on an infant’s coral are a Roman Catholic addition, the object being to frighten away evil spirits by their jingle.

Coral is good to be hanged about the neck of children . . . to preserve them from the falling sickness. It has also some special sympathy with nature, for the best coral . . . will turn pale and wan if the party that wears it be sick, and it comes to its former colour again as they recover.—SIR HUGH PLATT: Jewel-House of Art and Nature (1934).

Coram judice (kór’am joo’ di si) (Lat.). Under consideration; still before the judge.

Cordeia (kór dé’ li à). The youngest of Lear’s three daughters, and the only one that loved him. Holinshed’s Chronicle (whence Shakespeare drew most of his facts) as “Cordeilla,” as “Cordell” in the Mirour for Magistrates (1555) and as “Cordella” in the older play of Leir (1594). The form “Cordelia” seems to appear for the first time in Spenser’s Faerie Queene (ii, 10). See LEAR, KING.

Cordelia’s gift. A “voice ever soft, gentle, and low; an excellent thing in woman.” Shakespeare: King Lear, v, 3.

It is her voice that he hears prevailing over the those [sic] of the rest of the company . . . for she has not Cordelia’s gift.—MISS BROUGHTON: Dr. Cupid.

Cordelier (kór dé’ lyá, kór dé lê’), i.e. “cord-wearer.” A Franciscan friar of the strict rule, an Observantin. See FRANCISCANS. In the Middle Ages they distinguished themselves in philosophy and theology. Duns Scotus was one of their most distinguished members. The tale is that in the reign of St. Louis these Minorites repulsed an army of infidels, and the king asked who those gens de cordelles (corded people) were. From this they received their appellation.

In the French Revolution the name Club des Cordeliers was given to a political club, because it held its meetings in an old convent of Cordeliers. The Cordeliers were the rivals of the Jacobins, and numbered among their members Paré (the president), Danton, Marat, Camille Desmoulins, Hébert, Chaumette, Dufournoy de Villiers, Fabre d’Eglantine, and others. They were far in advance of the Jacobins, and were the first to demand the abolition of the monarchy and the establishment of a commonwealth. The leaders were put to death between March 24th and April 5th, 1794.

This club was nicknamed “The Pandemonium,” and Danton was called the “Archfiend.” When Bailly, the mayor, locked them out of their hall in 1791, they met in the Tennis Court (Paris), and changed their name into the “Society of the Rights of Man”; but they are best known by their original appellation.

Il ne faut pas parler Latin devant les Cordeliers. Don’t talk Latin before the Cordeliers, i.e. the Franciscans. A common French proverb, meaning that one should be careful what one says on a subject before those who are masters of it.

Cordon (Fr.). A ribbon or cord: especially the ribbon of an order of chivalry; also, a line of sentries or military posts enclosing some position; hence, an encircling line.

Cordon bleu. A knight of the ancient order of the St. Esprit (Holy Ghost); so called because the decoration is suspended on a blue ribbon. It was at one time the highest order in the kingdom of France.

The title is also given, as a compliment, to a good cook.

Cordon noir. A knight of the Order of St. Michael, distinguished by a black ribbon.

Cordon rouge. A chevalier of the Order of St. Louis, the decoration being suspended on a red ribbon.

Cordon sanitaire. A line of watchers posted round an infectious district to keep it isolated and prevent the spread of the disease; a sanitary cordon.

Un grand cordon. A member of the French Légion d’Honneur. The cross is attached to a grand (broad) ribbon.
Corduroy

A corded fabric, originally made of silk, and worn by the kings of France in the chase (Fr. corde du roy). It is also a coarse, thick, ribbed cotton stuff, capable of standing hard wear.

Corduroys

Trousers made of corduroy. Brown corduroy trousers were worn by officers of the British 8th Army in the Western Desert. 1940-2, not, as many have thought, as an affectation, but because this material stood up to wear in the sand better than battle-dress serge, and was less chafing in the heat.

Corduroy road

A term applied to roads formed of tree trunks sawn in two longitudinally, and laid transversely. Such a road presents a ribbed appearance, like corduroy.

Cordwainer

Not a twister of cord, but a worker in leather. Our word is the Fr. cordouannier (a maker or worker of cordouan); the former a corruption of Cordovanier (a worker in Cordovan leather).

The Cordwainers are one of the smaller though wealthier Livery Companies of the City of London.

Corinthus. A tag from Horace (Ep. I, xvii), quoted of some difficult attainment that can be achieved only by good fortune or great wealth. It is not known why.

Corinna. The Cornish giant, who in the time of these great conquests by them got, was the only survival of the term to-day is in the Cornish name and memorable gest, called Cormoran.

Corinna. The Cornish giant, who in the time of these great conquests by them got, was the only survival of the term to-day is in the Cornish name and memorable gest, called Cormoran.

Corinth. The Cornish giant, who in the time of these great conquests by them got, was the only survival of the term to-day is in the Cornish name and memorable gest, called Cormoran.

Corinth. A licentious libertine. The loose-living of Corinth was proverbial both in Greece and in Rome.

In the Regency the term was applied to a hard-living group of sportsmen whose time was largely spent in practising pugilism and horse-racing. The sporting rake in Pierce Egan's Life in London (1821) was known as "Corinthian Tom"; in Shakespeare's day a "Corinthian" was the "fast man" of the period. Cp. Ephesian.

I am no proud Jack, like Falstaff; but a Corinthian, a lad of mettle, a good boy.—Henry IV, ii, 4.

The only survival of the term to-day is in the Corinthian amateur football club.

Corinthian Order. The most richly decorated of the five orders of Greek architecture. The shaft is fluted and the capital is bell-shaped and adorned with acanthus leaves. See Acanthus.

Corinthian brass. An alloy made of a variety of metals (said to be gold, silver, and copper) melted at the conflagration of Corinth in 146 B.C., when the city was burnt to the ground by the consul Mummius. Vases and other ornaments, made by the Romans of this metal, were of greater value than if they had been silver or gold.

I think it may be of Corinthian brass. Which was a mixture of all metals, but the brazen uppermost.

Corked. Properly used of a bottle of wine which has not been opened; generally used in place of "corky"—i.e. the wine itself has become tainted through the cork being bad one.

Corker. That's a corker. That's a tremendous example of whatever is in question—a story, a ball in cricket, or anything you wish. Perhaps the allusion is to something that quite closes the discussion, settles the matter, "corks" it up.

Corking-pins. Pins of the largest size, at one time used by ladies to keep curls on the forehead fixed and in trim. They used to be called cakins (pronounced cawkins) pins, but it is not known why.

Cormoran. The Cornish giant, who in the nursery tale, fell into a pit dug by Jack the Giant-killer. For this doughty achievement Jack received a belt from King Arthur, with this inscription—

This is the valiant Cornish man
That slew the giant Cormoran.

Jack the Giant-killer.

Corn. There's corn in Egypt. There is abundance; there is a plentiful supply. The reference is to the Bible story of Joseph in Egypt (Ex. xliii. 2).

To tread on his corns. To irritate his prejudices; to annoy another by disregard to his pet opinions or habits.

Up corn, down horn. An old saying suggesting that when corn is high or dear, beef is down or cheap, because people have less money to spend on meat.

Corn Laws. In 1815 a law was passed forbidding the importation of foreign corn when the price of native corn was under 80s. a quarter. In 1828 a sliding scale was introduced whereby the duty was increased as the price fell until corn at 64s. a quarter meant a duty of 23s. These high prices raised the cost of living to such an extent that the poor were faced with starvation. In 1838 an Anti-Corn Law League was founded, and in 1846 Sir Robert Peel passed a law repealing the duties.

The Corn-Law Rhymographer Ebenezer Elliott (1781-1849) denounced the Corn Laws in scathing verse that appealed to the public for which he wrote. The Corn-Law Rhymes appeared in 1831.

Cornage. A rent in feudal times fixed with relation to the number of horned cattle in the tenant's possession. In Littlegton's Tenures (1574) it was mistakenly said to be "a kind of tenure in grand serjeanty," the service being to blow a horn when an invasion of the Scots was imminent. Until the true meaning of the term was given in the Oxford Dictionary this was the explanation always given.

Corner. The condition of the market with respect to a commodity which has been largely bought up, in order to create a virtual monopoly and enhance its market price; as a corner in pork, etc. The idea is that the goods are piled and hidden in a corner out of sight.

Corner-stone. A large stone laid at the base of a building to strengthen the two walls forming a right angle: in ancient buildings they were sometimes as much as 20 feet long and 8 feet thick. In figurative use, Christ is called because He united the Jews and Gentiles into one family; and daughters are called because, as wives and mothers, they unite together two families.

Why should we make an ambiguous word the corner-stone of moral philosophy?—Jowett: Plato, iv, 30.

Coronet. The terrible corneft of horse. A nickname of the elder Pitt (1708-78). He obtained a coronet in Cobham's Horse in 1731.

Cornish. Cornish hug. A hug to overthrow you. The Cornish men were famous wrestlers, and tried to throttle their antagonist with a particular grip or embrace called the Cornish hug.

The Cornish are Masters of the Art of Wrestling. ... Their Hug is a cunning close with their fellow-battant: the fruits whereof is his fair fall, or foil at the least. It is figuratively applicable to the deceitful dealing of such who secretly design their overthrow, whom they openly embrace.—Fuller: Worthies 1661.

Cornish language. This member of the Brythonic branch of the Celtic languages became virtually extinct nearly 200 years ago. It is supposed that Dolly Pentreath (Dorothy Jeffery, 1685-1777) was the last to speak Cornish as a native language. It is still spoken as an acquired language by a few cultured Cornishmen and there is a certain literature available.

Cornish names.

By Tre, Pol, and Pen.

Thus, Tre (a town) gives Treveny, Tregengon, Tregony, Tregouhan, Trelawy, Tremayne, Trevannion, Treveddooe, Trewthien, etc.

Pol (a head) gives Polkerris Point, Polperro, Polwheel, etc.

Pen (a top) gives Penkevil, Penriv, Penrose, Pentire, etc.

The Cornish Wonder. John Opie (1761-1807), of Cornwall, the painter. It was "Peter Pindar" (John Wolcot) who gave him this name.

Cornstalks. In Australia, especially in New South Wales, youths of colonial birth are so called; perhaps because they are often taller and more stouter than their parents.

Cornubian Shore. Cornwall, famous for its tin mines. ... from the bleak Cornubian shore Dispense the mineral treasure, which of old Sidonian pilots sought.

Cornucopia. See Aemulæa's Horn.

Cornwall. The county is probably named from Celtic corn, corny, a horn, with reference to the configuration of the promontory. For the legendary explanation of the name, see Cornisus.

Corny. U.S. slang for anything, such as music, which is affectedly and spuriously sweet. It is also used of anything of poor quality or hackneyed.

Coronach (kor' ô nach). Lamentation for the dead, as anciently practised in Ireland and Celtic Scotland. (Gael. cornh ranach, crying together.) Pennant says it was called by the Irish hulluloo.

Coronation Chair. See Stone.

Coroner. Properly, the crown officer (Lat. corona, crown). In Saxons times it was his duty to collect the Crown revenues; next, to take charge of Crown pleas; but at present his duties are almost entirely confined to searching into cases of sudden or suspicious death. The coroner also holds inquiries, or inquests, on treasure trove. Crownet was formerly a correct way of pronouncing the word, hence Shakespeare's—

But is this law?

Ay, marry, is't; crownet's quest law.

Hamlet, v, 1.

Coronet. A crown inferior to the royal crown. A duke's coronet is adorned with strawberry leaves above the band; that of a marquis with strawberry leaves alternating with pearls; that of an earl has pearls elevated on stalks, alternating with leaves above the band; that of a viscount has a string of pearls above the band, but no leaves; that of a baron has only six pearls.

Coronis (kōr' ō nīs). Daughter of a King of Phocis, changed by Athene into a crow to enable her to escape from Neptune. There was another Coronis, mother of Ascalapius by Apollo, who slew her for infidelity.

Coral Violet. See Violet.

Corporation. A municipal corporation is a body of men elected for the local government of a city or town, consisting of the mayor, aldermen, and councillors. The word is facetiously applied to a large paunch, from the tendency of civic magnates to indulge in well-provided feasts and thus acquire generous figures.
Corpsant. The St. Elmo’s Fire (q.v.) or “Castor and Pollux” of the Romans; the ball of fire which is sometimes seen playing round the masts of ships in a storm. So called from Span. _corpo santo_ , holy body. Sometimes known as _romanzant._

_Corps legislatif_ (kôr’ lej i là têf’). At various periods of modern French history this phrase has been used for the lower house of the legislature. In 1799 Napoleon substituted a _Corps legislatif_ and a tribunal for the two councils of the Directory. In 1807 there was a _c.l._ and a _conseil d’état_; in 1849 a _c.l._ was formed with 750 deputies; and under Napoleon III the legislative power was vested in the Emperor, the Senate and the _ Corps legislatif._

_Corps Diplomatique_ (Fr.). A diplomatic body: the foreign representatives at a Court collectively.

_Corpse_ Candle. The _ignis fatuus_ is so called by the Welsh because it was supposed to forebode death. and to show the road that the corpse would take. The large candle used at Lich w a kes—i.e., at the watching of a corpse before interment—had the same name.

_Corpus_ (kôr’ pûs) (Lat., a body). The whole body or substance: especially the complete collection of writings on one subject or by one person, as the _Corpus poetarum Latinarum_, the _Corpus historicum mediævi_. Also, short for _Corpus Christi_ College.

_Corpus Christi_ College: A festival of the Church, kept on the Thursday after Trinity Sunday, in honour of the Blessed Sacrament. It was instituted by Urban IV in 1264, and was the regular time for the performance of religious dramas by the trade guilds. In England many of the _Corpus Christi_ plays of York, Coventry, and Chester are extant.

_Corpus Christi College_ at Cambridge was founded in 1352, and the College of the same name at Oxford in 1516.

_Corpus delicti_ (Lat.). The material thing in respect to which a crime has been committed; thus a murdered body or a portion of the stolen property would be a “corpus delicti.”

_Corpuscular_ Philosophy. The theory promulgated by Robert Boyle which sought to account for all natural phenomena by the position and motion of corpuscles. _Cp. Atomic Philosophy._

_Corrector_. See _Alexander the Corrector._

_Corroboree._ The name of a dance indulged in by Australian aborigines on feast or warlike occasions; hence any hilarious or slightly riotous assembly. The word belongs to the language of the natives of Port Jackson, (Sydney), New South Wales.

_Corruption of Blood_. Loss of title and entailed estates in consequence of treason, by which a man’s blood is attained and his issue suffers.

_Corsair_ (kôr’ săr’) means properly “one who gives chase.” Applied to the pirates of the northern coast of Africa. (Ital. _corso_, a chase; Fr. _corsaire_; Lat. _cursus_.) Byron’s poem in heroic couplets, _The Corsair_, was written in 1813.

_Corsican_ (kôr’ si kăn’). For many years this was the derogatory epithet applied to Napoleon, as Consul and Emperor, in allusion to his place of birth. It was often expanded to “the Corsican upstart” by the Colonel Blimp’s of the day.

_Corsned_ (kôr’ néd’). The piece of bread “consecrated for exorcism,” formerly given (in one form of the Old English “ordeall”) to a person to swallow as a test of his guilt (A.S. _cor_, choice, trial, smud, piece). The words of “consecration” were: “May this morsel cause convulsions and find no passage if the accused is guilty, but turn to wholesome nourishment if he is innocent.” _See_ Choke.

_Cortina_ (kôr’ tî ná’). The Spanish or Portuguese parliament. The word means “court officers.”

_Cortina_ (kôr’ tî ná’). The Spanish or Portuguese parliament. The word means “court officers.”

_Cortina_ (kôr’ tî ná’). The Spanish or Portuguese parliament. The word means “court officers.”

_Corps_ (Fr.). A diplomatic body: the foreign representatives at a Court collectively.

_Corpus_ (kôr’ pûs) (Lat., a body). The whole body or substance: especially the complete collection of writings on one subject or by one person, as the _Corpus poetarum Latinarum_, the _Corpus historicum mediævi_. Also, short for _Corpus Christi_ College.

_Corpus Christi College_ at Cambridge was founded in 1352, and the College of the same name at Oxford in 1516.

The Corypheus of German literature. Goethe, "prince of German poets" (1749-1832).

The Corypheus of Grammarians. Aristarchus of Samothrace (2nd century B.C.), a prince of grammarians and critics.

The Corypheus of Learning. Richard Porson (1759-1808), the great English classical scholar.

Coryphee. A ballet-dancer; strictly speaking, the leader of the ballet.

Cosset. A dweller in a cottage.

Costard. A large, ribbed apple, and, metaphorically, a man's head. See Whitestone of Witte.

Coss. Rule of. An old name for algebra (also called the Cossic Art); from Ital. regola di cosa; cosa being an unknown quantity, or a thing. See Whitestone of Witte.

Cost. A pet; especially a pet lamb brought up in the house. Hence, coset, to make a pet of; to fondle, caress. Probably from A.S. costar, a dweller in a cottage.

Costa Brava (kos'ta bra' va). The precipitous coast of Spain lying between Port Bou and San Feliu de Guixols.

Costard. A large, ribbed apple, and, metaphorically, a man's head. See Coster-Monger.

Coster-Monger. Take him over the costard with the hilts of thy sword.—Shakespeare: Richard III, i, 4.

Shakespeare gives the name to a clown in Love's Labour's Lost, who apes the court wit of the period, but misapplies and miscalls like Mrs. Malaprop or Dogberry.

Costermonger. A seller of eatables about the streets, properly an apple-seller: from Abercast, and is often applied generically to a Cockney of the East End.

Côte (kōt) (Fr., coast).

Côte d’Azur. The Mediterranean coast of France between Menton and Cannes, so named in 1887 by the poet Stephen Liegeard.

Côte d’Or. The department of France of which Dijon is the chief town. It is famous for its vineyards, for within its boundaries the whole of the best Burgundy is produced. The area extends south from Dijon, embracing Gevrey, Chambolle, Vougeot, Vosne, Nuits, Aloxe-Corton, Beaune, Pommard, Volnay, Meursault, Santenay, and ends at Chasne.

Côtes-du-Rhône. The name given collectively to the wines grown in the Rhône valley, below Lyons, of which the most famous are Chateauneuf-du-Pape, and Hermitage.

Cote-hardi (kōt ar dé). A tight-fitting tunic buttoned down the front.

Coterie (kō’t e ré). A French word originally signifying something like our "guild," a society where each paid his quota, but now applied to an exclusive set or clique, especially one composed of persons of similar tastes, aims, prejudices, etc.

Cotillon (ko’ ti’ yon). Originally a brisk dance by four or eight persons, in which the ladies held up their gowns and showed their under-petticoats (Fr. cotillon, a petticoat). Later the dance became a very elaborate one with many added figures; but it is very rarely seen in modern ball-rooms.

Cost (kot’ set). This is a word that is met with frequently in Domesday Book, where it describes one of the lowest types of feudal bondsmen, a cottage-dweller (A.S. cot-satta) who was bound to work most of his time for the lord.

Cotswoled. You are as long a-coming as Costwold barley. The Cotswold Hills, in Gloucestershire, are very cold and bleak, exposed to the winds, and very backward in vegetation, but they yield a good late supply of barley.

Cotswold lion. An ironical name for a sheep, for which Cotswold hills are famous. Then will he look as fierce as a Cotswold lion.

Cottage. This word, now applied to any small dwelling in the country, is found in law in the 13th century as signifying a small house without land.

Cottage Countess, The. Sarah Hoggins, of Shropshire, daughter of a small farmer, who, in 1791, married Henry Cecil, nephew and heir presumptive of the 9th Earl of Exeter. At the time he had no courtesy title and was a plain "Mr." He was living under the name of John Jones, and was separated from his wife, from whom he subsequently obtained a divorce and an Act of Parliament to legitimize the children of his second wife. Sarah Hoggins was seventeen at the time of her marriage, and "John Jones" was thirty. They were married by licence in the parish church of Bolas Magna, Salop and lived there for two years until his succession to the peerage made her a Countess. She died in 1797, four years before her husband's elevation to the Marquessate. Tennyson's poem, The Lord of Burleigh, is founded on this episode.

Cottage loaf. A loaf of bread in two round lumps, a smaller on top of a larger, and baked with a good crust.

Cottage piano. A small upright pianoforte.

Cotton. A cotton king. A rich Manchester cotton manufacturer, a king in wealth, style of living, equipage, number of employees, etc. Many county families had this origin.

To cotton to a person. To cling to or take a fancy to a person. To stick to a person as cotton sticks to our clothes.

To cotton on. To catch on, to grasp a line of thought.

Cottonopolis. Manchester; the great centre of cotton manufactures in Great Britain during the 19th century.

Cottonian Library. The remarkable library founded by the noted antiquary Sir Robert...
Bruce Cotton (1571-1631). It was augmented by his son and grandson, and having been secured for the nation by statute in 1700, was eventually deposited in the British Museum on the foundation of that institution in 1733. It is particularly rich in early MSS.

Cotys (kót'is). One of the three hundred-handed giants, son of Uranus (Heaven) and Gaea (Earth). His two brothers were Briareus and Gyges. See HUNDRED-HANDED.

Cotytto (ko t’ tō). The Thracian goddess of immodesty, worshipped at Athens with licentious rites. See BAPTES.

Milton: Comus 129, 130.

Where are they, Cotytto or Venus, Astarte or Ashtaroth, where?

Swinburne: Dolores.

Couleur de rose (koo lurr de rōz) (Fr., rose-coloured). Highly coloured; too favourably considered; overdrawn with romantic embellishments, like objects viewed through glass tinted with rose pink.

Council, Privy, Ecumenical, etc. See these words.

Count. A title of honour, used on the Continent and equivalent to English earl (A.S. earl, a warrior), of which countess is still the feminine and the title of the wife or widow of an earl. Count is from Lat. comitem, accusative of comes, a companion, which was a military title, as Comes Littoris Saxonicel. Count of the Saxon Shore, the Roman general responsible for the south-eastern coasts of Britain.

Count, To. From O. Fr. conter, Lat. computare (putare, to think), to compute, to reckon.

To count kin with someone. A Scots expression meaning to compare one's pedigree with that of another.

To count out the House. To declare the House of Commons adjourned because there are not forty members present. The Speaker has his attention called to the fact, and if he finds that this is so, he declares the sitting over.

To be counted out is said of a boxer who, after being knocked down, fails to regain his feet during the ten seconds counted out loud by the referee. Count me out. Do not reckon me in on this.

To count upon. To rely with confidence on someone or something; to reckon on.

To count without your host. See RECKON.

Countrenance, To. To sanction; to support. Approval or disapproval is shown by the countrenance. The Scripture speaks of "the light of God’s countrenance," i.e. the smile of approbation; and to "hide His face" (or countrenance) is to manifest displeasure.

To keep in countrenance. To encourage, or prevent someone losing his countrenance or feeling dismayed.

To keep one's countrenance. To refrain from smiling or expressing one's thoughts by the face.

Out of countrenance. Ashamed, confounded. With the countrenance fallen or cast down.

To put one out of countrenance is to make one ashamed or disconcerted. To "discountenance" is to set your face against something done or propounded.

Counter. Under the counter is a phrase that came into use during World War II in connection with dishonest tradesmen who, when commodities were in short supply, kept out of sight under the counter sufficient quantities to sell to favoured customers, often at enhanced prices.

Counter-caster. One who keeps accounts, or casts up accounts by counters. Thus, at the opening of Othello, Iago in contempt calls Cassio "a great arithmetician," and "this counter-caster"; and in The Winter's Tale, the Clown says: "Fifteen hundred shorn; what comes the wool to? I cannot do it without counters" (iv, 3).

Countercheck Quarrelsome. Sir, how dare you utter such a falsehood? Sir, you know that it is not true. This, in Touchstone's classification (Shakespeare's As You Like It, v, 4), is the third remove from the lie direct; or rather, the lie direct in the third degree.

The Reproof Valiant, the Countercheck Quarrelsome, the Lie Circumstantial, and the Lie Direct, are not clearly defined by Touchstone. That is not true; how dare you utter such a falsehood; if you say so, you are a liar; you lie, or are a liar, seem to fit the four degrees.

Counter-jumper. A contemptuous epithet applied by the ignorant to a shop assistant, who may be supposed to have to jump over the counter to go from one part of the shop to another.

Counterpane. A corruption of counterpoint, from the Lat. culcita puncta, a stitched quilt. This, in French, became courte-pointe, corrupted into contre-pointe, counterpoint, where point is pronounced "poyn," corrupted into "pane."

Countess. See COUNT; COTTAGE COUNTESS.

Country. Black Country. See BLACK.

Country dance. A corruption of the Fr. contre danse; i.e. a dance where the partners face each other, as in Sir Roger de Coverley.

Father of his country. See FATHER.

To appeal, or go, to the country. To dissolve Parliament in order to ascertain the wish of the country by a new election of representatives.

County. A shire; originally the district ruled by a count. The name is also officially applied to county boroughs, i.e. towns with more than 50,000 inhabitants which, under the Local Government Act of 1888, rank as administrative counties. For various names of divisions of counties, see HUNDRED.

County family. A family belonging to the nobility or gentry with an ancestral seat in the county.

County palatine. Properly, the dominion of an earl palatine (see PALATINATE), a county over which the count had royal privileges. Cheshire and Lancashire are the only Counties...
Palatine in England now; but formerly Durham, Pembroke, Hexhamshire, and the Isle of Ely had this rank.

Coup (koo) (Fr.). Properly a blow or stroke, but used both in French and English in a large number of ways, as for a clap of thunder, a draught of liquids, a piece of play in a game (a move in chess, etc.), a stroke of policy or of luck, a trick, etc.

A good coup. A good hit or haul.

Coup d’essai. A trial-piece; a piece of work serving for practice.

Coup d’état. A state stroke, and the term is applied to one of those bold measures taken by Government to prevent a supposed or actual danger; as when a large body of men are arrested suddenly for fear they should overturn the Government.

The famous coup d’état, by which Louis Napoleon became possessed of absolute power, took place on December 2nd, 1851.

Coup de grâce. The finishing stroke; the stroke of mercy. When a criminal was tortured by the wheel or otherwise, the executioner gave him a coup de grâce, or blow on the head or breast, to put him out of his misery.

Coup de main. A sudden stroke, a stratagem whereby something is effected suddenly; a coup.

It appears more like a line of march than a body intended for a coup de main, as there are with it bullocks and baggage of different kinds.—WELLINGTON: Dispatches, vol. i, p. 25.

Coup d’œil. A view, glance, prospect; the effect of things at the first glance; literally “a stroke of the eye.”

Coup de pied de l’âne. Literally, a kick from the ass’s hoof; figuratively, a blow given to a vanquished or fallen man; a cowardly blow; an insult offered to one who has not the power of returning or avenging it. The allusion is to the fable of the sick lion kicked by the ass.

Coup de soleil. A sunstroke, any malady produced by exposure to the sun.

Coup de théâtre. An unforeseen or unexpected turn in a drama producing a sensational effect; a piece of clap-trap, something planned for effect. Burke throwing down the dagger in the House of Commons (see DAGGER SCENE) intended a coup de théâtre.

Coup manqué. A false stroke, a miss, a failure.

Shoot dead, or don’t aim at all; but never make a coup manqué. Oxen: Under Two Flags, ch. xx.

Coupon. In commercial phraseology, a coupon is a certificate of interest which is to be cut off (Fr. couper) from a bond and presented for payment. It bears on its face the date and amount of interest to be paid.

In times when rationing has been necessary the word has been employed for the detachable portions of a ration-book required to buy clothing, etc.

In political phraseology the coupon was the official recognition given by Lloyd George and Bonar Law to parliamentary candidates who proclaimed their allegiance to the coalition programme at the General Election of December, 1918. Hence, coupioneer, a politician who accepted the “coupon.”

Course. Another course would have done it. A little more would have effected our purpose. It is said that the peasants of a Yorkshire village tried to wall in a cuckoo in order to enjoy an eternal spring. They built a wall round the bird, and the cuckoo just skimmed over it. “Ah!” said one of the peasants, “another course would ‘a done it.”

There is a school of moralists who, connecting sundry short-comings . . . with changes in manners, endeavour to persuade us that only “another course” is wanted to wall in the cuckoo.—Nineteenth Century. December, 1892, p. 920.

In course; in the course of nature. In the due and proper time or order, etc.; in the ordinary procedure of nature.

Of course. Naturally; as would be expected.

A matter of course is something that belongs to ordinary procedure, or that is customary.

To hold, or keep on the course. To go straight; to do one’s duty in that course [path] of life in which we are placed. The allusion is to navigation.

Court. From Lat. cohors, cohortem, originally a coop or sheepfold. It was on the Latium hills that the ancient Latins raised their cors or cohors, small enclosures with hurdles for sheep, etc. Subsequently, as many men as could be coopered or folded together were called a cohort. The cattle-yard, being the nucleus of the farm, became the centre of a lot of farm cottages, then of a hamlet, town, fortified place, and lastly of a royal residence.

Court cards. A corruption of coat card, so called because these cards bear the representation of a clothed or coated figure, and not because the king, queen, and knave may be considered to belong to a Court.

The king of clubs may originally have represented the arms of the Pope; of spades, the king of France; of diamonds, the King of Spain; and of hearts, the King of England. The French kings in cards are called David (spades), Alexander (clubs), Cæsar (diamonds), and Charles (hearts)—representing the Jewish, Greek, Roman, and Frankish empires. The queens or dames are Argine—i.e. Juno (hearts), Judith (clubs), Rachel (diamonds), and Pallas (spades)—representing royalty, fortitude, piety, and wisdom. They were likenesses of Marie d’Anjou, the queen of Charles VII; Isabeau, the queen-mother; Agnes Sorel, the king’s mistress; and Jeanne d’Arc, the dame of spades, or war.

Court Circular. The information concerning the movements and doings of Royalty and the Court generally, supplied to the newspapers by the Court Newsman. He gives reports of levees, drawing-rooms, state balls, royal concerts, meetings of the cabinet ministers, deputations to ministers, and so on. George III, in 1803, introduced the custom to prevent misstatements on these subjects.

Court cupboard. A movable buffet to hold flagons, cans, cups, and beckers.

Away with the joint-stools, remove the court-cupboard, look to the plate.—SHAKESPEARE: Romeo and Juliet, i, 5.
Court

Court fools. See Fools.

Court holy water. An obsolete Elizabethan term for fair speeches; and promises of favour, but end in nothing.

O nurse, court holy water in a dry house is better than this rain-water out o' door.—Shakespeare: King Lear, iii, 2.

In Florio's Italian Dictionary (1598) Mantellizare is translated by "to flatter or fawne upon, to court one with faire words or give court holy water."

Court-leet. See Leet.

Court martial. A court convened as circumstances may require to try a person subject to military law. In Great Britain such courts were instituted in consequence of the Mutiny Act of 1690.

Court plaster. The plaster of which the court ladies made their patches. These patches, worn on the face, were cut into all sorts of fanciful shapes, some even patching their faces with a coach and four, a ship in full sail, a chateau, etc. This ridiculous fashion was in vogue in the reign of Charles I; and in Queen Anne's time was employed as a political badge.

Your black patches you wear variously,
Some cut like stars, some in half-moons, some lozenges.
Beaumont and Fletcher: Elder Brother, iii, 2.

Court of Arches. See Arch.

Court of love. A judicial court for deciding affairs of the heart, established in Provence during the days of the Troubadours. The following is a case submitted to their judgment:

A lady listened to one admirer, squeezed the foot of a third. Query: Which of these three was the favoured suitor?

Court of Pie-powder. See Pie-powder.

Court of Session. The supreme civil tribunal in Scotland. It dates from 1532, and represents the united powers of the Session of the Inner and Outer House; the total number of judges is thirteen, including the Lord President (or Lord Justice General) and the Lord Justice Clerk.

They are but in the Court of the Gentiles. They are not wholly God's people; they are not the elect, but have only a smattering of the truth. The "Court of the Israelites" in the Jewish temple was for Jewish men; the "Court of the Women" was for Jewish women; the "Court of the Gentiles" was for those who were not Jews.

Out of court. Not admissible evidence within the terms of reference of the trial being conducted by the Court in question.

To settle out of court. A case, almost invariably involving damages, which is settled by the respective litigants' solicitors, before it is called to court, agreeing on a sum to be paid by the litigant who admits himself to be in the wrong.

Courtepy. See Pea-Jacket.

Courtly. Wrong.

by the respective litigants' solicitors, before it is called to court, agreeing on a sum to be paid by the litigant who admits himself to be in the wrong.

Courtepsy. See Pea-Jacket.

Courtesy (kérté si) Civility, politeness. It was at the courts of princes and great feudatories that all in attendance practised the refinements of the age in which they lived. The word originally meant the manners of the court.

Courtesy titles. Titles assumed or granted by social custom, but not of any legal value. The courtesy title of the eldest son of a duke is marquis; of a marquis is earl; of an earl is viscount. Younger sons of peers are by courtesy called lord or honourable, and the daughters are lady or honourable. These titles do not give the holders the right to sit in the House of Lords.

Cousin. Blackstone says that Henry IV, being related or allied to every earl in the kingdom, artfully and constantly acknowledged the connexion in all public acts. The usage has descended to his successors, and in British royal writs and commissions an earl is still styled "Our right trusty and well-beloved cousin," a marquis "Our right trusty and entirely-beloved cousin," and a duke "Our right trusty and right-entirely-beloved cousin."

The word is also used by sovereigns in addressing one another formally; and in Italy it was a very high honour to be nominated by the king a "Cousin of the King."

Cousin Betty, or Betty. A half-witted person, a "Bess of Bedlam" (q.v.). [Note] can say Foster's wronged him of a penny, or gave short measure to a child or a cousin Betsy.—MRS GASKELL.

Cousin-german. The children of brothers and sisters, first cousins; kinsfolk. (Lat. germanus, a brother, one of the same stock.)

There is three cousin-germans that has cousin all the hosts of Reading, of Maidenhead, of Colebrook, of horses and money—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, iv, 5.

Cousin Jack. So Cornishmen are called in the western counties, and in places where they are working as miners.

Cousin Michael. The Germans are so called. Michel, in Old German, means "gross"; Cousin Michael is meant to indicate a slow, heavy, unrefined, coarse-feeding people.

To call cousins. This formerly meant to claim relationship—

He is half-brother to this Witword by a former wife, who was sister to my Lady Wishfort, my wife's mother; if you marry Millamant you must call cousins too.—Congreve: Way of the World, i, 5.

I wouldn't call the king my cousin. I am perfectly satisfied with things as they are; they couldn't be bettered even if I were cousin to the king.

Couvade. The name given by anthropologists to the custom prevalent among some primitive races by which the father of a newly born infant makes a pretence of going through the same experiences as the mother, lies up for a time, abstains from certain foods, etc., as though he, too, were physically affected by the birth (from Fr. couver, to hatch). The custom has been observed by travellers in Guiana and other parts of South America, among some African tribes, in parts of China, Borneo, etc., and it was noted by the ancients as occurring in Corsica and among the Celt-Iberians.

Cove. A term applied, during the civil wars, to the Scottish Presbyterians, who, in 1643, united by "solemn league and covenant" to resist the encroachments of Charles I on religious liberty. On the Restoration (1660) all toleration of Presbyterians ceased and for twenty-five years the Covenanters were harried and proscribed, their sad history being lightened by many acts of devotion and heroism under cruel persecution.

Covenanters. A term applied, during the civil wars, to the Scottish Presbyterians, who, in 1643, united by "solemn league and covenant" to resist the encroachments of Charles I on religious liberty. On the Restoration (1660) all toleration of Presbyterians ceased and for twenty-five years the Covenanters were harried and proscribed, their sad history being lightened by many acts of devotion and heroism under cruel persecution.

Covent Garden. A corruption of Convent Garden; the garden and burial ground attached to the convent of Westminster, and turned into a fruit and flower market in the reign of Charles II. At the dissolution of the monasteries the site was granted to the Duke of Somerset; on its attainder in 1552 it passed to the Earl of Bedford, to whose descendants it belonged till 1914, when it was sold by the 11th Duke.

Covent Garden has various claims to fame. During the 17th and 18th centuries it was the centre of the rowdier element of London's social life, the stamping-ground of the Mohocks and other semi-fashionable ruffians. Its coffee-houses and taverns were favourite resorts of such men of parts as Dryden, Otway, Steele, Fielding, Foote, Garrick, etc. The vegetable market was opened in the early 17th century, but was not properly organized until 1828.

Covent Garden Theatre was opened by Rich, the harlequin, in 1732 with Congreve's Westminster; the World. After Rich's death it was sold to George Colman the elder, who, in 1777, brought out She Stoops to Conquer. The house has been twice burned down (1808 and 1856); in 1847 it started a famous career as the Royal Italian Opera House, and in the years that have followed it has become one of the greatest opera-houses in Europe.

Coventry. Coventry Mysteries. Miracle plays supposed to have been acted at Corpus Christi (q.v.) at Coventry till 1591. They were published in 1841 for the Shakespeare Society; but, though called Ludus Coventriae by Sir Robert Bruce Cotton's librarian in the time of James I, it is doubtful whether they had any special connexion with the town.

Parliaments held at Coventry. Two parliaments have been held in this city, one in 1404, styled Parliamentium Indicorum; and the other in 1459, called Parliamentium Diabolicum.

To send one to Coventry. To take notice of him to make him feel that he is in disgrace by having no dealings with him. Cp. Boycott. It is said that the citizens of Coventry ad at one time so great a dislike to soldiers that a woman seen speaking to one was instantly tabooed; hence, when a soldier was sent to Coventry he was cut off from all social intercourse.

Hutton, in his History of Birmingham, gives a different version. He says that Coventry was a stronghold of the Parliamentary party in the Civil Wars, and that troublesome and refractory Royalist prisoners were sent there for safe custody.

Cover. To break cover. To start from the covert or temporary lair. The usual earth-holes of a fox being blocked the night before a hunt, the creature makes some gorse-bush or other cover its temporary resting-place, and as soon as it quits it the hunt begins.

Coverdale's Bible. See BIble, THE ENGLISH.

Coverley. Sir Roger de Coverley. A member of an hypothetical club in the Spectator, "who lived in Soho Square when he was in town." Sir Roger is the type of an English squire in the reign of Queen Anne. He figures in thirty papers of the Spectator.

Who can be insensible to his unpretending virtues and amiable weaknesses; his modesty, generosity, hospitality, and eccentric whims; the respect for his neighbours, and the affection of his domestics?—HIZLITT.

The well-known country dance was known by this name (or, rather, as Roger of Coverly) many years before Addison's time.

Cow. The cow that nourished Ymir with four streams of milk was called Audhumla.

Curst cows have curt horns. Angry men cannot do all the mischief they wish. Curt means "angry" or "fierce," and curt is "short," as curt-mantle, curt-hose. The Latin proverb is, Dat Deus inmiti cornua curta bovi.

You are called plain Kate.
And bonny Kate, and sometimes Kate the curst.
Taming of the Shrew, ii, 1.

The cow knows not the worth of her tail till she loses it, and is troubled with flies, which her brush off.

The tune the old cow died of. See TUNE.

The whiter the cow, the surer is it to go to the altar. The richer the prey, the more likely is it to be seized.

The system of impropriations grew so rapidly that, in the course of three centuries, more than a third part of all the benefited in England became such, and those the richest, for the whiter the cow, the surer was it to go to the altar.—BLUNT: Reformation in England, p. 63.

Cow-lick. A tuft of hair on the forehead that cannot be made to lie in the same direction as the rest of the hair.

This term must have been adopted from a comparison with that part of a cow's side where the hair, having different directions, meet and form a projecting ridge, supposed to be occasioned by the animals licking themselves.—BROCHETT: Glossary of North Country Words.

Coward. Ultimately from Lat. cauda, a tail, the allusion seems to be either from an animal "turning tail" when frightened, or from its cowering with its tail between its legs.

In the French version of Reynard the Fox the Hare is called Coart, which may refer either to his timidity or to the conspicuousness of his tail (O.Fr. coe) as it runs away.

A beast cowarded, in heraldry, is one drawn with its tail between its legs.

Cowper Justice. Cupar Justice (q.v.).

Cowper-Temple Clause. Clause 14 of the Education Act of 1870 (so called from its author, W. Cowper-Temple (1811-88), which regulated religious teaching in public elementary schools. It enacted that "in any school provided by a School Board, no religious catechism or religious formulary which is distinctive of any particular denomination, shall be taught."

Coxcomb. An empty-headed, vain person. The ancient licensed jesters were so called because they wore a cock’s comb in their caps. Coxcombs, an ever empty race.

Coxswain (cock’s son). The helmsman; originally the swain or servant of a cock (see Cocksail). The old spelling of the word was Cocksain.

Coyne and Livery. An old Irish term for food and entertainment for soldiers, and forage for their horses, formerly exacted from private persons by Irish chiefs when on the march. Coyne is Irish coinemh, billeting, or one billeted.

Coystril. A term of reproach, meaning a low fellow, a knave, a varlet. He’s a coward and a coystril that will not drink to my niece.—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, i, 3.

It is a variant of obsolete custel, an attendant on a knight, which seems to be connected with O.Fr. costillier, a soldier armed with a coustille, i.e. a two-edged dagger. Every soldier in the life-guards of Henry VIII was attended by a man called a coystrel or coystril.

Cozen. To cheat. This is the same word as cousin; the Fr. cousinier means “to sponge on” as well as “to call cousin”; and in England a person who cozened another was one who went and stayed at his house and lived on him just because they were “cousins.”—See Shakespeare’s Merry Wives, iv, 2, and v, 5.

Crab. A walking-stick made of crab-apple wood; a crabstick.

Out bolts her husband upon me with a fine taper crab in his hand.—Garrick: Lying Vale, ii, 2.

To catch a crab. See Catch.

Crack. First-rate, excellent, quite at the top of its class; something that is “cracked up” (see below), as a crack regiment, a crack hand of cards, a crack shot, etc. Formerly the word was used substantively for a lively young fellow, a wag:

Indeed, la! ’tis a noble child: a crack, madam. —Shakespeare: Coriolanus, i, 3.

A gude crack. In Scottish dialect, a good chat or conversation, also a good talker.

Wi’ merry sangs, an’ friendly cracks,
I wat they did na weary;
And unco tales, an’ fuunie jokes—
Their sports were cheery and cheery.

Burns: Halloween.

To be a gude crack . . . was essential to the trade of a “puir body” of the more esteemed class.—Scott: Antiquary (Introduction).

Crack-brained. Eccentric; slightly mad. Cracked pipkins are discovered by their sound. Ignorance is betrayed by speech.

They bid you talk—my honest song
Bids you for ever hold your tongue;
Silence with some is wisdom most profound—
Cracked pipkins are discovered by the sound.

Peter Pindar: Lord B. and his Motions.

In a crack. Instantly. In a snap of the fingers, in the time taken by a crack or shot. Do pray undo the bolt a little faster—They’re on the stair just now, and in a crack Will all be here.

Byron: Don Juan, i, cxxvii.

To crack a bottle. In this phrase the word means to open and drink:

They went to a tavern and there they dined, And bottles cracked most merrily.

Bold Pedlar and Robin Hood.

You’ll crack a quart together. Ha, will you not, Master Bardolph.—2 Henry IV, v, 3.

Dear Tom, this brown jug that now foams with mild ale,
From which I now drink to sweet Nan of the Vale.
Was once Toby Filpot’s, a thirsty old soul
As ever cracked a bottle, or fathomed a bowl.

O’Kiffe: Poor Soldier.

To crack a crib. To break into a house as a thief. See Crib. Hence, cracksman, a burglar.

To crack up. To praise highly, to eulogize. We find them cracking up the country they belong to, no matter how absurd may be the boast.—Jas. Payn: By Percy, ch. i.

It also means to break down in health or mind; or to crash an aeroplane or motor car.

Cracker. A word used in several senses:
A small firework (U.S.A., fire-breaker). A bon-bon containing sweets or toys with an appropriate motto, in use at Christmas. A flaky, unsweetened water biscuit; in the U.S.A. the word is applied to any kind of biscuit.

Poor white folk in the Southern U.S.A., and back-country folk generally. This is an early 19th-century term, arising from the long whips they cracked at their horse teams.

Crackers. 20th-century slang phrase for mentally unbalanced.

Cracksman. A burglar. See To Crack A Crib above.

Cradle-holding. A name given to land held by Borough English (q.v.).

Craft. Skill, ability, trade (A.S. craft). A craftsman is a mechanic. A handicraft is manual skill, i.e. mechanical skill; leechcraft is skill in medicine (A.S., lese, a physician); and before crafty adopted its bad sense it meant merely skillful, ingenious.

Small craft. Such vessels as schooners, sloops, cutters, and so on.

The Craft is the word usually employed by Freemasons to describe their fraternity.

Cram. To tell what is not true. A crammer, an untruth. The allusion is to stuffing a person with useless rubbish. It is, perhaps, in this connexion that working at high pressure for an examination is termed cram.

Crambo. A game which consists in someone setting a line which another is to rhyme to, but no one word of the first line must occur in the second. The word is of uncertain origin, but possibly it comes from the billiards term crambo.

Get the lead out of crambo of an evening and learn the knack of rhyming.—CONEGREGE: Love for Love, i. 1.

Dumb crambo is a somewhat similar game, but there are the words expressed in pantomime or dumb show.

Crambo. A ring that was consecrated by the king on Good Friday and was supposed to protect the wearer against cramp, "falling sickness," etc.

Because Cotshawk goes in a shag-ruff band, with a face sticking up in't which shows like an agate set in a cram-ring, he thinks I'm in love with him.—MIDDLETON: The Roaring Girl, IV, ii (1611).

The superstitious use of cram-rings, as a preservative against fits, is not entirely abandoned; instances occur where nine young men of a parish each subscribe a crooked sixpence, to be moulded into a ring for a young woman afflicted with this malady.—ROKENWODE: The Hundred of Thingoe (Suffolk), Introd. (1815).

To scour the cram-ring. To be put into fetters: to be imprisoned. The allusion is obvious.

There's no muckle hazard o' scouring the cram-ring.—SCOTT: Guy Mannering, ch. xxiii.

Crank. In Elizabethan thieves' slang, an Abram-man (q.v.): so called from Ger. krank (sickly). It was formerly used of a leaky ship, and is still employed in the U.S.A. in the sense of weak or sickly. Nowadays a crank is a person with a mental twist, an eccentric person, and the name is obviously an extension of the mechanical crank, which is a bent axle or handle designed to convert linear into rotary motion, or to impart motion to a wheel.

Cranmer's Bible. See BIBLE, THE ENGLISH.

Cranknock. An Irish measure which, in the days of Edward II, contained either eight or ten pecks. Curnock is another form of the word: this was a dry measure of varying capacity, but usually 3 bushels for wheat, 1 bushel for corn, and from 10 to 15 bushels for coal, lime, etc.

Crapaud or Johnny Crapaud. A Frenchman; according to Guillim's Display of Heraldry (1611), so called from a device of the ancient kings of France, "three toads [Fr. crapauds] rect. saltant."—See FLEUR-DE-LIS.

Les anciens crapauds prenderont Sara. One of the cryptic "prophecies" of Nostradamus (1503-66). Sara is Aras reversed, and when the French under Louis XIV took Arras from the Spaniards, this verse was remembered.

rape. A saint in crape is twice a saint in town. (Pope: Ep. to Cobham, 136.) Crape (a sort of bombeazine, or alpaca) is the stuff of which cheap clerical gowns used to be made; "lawn" refers to the lawn sleeves of a bishop. Crape was also the material used for mourning reses, etc. It is said to have been first made by St. Badorn, Queen of France, c. 680.

ratur. A drop of the cratur. See CREATURE.

ravat (kra' vät'). This neckcloth was introduced into France in the 17th century by roatian soldiers, or, as they called themselves, ravates (O.Slav. khruvat). The Croats armed the Austrian frontiers of Austria, and when France organized a regiment on the model of the Croats, their linen neckcloth were imitated, and the regiment was called "The Royal Cravat."

The Bonny Cravat. An old public-house sign at Woodchurch, Kent: a corruption of La bonne corvete. Woodchurch was noted for smuggling, and the "Bonnie Cravat" was a smuggler's hostelry.

To wear a hempen cravat. To be hanged.

Craven. In M.E. crauent, the word is the O.Fr. cravant, pres. part. of craver or crever, to burst or break, hence to be overcome. The "-en" is a mistake for "-ant"; it makes the word look like a past participle instead of what it really is, a present.

When controversies were decided by an appeal to battle, the combatants fought with batons, and if the accused could either kill his adversary or maintain the fight till sundown he was acquitted. If he wished to call off, he cried out "Craven!" and was held infamous.

Crawley. Crooked as Crawley or Crawley brook, a river in Bedfordshire. That part called the brook, which runs into the Ouse, is so crooked that a boat would have to go eighty miles in order to make a direct progress of eighteen. (Fuller: Worthies.)

Crawley. Crooked as Crawley or Crawley brook, a river in Bedfordshire. That part called the brook, which runs into the Ouse, is so crooked that a boat would have to go eighty miles in order to make a direct progress of eighteen. (Fuller: Worthies.)

Creaking Doors Hang the Longest. Delicate persons often outlive the more robust.

Creature. Wine, whisky or other spirits. The use of the word is a facetious adaptation of the passage "Every creature of God is good," 1 Tim. iv, 4, used in the defence of wine as a legitimate drink.

I find my master took too much of the creature last night, and now is angling for a quarrel.—DRYDEN: Amphitryon, iii, 1.

A drop of the creature. A little whisky. The Irish call it "a drop of the cratur."

Creature-comforts. Food and other things necessary for the comfort of the body. Man being supposed to consist of body and soul, the body is the creature, but the soul is the "vital spark of heavenly flame."

Mr. Squeers had been seeking in creature-comforts (brandy and water) temporary forgetfulness of his unpleasant situation.—DICKENS: Nicholas Nickleby.

Credence Table. The table near the altar on which the bread and wine are deposited before they are consecrated. In former times food was placed on a credence-table to be tasted previously to its being set before the guests. This was done to assure the guests that the meat was not poisoned. (Ital. credenza, a shelf or buffet.)

Credite Foncier. (kra' dé fong'si å'). Loans to landowners, first introduced by Frederick the Great in 1763 to alleviate distress caused by the prolonged wars.
Cranial. No connexion with the crane.

Crescent. A statement of belief.

Credo quia impossibile (Lat.), I believe it is impossible. A paradox ascribed to St. Augustine, but founded on a passage in Tertullian's De Carne Christi, IV:

Credible est, quia ineptum est ... certum est quia impossibile.

Creme de Ja Crème (krâm de la krâm) (Fr.). Literally, "cream of the cream"; used figuratively for the very choicest part of something which itself is very choice.

Cremona (kre mó'nä). A town in Lombardy famous for a school of violin-makers, 1550-1750. The most famous makers were Nicolò Amati (1596-1684), teacher of Andrea Guarneri (fl. 1650-95) and Antonio Stradivari (1649-50-1737). The term is loosely applied to any good instrument.

The organ-stop known as the cromona has no connexion with the above but the term is a corruption of the German krummhorn, crooked horn. It is a reed stop of 8-foot tone.

Cremona Gardens (kre'mör'nä). These pleasure gardens were in Chelsea, on the site now largely occupied by the Lots Road Power Station. The Gardens were opened in 1845 and for some years furnished the gayier side of London with much the same fare that Vauxhall had previously supplied. Spectacular balloon ascents were made from there; a medical warrant was got up; and every night there was dancing to be had, with all the other attractions of shady paths, flickering lamps, and attractive girls. Eventually the Gardens became such a centre of rowdiness that the neighbourhood revolted, and they were closed for good in 1877. Their memory is preserved in some of Whistler's Nocturnes.

Creole (kré'ól). A person of European parentage born in the West Indies or central America—a term of 16th-century Spanish origin (from criollo, W. Indian corruption of Sp. Criollo, from criado—bred, brought up). Used by the French of white residents (whether Fr. or Sp.) in Louisiana. The Empress Josephine was a Creole from Martinique.

Crêpe Rubber (kräp) is a term employed to describe raw, unvulcanized sheet rubber that has not been chemically treated in any way. It is crinkly (hence its name, crêpe, Fr. wavy) and is largely used for shoe soles, etc.

Crescelle (kre sel'). A wooden rattle used in R.C. churches in Holy Week in place of the bell rung at the elevation, etc., during mass.

Crescent. Tradition says that "Philip, the father of Alexander, meeting with great difficulties in the siege of Byzantium, set the workmen to work on the walls, but a crescent moon discovered the design, which miscarried; consequently the Byzantines erected a statue to Diana, and the crescent became the symbol of the state."

Another legend is that Othman, the Sultan, saw in a vision a crescent moon, which kept increasing till its horns extended from east to west, and he adopted the crescent of his dream for his standard, adding the motto, "Donee replet orbem."

Crescent City. The descriptive name in the U.S.A. for New Orleans.

Cresset. A beacon light. The original cresset was an open metal cup at the top of a pole, the cup being filled with burning grease or oil. Hence the name; from O.Fr. cresse (Mod. Fr. grasse), grease.

Cressida (kres' i dâ). Cressid. Daughter of Calchas, a priest, beloved by Troilus (q.v.). They vowed eternal fidelity to each other, and as pledges of their vow Troilus gave the maiden a sleeve, and Cressid gave the Trojan prince a glove. Scarse had the vow been made when an exchange of prisoners was agreed to. Diomed gave up three Trojan princes, and was to receive Cressid in lieu thereof. Cressid vowed to remain constant, and Troilus swore to rescue her. She was led off to the Grecian's tent, and soon gave all her affectations to Diomed—may, even bade him wear the sleeve that Troilus had given her in token of his love.

As false
As air, as water, wind, or sandy earth,
As fox to lamb, as wolf to heifer's calf,
Pard to the hind, or step-dame to her son:
"Yea," let them say, to stick the heart of falsehood,
"As false as Cressid."

Troilus and Cressida, iii, 2.

Cresswell, Madam. A notorious bawd who kept a house of ill-fame in London between 1670 and 1684. In her old age she became a religious devotee and bequeathed £10 for a funeral sermon, in which nothing ill should be said of her. She was not only detested by the Earl of Rochester is said to have written the sermon, which was as follows: "All I shall say of her is this—she was born well, she married well, lived well, and died well; for she was born at Shad-well, married to Cresswell, lived at Clerken-well, and died in Bride-well."

Crestfallen. Dispirited. The allusion is to fighting cocks, whose crest falls in defeat and rises rigid and of a deep-red colour in victory.

Shall I seem crest-fallen in my father's sight?
Shakespeare: Richard II, i, 1.

Coupe le gorge, that's the word. I thee defy again, O hound of Crete. Shakespeare: Henry V, ii, 1.

The Infamy of Crete. The Minotaur (q.v.).

There lay stretched
The infamy of Crete, detested brood
Of the leagued heifer.
Dante: Hell, xii (Cary's translation).

Cretinism (kret' in izm). Mental imbecility accompanied by goitre. So called from the Cretins of the Alps. The word is a corruption of Christian (Chrétien), because, being baptized, and only idiots, they were "washed from original sin," and incapable of actual sin. Similarly, idiots are called innocents. (Fr. crétin.)

Crewel Garters. Garters made of worsted or yarn.

Ha! ha! look, he wears cruel garters.
Shakespeare: King Lear, ii, 4.

The resemblance in sound between crewel...
Crib

(thed derivation of which is unknown) and cruel formerly gave rise to many puns, e.g.—
Wearing of silk, why art thou so cruel?
Woman's a Weathercock (1612).

Crib. Thieves' slang for a house or dwelling, as "Stocking Crib" (a hosier's shop), "Thimble Crib" (a silversmith's): also slang for a petty theft, and for a translation from Latin, Greek, etc., surreptitiously used by schoolboys in doing their lessons. To crib is to pilfer or purloin, and to copy someone else's work without acknowledging it, to plagiarize.

The word originally denoted a manger with bats: hence its application to a child's cot.

To crack a crib. See CRACK.

Cricket. The earliest mention of the game appears to be the reference in the Guild Merchant Book of Guildford, dated 1598, when John Denwick of Guildford, being then about fifty-nine years of age, deposed that he had known a certain parcel of land "for the space of Fifty years and more," and that "hee and several of his fellowes did runne and play there at Creckett and other plaies" when he was a scholar at the Guildford Free School.

This would take the game back to the end of Henry VIII's reign, and it was certainly a Walkhamst game in the days of Elizabeth.

In 1700 two stumps were used 24 inches apart and 12 inches high, with long bails atop. A middle stump was added by the Hambledon Club in 1775. The height of the stumps was raised to 28 inches in 1929. The length of run is 22 yards.

The first cricket club was the Hambledon, which practically came to an end in 1791, but existed in name till 1825.

The Marylebone Cricket Club (M.C.C.), which is regarded as the governing body of the game, was founded in 1787. Its ground was originally on the site now occupied by Dorset Square; in 1811 the groundsman, Thomas Lord, moved it to Regent's Park, and in 1814 to its present position in St. John's Wood, known after him as Lord's Cricket Ground.

The word cricket is probably from A.S. crik, criece, a staff, and is thus connected with crutch.

It's not cricket. It's not done in a fair and sportsmanlike way.

Merry as a cricket. See GRIG.

Crikey (kri' ki'). An exclamation; a mild oath; originally a euphemistic modification of Christ.

Crillon (krē' yon). Where art thou, Crillon? Crillon, surnamed the Brave, in his old age went to church, and listened intently to the story of the Crucifixion. In the middle of the narrative he grew excited, and, unable to contain himself, cried out, "Ou etiez-vous, Crillon?" One of the finest hotels in Paris, named after him; it was the German Headquarters during the occupation, 1940-44.

Crillon (1541-1615) was one of the greatest captains of the 16th century. He fought at the battle of Ivry (1590), and was entitled by Henri IV "le brave des braves."

Henri IV, after the battle of Arbogast (1589), wrote to Crillon: "Prend-toi, brave Crillon, mets a sauvage a Arques, et tu n'y eisin pas." This letter has become proverbial.

Crimen laesae majestatis (kri' men le' ze maj es tā' tis) (Lat.). High treason. See LESE-MAJESTE.

Crimp. A decoy; especially one of those riverside pests who purport to supply ships with sailors, but who are in league with public-houses and low-class lodging-houses, into which they decoy the sailors and relieve them of their money under one pretence or another.

Crinoline (krin' ō lēn). The word comes from Latin crinis, hair, and linum, linen, and originally meant the stiff horsehair and linen material used to swell out the skirts of women's dresses. When enormous skirts became fashionable, about 1856, cages of steel or whalebone were worn to keep them spread to their full extent, and these also were called crinolines. The crinoline reached its largest spread about 1866, and then quickly subsided, to be replaced by the bustle.

Cripplegate. This district in the City of London was so called before the Conquest from the number of cripples who resorted thither to beg, because of the parish church of St. Giles (q.v.), the patron of cripples (Stow). Churches dedicated to this saint are common in the suburbs of large towns, as St. Giles of Norwich, Cambridge, Salisbury, etc.

Crishna. See KRISHNA.

Crisis properly means the "ability to judge." Hippocrates said that all diseases had their periods, when the humours of the body ebbed and flowed like the tide of the sea. These tidal days he called critical days, and the tide itself a crisis, because it was on these days the physician could determine whether the disorder was taking a good or a bad turn.

The seventh and all its multiples were critical days of a favourable character. (Gr. krinein, to decide or determine.)

Crispin. A shoemaker. St. Crispin was a shoemaker, and was therefore chosen for the patron saint of the craft. It is said that two brothers, Crispin and Crispian, born in Rome, went to Soisson, in France (A.D. 303), to propagate the Christian religion, and maintained themselves wholly by making and mending shoes. Probably the tale is fabulous, for crepis is Greek for a shoe. Latin crepida; and St. Crepis or Crepid became Crepin and Crispin.

St. Crispin's Day. October 25th, the day of the battle of Agincourt. Shakespeare makes Crispin Crispian one person, and not two brothers. Hence Henry V says to his soldiers—

And Crispin Crispian shall ne'er go by . . .

But we in it shall be remembered. Henry V, iv, 3.

St. Crispin's Day. Every Monday, with those who begin the working week on Tuesday; a no-work day with shoemakers.

Critic. A judge; an arbiter. (Gr. kríkein, to judge, to determine.)

A captious, malignant critic is called a Zoilus (q.v.).

"And what of this new book the whole world makes such a rout about?" "Oh, it is out of all plumb, my lord; quite an irregular thing! Not one of the angles at the four corners is a right angle. I had my rule and compasses in my pocket!" "Excellent critic!"

"And for the epic poem your lordship bade me look at, upon taking the length, breadth, height, and depth of it, and trying them at home upon an exact scale of Bossu's [Bossut's], 'tis out, my lord, in every one of its dimensions." "Admirable connoisseur!"—STERNE: Tristram Shandy, vol. iii, ch. xii.

The abbé Charles Bossut (1730-1814) was a noted mathematician and geometer.

Prince of critics. Aristarchus, of Byzantium, who compiled the rhapsodies of Homer. (2nd cent. B.C.)

Stop-watch critics.

"And how did Garrick speak the soliloquy last night?" "Oh, against all rule, my lord, most ungrammatically. Between the substantive and the adjective, which should agree together in number, case, and gender, he made a breach, thus—stopping as if the point wanted settling; and betwixt the nominative case, which your lordship knows, should govern the verb, he suspended his voice in the epilogue a dozen times, three seconds and three-fifths by a stop-watch, my lord, each time." "Admirable grammarian! But in suspending his voice was the sense suspended likewise? Did no expression of attitude or countenance fill up the chasm? Was the eye silent? Did you narrow your eyes?" "I looked only at the stop-watch, my lord." "Excellent observer!"—STERNE: Tristram Shandy, vol. iii, ch. xii.

Croak, To. In slang this means to die, the term probably coming from the hoarse death rattle or croak of the expiring breath. A hedge doctor, or wandering quack is known as a Croaker, or one who makes his patients croak.

Croaker. A raven, so called from its croak; one who takes a desponding view of things. Goldsmith, in his Good-natured Man, has a character so named.

Croakeshire. Northumberland is so called from the peculiar croaking of the natives in speaking. This is especially observable in Newcastle and Morpeth, where the people are said to be born with a burr in their throats, which prevents their giving effect to the letter r.

Crocodile. A symbol of deity among the Egyptians, because, says Plutarch, it is the only aquatic animal which has its eyes covered with a thin transparent membrane, by reason of which it sees and is not seen, as God sees all, Himself not being seen. To this he subsequently adds another reason, saying, "The Egyptians worship God symbolically in the crocodile, that being the only animal without a tongue, like the Divine Logos, which standeth not in need of speech." (De Iside et Osiride, vol. ii, p. 381.)

Achilles Tatius says, "The number of its teeth equals the number of days in a year."

Another tradition is that, during the seven days held sacred to Apis, the crocodile will harm no one.

Crocodile tears. Hypocritical tears. The tale is, that crocodiles moan and sigh like a person in deep distress, to allure travellers to the spot, and even shed tears over their prey while in the act of devouring it.

As the mournful crocodile

With sorrow snarls relenting passengers.

SHAKESPEARE: 2 Henry, VI, iii, 1.

Cresus (kré'sús). Rich as Cresus. Cresus, King of Lydia (560-546 B.C.), was so rich and powerful that all the wise men of Greece were drawn to his court, and his name became proverbial for wealth.

Crofter. Small holders in the Highlands of Scotland; also Cotters (cf. Burns, Cottar's Saturday Night).

Cromlech (krom'leck). A megalithic monument of prehistoric times, consisting of a large flat stone resting on two or more others, like a table (Welsh cron, bent; lech, a flat stone). They are probably the uncovered remains of sepulchral chambers or cairns.

Weyland Smith's cave (Berkshire), Trevely Stone (Cornwall), Kit's Coty House (Kent), are examples, and there are others at Plas Newydd (Anglesey) and in Cornwall; not a few are found in Ireland, as the "killing-stone" in Louth. In Brittany, where they are known as dolmens (q.v.), Denmark, Germany, and some other parts of Europe, cromlechs are to be found.

Cromwell's Bible. See Bible, The English.

Crone. From Old North Fr. carone, a worn-out horse, which gives in Mod. Fr. carogne, a contemptuous word for an old woman. It is from Lat. caro, flesh, and is so connected with carrion. Crone was also applied to an old ewe, and in this case is direct from Mid. Dutch, kronie, karorie, an old sheep, which has the same origin as carone.

Take up the bastard: take 't up, I say; give 't to thy crone.—SHAKESPEARE: Winter's Tale, ii, 3.

Cronian Sea. The north polar sea; so called from Cronos. Pliny says "A Thule unius diei navigatione mare concretum, a nonnullis cronium appellatur." (Nat. Hist., iv, 16.)

As when two polar winds blowing adverse

Upon the Cronian sea.

MILTON: Paradise Lost, x, 290.

Cronos or Cronus (kró' nos). See Kronos.

Crony. A familiar friend. An old crony is an intimate of times gone by. The word was originally (17th cent.) University slang, and seems to have no connexion with crony (q.v.); it may be from Gr. kronios, long-lasting (kronos, time), meaning a long-lasting friend.

Crook. By hook or crook. See Hook.

There is a crook in the lot of every one. There is vexation bound up in every person's life. When lots were drawn by bits of stick, it was desirable to get sticks which were smooth and straight; but one without a crook, knot, or some other defect is rare. Thomas Boston (1677-1732) published a sermon entitled The Crook in the Lot.

The term Crook as applied to a criminal or sharper came into use in the second half of the 19th century.
To crook the elbow, or finger. The American equivalent to the English elbow-lifting, i.e., having a drink, especially drinking as a habit.

Crooked as Crawley. See Crawley.

Crooning. A competent musical critic describes crooning thus: "A reprehensible form of singing that established itself in light entertainment music about the 1930s... The principle of crooning is to use as little voice as possible and instead to make a sentimental appeal by prolonged moaning over the notes near the written notes, but preferably never actually on those notes. The smallest vocal equipment is sufficient for the purpose of crooning, one of its admirers' delusions being that it does not become wholly satisfactory until it is amplified by a microphone." (Eric Blom)

Crop Up or Out. To rise out of, to appear at the surface. A mining term. Strata which rise to the surface are said to crop out. We also say, such and such a subject crops up from time to time—i.e., rises to the surface; such and such a thing crops out of what you were saying—i.e., is apropos thereof.

Share-cropper (U.S.A.). Under-privileged classes in the Southern States who work on he cotton plantations and take a share of the crops in lieu of wages.

He came a cropper. He fell head over heels.

To come a cropper. To get a bad fall. "Neck and crop" means altogether, and to "come a cropper" is to come to the ground neck and crop.

Croquet. A hobgoblin, an evil sprite or ugly monster, used by French nurses to frighten their charges into good behaviour. In 1863 M. L'Epine published a romance with his title, telling the story of a god-daughter of Charlemagne whom he called "Mitaine." It was translated by Tom Hood (the Younger).

Croquet (kro' ki). This once popular garden game takes its name from the French crocq, a hook, as the early croquet mallets were shaped like hockey-sticks. It came into fashion in Britain about 1856.

crook. In India, a hundred lacs of rupees.

crozier (from late Lat. croquia; connected with our crook; confused with Fr. croisier from r. Lat. crux, cruce, a cross). The pastoral staff of an abbot or bishop, and sometimes but incorrectly applied to an archbishop's staff, which terminates in a floriated cross, while a bishop's crozier has a curved, brackenke head.

A bishop turns his staff outward, to denote his wider authority; an abbot (whose staff is the same as bishop's) carries it turned inward, to show that his jurisdiction is limited to his own inmates. When walking with a bishop an abbot covers his staff with a veil hanging from the knob, to show that his authority is in the presence of his superior.

Cross. The cross is not solely a Christian symbol, originating with the crucifixion of the Redeemer. In Carthage it was used for ornamental purposes; runic crosses were set up by the Scandinavians as boundary marks, and were erected over the graves of kings and heroes; Cicero tells us (De Divinatione, ii, 27, and 80, 81) that the augur's staff with which they marked out the heaven was a cross; the Egyptians employed the same as a sacred symbol, and two buns marked with the cross were discovered at Herculaneum. It was a sacred symbol among the Aztecs long before the landing of Cortes; in Cozumel it was an object of worship; in Tabasco it symbolized the god of rain; and in Palinque it is sculptured on the walls with a child held up adoring it. It was one of the problems of Quetzalcoatl, as lord of the four cardinal points, and the four winds that blow therefrom.

The cross of the crucifixion is legendarily said to have been made of four sorts of wood (palm, cedar, olive, and cypress), to signify the four quarters of the globe.

Ligna crucis palma, cedrus, cupressus, oliva.

In his Monasteries of the Levant (1848) Curzon gives the legend that the cross was driven down a cedar and buried it on the spot where the pool of Bethesda stood later. A few days before the crucifixion, this cedar floated to the surface of the pool, and was employed as the upright of the Saviour's cross.

It is said that Constantine, on his march to Rome, saw a luminous cross in the sky, in the shape and with the motto In hoc vicen, by this sign conquer. In the night before the battle of Sasa Rubra (312) a vision appeared to the Emperor in his sleep, commanding him to inscribe the cross and the motto on the shields of his soldiers. He obeyed the voice of the vision, and prevailed. The monogram is XPoors (Christ). See Gibbon's Decline and Fall, ch. xx.

This may be called a standing legend: for, besides St. Andrew's cross, and the Dannebrog (q.v.), there is the story concerning Don Alonzo before the battle of Ourique in 1139, when the figure of a cross appeared in the eastern sky; Christ, suspended on it, promised the Christian king a complete victory, and the Moors were totally routed. This legend is commemorated by Alonzo's device, in a field argent five escutcheons azure, in the form of a cross; each escutcheon being charged with five bezants in memory of the five wounds of Christ. See Labarum.

In heraldry, as many as 285 varieties of cross have been recognized, but the twelve in ordinary use, and from which the others are derived, are:—(1) The ordinary cross; (2) the cross huméti, or couped; (3) the cross urdé, or pointed; (4) the cross potent; (5) the cross solitaire; (6) the cross botonné, or trellé; (7) the cross moline; (8) the cross potent; (9) the cross fleury; (10) the cross pattée; (11) the Maltese cross; (12) the cross cleché and flitché.

As a mystic symbol the number of crosses may be reduced to four:

The Greek cross found on Assyrian tablets, Egyptian and Persian monuments, and on Etruscan pottery.

The crux decussata generally called St. Andrew's cross. Quite common in ancient sculpture.

The Latin cross or crux immissa. This symbol is found on coins, monuments, and medals long before the Christian era.
The tau cross or crux commissa. Very ancient indeed, and supposed to be a phallic emblem. The tau cross with a handle, or crux manica, is common to several Egyptian deities, Isis, Osiris, etc.; and is the emblem of immortality and life generally. The circle signifies the eternal preserver of the world, and the T is the monogram of Thoth, the Egyptian Mercury, meaning wisdom. See Cross.

The Invention of the Cross. A church festival held on May 3rd, in commemoration of the discovery (Lat. invenire, to discover) of the cross (236) by St. Helena (q.v.). At her direction, after a long and difficult search in the neighbourhood of the Holy Sepulchre which had been over-built with heathen temples, the remains of the three buried rosses were found. These were applied to a sick man, and that which effected his cure was declared to be the True Cross. The Emperor Constantine had it deposited in a silver shrine (after having carried a large piece to Rome) and disposed in a church that was built on the spot or the cross.

The Cross of Lorraine, with two bars, was adopted in the reign of Charlemagne. The Cross is indeed, entirely Christian, and all other obliquely) of this bird are accounted for its having attempted to pull the nails from the Saviour at the Crucifixion, as a reward for his opinions.—LOCKE: Human Understanding.

Cross and Ball. The orb of royalty is a sphere or ball surmounted by a cross, an emblem of empire introduced in representations of our Saviour. The cross stands above the ball, to signify that the spiritual power is above the temporal.

Cross and Pile. The obverse and reverse sides of a coin, head and tail; hence, money generally, pitch and toss, etc. Pile is French for the reverse of a coin, and the other side for centuries was marked with a cross.

A man may now justifiably throw up cross and pile for his opinions.—LOCKE: Human Understanding.

Cross-belts. The 8th King's Royal Irish Hussars, raised by William III, in 1693. The unit fought in Spain in 1710, during one fight practically destroying a Spanish cavalry regiment, whose cross-belts they removed and wore themselves.

Cross-bench. Seats set at right angles to the rest of the seats in the House of Commons and the House of Lords, and intended for those members who are independent of any recognized party. Hence, cross-bencher, an independent, and the cross-bench mind, an unbiased or neutral mind.

Crossbill. The red plumage and the curious bill (the horny sheaths of which cross each other obliquely) of this bird are accounted for by a mediaeval fable which says that these distinctive marks were bestowed on the bird by the Saviour at the Crucifixion, as a reward for the nails from the Cross with its beak. Schwenckfeld in 1603 (Theriotropheum Silesia) gave the fable in the Latin verses of Johannes Major; but it would be better known to English readers through Longfellow's "Legend of the Crossbill" from the German of Julius Mosen.

Cross-biting. Cheating; properly, cheating one who has been trying to cheat you—biting in return. Hence, cross-biter, a swindler. Laurence Crossbiter is the name given to one of the rogues in Cock Lorell's Bote (q.v.).

Cross-bones. See Skull and Cross-bones.

Cross-legged Knights. Crusaders were generally represented on their tombs with crossed legs.

Cross-roads. All (except suicides) who were excluded from holy rites were piously buried on a dedicated ground. Suicides were ignominiously buried as "Cross-roads."
Our orthodox coroner doubtless will find it a felo-de-se.
And the stake and the cross-road, fool, if you will, does it matter to me? Tennyson: Despair.

Cross-row. Short for CHRISS-CROSS ROW.

Crossword puzzle. A puzzle in which words must be discovered to fill in, letter by letter, the squares into which a rectangular diagram is divided. Clues are furnished and most of the letters form parts of two words, one reading across and the other down the rectangle. There have long been simple puzzles of this nature, but the more ingenious crossword was invented in U.S.A., about 1923, and immediately welcomed in Britain.

Cross, meaning irritable, bad tempered.

As cross as a bear with a sore head, as the tongs, as two sticks. Common phrases used of one who is very vexed, peevish, or cross. The allusions are obvious.

Cross-grained. Patchy, ill-tempered, self-willed. Wood must be worked with the grain; a person, male or female.

"What fellow of the Invention of the Cross (May 3rd), also Crouchmas. An old name for the festival for Rogation week.

"Crouch" is an old word for cross, especially as a crowd. Wood must be worked with the grain; a person, male or female.

"a crow.

"I never heard the old song of Percy and Daub, that I found not my heart moved more then with a trumpet: and yet is it sung but by some blinde Crouder, with no rougher voyce, then rude stille.—Sidney: Apologie for Poetrie.

Crown. In heraldry, nine crowns are recognized: The oriental, the triumphal or imperial, the diadem, the obsidional crown, the civic, the crown vallety, the mural crown, the naval, and the crown celestial.

Among the Romans of the Republic and Empire crowns of various patterns formed marks of distinction for different services; the principal ones were:

The blockade crown (corona obсидionalis), presented to the general who liberated a beleaguered army. This was made of grass and wild flowers gathered from the spot.

A camp crown (corona castrensis) was given to him who first forced his way into the enemy's camp. It was made of gold, and decorated with palisades.

A civic crown to one who saved a civis or Roman citizen in battle. It was of oak leaves, and bore the inscription: HOC S.-I.e. gens occidit, civem servavit (a foe he slew, a citizen saved).

A mural crown was given to that man who first scaled the wall of a besieged town. It was made of gold and decorated with battlements.

A naval crown, of gold, decorated with the beaks of ships, was given to him who won a naval victory.

An olive crown was given to those who distinguished themselves in battle in some way not specially mentioned.

An ovation crown (corona ovatio) was by the Romans given to a general in the case of a lesser victory. It was made of myrtle.

A triumphal crown was by the Romans given to the general who obtained a triumph. It was made of laurel or bay leaves. Sometimes a massive gold crown, was given to a victorious general. See Laurel.
The crown of Lombardy is the crown of the ancient Longobardic kings. It was used at the coronation of Agilulf, King of Lombardy, in 591, and among others that have since been crowned with it are Charlemagne, King of Italy (774), Henry of Luxemburg, the Emperor Henry VII, as King of Lombardy (1311), Frederick IV (1452), Charles V (1530), and in 1805 Napoleon put it on his head with his own hands.

In 1866, at the conclusion of peace, it was estored by Austria to Italy and was replaced in the cathedral at Monza, where Charlemagne had been crowned, and whence it had been taken in 1859. The crown is so called from a narrow band of iron about three-eighths of an inch broad, and one-tenth of an inch in thickness, within it, said to be beaten out of one of the nails used at the Crucifixion. According to tradition, the nail was given to Constantine by his mother, St. Helena, who discovered the cross. The outer circle is of beaten gold, and set with precious stones.

Crown of Egypt. See Egypt.

The crown, in English coinage, is a five-hilling piece, and is so named from the French enier à la couronne, a gold coin issued by Philip of Valois (1339) bearing a large crown on the obverse. The English crown was a gold coin of about 43½ grs. till the end of Elizabeth's reign, except for a silver crown which was issued in the last coinage of Henry VIII and one other of Edward VI.

Crown Office. A department of the central Office of the Supreme Court. It consists of the King's Coroner and Attorney, who is also Master, two Assistant Masters, a Chief Clerk, and some minor officials.

Crown of the East. Antioch, capital of Syria, which consisted of four walled cities, encompassed by a common rampart, that surrounded them like a corona.

Cruor. An old pronunciation of "coroner." It is perhaps with the suggestion that he is a officer of the Crown. The crown hath sat on her, and finds it Christian.

Crowell, Alfred. This was the name used by Alfred Henry Forrester (1805-72), the black-and-white artist of Punch and the Illustrated London News. He was famous in his day as the illustrator of Dr. Syntax, the Bon Gaultier affair, Baron Munchausen and other popular works.

Cruizer. See Crisper.

Cruicial (kroo' shal). A crucial test. A very rare and undeniable one. The allusion is to a fuzzy of Lord Bacon, who said that two different diseases or sciences might run parallel or a time, but would ultimately cross each other: thus, the plague might for a time resemble other diseases, but when the bubo or boil appeared, the plague would assume its peculiar characters. Hence the phrase instantaneous (a crucial or unmistakable symptom), a valid experiment, example, question, etc. Cpr. Rux.

Cruel, The. Pedro, King of Castile (1334, 1350-69).

Cruel garters. See Crewel.

Cruet. In common parlance this word is used in the plural to mean the salt, pepper, and mustard usually placed on the table for meals. A cruet is really a small bottle and is used specifically for each of the small bottles in which the water and wine for the eucharist and the ablutions of the Mass are served upon the altar.

Cruiser. Cruiser weight is the same as light-heavy weight. See Boxing.

Cruiller. In the U.S.A. a sweet cake or biscuit in the form of strips or twists or rings, which has been fried in deep fat.

Crummy. In obsolete slang, expressive of something desirable, as that's crummy, that's good; also meaning plump, well developed, as she's a crummy woman, a fine, handsome woman. Among soldiers, however, the word has always meant lousy, infested with lice, and this is now the only meaning attached to the word.

Cruptum. See Muffins.

Cruada (kroo' sád). A war undertaken in late mediaeval times by Christians against the Turks and Saracens for the recovery of the Holy Land and, nominally at least, for the honour of the Cross. Each nation had its special colour, which, says Matthew Paris (i, 446), was red for France; white for England; green for Flanders; for Italy it was blue or azure; for Spain, gules; for Scotland, a St. Andrew's cross; for the Knights Templars, red on white.

There were eight principal crusades:-

1. A crusade proclaimed by Urban II, in 1095. Two columns led by Peter the Hermit and Walter the Penniless, set out in 1096 and were destroyed. A second expedition under Hugh the Great (father of Hugh Capet, later King of France), Raymond Count of Toulouse, Emperor Conrad III, and Louis VI of France, were successful and ended by achieving the proclamation of Godfrey as King of Jerusalem, 1099.

3. Jerusalem and Ascalon having been lost in 1187, a crusade for their recovery was preached by Gregory VIII, and Frederick Barbarossa set out in 1189; Philip II Augustus, King of France and Richard I of England started the following year. A stalemate was reached and the crusade abandoned in 1192.

4. A crusade was preached by Fulke of Bouillon, was successful and ended by achieving the proclamation of Godfrey as King of Jerusalem, 1099.

5. In 1217 an unsuccessful expedition set out under Andrew, King of Hungary, to return in 1221.

6. The Emperor Frederick II set out in 1228, and the following year was crowned King of Jerusalem.
7. Following the loss of the Holy Land in 1244, St. Louis (Louis IX of France) set out in 1248. He was captured by the Saracens in 1250; a ten years' truce was declared and Louis returned to France.

The Children's Crusade, consisting of a body of 30,000 boys and girls between the ages of ten and sixteen, led by a shepherd boy, Stephen, set out from Vendôme to capture Jerusalem in 1212. The King of France, Stephen, a man but not that of a moose or deer.

Crusty. Ill-tempered, apt to take offence; cross, peeved. In Shakespeare's play Achilles addresses the bitter Thersites with:—

How now, thou core of envy!
Thou crusty batch of nature, what's the news?

Crutched Friars (kruch'd fri' ārs) is the Lat. cruciati (crossed)—i.e. having a cross embroidered on their dress. They were a minor order of friars, the Canons Regular of the Holy Cross, founded at Bologna about 1169, who first appeared in England in 1244.

Crux. A knotty point, a difficulty. Instantia crucis means a crucial test (q.v.), or the point where two similar diseases crossed and showed a special feature. It does not refer to the cross, an instrument of punishment; but to the crossing of two lines, called also a node or knot; hence a trouble or difficulty. Quæ te mala crux agit? (Plautus); What evil cross distresses you?—i.e. what difficulty, what trouble are you under?

Crux pectoralis. The cross which bishops of the Church of Rome suspend over their breast.

See also Cross.

Cry. For names of the distinctive cries of animals, see Animals.

A far cry. A long way; a very considerable distance: used both of space and of time, as, "it is a far cry from David to Disraeli," but they both were Jews, "it's a far cry from Chaliphom to Kamschatka." Sir Walter Scott several times uses the phrase, "It's a far cry to Lochow (Lochave)," and he tells us that this was a proverbial expression among the Campbells, meaning that their ancient hereditary dominions lay beyond the reach of an invading enemy.—Legend of Montrose; ch. xii.

Great cry and little wool. A proverbial saying expressive of contempt or derision for one who promises great things but never fulfils the promises.

Originally the proverb ran, "Great cry and little wool, as the Devil said when he sheared the hogs"; and it appears in this form in the ancient mystery of David and Abigail, in which Nabal is represented as shearing his sheep, and the Devil imitates the act by "shearing a hog."

Thou wilt at best but suck a bull,
Or shear swine, all cry and no wool.

BuLTER: Hudibras, 1, 1, 851.

Hue and cry. See Hue.

In full cry. In full pursuit. A phrase from hunting, with allusion to a yelping pack of hounds in chase.

It's no good crying over spilt milk. It's useless bewailing the past.

To cry aim. See Aim.

To cry cave (kā' vi). To give warning (Lat. cave, beware); used by schoolboys when a master comes in sight.

To cry havoc. See Havock.

To cry off. To get out of a bargain; to refuse to carry out one's promise.

To cry quits. See QUIT.
Cry

To cry stinking fish. To belittle one’s own endeavours, offerings, etc. “To cry” here is to offer for sale by shouting one’s wares in the street.

To cry up. To praise loudly and publicly.

To cry wolf. See Wolf.

Crypto-Catholic. A person who is secretly a Catholic but for some ulterior motive conceals the fact and poses as a Protestant. The term is also applied (Crypto-Communist, -Fascist, etc.) to one who secretly works for the cause of his party though outwardly appearing to have no connection with it.

Crystal Gazing, or, as it is sometimes termed, Scrying, is a very ancient form of divination. It is alleged that certain people can, by gazing fixedly and deeply into a polished crystal ball, see what is about to happen or what is actually happening at some distant place. It is said that scenes are enacted and places are recognizable as clearly as in the view-finder of a camera. Crystal gazing has been, and, indeed, still is, a practice that lends itself to the skill of imposters, and from a psychic standard it is not to be encouraged.

Crystal Palace. This was one of the glories of the Victorian era. The original Crystal Palace, built entirely of glass and iron, was erected in Hyde Park to house the 1851 Great Exhibition. When the exhibition closed the building was moved (1854) to Sydenham where it was re-erected with some alterations and the addition of two towers which for many years were visible for many miles around. Exhibitions, concerts, and other events took place in the Palace, which became national property in 1911. The whole building was entirely destroyed by fire in November, 1936.

The crystalline sphere. According to Ptolemy, the ninth orb, identified by some with the crystalline sphere. According to authors, it was placed between the firmament or sphere of the fixed stars and was held to have a shivering effect on the human body and spirit.

Cubit (kúb’ bizm). The doctrine of an early-20th-century school of painters who depict surfaces, figures, tints, light and shade, etc., on canvas by means of a multiplicity of cubes. The name was given to this school, somewhat disparagingly, by Henri Matisse, in 1908. It was a form of art wholly devoid of representation and divorced from realism, excluding any attempt to depict actual appearances and spurning all the accepted canons of art. Picasso was its great exponent; Braque, Leger, and Derain explored its possibilities in many of their works.

Cubit (kúb’ bit). An ancient measure of length, the word coming from the Latin cubitum, the elbow. Approximately it applied to the length from the elbow to the tip of the longest finger. The Hebrews had two cubits, the ordinary cubit as above, measuring about 22 in. and a longer one used by Ezekiel for measuring the Temple. The most ancient cubit was the Egyptian, which measured 20-24 in. and was divided into seven palms. It was employed in the design and building of the Pyramids, and measuring sticks have been found proving the use of this measure for at least three centuries before Christ. The Roman cubit measured 17-4 in.

Cucking-stool. A kind of chair formerly used for ducking scolds, disorderly women, dishonest apprentices, etc., in a pond. “Cucking” is from the old verb cuck, to void excrement, and the stool used was often a close-stool.

Now, if one cucking-stool was for each scold; Some towns, I fear, would not their numbers hold. Poor Robin (1746).

Cuckold. The husband of an adulterous wife; so called from cuckoo, the chief characteristic of this bird being to deposit its eggs in other birds’ nests. Johnson says “it was usual to alarm a husband at the approach of an adulterer by calling out ‘Cuckoo,’ which by mistake was applied in time to the person warned.” Greene calls the cuckold “the cuckold’s quirister” (Quip for an Upstart Courtier, 1592), and the Romans used to call an adulterer a “cuckoo,” as “Te cuculum uxor ex lustris rapit” (Plautus: Asinaria, v, 3). Cp. AÇTEON; HORN; and see quotation under Lady’s Smock.

Cuckold’s Point. A spot on the riverside near Deptford. So called from a tradition that King John there made love successfully to a labourer’s wife.

Cuckoo. There are many old folk rhymes about this bird; one says—

April the cuckoo shows his bill; In May he sings all day; In June he alters his tune; In July away he’ll fly; In August go he must.

Other sayings are:—

Turn your money when you hear the cuckoo, and you’ll have money in your purse till he come again.

Cuckoo oats and woodcock hay make a farmer run away. If the spring is so backward that oats cannot be sown till the cuckoo is heard (i.e. April), or if the autumn is so wet that the aftermath of hay cannot be got in till woodcock shooting (middle of November), the farmer must be a great sufferer.

Cuckoo-spit. A frothy exudation deposited on plants by certain insects, especially the frog-hopper (Aphrophora spumaris), for the purpose of protecting the larvae. So called from an erroneous popular notion that the froth was spat out by cuckoos. It must be likewise understood with some restriction what hath been affirmed by Isidore, and yet delivered by many, that Cicadas are bred out of the farmer must be a great sufferer.

frog-hopper purpose of protecting the froth was spat out by cuckoos. from an erroneous popular notion that the frothy dew or exudation, or both, found upon Plants, tion what harh been affirmed by

Don't be a cuckoo! Don't be a silly ass; don't go and make a fool of yourself.

To wall in the cuckoo. See Course.

Cuddy, an abbreviation of Cuthbert, is the North Country and Scottish familiar name for a donkey, as elsewhere he is called Neddy or Jack.

Cudgel. To cudgel one's brains. To make a painful effort to remember or understand something. The idea is from taking a stick to beat a dull boy under the notion that dullness is the result of temper or inattention. Cudgel thy brains no more about it; for your dull ass will not mend his pace with beating.—SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, v, 1.

To take up the cudgels. To maintain an argument or position. To fight, as with a cudgel, for one's own way.

Cue (kü). The tail of a sentence (Fr. quiche), the catchword which indicates when another actor is to speak; a hint. When my cue comes, call me, and I will answer.—A Midsummer Night's Dream, iv, 1.

To give the cue. To give the hint. In another sense cue means a person's frame of mind—in a good or bad skin. My uncle was in thoroughly good cue.

DICKENS: Pickwick Papers.

Cuerp. See Querpo.

Cuffy. A Negro; both a generic word and proper name; possibly from the English slang term "cove" (q.v.). Sambo and Cuffy expand under every sky.—MRS. BEECHER STOWE: Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Cui bono? (ku4 bo' nó). Who is benefited thereby? To whom is it a gain? A common, but quite erroneous, meaning attached to the words is, What good will it do? For what good purpose? It was the question of the Roman judge L. Cassius Pedanius. See: Cicero, Rosc. Am., xxx, 84.

Cato, that great and grave philosopher, did commonly demand, when any new project was proposed unto him, cui bono, what good will ensue in case the same is effected?—FULLER: Worthies (The Design, i.).

Cul de Sac (kul de sák) (Fr.). A blind alley, or road blocked up at one end like a sack. Figuratively, an argument, etc., that leads to nothing.

Culdee (kůl de'z). An ancient religious order in Ireland and Scotland from about the 8th to the 13th centuries. So called from the Old Irish cēlē dé, servant of God. The culdees were originally hermits or anchorites, but were later gathered into communities and were, finally, little more than secular canons.

Cullinan Diamond (ku lin' an). The largest diamond ever known. It was discovered in 1905 at the Premier Mine in South Africa, and when found weighed 3.0251 carats (about 1 lb. 6 oz.), as against the 186.2 carats of the famous Koh-i-Nor (q.v.) in its uncut state. It was purchased by the South African Government for £150,000 and presented to Edward VII, and now forms part of the Crown Jewels, its estimated value being over £1,000,000. It was cut into a number of stones, of which the two largest weigh over 516 and 309 carats respectively. It was named from the manager of the mine at the time of its discovery.

Cully. A pop, a fool, a dupe. Perhaps a contracted form of cullion, a despicable creature (Ital. coglione). Shakespeare uses the word "two or three times as "Away, base culions!" (2 Henry VI, i, 3), and again in Taming of the Shrew, iv, 2—"And makes a god of such a cullion."—CP. GULL.

You base cullion, you.

BEN JONSON: Every Man in his Humour, iii, 2.

Culross Girdles. The thin plate of iron in Scotland, on which oat cakes, scones, etc. are cooked, is called a "girdle," for which Culross was long celebrated.

Culbus (kůl' tús). In usual parlance this means a cult, or system of religious belief, but in the Far Western States of the U.S.A. the word, taken from the Indian, was used as signifying worthless.

Culver (kul'ver). A dove or pigeon; from A.S. culfre, which is probably an English word and unconnected with Lat. columba. Hence culver-house, a dovecote.

On liquid wing.
The sounding culver shoots.

THOMSON: Spring. 452.

Culverin (kul' vər in). A long, slender piece of artillery employed in the 16th century. It was 51 in. bore and fired a projectile of 18 lb. Queen Elizabeth's "Pocket Pistol" in Dover Castle is a culverin. So called from Lat. culibrinus (Fr. coulevrinc), snake-like.

Culverkeys (kul' vər kéz). An old popular name for various plants, such as the bluebell, columbine, squill, etc., the flowers of which have some resemblance to a bunch of keys (O.E. culfre, a dove).

Cumberland Poets, or Lake Poets. One or other of these terms used often to be applied to the poets Wordsworth (1770-1850), Southey (1774-1843), and Coleridge (1772-1834) who lived about the lakes of Cumberland. According to Jeffrey, of the Edinburgh Review, they combined the sentimentality of Rousseau with the simplicity of Kotzebue and the homesickness of Cowper.
Cumberlands Presbyterians. A sect found in Kentucky and Tennessee which was opposed to college-trained ministers.

Cum grano salis (kûm grâ' nô sâ' lis) (Lat.). With a grain of salt; there is some truth in the statement, but we must use great caution in accepting it.

Cummer. A cudewife, old woman. A variety of ganger which is a corruption of grandmather, as gagger is of grandfather. It occurs scores of times in Scott’s novels.

Cumhaw (kûm' shaw). This is a pidgin English word meaning a tip, a douceur, palm-oil. It may be a corruption of the English word “commission,” or it may derive from the Chinese kan’ hîshè, grateful thanks.

Cunctator (küngk tâ tòr) (Lat., the delayer). Quintus Fabius Maximus (d. 203 B.C.), the Roman general who baffled Hannibal by avoiding direct engagements, and wearing him out by marches, countermarches, and skirmishes from a distance. This was the policy by which Duguesclin forced the English to abandon their French possessions in the reign of Charles V. Cf. Fabian.

Cuneiform Letters (kû nê’ i fôrm). Letters like wedges (Lat. cuneus, a wedge). They form the writing of ancient Persia, Babylonia, Assyria, etc., and, dating from about 3800 B.C. to the early years of the Christian era, are the most ancient specimens of writing known to us. Cuneiform inscriptions first attracted interest in Europe in the early 17th century, but no deciphering was successful until 1802 (by Grotefend, of Hanover).

Cunning. This is a word to which various meanings are attached and on which several phrases depend. It originally comes from the same word as does “ken,” to know, and was applied to someone who knew things. As Wyclif’s Bible translates Genesis ii, 9:

A tree of cunninge of good and euil.

By an extension of this came the meaning of skilful. If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning.—Psalm cxxxvi.

The word had, however, already begun to infer a knowledge of occult and evil matters:—We take cunning for a sinister and crooked wisdom.—Bacon: Cunnings, and a Cunning Man, or Woman, was merely another name for a wizard, or witch. Hence it grew to mean sly and crafty, the sense in which it is commonly used now.

The American usage, in the sense of charming, or pretty or engaging, was customary there by the mid-19th century.

Cunobelin (kûn’ nô bel’ in). Cunobelinus, King of the Catuvellauni (A.D. 540), and the father of Caractacus. His name is preserved, in modified form, in Cymbeline, and in “Cunobelin, the gold-mines,” the local name for the iron-holes in the chalk beds of Little Thurrock, Essex, which were traditionally used by Cunobelin for hiding.

Cup. A mixture of strong ale with sugar, spice, and a lemon, properly served up hot in a silver cup. Sometimes a roasted orange takes the place of a lemon. If wine is added, the cup is called bishop (q.v.); if brandy is added, the beverage is called cardinal.

Cider cup, claret cup, etc., are drinks made of cider, claret, etc., with sugar, fruit, and herbs.

Cup Final. See Association Football Cup.

He was in his cups. Intoxicated. Inter pocula, inter vina. (Horace: 3 Odes, vi, 20.)

Let this cup pass from me. Let this trouble or affliction be taken away, that I may not be compelled to undergo it; this cup is “full of the wine of God’s fury,” let me not be compelled to drink it. The reference is to Christ’s agony in the garden (Matt. xxvi, 39).

My cup runs over. My blessings overflow. Here cup signifies portion or blessing. My cup runneth over . . . goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life.—Ps. xxiii, 5, 6.

The cup of vows. In Scandinavia it was customarily customary at feasts to drink from cups of mead, and vow to perform some great deed worthy of the song of a skald. There were four cups: one to Odin, for victory; one to Freyja, for a good year; one to Niörd, for peace; and one to Bragi, for celebration of the dead in poetry.

There’s many a slip ’twixt the cup and the lip. See Anæus.

We must drink the cup. We must bear the burden awarded to us, the sorrow which falls to our lot.

Not my cup of tea. A phrase meaning, it does not suit me, this is not the sort of thing I want.

Cupper. A comfortable colloquial abbreviation of “a cup of tea.” “Come in and have a nice cupper,” i.e. “Come in and have a nice cup of tea.”

Cups as sports trophies. An engraved (usually silver) cup is a common form of trophy. One of the oldest is the Waterloo Cup for coursing, which was first offered in 1802 (by Grotefend, of Hanover), and its name was changed to Freyja, for a good year; one to Niörd, for peace; and one to Bragi, for celebration of the dead in poetry.

The Davis Cup for an international lawn tennis championship was presented by Dwight Davis in 1900. Another tennis trophy is the Wightman Cup, given by Mrs. George Wightman in 1923, for competition between teams of women players from U.S.A. and Great Britain.

The America Cup, for an international yacht race, was originally named the Queen’s Cup, and was offered by the Royal Yacht Squadron in 1851. In 1857 it was won by an American yacht and has since been called the America Cup. For many years Sir Thomas Lipton built yachts in an endeavour to win back the Cup but it has remained in American hands.

The Ryder Cup for international golf matches was presented by Samuel Ryder in 1927, though up to the present only the British and American professional teams have competed for it—no other country being able to produce a team of sufficiently high standard. The Walker Cup was given in 1922 by an American, George H. Walker, for a golf match.
to be played twice a year between teams of amateurs of Great Britain and U.S.A. The Curtis Cup, given in 1923 by two American lady champions, the Misses Margaret and Harriett Curtis, is for a golf match between teams of ladies of Great Britain and the U.S.A.

See also Association Football Cup.

Cupar (koo' par). He that will to Cupar maun to Cupar. A Scottish proverbial saying, meaning, he that will have his own way, must have it even to his injury. The reference is to the Cistercian monastery, founded there by Malcolm IV.

Cupar justice. Same as "Jedburgh justice," hang first and try afterwards. It is sometimes called "Cowper law," and it had its rise from a baron Baile in Cupar-Angus, before heritable jurisdictions were abolished. Abingdon Law is a similar phrase. It is said that Major-General Browne, of Abingdon, in the Commonwealth, first hanged his prisoners and then tried them. See Jedwood Justice; Lydford Law.

Cupboard Love. Love from interested motives. The allusion is to the love of children to some indulgent person who gives them things nice from her cupboard.

Cupid. The god of love in Roman mythology (Lat. cupido, desire, passion), identified with the Greek Eros; son of Mercury and Venus. He is usually represented as a beautiful winged boy, blindfolded, and carrying a bow and arrows, and one legend says that he whets with Cupid's leaden arrow, sensual passion.

Cur. Among the catch-phrases that Punch has introduced into the English language, "Good in parts, like the curate's egg" is, perhaps, the most commonly used. The illustrated joke showed a nervous young curate, at his bishop's breakfast table. He has been asked by his lordship whether his egg is to his liking; terrified to say that it is bad, he stammers out that "it's good in parts."

Curé de Meudon (ku' ra de me dou) — i.e. Rabelais (c. 1495-1553), who was first a monk, then a leech, then prebend of St. Maur, and lastly curé of Meudon.

Curfew (ker' fo). The custom of ringing a bell every evening as a signal to put out fires and go to bed. The word comes from the Fr. couvre feu, and shows its Norman origin. William the Conqueror instituted the curfew in England in 1068, fixing the hour at eight in the evening. The word is now extended to mean the period commonly ordered by all occupying armies in time of war or civil commotion when civilians must stay within doors.

The curfew tolls the knell of parting day.

GRAY'S Elegy.

Curmudgeon (ker muj' on). A grasping, mis­cruel churl. Concerning this word Johnson says in his dictionary: "It is a vitious manner of pronouncing cœur méchant. Fr. an unknown correspondent," meaning that this suggestion was supplied by some correspondent unknown. By a ridiculous blunder, Ash (1775) copied it into his dictionary as "from Fr. cœur, un­known, méchant, correspondent!" The actual etymology of the word has not been traced.

Currant. A corruption of Corinth, whence currants were imported probably in the 16th century. Originally called "raisins of Cor­autz," Corautz being Anglo-French for Corinth.

Currency. A word applied in early Australia to the wide variety of coins then in circulation, as apart from English gold coins, which were called sterling. The word assumed the connotation of "Australian," and in novels of the mid-19th century the word "uncurrency" is found in the sense of "unAustralian."

Current. The drift of the current is the rate per hour at which the current runs.

The setting of the current is that point of the compass towards which the waters of the current run.

Curry Favour. A corruption of the M.E. to curry favel, to rub down Favel: Favel (or Fauvel) being the name of the horse in the 14th­century French satire Roman de Fauvel, which was a kind of counterpart to the more famous romance, Reynard the Fox. Fauvel, the fallow-coloured horse, takes the place of Reynard, and symbolizes cunning or duplicity; hence, to curry, or stroke down, Favel, was to enlist the services of duplicity, and so, to seek to obtain by insincere flattery or officious courtesy.
Curse. Curses, like chickens, come home to roost. Curses fall on the head of the curser, as chickens which stray during the day return to their roost at night.

Cursing by bell, book, and candle. See Bell.

Not worth a curse. I don't care a curse (or cuss). Here "curse" is the O.E. cresse or cissa. Most E. cress, i.e. something quite worthless. Similarly, the Lat. nihil (nihilam) is nihilo, not (worth) the black eye of a bean. Other phrases are "not a straw," "not a pin," "not a rap," "not a jot," "not a pin's point," "not a button."

Wisdom and wit nowe is not worthe a kerse.

The curse of Cain. One who is always on the move and has no abiding place is said to be "cursed with the curse of Cain." The allusion is to God's judgment on Cain after he had slain his brother Abel:

And now art thou cursed from the earth, . . . a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth.—Gen. iv. 11-12.

The curse of Scotland. The nine of diamonds. It may refer to the arms of Dalrymple, Earl of Stair—viz. or, on a saltire argent, nine lozenges of the first. The earl was justly held in abhorrence for the massacre of Glencoe, and he was also detested in Scotland for his share in bringing about the Union with England in 1707. The phrase seems to be first recorded in the early 18th century, for in Houston's Memoirs (1715-47) we are told that Lord Justice Clerk Oermiston became universally hated in Scotland, where they called him the Curse of Scotland; and when the ladies were at cards playing the Nine of Diamonds (commonly called the Curse of Scotland) they called it the Justice Clerk.

Other attempts at accounting for the nickname are: (1) The nine of diamonds in the game of Pope Joan is called the Pope, the Antichrist of the Scottish reformers. (2) In the game of comette, introduced by Queen Mary, it is the great winning card, and the same as the Curse of Scotland because it was the ruin of many families. (3) The word "curse" is a corruption of cross, and the nine of diamonds is so arranged as to form a St. Andrew's Cross; but as there is no evidence that the St. Andrew's Cross was ever looked upon in Scotland as a curse, and as also the nine of hearts would do as well, this explanation must be abandoned. (4) Some say it was the card on which the "Butcher Duke" wrote his cruel order after the Battle of Culloden; but this took place in 1746, which would seem to make it too late for the reference given above.

"Crosse says of the nine of diamonds: "Diamonds . . . imply royalty . . . and every ninth King of Scotland has been observed for many ages to be a tyrant and a curse to the country."—Tour Thro' Scotland, 1769.

Curt cows have curt horns. See Cow.

Curtor (kær'tor). In the procedure of the old Courts of Chancery, which was revised in the mid-19th century, the issue of writs by the court was done by 24 cursitors, who between them covered all the counties in England and Wales. The word comes from the Latin cursor, a runner, and refers to the long journeys they had to perform when issuing the writs. Cursitor Street, Chancery Lane, takes its name from the office of the cursitors, built by Sir Nicholas Bacon (1509-79), father of the great chancellor.

Curtain. Curtain lecture. The nagging of a wife after she and her husband are in bed.

Besides what endless brawls by wives are bred. The curtain lecture makes a mournful bed.

Dryden.

Curtal Friar (kær'tal). Curtal was originally applied to horses—a "curtal horse" was one with its tail docked; hence the adjective came to be used for things in general that were cut down or shortened, and a "curtal friar" was one who wore a short cloak. In later use (especially by Scott) it acquired a vaguely derogatory or belittling significance.

Curtana (kær'tá ná). The sword of mercy borne before the English kings at their coronation; it has no point and is hence shortened (O.Fr. curt, Lat. curtus). It is called the sword of Edward the Confessor, which, having no point, was the emblem of mercy. The royal sword of England was so called to the reign of Henry III.

But when Curtana will not do the deed
You lay the pointless clergy-weapon by,
And to the laws, your sword of justice fly.

Dryden: Hind and Panther, Pt. ii, 419.

Curtose (kær't hóz). Robert II, Duke of Normandy (1087-1134); eldest son of William the Conqueror. He was also called "Short thigh," as in Drayton's The Tragicall Legend of Robert, Duke of Normandy, surnamed Short-thigh (1596).

Curtmantle (kær't mán tél). Henry II. He introduced the Anjou mantle, which was shorter than the robe worn by his predecessors.

Curtal. (kær'tal). The chair of state among the ancient Romans; an elaborate kind of camp-stool inlaid with ivory, etc. As dictators, consuls, pretors, censors, and the chief ediles occupied such a chair, they were termed curiae magistrates or curules. The word is connected either with currus, a chariot—perhaps because the chair was originally intended for use in a chariot—or with curvus, through the shape of its legs.

Cushcow Lady. A Yorkshire name for the ladybird (q.v.).

Cushion. Cushion dance. A lively dance in which kissing while kneeling on a cushion was a prominent feature; popular in early Stuart times.

In our court in Queen Elizabeth's time, gravity and state was kept up; in King James's time things were pretty well; but in King Charles's time there has been nothing but Trenchmore and the cushion dance, omnium gatherum, jolly Polly, hoity cotity—Selden's "Table Talk" (King of England).
The dance survived in rural districts until comparatively recent times, and is probably still practised. John Clare (1793-1864), the peasant poet of Northamptonshire, mentions it in his May-Day Ballad:

And then comes the cushion, the girls they all shriek,
And fly to the door from the old fiddler's squeak;
But the doors they are fastened, so all must kneel down,
And take the rude kiss from th' unmanly clown.

To miss the cushion. To make a mistake; to miss the mark.

Cusp. A fellow, usually used with an epithet as in the case of "customer" (q.v.). Presumably from "curse" which in 19th-century U.S. was found used in the same way.

Cussedness. Perversity; malice prepense; an evil temper. In this sense the word seems to have been originally an Americanism; the M.E. word cursyndesse meant sheer wickedness.

Custard Coffin. See Coffin.

Customer. Slang for a man or a fellow in a general way; usually with some qualification, as, an ugly customer, a run customer, a person better left alone, as he is likely to show fight if interfered with. Cp. Card.

Custos Rotulorum (keeper of the rolls). The chief civil officer or principal justice of the peace of a county, to whose custody are committed the records or rolls of the sessions.

Cut. Cut and come again. Take a cut from the joint, and come for another if you like; a colloquial expression for "there's plenty of it, have as much as you like." It is used by Swift in Polite Conversation, ii.

Cut and dried. Already prepared. "He had a speech all cut and dried." The allusion is to timber, cut, dried, and fit for use.

Cut and run. Be off as quickly as possible. A sea phrase, meaning cut your cable and run before the wind.

Cut neither nails nor hair at sea. Petronius says:—

Non licere cuiquam mortalium in nave neque unges neque capillos deponere nisi cum pelago venus inarcietur.

The cuttings of the nails and hair were votive offerings to Proserpine, and it would excite the jealousy of Neptune to make offerings to another in his own special kingdom.

Cut no ice. Be of no account, make no impression, presumably borrowed from figure skating.

To cut a swath. To make an impression. An American colloquialism, usually used in the negative. A swath is the amount of grass or crop cut down with one sweep of a scythe.

Cut out of whole cloth. Entirely false. Suggested probably by the mendacious claims of tailors' advertisements.

The cut of his jib. The contour or expression of his face. A sailor's phrase. The cut of a jib or foresail of a ship indicates her character, hence a sailor says of a suspicious vessel, he "does not like the cut of her jib."

Cut off with a shilling. Disinherited. Blackstone tells us that the Romans set aside those testamentes which passed by the natural heirs unnoticed; but if any legacy was left, no matter how small, it proved the testator's intention. English law has no such provision, but the notion at one time prevailed that the name of the heir should appear in the will; and if he was bequeathed "a shilling," that the testator had not forgotten him, but disinherited him intentionally.

Cut your coat according to your cloth. See Coat.

Cut your wisdom teeth. See Wisdom Tooth.

Diamond cut diamond. See Diamond.

He has cut his eye teeth. See Teeth.

He'll cut up well. He is rich, and his property will cut into good slices.

His life was cut short. He died prematurely. The allusion is to Atropos, one of the three Parcae, cutting the thread of life spun by her sister Clotho.

I must cut my stick. — i.e. leave. The Irish usually cut a shillelah before they start on an expedition. Punch gives the following derivation:—"Pilgrims on leaving the Holy Land used to cut a palm-stick, to prove that they had really been to the Holy Sepulchre. So brother Francis would say to brother Paul, 'Where is brother Benedict?' 'Oh (says Paul), he has cut his stick!' — i.e. he is on his way home."

To cut. To renounce acquaintance. There are four sorts of cut—

(1) The cut direct is to stare an acquaintance in the face and pretend not to know him.
(2) The cut indirect, to look another way, and pretend not to see him.
(3) The cut sublime, to admire the top of some tall edifice or the clouds of heaven till the person cut has passed by.
(4) The cut infernal, to stoop and adjust your boots till he has gone past.

To cut a dash. To make a show; to get oneself looked at and talked about for a showy or striking appearance. "Dashing" means striking—i.e. showy, as a "dashing fellow," a "dashing equipage."

To cut blocks with a razor. To do something astounding by insignificant means; to do something more eccentric than expedient; to make pin-cushions of sunbeams (Swift). The tale is that Accius Navius, a Roman augur, opposed king Tarquin the Elder, who wished to double the number of senators. Tarquin sneered at his pretensions of augury, and asked if he could do what was then in his thoughts. "Undoubtedly," replied Navius; and Tarquin with a laugh said, "Why, I was thinking whether I could cut through this whetstone with a razor.” “Cut boldly,” cried Naevius, and the whetstone was cleft in two.

This story forms the subject of the Don Gaultier Ballads, and Goldsmith refers to it in his Retaliation—in short, 'twas his [Burke's] fate, unemployed or in place, sit.

To eat mutton cold, and cut blocks with a razor.

To cut capers. See Capers.

To cut one's comb. See Comb.

To cut short is to shorten. “Cut short all intermission” (Macbeth, iv, 3).

To cut it short (cp. Audley) means to bring to an end what you are doing or saying.

To cut the ground from under one, or from under his feet. To leave an adversary no ground to stand on, by disproving all his arguments.

To cut the knot. To break through an obstacle. The reference is to the Gordian knot (q.v.) shown to Alexander, with the assurance that whoever loosed it would be made ruler of all Asia; whereupon the Macedonian cut it in two with his sword, and claimed to have fulfilled the prophecy.

To cut the painter. See Painter.

To cut up rough. To be disagreeable or quarrelsome about anything.

Cut-off. The American equivalent of the English short cut.

Cut out. Left in the lurch; superseded. In cards, when there are too many for a game say whisk, it is customary for the players to cut out after a rubber, in order that another player may have a turn. This is done by the players cutting the cards on the table, when the worst turn-up gives place to the new hand.

He is cut out for a sailor. His natural propensities are suited for the vocation. The illusion is to cutting out cloth, etc., for specific purposes.

Cut. An American colloquialism for smart, witty, attractive. It is a contraction of 'acute," and is found in Nathan Bailey's dictionary of 1721.

Cuthbert. A name given during World War I to fit and healthy men of military age who, particularly in Government offices, were not 'combed out' to go into the Army; also, of course, to one who actually avoided military service. It was coined by "Poy," the artist of the Evening News, who represented these civilians as frightened-looking rabbits.

St. Cuthbert's beads. See Bead.

St. Cuthbert's duck. The eider duck; so called because it breeds in the Farne Islands, it. Cuthbert's headquarters, and figures in the legends of the saint.

St. Cuthbert's Stone, and Well. A granite ock in Cumberland, and a spring of water lose by.

Cuthbert Bede was the pen-name of the Rev. Edward Bradley (1827-89), author of Verdant Green (q.v.) and other pieces of Victorian humour.

Cutler's Poetry. Mere jingles or rhymes. Knives had, at one time, a distich inscribed on the blade by means of aqua fortis.

Whose poetry was

For all the world like cutler's poetry

Upon a knife.

Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, v, 1.

Cutpurse. Now called "pickpocket." The two words are of historical value. When purses were worn suspended from a girdle, thieves cut the string by which the purse was attached; but when pockets were adopted, and purses were no longer hung on the girdle, the thief was no longer a cutpurse, but became a pickpocket.

To have an open ear, a quick eye, and a nimble hand, is necessary for a cutpurse.—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iv, 3.

Moll Cutpurse. The familiar name of Mary Frith (about 1585-1660), a woman of masculine vigour, who not infrequently assumed man's attire. She was a notorious thief and once attacked General Fairfax on Hounslow Heath, for which she was sent to Newgate. She escaped by bribery, and died at last of dropsy. Middleton and Dekker's play, The Roaring Girl (1611) is founded on her doings.

Cutteau, Cuttoe, Cutoe. A knife, from the Fr. couteau. It was in use in England and America from the 17th century until about 1850.

Cutter. A single-masted, deep-keeled and fore-and-aft rigged sailing vessel. The term is also applied to a light-armed naval vessel—a revenue cutter—used to prevent smuggling, etc.

Cutter's law. Not to see a fellow want while we have cash in our purse. Cutter's law means the law of purse-cutters, robbers, brigands, and highwaymen.

I must put you in cash with some of your old uncle's broad-pieces. This is cutter's law; we must not see a pretty fellow want, if we have cash ourselves.—Scott: Old Mortality, ch. ix.

Cuttle. Captain Cuttle. An eccentric, kind-hearted sailor in Dickens's Dombey and Son: simple as a child, credulous of every tale, and generous as the sun. He is immortalized by his saying, "When found make a note of," This phrase was adopted by Notes and Queries.

Cutty. Scots for short, as cutty pipe, a short clay pipe, cutty spoons, cutty sark, a short-tailed shirt, a cutty, a stumpy girl or woman, cutty guen, a popgun.

Cutty stool. A small stool on which offenders were placed in the Scottish church when they were about to receive a public rebuke. Cp. Stool of Repenance.

Cut, is C. centum, wt. weight, meaning hundredweight. Cp. Dwt.

Cyanean Rocks, The (sī an′ ē an). The Symplegades, two movable rocks at the entrance of the Euxine, i.e. where the Bosphorus and Black Sea meet. They were said to close together when a vessel attempted to sail between them, and thus crush it to pieces. Cyanean means blue-coloured, and Symplegades means dashers together.
Cycle. A period or series of events or numbers which recur everlastingly in precisely the same order.

Cycle of the moon, called "Meton's Cycle," from Meton, who discovered it, is a period of nineteen years, at the expiration of which time the phases of the moon repeat themselves on the same days as they did nineteen years previously. See Callippic Period.

Cycle of the sun. A period of twenty-eight years, at the expiration of which time the Sunday letters recur and proceed in the same order as they did twenty-eight years previously. In other words, the days of the month fall again on the same days of the week.

The Platonic cycle or great year. That space of time which, according to ancient astronomers, elapses before all the stars and constellations return to their former positions in respect to the equinoxes. Tycho Brahe calculated this period at 25,816 years, and Riccioli at 25,920.

Cut out more work than can be done in Plato's year, but finish none. BUTLER: Hudibras, iii, 1.

Cyclic Poets (sí' klik). Epic poets who, on the death of Homer, caught the contagion of his genius, and wrote continuations, illustrations, or additions thereto. These poets wrote between 800 and 550 B.C., and were called cyclic because they confined themselves to the cycle of the Trojan war. The chief were Agias, Arctinos, Eugamon, Lesches, and Strasinos.

Cyclops (sí' klops) (Gr., circular-eye). One of a group of giants that, according to legend, inhabited Thrace. They had only one eye each, and that in the centre of their forehead, and their name was derived from this peculiarity. They were probably Pelasgians, who worked in quarries, and attached a lantern to their forehead to give them light underground. Cp. Arimaspians.

Cyclopean Masonry (sí kló' pián). The old Pelasgic ruins of Greece, Asia Minor, and Italy, such as the Gallery of Tiryns, the Gate of Lions at Mycenae, the Treasury of Athens, and the Tombs of Phoroneus and Danaos. They are composed of huge blocks fitted together without mortar, with marvellous nicety, and are fabled to be the work of the Cyclops (q.v.). The term is also applied to similar structures in many parts of the world.

Cynthia. See Plexaton's Bird.

Cyllenius (si lé' niús). Mercury. So called from Mount Cyllenê, in Peloponnesus, where he was born.

Cymbeline. See CASSIBELAN, CUNOBELIN.

Cynodoce (sí mod' ò si). A sea nymph and companion of Venus in Virgil's Georgics (iv, 338) and Aeneid (v, 826). In Spenser's Faerie Queene (iii, iv and iv, xii), she is a daughter of Nereus and mother of Marinell by Dumarin. She frees Florimel from the power of Proteus. The word means "wave-receiving."

The Garden of Cynodoce. Sark, one of the Channel Islands. It is the title of a poem by Swinburne in his Songs of the Springtides.

Cynic (sin' ik). The ancient school of Greek philosophers known as the Cynics was founded by Antisthenes, a pupil of Socrates, and made famous by his pupil, Diogenes. They were ostentatiously contemptuous of ease, luxury, or wealth, and were given their name because Antisthenes held his school in the Gymnasium, Cynosarges (white dog), so called because a white dog once carried away part of a victim which was there being offered to Hercules. The effigy over Diogenes's pillar was a dog, with this inscription:

"Say, dog, I pray, what guard you in that tomb?"
"A dog." "His name?" "Diogenes." "From far?"
"Sinope." "What! who made a tub his home?"
"The same; now dead, amongst the stars a star."

Cynic Tub, The. The tub from which Diogenes lectured. Similarly we speak of the "Porch" (q.v.), meaning Stoic philosophy; the "Garden" (q.v.), Epicurean philosophy; the "Academy" (q.v.), Platonic philosophy; and the "Colonade," meaning Aristotelian philosophy. [They] fetch their doctrines from the Cynic tub.

Cynosure (sin' ó shur). The Pole star; hence, the observed of all observers. Greek for dog's tail, and applied to the constellation called Ursa Minor. As seamen guide their ships by the north star, and observe it well, the word "cynosure" is used for whatever attracts attention, as "The cynosure of neighbouring eyes" (Millon), especially for guidance in some doubtful matter.

Cynthia (sin' thi ̊ a). The moon; a surname of Artemis or Diana. The Roman Diana, who represented the moon, was called Cynthia from Mount Cynthia in Delos, where she was born. And from embattled clouds emerging slow, Cynthia came riding on her silver car. BEATTIE: Minstrel.

Pope, speaking of the inconstant character of woman, "matter too soft a lasting mark to bear," says—

Come, then, the colours and the ground prepare!
Dip in the rainbow, trick her off in air;
Choose a firm cloud, before it fall, and in it
Catch, ere she change, the Cynthia of the minute.
EPISTLE, ii, 17-20.

By Elizabethan poets—Spenser, Phineas Fletcher, Raleigh, Ben Jonson, and others—the name was one of the many that was applied to Queen Elizabeth.

Cypress. A funeral tree; dedicated by the Romans to Pluto, because when once cut it never grows again. It is said that its wood was formerly employed for making coffins; hence Shakespeare's "In sad cypress let me be laid" (Twelfth Night, ii, 4).

Cypresse garlands are of great account at funerals amongst the gentler sort, but rosemary and bayes are used by the commons both at funerals and weddings. They are plants which fade not a good while after they are gathered . . . and intimate that the remembrance of the present solemnity might not dye presently.—COLES: Introduction to the Knowledge of Plants.

Cyprian (sip' ri an). Cyprus was formerly famous for the worship of Venus; hence the Cyprian brass has been applied to lewd or profligate persons and prostitutes.

A Night Charge at Bow Street Office: with other matters worth knowing, respecting the unfortunate Cyprian, the feeling Coachman, and the generous Magistrate.—Pierce Egan: Life in London. Bk. ii, ch. ii.

Cyprian brass, or as Cyprium, copper. Pliny (Bk. xxxiv, c. ii) says, "in cyprio enim prima aris inventio fuit."

Cynro de Bergerac (sè ra' nò de bâr zher ak). Cynro is mostly known as the eponymous hero of Rostand's play, which appeared in 1897 with Coquelin in the title-role. The rest Cynro de Bergerac (1619-55) was a novelist and dramatist, as well as a soldier and duellist—the latter largely on account of his great nose. His best-known book was Comic Histories of the States and Empires of the Moon, 1656.

Czechooslovakia (če kò slo vâk'ya). The name of the republic formed after World War I by the union of Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, Slovakia, and part of Ruthenia, under the presidency of Thomas Masaryk (1850-1937). The capital city is Prague. After appealing in vain to the Western powers for help, it was overrun by Nazi Germany in 1938 regained its freedom in 1945 but fell into Communist hands in 1948.

D.

This letter is the outline of a rude archway or door. It is called in Phenician and Hebrew dalet (a door) and in Gr. delta (q.v.). In Egyptian hieroglyphics it is a man's hand.

Din' is mostly known

Dad or Daddy. A child's word (common to many languages) for "father"; for example: Gaelic, daidein; Welsh, tad; Cornish, tat; Latin, tata, tatula (papa); Greek, tata, retta, used by youths to an elder; Sanskrit, tata; Lap. dadda.

Dad and Dave. Two figures rapidly becoming traditional in Australian humour. They first appeared in A. H. Davis's On Our Selection, 1899; but they have since been used extensively in radio serials.

Daddy Long-legs. A crane-fly, applied also to the long-legged spiders called "harvesters."

Dadaism (da' da izm). A school of art, painting, and writing that had its beginning in New York and Zürich in 1916, arising from indignation and despair at the catastrophe of World War I and increasing with the ensuing peace. The artists endeavoured to free themselves from all previous artistic conventions in an iconoclastic attack on what they considered cultural shams. The movement died about 1922 and was succeeded by Surrealism (q.v.). The name Dadaism was derived from the French phrase alter à dada, ride a cock-horse, and was chosen at random from a dictionary. Its principal exponents were Tristan Tzara, Max Ernst, Picabia.

Dadalus (dè' dâ lus). A Greek who formed the Cretan labyrinth, and made for himself wings, by means of which he flew from Crete across the Archipelago. He said to have invented the saw, the axe, the gimlet, etc., and his name is perpetuated in our saved, skilful, fertile of invention, dadalian, labyrinthine or ingenious, etc. Cp. Icarus.
Daffodil. Legend says that the daffodil, or "Lent Lily," was once white; but Persephone, who had wreathed her head with them and fallen asleep, was captured by Pluto, at whose touch the white flowers turned to a golden yellow. Ever since the flower has been planted on graves. Theophrastus and Pliny tell us that they grow on the banks of Acheron and that the spirits of the dead delight in the flower, called by them the Asphodel. In England it used to be called the Affodil. (French, asphodile; Lat., asphodelus; Gr. asphodelos.)

An attempt was made in the 20th century in Britain to introduce it as the national emblem of Wales because the leek was considered vulgar.

Flour of daffodil is a cure for madness.—Med. MS. Lincoln Cathedral, f. 282.

Dagger or Long Cross (†), used for reference to a note after the asterisk (*), is a Roman Catholic character, originally employed in church books, prayers of exorcism, at benedictions, and so on, to remind the priest where to make the sign of the cross. This sign is sometimes called an obelisk—that is, "a spit." (Gr., obelos, a spit.)

In the arms of the City of London, the dagger commemorates Sir William Walworth's dagger, with which he slew Wat Tyler in 1381. Before this time the cognizance of the City was the sword of St. Paul.

Brave Walworth, knight, lord mayor, that slew Rebellious Tyler in his alarms;
The king, therefore, did give him in lieu The dagger to the city arms.

Fourth year of Richard II (1381), Fishmongers' Hall.

Dagger ale. The ale of the Dagger, a low-class gambling-house in Holborn, famous in Elizabethan times for its strong drink, furmety, and meat-pies. There was another tavern of the same name in Cheapside. The exact site of neither is known.

My lawyer's clerk I lighted on last night In Holborn, at the Dagger.

Ben Jonson: The Alchemist, i. 1.

Dagger-scene in the House of Commons. Edmund Burke, during the French Revolution, threw down a dagger on the floor of the House, exclaiming as he did so: "There's French fraternity for you! Such is the weapon which French Jacobins would plunge into the heart of our beloved king." Sheridan spoilt the dramatic effect, and set the House in a roar by his remark: "The gentleman, I see, has brought his knife with him, but where is his fork?" Cf. Coup de Théâtre.

Daggletail or Draggle-tail. A slovenly woman, the bottom of whose dress trails in the dirt. Dag (of uncertain origin) means loose ends, mire or dirt; whence dag-locks, the soiled locks of a sheep's fleece, and dag-wool, refuse wool.

Dago (dà' gô). A disparaging epithet applied to a Spaniard, Portuguese, or Italian generally. The word originated in Louisiana where a man of Spanish parentage was popularly called Diego.

Dagobert (dâ' gô bêt). King Dagobert and St. Eloi. There is a popular French song with this title. St. Eloi tells the king his coat has a hole in it, and the king replies, "C'est vrai, le tien est bon; prête-le moi." After many such complaints and answers St. Eloi says, "My lord, death is at hand!" "Why can't you die instead of me?" says the king. From the Revolution onwards many adaptations of this song have been made suited to the political events of the times. In 1814 it became very popular on account of verses against Napoleon and the Russian campaign and was forbidden by the police. The return of the Bourbons produced other topical verses.

Dagon. A god of the Philistines, supposed—from very uncertain etymological and mythological indications—to have been symbolized as half woman and half fish.

Dagon his name: sea-monster, upward man And downward fish; yet had his temple high Rear'd in Azotus, dæd ed through the coast Of Palestine, in Gath and Ascalon.

And Accaron and Gaza's frontier bounds. Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 462.

Daguerreotype (dâ' gar' ô tip). A photographic process invented by L. J. M. Daguerre (1789-1851) and J. N. Niepce (d. 1833). The process, which was introduced in 1839, consisted in exposing in a camera a plate of silvered copper on which a film of silvered iodide had been formed by iodine vapour. It was the first photographic process to yield a technically good result.

Dahila (dâ' liâ). This plant, bearing strikingly beautiful flowers, was discovered in Mexico by Humboldt in 1789; he sent specimens to Europe, and in 1791 it was named in honour of Andrew Dahl, the Swedish botanist and pupil of Linnaeus. It was cultivated in France in 1802, and two years later in England.

Daibutsu (di but' soo). The great bronze Buddha at Kamakura, formerly the capital of Nippon (Japan). It is in a sitting posture, and is 50 ft. high and 97 ft. in circumference; the face is 8 ft. long and the thumbs a yard round.

Above the old songs turned to ashes and pain, Under which Death enshrouds the idols and trees with mist of sigh, (Where are Kamakura's rising days and life of old?) With heart heightened to hush, the Daibutsu for ever sits.

Yone Naguchi.

Daikoku (da' kô kô). One of the seven gods of Good Fortune in the Japanese pantheon; he is invoked specially by artisans.

Dais. The raised floor at the head of a dining-room, designed for the high, or principal, table, but originally the high table itself; from late lat. discus, a table. The word was also used (as it still is in French) for a canopy, especially the canopy over the high table. Hence, Sous le dais, in the midst of grandeur.
Daisy. Ophelia gives the queen a daisy to signify "that her light and fickle love ought not to expect constancy in her husband." So the daisy is explained by Greene to mean a Quip for a misstart courtier.

The word is Day's Eye (A.S. dages eage), and the flower is so called because it closes its pinky lashes and goes to sleep when the sun sets, but in the morning expands its petals to the light. Cp. Violet.

That well by reason men calle it maie, That it is not to the daisy, or else the eie of daie. Chaucer: Legend of Good Women (Prolog).

Daisy-roots. Legend says that these, like dwarf-elder berries, stunt the growth, a superstition which probably arose from the notion that everything had the property of bestowing its own speciality on others. Cp. Fern Seed.

She robb'd dwarf-elders of their fragrant fruit And led him early with the daisy root, Whence through his veins the powerful juices ran, And formed the beauteous miniature of man. Tickell: Kensington Gardens.

Dak-bungalow. See Bungalow.

Dalai-Lama. See Lama.

Dalkey, King of. A burlesque officer, like the Mayor of Garratt (q.v.). Dalkey is a small island in St. George's Channel, near Kings-town, to the south of Dublin Bay.

Dalmatica or Dalmatic (dāl măt' ĭ ka). A vestment open in front, reaching to the knees, worn by Catholic bishops and deacons over the cassock. It is in imitation of the regal vest of Dalmatia, and was imported into Rome by the Emperor Commodus.

A similar robe is worn by kings at coronations and other great solemnities.

Daltonism. See Colour-Blindness.

Dam. The female parent of animals such as the horse, sheep, etc.; the counterpart of "sire"; when used of human beings the word has always a very opprobrious significance. It is another form of dame. See the Devil and His Dam.

Damascening (dām à sēn' ing). "Producing upon steel a blue tinge and ornamental figures, sometimes inlaid with gold and silver, as in Damascus blades; so called from Damascus, which was celebrated in the Middle Ages for this class of ornamental art.

Damask. Linens and silks first made at Damascus, imitated by the French and Flemish. Introduced into England by refugee Flemish weavers about 1570. The damask rose was brought to England from Southern Europe by Dr. Linacre, physican to Henry VIII. about 1540.

Damien's Bed of Steel (dām' ĭ enz). Robert François Damien, in 1757, attempted the life of Louis XIV. As a punishment, and to strike terror into the hearts of all regicides, he was chained to an iron bed that was heated, his right hand was burned in a slow fire, his flesh was torn with pincers and the wounds dressed with molten lead, boiling wax, oil, and resin, and he was ultimately torn to pieces by wild hounds.

The uplifted axe, the agonizing wheel, Luke's iron crown, and Damien's bed of steel. Goldsmith: The Traveller (1768).

Damn. Not worth a damn. Worthless; not even worth cursing. The derivation of the phrase from the Indian coin, a dam (96 to the penny) has no foundation in fact. Goldsmith, in his Citizen of the World, uses the expression, "Not that I care three dams." Another vague imprecation, said to have been commonly used by the great Duke of Wellington, is Not a twopenny damn.

To damn with faint praise. To praise in such measured terms as to deprive the praise of any real value.

Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer, And, without sneering, teach the rest to sneer. Pope: Epistle to Arbuthnot.

Damoecles's Sword. Impending evil or danger. Damocles, a scyphant of Dionysius the Elder, of Syracuse, was invited by the tyrant to try the felicity he so much envied. Accepting, he was set down to a sumptuous banquet, but overhead was a sword suspended by a hair. Damocles was afraid to stir, and the banquet was a tantalizing torment to him.

Damon (dā' mon). The name of a goatherd in Virgil's Eclogues, and hence used by pastoral poets for rustic swains.

Damon and Pythias. A type of inseparable friends. They were Syracusans of the first half of the 4th century B.C.; Pythias being condemned to death by Dionysius the tyrant, obtained leave to go home to arrange his affairs after Damon had agreed to take his place and be executed should Pythias not return. Pythias being delayed, Damon was led to execution, but his friend arrived just in time to save him. Dionysius was so struck with this honourable friendship that he pardoned both of them.

Damper. An Australian term for bread baked in the ashes of a fire. It was in use in the 1820s. Small dampers are called "beggars-on-the-coals"; of a somewhat similar nature are the Australian "Johnny-cakes".

Damsel. Its usual meaning is a virgin, a maiden, often a waiting-maid. From the old French damoisele, the feminine form of domoisel, a squire; this is from Med. Lat. domicellus, a contracted form of dominicellus, the diminutive of dominus, lord. (Cp. Donzel.) In mediaeval France the domicellus or domoiseau was the son of a king, prince, knight, or lord before he entered the order of knighthood; the king's bodyguards were called his damoiseaux or damels. Froissart styles Richard II le jeune damoiseel Richard, and Louis VII (Le Jeune) was called the royal damsel.

Damsion. Originally called the Damascene plum, from Damascus, it having been imported from Syria.

Dan. A title of honour meaning Sir or Master (Lat. dominus, cp. Span. don), common with the old poets, as Dan Phœbus, Dan Cupid, Dan Neptune, Dan Chaucer, etc. (Cp. Dom.)

Dan Chaucer, well of English styles Richard II le jeune damoiseel Richard, and Louis VII (Le Jeune) was called the royal damsel.

On Fame's eternal beadroll worthy to be filed. Spenser: Faerie Queene, IV, ii. 32.
From Dan to Beersheba. From one end of the kingdom to the other; all over the world; everywhere. The phrase is Scriptural, Dan being the most northern and Beersheba the most southern cities of the Holy Land. We have a similar expression, "From Land's End to John o' Groats."

Danace (dán' ás). An ancient Persian coin, worth rather more than the Greek obolus (q.v.). and sometimes, among the Greeks, placed in the mouth of the dead to pay their passage across the ferry of the Lower World.

Danné (dán' á ę). An Argive princess, daughter of Acrisius, King of Argos. He, told that his daughter's son would put him to death, resolved that Danæ should never marry, and accordingly locked her up in an inaccessible tower. Zeus foiled the king by changing himself into a shower of gold, under which guise she readily found access to the fair prisoner, and she thus became the mother of Perseus.

Danaides (dán' á i déź). The fifty daughters of Danaus, King of Argos. They married the fifty sons of Egyptus, and all but Hypermnestra, wife of Lynceus, at the command of their father murdered their husbands on their wedding night. They were punished in Hades by having to draw water eternally in sieves from a deep well.

Dance. I'll lead you a pretty dance. I'll bother or put you to trouble. The French say, Donner le bal à quelqu'un. The reference is to the complicated dances of former times, when all followed the leader.

St. Vitus's dance. See VITUS.

To dance and pay the piper. To work hard to amuse and have to bear all the expense and take all the trouble oneself as well. The allusion is to Matt. xi, 17:—"We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced."

To dance attendance. To wait obsequiously, to be at the beck and call of another. It was an ancient custom at weddings for the bride, no matter how tired she was, to dance with every guest.

Then must the poor bride kepe foote with a dauncer, and refuse none, how scabbed, foule, drouncken, rude, and shameless soever he be.—CHRISTEN: State of Matrimoniy, 1543.

I had thought
They had parted so much honestly among them (At least, good manners) as not thus to suffer
A man of his place, and so near our favour,
To dance attendance on their lordships' pleasures.
SHAKESPEARE: Henry VIII, v, 2.

To dance upon nothing. To be hanged.

Dance of Death. An allegorical representation of Death leading all sorts and conditions of men in a dance to the grave, originating in Germany in the 14th century as a kind of morality play, quickly becoming popular in France and England, and surviving later principally by means of pictorial art. There is a series of woodcuts, said to be by Hans Holbein (1538), representing Death dancing after all sorts of persons, beginning with Adam and Eve. He is beside the judge on his bench, the priest in the pulpit, the nun in her cell, the doctor in his study, the bride, and the beggar, the king and the infant; but he is "swallowed up at last."

On the north side of Old St. Paul's was a cloakroom, on the walls of which was painted, at the cost of John Carpenter, town clerk of London (15th century), a "Dance of Death," or "Death leading all the estate with speeches of Death, and answers," by John Lydgate. The Death-Dance in the Dominican Convent of Basle was retouched by Holbein.

Dances, National. When Handel was asked to point out the peculiar taste of the different nations of Europe in dancing, he ascribed the minuet to the French, the saraband to the Spaniard, the ariette to the Italian, and the hornpipe and the morris-dance to the English. To these might be added the reel to the Scots, and the jig to the Irish.

Astronomical dances, invented by the Egyptians, designed to represent the movements of the heavenly bodies.

The Bacchic dances were of three sorts: grave (like our minuet), gay (like our gavotte), and mixed (like our minuet and gavotte combined).

The dance Champtère, invented by Pan, quick and lively. The dancers (in the open air) wore wreaths of oak and garlands of flowers.

Children's dances, in Lacedemonia, in honour of Diana. The children were nude; and their movements were grave, modest, and graceful.

Corybantic dances, in honour of Bacchus, accompanied with timbrels, flutes, and a tumultuous noise produced by the clashing of swords and spears against brazen bucklers.

Funereal dances, in Athens, slow, solemn dances in which the priests took part. The performers wore long white robes, and carried cypress slips in their hands.

Hymenial dances were lively and joyous. The dancers were crowned with flowers.

Jewish dances. David danced in certain religious processions (2 Sam. vi, 14). The people sang and danced before the golden calf (Exod. xxxii, 19). And in the book of Psalms (cl, 4) we read, "Praise Him with the timbrel and dance." Miriam the sister of Moses, after the passage of the Red Sea, was followed by all the women with timbrels and dances (Exod. xv, 20).

Of the Lapithæ, invented by Piritous. These were exhibited after some famous victory, and were designed to imitate the combats of the Centaurs and Lapithæ. These dances were both difficult and dangerous.

May-day dances at Rome. At daybreak lads and lasses went out to gather "May" and other flowers for themselves and their elders; and the day was spent in dances and festivities.

Military dances. The oldest of all dances executed with swords, javelins, and bucklers. Said to be invented by Minerva to celebrate the victory of the gods over the Titans.

Nuptial dances. A Roman pantomimic performance resembling the dances of our Harlequin and Columbine.

Pyrrhic dances. See PYRRHIC.

Sallet dances, instituted by Numa Pompius in honour of Mars. They were executed by twelve priests selected from the highest of the nobility, and the dances were performed in the temple, while dances were being made and hymns sung to the god.

The Dancing Dervishes celebrate their religious rites with dances, which consist chiefly of spinning round and round a little allotted space, not in couples, but each one alone.

In ancient times the Gauls, the Germans, the Spaniards, and the English had their sacred dances. In fact, in all religious ceremonies the dance was, and in many religions still is, an essential part of divine worship.
Dancing Chancellor, The. Sir Christopher Hatton (1540-91) was so called, because he first attracted Queen Elizabeth's notice by his graceful dancing in a masque at Court. He was Lord High Chancellor from 1587 till his death.

His bushy beard, and shoestrings green,
His high-crowned hat and satin doublet,
Moved the stout heart of England's queen,
Though Pope and Spaniard could not trouble it.

GRAY: A Long Story.

Dancing-water. A magic elixir, common to many fairy-tales, which beautifies ladies, makes them young again, and enriches them. In the Countess d'Aulnoy's Contes des Féés it fell in a cascade in the Burning Forest, and could only be reached by an underground passage. Prince Chercy fetched a bottle of it for his beloved Fair-star, but was baid by a dove.

Dandelion (dan'de li on). The leaves of the plant have jagged, tooth-like edges; hence its name, which is a form of the M.E. dent de lion, from Fr. dent de lion, lion tooth. Its Lat. name is Taraxacum dens leonis.

Dander. Is your dander up or riz? Is your anger excited? Are you in a rage? This is generally considered to be an Americanism, but it is of uncertain origin, and as a synonym for anger has been a common dialect word in several English counties. In the present sense it is more likely that it is one of the words (like waffle, and hook for a point of land) imported into America by the early Dutch colonists, from donder, thunder; the Dutch op donneren is to burst into a sudden rage.

He was as spunky as thunder, and when a Quaker gets his dander up, it's like a Northwester.

SEBAR SMITH: Letters of Major Jack Downing (1830).

From this dog descended Davidson of Hyndlee's breed, the original Dandie-Dinmont.—T. BROWN: Our Dogs.

Dandiprat (dan' di prät). A small coin issued in the reign of Henry VII, value three halfpence. The term was also applied to a dwarf imported into America by the early Dutch colonists, from donder, thunder; the Dutch op donneren is to burst into a sudden rage.

He was as spunky as thunder, and when a Quaker gets his dander up, it's like a Northwester.

DANDER: see DANDY.

Danebrog or Danebrog (da'né brog). The national flag of Denmark (brog is Old Danish for cloth). The tradition is that Waldemar II of Denmark saw in the heavens a fiery cross which betokened his victory over the Esthoni ans (1219). This story is very similar to that of Constantine (see under Cross) and of St. Andrew's Cross.

The order of Danebrog. The second of the Danish orders of knighthood; instituted in 1219 by Waldemar II, restored by Christian V in 1671, and several times modified since.

Damocks. Hedging-gloves. The word is said to be a corruption of Doornick, the Flemish name of Tournay, where they may have been originally manufactured. Cp. Dornick.

Dансker (dan'sker). A Dane. Denmark used to be called Danske. Hence Polonio says to Reynaldo, "Inquire me first what Danskers are in Paris." (Hamlet, ii, 1.)

Dante and Beatrice (dan'te, be' a tris, bā a trē' chi). Beatrice Portinari, was only eight years old when the poet first saw her. His abiding love for her was pure as it was tender. Beatrice married a nobleman, named Simone de Bardi, and died young, in 1290. Dante married Gemma, of the powerful house of Donati. In the Divina Commedia the poet is conducted first by Virgil (who represents human reason) through hell and purgatory; then by the spirit of Beatrice (who represents the wisdom of faith); and finally by St. Bernard (who represents the wisdom from on high).

Dantesque (da'n te sk). Dante-like—that is, a minute lifelike representation of horrors, whether by words, as in the poet, or in visible form, as in Doré's illustrations of the Inferno.

Daphne (da'f ni). Daughter of a river-god, loved by Apollo. She fled from the amorous god, and escaped by being changed into a laurel, thenceforth the favourite tree of the sun-god.

Nay, lady, sit. If I but wave this wand
Your nerves are all chain'd up in alabaster,
And you a statue, or, as Daphne was,
Root-bound, that fled Apollo.

MILTON: Comus, 678.

Daphnis (da'f nis). In Greek mythology, a Sicilian shepherd who invented pastoral poetry. He was a son of Mercury and a Sicilian nymph, was protected by Diana, and was taught by Pan and the Muses.

The lover of Chloe (q.v.) in the Greek pastoral romance of Longus, in the 4th century. Daphnis was the model of Allan Ramsay's Gentle Shepherd, and the tale is the basis of St. Pierre's Paul and Virginia.

Dapple. The name given in Smollett's translation of Don Quixote to Sancho Panza's donkey (in the original it has no name). The word is probably connected with Icel. depill, a spot, and means blotched, speckled in patches. A dapple-grey horse is one of a light grey shaded with a deeper hue; a dapple-bay is a light bay spotted with bay of a deeper colour.
Darbies. Handcuffs. Probably so-called from a personal name; the phrase “father Darbies bands” for handcuffs is found in George Gascoigne’s Steele Glas, 1576.

Hark ye! Jem Clink will fetch you the darbies.—SCOTT: Peveril of the Peak.

Johnny Darbies, policemen, is a perversion of the French gendarmes, in conjunction with the above.

Darby and Joan. The type of loving, old-fashioned, virtuous couples. The names belong to a ballad written by Henry Woodfall, and the characters are said to be John Darby, of Bartholomew Close, who died 1730, and his wife, “As chaste as a picture cut in alabaster. You might sooner move a Scythian rock than shoot fire into her bosom.” Woodfall served his apprenticeship to John Darby; but another account localizes the couple in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

The French equivalent is C’est St. Roch et son chien.

Darbyites (dar’ bi itz). A name sometimes given to the Plymouth Brethren (q.v.), from John Nelson Darby (1800-82), the founder.

Dardanelles (dar dá nelz). The entrance to the Straits of Gallipoli, commanded by the two forts of Sestos and Abydos, built by the Sultan Mahomet IV in 1659, and taking their name from the adjacent town of Dardanus. The British fleet passed through the Straits in 1807 and 1853; but the campaign to force the Straits in 1915 was unsuccessful.

Daric. An ancient Persian gold coin, probably so called from dara, a king (see Darius), much in the same way as our sovereign, but perhaps from Assyrian dariku, weight. Its value is put at about 23s. There was also a silver daric, worth one twentieth of the gold.

Darien, Isthmus of (dár’ i én). Central America, discovered by Columbus, 1494. Bulboa crossed the isthmus and first saw the Pacific, 1513. “Silent, upon a peak in Darien”—Keats, On First looking into Chapman’s Homer (where the poet erroneously refers to Cortez).

Darius (dá’ rí’ ús). A Greek form of Persian dara, a king, or of Sanskrit dury, the maintainer. Gushtasp, or Kishasp assumed the title on ascending the throne in 521 B.C., and is generally known as Darius the Great.

Legend relates that seven Persian princes agreed that he should be king whose horse neighed first; and the horse of Darius was the first to neigh.

It is said that Darius III (Codomanus), the last king of Persia, who was conquered by Alexander the Great (331 B.C.), when Alexander succeeded to the throne, sent to him for the tribute of golden eggs, but the Macedonian answered, “The bird which laid them is flown to the other world, where Darius must seek them.” The Persian king then sent him a bat and ball, in ridicule of his youth; but Alexander told the messengers, with the bat he would beat the ball of power from their master’s hand. Lastly, Darius sent him a bitter melon as emblem of the grief in store for him; but the Macedonian declared that he would make the Sháh eat his own fruit.

Dark. A dark horse. A racing term for a horse of good pretensions, but of which nothing is positively known by the general public. The epithet is applied to a person whose abilities are untried or whose probable course of action is unknown.

A leap in the dark. A step the consequences of which cannot be foreseen. Thomas Hobbes is reported to have said on his death-bed, “Now am I about to take my last voyage—a great leap in the dark.” Hallam considered this term to apply to the period lasting from A.D. 475 to about the middle of the 12th century; in 1868 Lord Derby applied the words to the Reform Bill.

The Dark Ages. The earlier centuries of the Middle Ages (q.v.); so called because of the intellectual darkness thought to be characteristic of the period.

Dark and bloody ground. Kentucky. So called by the Indians because of the fierce wars waged in the forests, and later so known by the whites for the same reason in their struggle against the red man.

The dark Continent. Africa; concerning which the world was so long “in the dark,” and which, also, is the land of dark races.

The darkest hour is that before the dawn. When things have come to their worst, they must mend. In Lat., Post nubila Phaebus.

To keep dark. To lie perdu; to lurk in concealment.

To keep it dark. To keep it a dead secret; to refuse to enlighten anyone about the matter.

To darken one’s door. To cross one’s threshold; almost entirely used only in a threatening way, as “Don’t you dare to darken my door again!”

Darkie. A former colloquial name for an American Negro, found as early as 1775.

Darley Arabian. In 1704 Thomas Darley sent from Aleppo to his father Richard Darley, of Aldby Park, Yorks, an Arab horse of the best Maneghi breed. From this thoroughbred stallion came a famous breed of race-horses, including Eclipse (q.v.) who was Darky Arabian’s great-grandson.

It is interesting to note that the entire thoroughbred race throughout the world is descended from three Arabs, of which Darley Arabian was one. The others were Byerley Turk, the charger of Capt. Byerley at the Battle of the Boyne, and Godolphin Arabian, brought to England in 1720 by Edward Coke, from whose hands he passed into the possession of the Earl of Godolphin.

Darn and derr are minced forms of down and date from the late 18th and early 19th centuries.

Darnex. See Dornick.

Dart. See Abaris.

D’Artagnan (dar ta nyôn). The hero of Dumas’s novels The Three Musketeers, Twenty Years After, etc., was a real man—Charles de Baatz, Seigneur d’Artagnan, a Gascon gentleman who was born at Lupiac in 1611. He rose to be captain in Louis XIV’s Mousquetaires and eventually became general of brigade. He was killed at the siege of Maestricht, in 1673. Dumas and his collaborator Maquet worked up the story from the Mémoires de M. D’Artagnan, written by Courtilz de Sandras and published in Cologne, 1701-02.

Darwinian Theory. Charles Darwin (1809-82) published in 1859 Origin of Species, to prove that the numerous species now existing on the earth sprang originally from one or at most a few primal forms; and that the present diversity is due to special development and natural selection. In recent times the Darwinian theory has undergone very considerable modification but it is still the basis of scientific research. See EVOLUTION.

Dash. One dash under a word in MS. means that the part so marked must be printed in italics: two dashes means small capitals; three dashes, large capitals.

Cut a dash. See CUT.

Dash my wig, buttons, etc. Dash is a euphemism for “damn,” and the words wig, buttons, etc., are relics of a fashion at one time adopted in comedies and by “mashers” of swearing without using profane language.

Date. Not up to date. Not in the latest fashion, behind the times.

To have a date. To have an appointment, more particularly with someone of the opposite sex.

Datum Line (dá’ tûm). A term used in surveying and engineering to describe a line from which all heights and depths are measured. The datum line upon which the Ordnance Survey maps of Great Britain are based was, until 1921, the mean sea-level at Liverpool, since that date it has been the mean sea-level at Newlyn, Cornwall.

Daughter. The daughter of Peneus. The bay-tree was so called because it grew in greatest perfection on the banks of the River Peneus.

The daughter of the horseleech. One very exiguous; one for ever sponging on another. Prov. xxx, 15.

The horseleech hath two daughters, crying.

Give, Give.

The scavenger’s daughter. See SCAVENGER.

Dauphin (daw’ fin). The heir of the French crown under the Valois and Bourbon dynasties. Guy VIII, Count of Vienne, was the first so styled, because he wore a dolphin as his cognizance. The title descended in the family till 1349, when Humbert III ceded his seigneurie, the Dauphiné, to Philippe VI (de Valois), one condition being that the heir of France assumed the title of le dauphin. The first French prince so called was Jean, who succeeded Philippe; and the last was the Duc d’Angoulême, son of Charles X, who renounced the title in 1830.

Grand Dauphin. Louis, Duc de Bourgogne (1661-1711), eldest son of Louis XIV, for whose use was published the Delphine Classics (q.v.).

Second or Little Dauphin. Louis, son of the Grand Dauphin (1682-1712).

Davenport (dâv’ ən pôrt). This word, which owes its origin to the name of some now-forgotten craftsman, is applied to two different articles of furniture; one kind of davenport is a small desk with drawers on each side; the other is a large upholstered sofa or settee that can also be made up into a bed.

Davenport Brothers, The. Two impostors from America whose alleged spiritualistic manifestations caused a great sensation in the early 1860s. Their imposture was exposed in 1865.

David. In Dryden’s Absalom and Achitophel (q.v.), represents Charles II.

David Jones. A sailor’s name for the supposed evil spirit of the sea.

He’s gone to Davy Jones’s locker. The nautical way of saying that a messmate is dead and has been buried at sea. It has been conjectured that Jones is a corruption of Jonah the prophet who was thrown into the sea.

This same Davy Jones, according to the mythology of sailors, is the fiend that presides over all the evil spirits of the deep, and is seen in various shapes... warning the devoted wretch of death and woe.—SMOLLETT: Peregrine Pickle, xiii.
Davy Lamp. A miner's safety-lamp invented by Sir Humphry Davy (1778-1829) and brought into use in the mines in 1816.

Dawson, Bully. A noted London sharper, who swaggered and led a most abandoned life about Blackfriars, in the reign of Charles II. Bully Dawson kicked by half the town, and half the town kicked by Bully Dawson.—CHARLES LAMB.

Jemmy Dawson. The hero of a pathetic ballad by Shenstone, given in Percy's Reliques. Captain James Dawson (1717-46) joined the "Young Chevalier," and was one of the Manchester rebels who was hanged, drawn, and quartered on Kennington Common in 1746. A lady of gentle blood was in love with the gallant young rebel, and died of a broken heart after witnessing his execution.

Young Dawson was a gallant youth, A brighter never trod the plain; And well he lov'd one charming maid, And dearly was he lov'd again.

Day. When it begins. (1) With sunset: The Jews in their "sacred year," and the Church—hence the eve of feast-days; the ancient Britons "non diem numerum, ut not. sed noctem computaverint," says Tacitus—hence "se'night" and "fort'night"; the Athenians, Chinese, Mohammedans, etc. (2) With sunrise: The Babylonians, Syrians, Persians, and modern Greeks. (3) With noon: The ancient Egyptians and modern astronomers. (4) With midnight: The English, French, Dutch, Germans, Spanish, Portuguese, Americans, etc.

A day after the fair. Too late; the fair you came to see is over.

Day in, day out. All day long and every day. Every dog has its day. See Dog.

I have had my day. My prime of life is over; Old Joe, sir . . . was a bit of a favourite . . . once; but he has had his day.—DICKENS: Dombey and Son.

I have lost a day. The exclamation (Perdidi diem) of Titus, the Roman emperor, when on one occasion he could call to mind nothing done during the past day for the benefit of his subjects.

To-day a man, to-morrow a mouse. In Fr., "Aujourd'hui roi, de demain rief." Fortune is so fickle that one day we may be at the top of the wheel, and the next day at the bottom.

To lose the day. To lose the battle; to be defeated. To win (or gain) the day is to be victorious.

Day of the Barricades, Dupes. See these words.

Daylight. Toast-masters used to cry out, "Gentlemen, no daylight nor heel-taps." This meant that the wineglass was to be full to the brim so that light could not be seen between the edge of the glass and the top of the wine; and that every drop of it must be drunk. See HEELTAP.

Daylight Saving. A system of advancing the clock by an hour on some specified day in the Spring, and putting back the hands one hour on a specified day in autumn. By this device greater advantage can be taken of the longer evenings of summer-time. The originator was William Willett (1856-1915) a London builder who advocated the scheme for some years but died before it was adopted (as a war measure) in 1916. By an Act of 1925 Daylight Saving started the third week in April and ended the first week in October, but since the outbreak of World War II the dates have varied from year to year.

In 1941 a system of Double Summer Time was introduced, the clock being set back yet another hour (i.e. two hours in advance of G.M.T.) during the height of summer, approx. April to August.

Daylights. Pugilists' slang for the eyes.

To beat the living daylight's out of him, to heavily chastise. To let daylight into him, to pierce a man with sword or bullet.

Daysman. An umpire, judge, or intercessor.

The obsolete verb to day meant to appoint a day for the hearing of a suit, hence to judge between; and the man who dayed was the daysman. The word is used in Job ix, 33; also by Spenser and others.

If neighbours were at variance, they ran not straight to law; Daysmen took up the matter, and cost them not a straw.

Dayspring. The dawn.

The dayspring from on high hath visited us.—Luke i, 78.

Daystar. The morning star. Hence the emblem of hope or better prospects.

Again o'er the vine-covered regions of France, See the day-star of Liberty rise.—WILLSON: Noctes.

De die in diem (dé dì' e in di' em) (Lat.). From day to day continuously, till the business is completed.

The Ministry have elected to go on de die in diem.—Newspaper paragraph.

De facto (Lat.). Actually, in reality; in opposition to de jure, lawfully or rightfully. Thus John was de facto king, but Arthur was so de jure. A legal axiom says: "De jure Judices, de facto Juratores, respondent;" Judges look to the law, juries to the facts.

De jure. See De FACTO, above.

De mortuis nil nisi bonum (dé mór' tò is nil nì' si bó' num) (Lat.). Of the dead speak kindly or not at all. "Speak not evil of the dead" was one of the maxims of Chilo (q.v.).

De novo (dé nó' vò) (Lat.). Afresh; over again from the beginning.

De profundis (dé pró' fun' dis) (Lat.). Out of the deep; hence, a bitter cry of wretchedness. Ps. cxix is so called from the first two words in the Latin version. It forms part of the Roman Catholic burial service.

These words were chosen as the title of Oscar Wilde's apologia, published posthumously in 1905.

De rigueur (dé rigü' er) (Fr.). According to strict etiquette; quite comme il faut, in the height of fashion.

De trop (dé trò') (Fr.). One too many; when a person's presence is not wished for, that person is de trop.
Deacon. To deacon apples, etc., is an American phrase arising out of the thrifty habits ascribed to the rural New England deacons who are said to have put the best or largest specimens of fruit, etc., on the top of the baskets in which they were being sold, the inferior goods being concealed beneath them.

Dead. Dead as a door-nail. The door-nail is either one of the heavy-headed nails with which large outer doors used to be studded, or the knob on which the knocker strikes. As this is frequently knocked on the head, it cannot be supposed to have much life left in it. The expression is found in Piers Plowman.

"Come thou and thy five men, and if I do not leave you alive as dead as a door-nail, I pray God I may never eat grass more."—SHAKESPEARE: 2 Henry VI, iv, 10.

Other well-known similes are "Dead as a shotten herring," "as the nail in a coffin," "as mutton," and Chaucer’s "as stoon [stone]."

Let the dead bury the dead. (Matt. viii, 22.) Let bygones be bygones. Don’t rake up old and dead grievances.

Let me entreat you to let the dead bury the dead, to cast behind you every recollection of bygone evils, and to cherish love, to sustain one another through all the vicissitudes of human affairs in the times that are to come.—GLASTONE: Home Rule Bill (February 13th, 1893).

The wind is dead against us. Directly opposed to our direction. Instead of making the ship more lively, its tendency is quite the contrary.

Dead beat. Exhausted. In the U.S.A. the word is used as a noun, a worthless fellow.

Dead drunk. So intoxicated as to be wholly powerless.

Pythagoras has finely observed that a man is not to be considered dead drunk till he lies on the floor and stretches out his arms and legs to prevent his going lower.—S. WARREN.

Dead-eye. A block of wood with three holes through it, for the lanyards of rigging to reeve through, without sheaves, and with a groove round it for an iron strap. An old name for them is "dead men’s eyes.”

Dead hand. One who is a "dead hand" at anything can do it every time without fail. See also HAND, DEAD MAN’S; MORTMAIN.

First-rate work it was, too; he was always a dead hand at splitting.—BOLDREWOOD: Robbery Under Arms, xx.

Dead-heads. Those admitted to theatres, etc., without payment; they are "dead" so far as the box-office receipts are concerned. The term is also applied to persons who receive something of value for which the taxpayer has to pay.

In nautical language, an obstruction floating so low in the water that only a small part of it is visible.

Dead beat. A race in which two (or more) leading competitors reach the goal at the same time, thus making it necessary to run the race over again. See Heat.

Flogging the dead horse. See Horse.

To work a dead horse. To perform work already paid for; to pay off a debt.

Dead languages. Languages no longer spoken; such as Latin and Sanskrit.

Dead letter. A law no longer acted upon. Also a letter which cannot be delivered by the postal authorities because the address is incorrect, or the person addressed cannot be found.

Dead-letter Office. See Blind Department, and Dead Letter above.

I am at a dead lift. In a strait or difficulty where I greatly need help; a hopeless exigency. A dead lift is the lifting of a dead or inactive body, which must be done by sheer force.

Dead lights. Strong wooden shutters to close the cabin windows of a ship.

To ship the dead lights. To fasten the shutter over the cabin window to keep out the sea when a gale is expected.

Dead lock. A lock which has no spring catch. Metaphorically, a state of things so entangled that there seems to be no practical solution.

Dead men. Empty bottles.

Down among the dead men let me lie. Let me get so intoxicated as to slip from my chair, and lie under the table with the empty bottles.

Dead men’s shoes. See Shoe.

Dead reckoning. A calculation of the ship’s place without any observation of the heavenly bodies. An approximation made by consulting the log, compass, chronometer, the direction, wind, and so on.

Dead right. Entirely right.

Dead ropes. Those which are fixed or do not run on blocks.

Dead Sea. The salt lake in Palestine, in the ancient Vale of Siddim; so called by the Romans (Mare Mortuum), also Lacus Asphaltites. The water is limpid, and of a bluish-green colour; it supports no life other than microbes and a few very low organisms. It is about 46 miles long by 10 miles broad; its surface is about 1,300 ft. below sea-level, and it attains a depth of nearly 1,300 ft. The percentage of salt in the ocean generally is about three or four, but of the Dead Sea it is twenty-six or more.

Dead Sea fruit. See APPLES OF SODOM.

To be at a dead set. To be set fast, so as not to be able to move. The allusion is to machinery.

To make a dead set upon someone. To make a steady and unwavering concentration of activity upon someone’s attention or notice; to concentrate one’s endeavours to gaining a person’s affection. The allusion being to dogs, bulls, etc., set on each other to fight.

Dead weight. The weight of something without life; a burden that does nothing towards easing its own weight; a person who encumbers us and renders no assistance. Cp. Dead Lift.

Dead works. A theologian’s term (from Heb. ix, 14) denoting such works as do not earn salvation, or even assist in obtaining it.

Dead water, the eddy-water which closes in with a ship’s stern as she passes through the water.
Deaf. Deaf as an adder. "They are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear; which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely." (Ps. lix, 8, 9.) In the East, if a viper entered the house, the charmer was sent for, who enticed the serpent and put it into a bag. According to tradition, the viper tried to sting its ears when the charmer uttered his incantation, by applying one ear to the ground and twisting its tail into the other.

In the United States deaf adder is one of the names of the copperhead (q.v.).

Deaf as a beetle. It is not the insect that is here alluded to, but the heavy wooden mallet used to level paving-stones or drive in stakes.

Deaf as a post. Quite deaf; or so inattentive as not to hear what is said. One might as well speak to a gatepost or log of wood.

Deaf as a white cat. It is said that white cats are deaf and stupid.

None so deaf as those who won't hear. The French have the same locution:
Il n'y a de pire sourd que celui qui ne veut pas entendre.

Deal. This is a word to which several meanings are attached. It can mean a business transaction; the distribution of a pack of cards; pinewood or fir wood: a plank of this wood measuring not less than 6 ft. long, 7 in. across, and 3 in. thick; a lot, a quantity; a share.

To deal in is to trade in.

To deal with is to be concerned with, or to handle, or to do business with.

To deal out is to hand out in shares; esp. cards in a game.

Dean. (Lat. decanus, one set over ten.) The ecclesiastical dignitary who presides over the chapter (q.v.) of a cathedral or collegiate church, this having formerly consisted of ten canons (q.v.). In ecclesiastical use there are also deans not having chapters (such as the Deans of Westminster and Windsor, and the Bishop of London) is ex officio Dean of the Province of Canterbury. Rural deans are subsidiary officers of archdeacons.

The title "Dean" is also borne by certain resident Fellows at English Universities who have special functions; by the head of Christ Church, Oxford; and, in Scotland, by the President of the Faculty of Advocates (Dean of Faculty), and certain magistrates (Dean of Guild). In the U.S.A., a dean is an administrative officer of a college or university, who supervises a school, a faculty, or a body of Students, e.g. Dean of Women, Dean of the Graduate School.

The chief or senior of any group of men may be called a dean, as dean of the diplomatic corps.

Dean of the Arches. The judge presiding over the Court of Arches. See ARCHES.

Dear. Dear bought and far brought, or felt. A gentle reproof for some extravagant purchase of luxury.

My dearest foe. As "my dearest friend" is one with whom I am on the greatest terms of friendship, so "my dearest foe" is one with whom I am on the greatest terms of enmity.

Would I had met my dearest foe in heaven, or ever I had seen that day, Horatius.

SHAKESPEARE: Hamlet, i, 2.

Oh, dear me! A very common exclamation; there is no foundation for the suggestion that it is a corruption of the Ital. O Dio mio! (Oh, my God!); it is more likely to have originated as a euphemism for the English "Oh, damn me!"

Death. Milton makes Death keeper, with Sin, of Hell-gate.

The other phrase (if shape it might be called that shape had none Distinguishable in member, joint or limb; Or substance might be called that shadow seemed;) The likeness of a kingly crown had on.

See Malmsey.

Sauveius (Appius) was choked to death supping up the white of an under-boiled egg. Phiny, History, vii, 33.

Death in the pot. During a death in Gilgal, therewas made for the sons of the prophets a pottage of wild herbs, some of which were poisonous. When the sons of the prophets tasted the pottage, they cried out, "There is death in the pot." Then Elisha put into it some meal, and its poisonous qualities were counteracted (2 Kings iv, 40).

Death under shield. Death in battle.

Her imagination had been familiarised with wild and bloody events ... and had been trained up to counter an honourable "death under shield" (as that it: a field of battle was termed) a desirable termination to the life of a warrior.—Scott: The Betrothed, ch. vi.

Death-bell. A tinkling in the ears, supposed by the Scottish peasantry to announce the death of a friend.

"O lay, 'tis dark, an' I heard the death-bell.
An' I darena gae yonder for gowd nor fee.

JAMES HOGG: Mountain Bard.

Death-watch. Any species of Anobium, a genus of wood-boring beetles, that make a clicking sound, once supposed to presage death.

Death's head. Bawds and procurers used to wear a ring bearing the impression of a head in the time of Queen Elizabeth.

Allusions are not uncommon in plays of the period.

Sell some of the cloaths to buy thee a death's head, and put upon thy middle finger: your least considering bawd does so much.—Massinger: The Old Law, iv, 1.

Death's head Moth. Acherontia atropos, is so called from the markings on the back of the thorax, which closely resemble a skull. It is also called the Hawk Moth.

Death's man. An executioner; a person who kills another brutally but lawfully.

He's dead, I'm only sorry
He had no other death's man.

King Lear, iv, 6.

Eske and Sark, claimed by both England and Scotland, and for a long time the subject of dispute. It was the haunt of thieves and vagabonds.

See Devonshire.

Debonair (de bon ar') (Le Débonnaire). Louis I of France (178, 814-40), also called The Pious, son and successor of Charlemagne; a man of courteous manners, cheerful temper, but effeminate and deficient in moral energy.

Debt of Nature. To pay the debt of Nature.

To die. Life is a loan, not a gift, and the debt is paid off by death.

The slender debt to Nature's quickly paid.

Quarles: Emblems.

Decameron (de kám'ér nón). The collection of 100 tales by Boccaccio (1353) represented as having been told in ten days (Gr. deka, ten, hemera, day) during the plague at Florence in 1348. The storytellers were also ten (seven ladies and three gentlemen), and they each told a tale on each day.

Decathlon. An athletic contest in the modern Olympic games, consisting of ten events:
100 metres race, long jump, putting the shot, high jump, 400 metres race, 110 metres hurdles, discus, pole vault, throwing the javelin, and 1,500 metres race.

December (Lat., the tenth month). So it was when the year began in March with the vernal equinox; but since January and February have been inserted before it, the term is etymologically incorrect.

The old Dutch name was Wintermaand (winter-month); the old Saxon, Mid-winter-monath (midwinter-month); whereas June was Mid-sumor-monath.

Christian Saxons called December Se ura geola (the anti-yule). In the French Republican calendar it was called Frimaire (hoar-frost month, from November 22nd to December 20th).

The Man of December. Napoleon III
(1808-73). He was made President of the French Republic December 11th, 1848; made his coup d'état December 2nd, 1851; and became Emperor December 2nd, 1852.

Decimo-sexta. An obsolete expression for a little, insignificant person. The term comes from the book-trade: sexto-decimo (16 mo.) is a book in which each sheet is folded to a six-tenth of its size, giving 32 pages; hence it is a

How now! my dancing braggart in decimo-sexta!

Charm your skipping tongue.

Ben Jonson: Cynthia's Revels, 1, 1.

Deck. A pack of cards, or that part of the pack which is left after the hands have been dealt.

The term was used in England until the 19th century; it is now in use in the U.S.A.

But whilst he thought to steal the single ten,

The king was slyly fingered from the deck.

3 Henry VI, v, 1.

Clear the decks. Get everything out of the way that is not essential; get ready to set to work. A sea term. Decks are cleared before action.

To sweep the deck. To clear off all the stakes. See above.

To deck is to decorate or adorn. (Dut.
dekken, to cover; perhaps connected with
A.S. thecan, that thatch.)

I thought thy bride-bed to have decked, sweet maid,

Whose head was slyly fingered from the deck.

Shakespeare: Hamlet, v, 1.

Deckle Edge. The feathery edge occurring round the borders of a sheet of handmade or mould-made paper, due to the deckle or frame of the mould. It can be imitated in machine-made papers.

"dress cut low about the bosom."

Decoration Day or Memorial Day. May 30th; set apart in the United States for decorating the graves of those who fell in the Civil War (1861-5).
DecoK Duck. A bait or lure; a duck taught to allure others into a net, and employed for this purpose.

Decree nisi. See Nisi.

Decretals. The name given by ecclesiastical historians to the second part of the code law, which contains the decrees and decisions of the early popes on disputed points.

The False or Forged Decretals were designed to support the claim of the popes to temporal as well as spiritual authority, and purport to be the decisions of some thirty popes of the first three centuries. They comprise nearly a hundred letters written in the names of the early popes, as Clement and Anacletus, as well as letters from their supposed correspondents and acts of fictitious councils. The 9th-century forgery known as the Donation of Constantine is also among the False Decretals. This purports to relate how Constantine the Great, when he retired to the Bosporus in 330, conferred all his rights, honours, and property as Emperor of the West on the Pope of Rome and his successors. It is said, also, to have been confirmed by Charlemagne.

The Isidorian Decretals were genuinely compiled in the 9th century, and assigned to Isidore of Seville, who died in 636.

Decuman Gate. A Roman military term. The principal entrance to a camp, situated on the side farthest from the enemy, and so called because it was guarded by the 10th cohort of each legion (decimus, tenth).

Dedalus. See Ædæalus.

Dedalus, Stephen (déd’ à lús). The young man whose literary and moral development is described in James Joyce's Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man. He also appears as a character in Ulysses.

Dee, Dr. John Dee (1527-1608) was a famous astrologer; he was patronized by Queen Elizabeth, and was a man of vast knowledge, whose library, museum, and mathematical instruments were valued at £2,000. On one occasion the populace broke into his house and destroyed the greater part of his valuable collection. In the notion that Dee held intercourse with the devil. He ultimately died a pauper, at the advanced age of eighty-one and was buried at Mortlake. He professed to be able to raise the dead, and had a magic mirror, a piece of solid pink-tinted glass about the size of an orange, in which persons were told they could see their friends in distant lands and how they were occupied. It was afterwards in Horace Walpole's collection at Strawberry Hill, and is now in the British Museum.

Deed Poll (déd’ pól). A deed drawn by one party, and so called because such deeds were formerly written on parchment with a polled or straight edge, in distinction to the indentures, which had an indented or wavy edge. It is by deed poll that one changes one's name or executes any deed that does not concern another party.

Deer. Supposed by poets to shed tears. The drops, however, which fall from their eyes are not tears, but an oily secretion from the so-called tear-pits.

A poor sequestered stag... Did come to languish... and the big round tears Coursed one another down his innocent nose

In piteous chase.

Deficient. A deficient number is one of which the sum of all its divisors is less than itself, as 10, the divisors of which are 1, 2, 5, = 8, which is less than 10.

Deficit, Madame. Marie Antoinette; so called because she was always demanding money of her ministers, and never had any. According to the Revolutionary song:

La Boulangerie a des écus, Qui ne lui content guère.

See BAKER.

Degrees, Songs of. Another name for the Gradual Psalms (q.v.).

Dei Gratia (dē’ ĭ grá’ shâ) (Lat.). By the grace of God. Introduced into English charters in The judgment of God: so the judgment by some (A.D. 780), we find occasionally the same or some similar assumption as, Dei dono, Christo donanient, etc.

From about 676 to 1170 the Archbishop of Canterbury and some other ecclesiastical dignitaries used the same style; the Archbishop is now divina providentia.

Dei Judicium (dé i joo dish ‘i um) (Lat.). The judgment of God; so the judgment by ordeals was called, because it was taken as certain that God would deal rightly with the appellants.

Deidamia (dé i dâ’ mia). When Achilles (q.v.) was concealed in the island of Scyrus dressed as a woman he met this daughter of Lycomedes, and she became by him the mother of Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus.

Deist. See Theist.

Deities. The more important deities of classical, Teutonic, and Scandinavian mythology are given as entries in this work: the present list is only intended to include collective names and the gods of a few special localities, functions, etc.

Déjeuner à la Fourchette (Fr.). A fork lunch; a cold collation with meat and wine.

The two gentlemen were consulting as to the best means of being useful to Mrs. Becky, while she was finishing her interrupted déjeuner à la fourchette.—THACKERAY: Vanity Fair, ch. lxxv.

Delaware (del’ à wâr). The name of a State, river, and bay in the United States: so called from Thomas West, Baron De la Warr (1577-1618), first Governor of Virginia, in 1611.

Delectable Mountains. In Bunyan's Pilgrim’s Progress, a range of mountains from which the "Celestial City" may be seen. They are in Immanuel's land, and are covered with sheep, for which Immanuel had died.

Delenda est Carthago (dé len’ dá est kar’ thâ gó), Lat. “Carthage must be destroyed.” The words with which Cato the Elder concluded every speech in the Senate when Carthage was such a menace to the power of Rome. They are now proverbial, and mean, “That which stands in the way of our greatness must be removed at all hazards.”

Delft, or more correctly Delf. A common sort of pottery made at Delft in Holland, a town noted from the 16th to the 18th centuries for its very excellent pottery.

Delight. The delight of mankind. So Titus, the Roman emperor, was entitled (40, 79-81) on account of his benevolence and munificence.

Delirium. From the Lat. lira (the ridge left by the plough), hence the verb de-lirare, to make an irregular ridge in ploughing. Delirius was one who couldn't plough a straight furrow, hence a crazy, doting person, one whose mind wandered from the subject in hand; and delirium is the state of such a person. Cp. Prevarication.

Della Cruscans (del’ a krôös’ känz) or Della Cruscan School. A school of poetry started by some young Englishmen at Florence in the latter part of the 18th century. Their silly, sentimental affectations, which appeared in the World and the Oracle, created for a time quite a furor, but were mercilessly gibbeted in the Baviad and Maviad of Gifford (1794 and 1795). The clique took its name from the famous Accademia della Crusca (literally, Academy of Chaff) which was founded in Florence in 1582 with the object of purifying the Italian language—sifting away its “chaff”—and which in 1611 published an important dictionary.

Delos. A floating island, according to Greek legend, ultimately made fast to the bottom of the sea by Poseidon. Apollo having become possessors of it by exchange, made it his favourite retreat. It is the smallest of the Cyclades.

Delphi or Delphos. A town of Phocis, at the foot of Mount Parnassus (the modern Kastroi), famous for a temple of Apollo and for an oracle which was silenced only in the 4th century a.d. by Theodosius, and was celebrated in every age and country.

Delphi was looked upon by the ancients as the "navel of the earth," and in the temple was kept a white stone bound with a red ribbon, to represent the navel and umbilical cord.

In the Winter's Tale (the same play in which he gives Bohemia a seacoast) Shakespeare makes Delphos an island.

Delphin Classics. A set of Latin classics edited in France by thirty-nine scholars, under the superintendence of Montausier, Bossuet, and Huet, for the use of the Dauphin (Lat. in usum Delphini), i.e. the son of Louis XIV, called the Grand Dauphin. They were first published in 1674, and their chief value consists in their verbal indexes or concordances.

Delta. A tract of alluvial land enclosed by the mouth of a river. The name, from the Greek letter Δ, delta was originally given to the area of the mouths of the Nile, which was of triangular shape: it has since been applied to similar formations, such as the deltas of the Danube, Rhine, Ganges, Indus, Mississippi, etc.

Deluge. The Bible story of Noah's Flood has its counterpart in several mythologies and folklore. In Babylonia it appears in the 11th tablet of the Gilgamesh Epic but on a higher level of civilization, for Utnapishtim (Noah) takes into the ark with him craftsmen and treasure.

Apollodorus tells the story of Deucalion and Pandora (q.v.). Of this story there are several versions, in one of which Deucalion is replaced by Ogyges.

One of the Indian deluge stories tells how Manu was warned by a fish, which towed the boat he made and brought it to safety.

In all these stories it is observable that, as in the case of Noah, the survivors' first act was to render thanks to the god who had preserved their lives.

Somewhat similar deluge stories are found in China, Burma, New Guinea, Polynesia and both the American continents.

See also AFTER ME THE DELUGE.

Demerit (de mér'it) has reversed its original meaning (Lat. demére, to merit, to deserve). The de- was originally intensive, as in "de-mand," "de-scribe," "de-claim," etc., but in medieval Latin it came to be regarded as privative, and in English the word hence had both a good and a bad sense, of which the latter is now the only one remaining.

My demerits [deserts] may speak unbonneted. Othello, i, 2.

Demesne. See MANOR.

Demeter (de mè'ter). One of the great Olympian deities of ancient Greece, identified with the Roman Ceres (q.v.). She was the goddess of fruits, crops, and vegetation generally, and the protectress of marriage. Persephone (Proserpine) was her daughter.

Demijohn (dem' i jon). A glass vessel with a large body and small neck, enclosed in wicker-work like a Florence flask, and containing more than a bottle. The word is from the Fr. d'ime-jeanne. "Madame Jane," which has been thought to be a corruption of Damaghan, a town in Persia. There is, however, no support for this; it is more likely that the word is simply a popular name—"Dame Jane"—like "Bellarmine" (q.v.), but it is possible that it is from the Lat. de mediana, of middle size, or even dimidium, half.

Dem-i-monde (dem'i mond). Female society only half acknowledged, as le beau monde is Society. The term was first used by Dumas fils, and has been sometimes incorrectly applied to fashionable courtisans.

[Dumas'] demi-monde is the link between good and bad society. . . . the world of compromised women, a social limbo, the inmates of which . . . are perpetually struggling to emerge into the paradise of desirable and respectable ladies.—Fraser's Magazine, 1885.

Demi-rep (dem'i rep). A woman whose character has been blown upon, one "whom everybody knows to be what nobody calls her" (Fielding). A contraction of demi-reputation.

Demi-urge (dem'i ěrij). In the language of the Platonists, that mysterious agent which made the world and all that it contains. The Logos or Word spoken of by St. John, in the first chapter of his gospel, is the Demiurgus of Platonizing Christians. In the Gnostic systems, Jehovah (as an eon or emanation of the Supreme Being) is the Demi-urge. See MARCIONITES.

In some of the ancient Greek states the chief magistrate was called the demiurgus.

Democracy. A form of Government in which the sovereign power is in the hands of the people, and exercised by them directly or indirectly: also, a State so governed, and the body of the people, especially the non-privileged classes. (Gr. demos-kratia, the rule of the people.)

Democrats. Advocates of government by the people. A term adopted by the French revolutionists to distinguish themselves from the aristocrats. Adopted by the pro-slavery Southern States in the U.S.A., now a political party more of the left than the Republicans.

Democritus (de mok' ri tus). The laughing philosopher of Abdera (lived about 460-357 B.C.). He should rather be termed the deriding philosopher, because he derided or laughed at people's folly or vanity. It is said that he put out his eyes that he might think more deeply.

Democritus, dear droll, revisit earth, and with our follies glut thy heightened mirth. Prior.

Demogorgon (dem ō gor' gon). A terrible deity, whose very name was capable of producing the most horrible effects. He is first mentioned by the 4th-century Christian writer, Lactantius, who, in so doing is believed to have broken the spell of a mystery, for Demogorgon is supposed to be identical with the infernal Power of the ancients, the very mention of whose name brought death and disaster, to whom reference is made by Lucan and others:

Must I call your master to my aid, at whose dread name the trembling furies quake. Hell stands abashed, and earth's foundations shake?—Rowe: Lucan's Pharsalia, vi.

Hence Milton speaks of "the dreaded name of Demogorgon" (Paradise Lost, ii, 956). According to Ariosto Demogorgon was a king of the elves and fays who lived on the Himalayas, and once in five years summoned all his subjects before him to give an account of their stewardship. Spenser (Faerie Queene, iv, ii, 47) says that he dwells in the deep abyss with the three fatal sisters.

Demon (Austr.). A convict serving his sentence of transportation in Van Diemen's Land (Tasmania).

Demons, Prince of Asmodeus (q.v.), also called "The Demon of Matrimonial Unhappiness."

Demos, King (dē' məs). A facetious term for the elector, the proletariat. Those who choose and elect our senators, and are therefore the virtual rulers of the nation.

Demurrage (de mûr' ĭj). An allowance made to the master or owners of a ship by the freighters for detaining her in port longer than the time agreed upon. (Lat. demorari, to delay.)

The extra days beyond the lay days . . . are called days of demurrage.—Kent: Commentaries, vol. iii, pt. v, lecture xlvii, p. 159.

Den (de mi'). A size of paper between royal and crown, measuring 17 ⅞ by 22 ⅞ in. in printing papers, and 15 ½ by 20 in. in writing papers. It is from Fr. demi (half), probably meaning "half imperial."

A Demy of Magdalen College, Oxford, is a foundation scholar, whose allowance or "commons" was originally half that of a Fellow.

Den. God ye good den! An abbreviated form of the old salutation "God give you good evening."

Nurse: God ye good morrow, gentlemen

Merchant: God ye good den, fair gentlewoman.

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, ii, 4.

Denarius (den ā'rī' ĭs). A Roman silver coin equal in value to ten asses (deni-ases), or about 8d. The word was used in France and England for the inferior coins, whether silver or copper, and for ready money generally. The initial "d." for penny (£ s.d.) is from denarius.

The denarius . . . shown to our Lord . . . was the tribute-money payable by the Jews to the Roman emperor, and must not be confounded with the tribute paid to the Temple.—Madden: Jewish Coinage, ch. xi.

Denarius Dei (Lat. God's penny). An earnest of a bargain, which was given to the church or poor.

Denarii St. Petri. Peter's pence (q.v.).

Denizen. A person who lives in a country as opposed to foreigners who live outside (Lat. de-intus, from within, through O.Fr. dejezine). In English law the word means a made citizen —i.e. an alien who has been naturalized by letters patent.

A denizen is a kind of middle state, between an alien and a natural-born subject, and partakes of both.—Blackstone: Commentaries, Bk. i, ch. x.

Denmark. According to the Roman de Rose, Denmark means the country of Danoas, who settled here with a colony after the siege of Troy. But Danoas is said by the same sort of name-legend to have settled in Britain. Saxo-Germanicus, with equal absurdity, makes Dan, the son of Humle, the first king, to account for the name of the country.

The true origin of the word is from the nearch or boundary of the Danes.

Denys, St. (dē nē'). The apostle to the Gauls and patron saint of France. He is said to have been beheaded at Paris in 272, and, according to tradition, carried his head, after martyrdom, for six miles in his hands and laid it on the spot where stands the cathedral bearing his name. The tale may have taken its rise from an ancient painting of the incident, in which the artist placed the head between the martyr's hands so that the trunk might be recognized.

Montjoie Saint Denys! See Montjoie.

Deo gratias (dē' ō grā shās) (Lat.). Thanks to God. Cp. Dei gratia.

Deo juvante (dē' ō joo vān' te) (Lat.). With God's help; God willing.

Deo volente (dē' ō vō len' te) (Lat.). God being willing; by God's will; usually contracted into D.V.

Deoch-an-doruis. See Dochnan doroch.

Deodand (dē' ō dānd). Literally, something "given to God" (Lat. deo-dandum). In English law, a personal chattel which had been the cause of the death of a person which (till the custom was abolished in 1846) was forfeited and sold for some pious use. For instance, when a man met with his death through injuries inflicted by the fall of a ladder, the ruins of a bull, or the kick of a horse, the cause of death was sold, and the proceeds given to the Church. The custom originated in the idea that as the person was sent to his account without the sacrament of extreme unction, the money could serve to pay for masses for his repose.

Depart. Literally, to part thoroughly; to separate effectually. The marriage service in the old prayer-books had "till death us depart," which has been corrupted into "till death us do part."

"Depart" is sound English for "part asunder," which was altered to "do part" in 1661, at the pressing request of the Puritans, who knew as little of the history of their national language as they did of that of their national Church.—J. H. Blunt: Annotated Book of Common Prayer.

Department. France is divided into departments, as Great Britain and Ireland are divided into counties or shires. From 1768 it was divided into governments, of which thirty-two were grand and eight petit. In 1790, by a decree of the Constituent Assembly, it was mapped out de novo into eighty-three departments. In 1804 the number of departments was increased to 107, and in 1812 to 130. In 1815 the territory was reduced to eighty-six departments, and continued so till 1860, when Savoy and Nice were added. The present number is ninety, including Corsica and the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine.

Depot. The American term for a railway station, in use since the first introduction of railways into that country.

Derby (dēr' bi). The American term for the hat known as the Bowler (q.v.) in England. The Brown Derby is a well-known restaurant in Hollywood, shaped like a hat, frequented by the film colony.

Derby Scheme (dar' bi). As a compromise with conscription the Government introduced a scheme in 1915 (when the Earl of Derby was at the War Office) of voluntary enlistment for men between 18 and 41, who would be called to the colours in age groups. It did not succeed, and conscription was introduced in January, 1916.

Derby Day is the day when the Derby stakes are run for, during the great Epsom Summer Meeting; it is usually during the week before or after Whit Sunday. The Derby, known as the "Blue Riband of the Turf," is for colts and fillies of three years old only; consequently, no horse can win it twice. See CLASSIC RACES.

Derby Stakes (där' bi). Started by Edward Stanley, the twelfth Earl of Derby, in 1780, the year after his establishment of the Oaks stakes (q. v.).

Derrick. A temporary crane to remove goods from the hold of a vessel, etc.; so called from Derrick, the Tyburn hangman early in the 17th century. The name was first given to the gibbet; hence, from the similarity in shape, to the crane. He rides circuit with the devil, and Derrick must be his host, and Tyborne the inn at which he will light.—DE LA RUE: Ballad of London (1608).

Derwentwater. Lord Derwentwater's lights. A local name for the Aurora Borealis; James, Earl of Derwentwater, was beheaded for rebellion February 24th, 1716, and it is said that the northern lights were unusually brilliant that night.

Desert Rats. Sobriquet of the 7th Armoured Division which, already in the Western Desert before the outbreak of war in 1939, served in the Eighth Army throughout the North African campaigns. Afterwards served in N.W. Europe. Its divisional sign was a red desert rat on a black ground. The 4th Armoured Brigade, also of long standing in the desert, used a black rat on a white ground. The name was given contemptuously by Mussolini but adopted with pride and pleasure.

Desmas. See Dysmas.

Despair. Giant Despair, in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, lived in "Doubling Castle." He caught unwary pilgrims and shut them up in his grim castle, from which Christian and Hopeful escaped by using the key called Promise.

Deauville. The Deluge. The Deluge, of Greek legend. Deucalion was son of Prometheus and Clymene, and was king of Phthia, in Thessaly.

When Zeus sent the deluge Deucalion built a ship, and he and his wife, Pyrrha, were the only mortals saved. The ship at last rested on Mount Parnassus, and Deucalion was told by the oracle at Themis that to restore the human race he must cast the bones of his mother behind him. His interpretation of this was the casting of his mother Earth, so the two cast these as directed and those thrown by Deucalion became men, and those thrown by his wife became women.

Deuce. The two, in games with cards, dice, etc. (Fr. deux). The three is called "Tray" (Fr. trois; Lat. tres).

Deuce-ace. A throw of two dice, one showing one spot and the other showing two; hence, exceptionally bad.

There are various origins ascribed to the word deuce used as a euphemism for devil. It may derive in reverse meaning from the Latin expletive Deus!, My god! Or it may come from the Celtic dus, teuz, a phantom, spectre. Or, again, there is the Old German durse, durse, meaning a giant. Finally, there is a suggestion that it comes from the two at dice being an unlucky throw.

Deuce take you. Get away! you annoy me.

It played the deuce with me. It made me very ill; it disagreed with me; it almost ruined me.

The deuce is in you. You are a very demon.

What the deuce is the matter? What in the world is amiss?

Deus. Deus ex machina. The intervention of some unlikely event, in order to extricate one from difficulties. Literally, it means "a god (let down upon the stage) from the machine," the "machine" being part of the furniture of the stage in an ancient Greek theatre.

Dev. Chester, or the Dee.

Nor yet where Deva spreads her wizard stream.

Milton: Lydias.

Devil. Represented with a cloven foot, because by the Rabbinical writers he is called setirizzin (a goat). As the goat is a type of uncleanness, the prince of unclean spirits is aptly represented under this emblem.

In his Divina Commedia Dante gives the following names to the various devils:—

Alichino, the allurer; Barbaricina, the malicious; Calabrina, the grace-scorner; Cognazzo, the snarer; Cirgajo Santutto, the tusked boar; Dragognazzo, the fell dragon; Farfarello, the scoundrel; Grafiche, the dogish; Libeccio, the ill-tempered; Rubicon, the red with rage; Scarmiglione, the baneful.

In legal parlance a devil is a leader's assistant (also a barrister) who gets up the facts of a brief, with the laws bearing on it, and summarizes the case for the pleader.

The Attorney-General's devils are the Counsel of the Treasury, who not unfrequently get promoted to the bench.

A printer's devil. A printer's message boy; formerly, the boy who took the printed sheets from the tympan of the press. Moxon says (1683): "They do commonly so black and daub themselves that the workmen do jocosely call them devils."
As the devil loves holy water. That is, not at all, holy water drives away the devil. The Latin proverb is, "Sicut sus amaricum amat" (as swine love marjoram). Lucretius, vi, 974, says, "amaricum fugit sus."

Beating the devil's tattoo. Tapping on the table with one's finger a wearisome number of times, or on the floor with one's foot; repeating any rhythmical mechanical sound with annoying pertinacity.

Between the devil and the deep sea. Between Scylla and Charybdis: between two evils, each equally hazardous. The allusion seems to be to the herd of swine and the devils called Legion. (Luke, viii. 26 ff.)

Cheating the devil. Mincing an oath; doing evil for gain, and giving part of the profits to the Church, etc. In a literal sense, cheating the devil is by no means unusual in monkish traditions. Thus the "Devils' Bridge," over the Fall of the Reuss, in the canton of the Uri, Switzerland, is a single arch over a cataract. It is said that Satan knocked down several bridges, but promised the abbot, Giraldus of Einsiedeln, to let this one stand, provided he would give him the first living thing that crossed. The abbot agreed, and threw across it a loaf of bread, which a hungry dog ran after, and "the rocks re-echoed with peals of laughter to see the devil thus defeated." (Longfellow: Golden Legend, v.)

Rabelais says that a farmer once bargained with the devil for each to have on alternate years what grew under and over the soil. The canny farmer sowed carrots and turnips when it was his turn to have the under-soil share, and the name of a game in which a top (the "devil") is spun among a number of wooden men ("tailors") and knocks down as many as possible.

The first-mentioned use of the phrase is said to have originated through a row at a benefit performance about 1830 for the well-known actor William Dowton (1764-1831). The piece was a burlesque called The Tailors: a Tragedy for Warm Weather, and a large number of tailors caused a riot outside the theatre (the Haymarket) as they considered it insulting to the trade.

The devil and all. Everything, especially everything bad.

The devil and his dam. The devil and something even worse. Dam (q.v.) here may mean either mother (the usual meaning), or wife. Quotations may be adduced in support of either of these interpretations, and it is to be noted that frequently (cp. Paradise Lost, ii) there is no differentiation. Also, Rabbinical tradition relates that Lilith was the wife of Adam, but was such a vixen that Adam could not live with her, and she became the devil's dam. We also read that Belphegor "came to earth to seek him out a dam." In many mythologies the devil is typified by an animal; the Irish and others call him a black cat; the Jews speak of him as a dragon (which idea is carried out in our George and the Dragon); the Japanese call him a species of fox; others say he is a goat, a camel, etc., and Dante associates him with dragons, swine, and dogs. In all which cases dam for mother is not inappropriate.
The devil catch the hindmost. A phrase from late medieval magic; it was said that the devil had a school at Toledo, or at Salamanca, where the students, when they had made a certain progress in their studies, were obliged to run through a subterranean hall, and the last man was seized by the devil and became his imp.

The devil in Dublin City. The Scandinavian form of Dublin was Divelin[a], and the Latin Dublima. “Dublin” is the Gael. dhu linn, the black pool. Devlin, in Co. Mayo, is the same word and preserves the Scandinavian form.

It is just as true the devil’s in hell
Or Dublin city.

Burns: Death and Dr. Hornbrook.

The devil is not so black as he is painted. Said in extenuation or mitigation, especially when it seems that exaggerated censure has been given.

The devil looking over Lincoln. Said of a vitriolic critic or a backbiter. Fuller, in his Worthies (under Oxford), says the phrase may allude either to the “stone picture of the Devil which doth [1661] or lately did overlook Lincoln College,” or to a grotesque sculpture at Lincoln Cathedral. The phrase occurs as early as 1562 (John Heywood’s Proverbs).

Than wold ye looke ouer me with stomoke swolne
Like as the devill lookt ouer Lincolne.

The devil rides on a fiddlestick. Much ado about nothing. Beaumont and Fletcher, Shakespeare, and others, use the phrase.

“Fiddlesticks!” as an exclamation, meaning rubbish! nonsense! When the prince and his followers are at hand, and anon enters the hostess to put her guests on their guard.

The devil’s advocate. See Advocate.

The devil’s daughter’s portion. The saying is:
Deal, Dover, and Harwich,
The devil gave with his daughter in marriage, because of the scandalous impositions practised in these seaports on sailors and occasional visitors.

The devil’s door. A small door in the north wall of some old churches, which used to be opened at baptisms and communions to “let the devil out.” The north used to be known as “the devil’s side,” where Satan and his legion lurked to catch the unwary.

The devil sick would be a monk.

When the Devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
When the Devil got well, the devil a monk was he.

Said of those persons who in times of sickness or danger make pious resolutions, but forget them when danger is past and health recovered. The lines are found as an interpolation in Urquhart and Motteux’s translation of Rabelais (Bk. iv, ch. xxiv). A correct translation of what Rabelais actually wrote is:

“There’s a rare rogue for you,” said Eusthenes, “there’s a rogue, a rogue and a half. This makes good the Lombard’s proverb, “Passato el Pericolo, gabbato el Santo” [when the danger is passed, the Saint is mocked].

The devil to pay and no pitch hot. The “devil” is a seam between the garboard-strake and the keel, and to “pay” is to cover with pitch (O. Fr. payer, to pitch, whence Fr. poix; see Pay). In former times, when vessels were often careened for repairs, it was difficult to calk and pay this seam before the tide turned. Hence the location, the ship is careened, the devil is exposed, but there is no hot pitch ready, and the tide will turn before the work can be done.

To hold a candle to the devil. See Candle.

To kindle a fire for the devil. To offer sacrifice, to do what is really sinful, under the delusion that you are doing God’s service.

To lead one the devil’s own dance. To give him endless trouble; to lead him right astray.

To play the very devil with something. To muddle and mar it in such a way as to spoil it utterly.

To pull the devil by the tail. To struggle constantly against adversity.

To say the devil’s paternoster. To grumble; to rail at providence.

To whip the devil round the stump. An American phrase meaning to enjoy the fruits of evil-doing without having to suffer the penalty; to dodge a difficulty dishonestly but successfully.

When the devil is blind. Never.

Why should the devil have all the good tunes? A saying originating with Charles Wesley about 1740, when he utilized the music of the popular songs of the day to get his hymns sung and known.

Devil in Topographical Nomenclature.

Devil’s Arrows. Three remarkable “Druid” stones near Boroughbridge, Yorks, like Harold’s Stones.

Devil’s Bridge. There is a village in Cardiganshire of this name, so called because of its double bridge across a gorge of the river Mynach. The lower bridge dates from the 11th century, and is locally known as the Monks’ Bridge, because it was built by, and for the use of, the monasteries in the neighbourhood; the upper bridge dates from 1735. See also Cheating the Devil, in Phrases above.

The Devil’s Cheesewring. See Cheesewring.

Devil’s Coits. See Hackell’s Coit.

The Devil’s Current. Part of the current of the Bosphorus is so called, from its great rapidity.

Devil’s Den. A cromlech in a valley, near Marlborough. It now consists of two large uprights and an impost. The third upright has fallen.

The Devil’s Dyke. A ravine in the South Downs, Brighton. The legend is, that St.
Cuthman, walking on the downs, prided himself on having Christianized the surrounding country, and having built a nunnery where the dyke-house now stands. Presently the devil appeared and told him all his labour was vain, for he would swamp the whole country before morning. St. Cuthman went to the nunnery and told the abbess to keep the sisters in prayer till after midnight, and then illuminate the windows. The devil came at sunset with mattock and spade, and began cutting a dyke into the sea, but was seized with rheumatic pains all over his body. He flung down his mattock and spade, and the cocks, mistaking the illuminated windows for sunrise, began to crow: whereupon the devil fled in alarm, leaving his work not half done.

The same name is given to a prehistoric earthwork in Cambridgeshire, stretching across Newmarket Heath from Rech to Cowledge.

The Devil's Frying-pan. A Cornish tin-mine worked by the Romans.

The Devil's Hole. A name of the Peak Cavern, in Derbyshire.

The Devil's Nostrils. Two vast caverns separated by a huge pillar of natural rock in the mainland of the Zetland Islands.

The Devil's Punch Bowl. A deep combe on the S.W. side of Hindhead Hill, two miles N. of Haslemere, in Surrey. A similar dell in Mangerton Mountain, near Killarney, has the same name.

The Devil's Throat. Cromer Bay. So called from its danger to navigation.

The Devil's Tower. A great rectangular granite obelisk, over 600 feet in height, in the Black Hills, Dakota, U.S.A.

IN PERSONAL NOMENCLATURE.

Devil Dick. A nickname of Richard Porson (1759-1808), the great English Greek scholar.

Robert the Devil. See Robert Le Diable.

The French Devil. Jean Bart (1651-1702), an intrepid French sailor, born at Dunkirk.

The Devil's missionary. A nickname given to Voltaire (1694-1778), and very likely to others.

Son of the Devil. Ezzelino (1194-1259), the noted Ghibelline leader and Governor of Vicenza; so called for his infamous cruelties.

The White Devil was the name given to Vittoria Corbonona, an Italian murderess whose story was dramatized by John Webster under that name, 1608.

The White Devil of Wallachia. Scanderbeg, or George Castriota (1403-68), was so called by the Turks.

IN COMMON TERMS AND NAMES.

Devil and bag o' nails. See Bag o' Nails.

Devil dodger. A sly hypocrite; a ranting preacher.

Devil may care. Wildly reckless; also a reckless fellow.

Devil on two sticks. The English name of Le Sage's novel Le diable boiteux (1707), in which Asmodeus (q.v.) plays an important part. It was dramatized by Foote in 1768. See also Diabolo.

Devil's apple. The mandrake; also the thorn apple.

Devil's bedpost. In card games, the four of clubs. Cp. Devil's Four-poster below.

Devil's Bible. See Devil's Books below.

Devil's bird. A Scots name for the yellow bunting; from its note, devil.

Devil's bones. Dice, which are made of bones and lead to ruin.

Devil's books, or Devil's picture-book. Playing cards. A Presbyterian phrase, used in reproof of the term King's Books, applied to a pack of cards, from the Fr. livre des quatre rois (the book of the four kings). Also called the Devil's Bible.

Devil's candle. So the Arabs call the mandrake, from its shining appearance at night.

Devil's candlestick. The common stinkhorn fungus, Phallus impudicus; also called the devil's horn and the devil's stinkpot.

Devil's coach-horse. A large rove-beetle, Goerius olen.

Devil's coach-wheel. The corn crowfoot.

Devil's dust. The flock made from old rags torn up by a machine called the "devil"; also the shoddy made from this.

Devil's four-poster. A hand at whist with four clubs. It is said that such a hand is never a winning one. Cp. Devil's Bedpost above.

Devil's horn. See Devil's Candlestick above.

Devil's luck. Astounding good luck. Persons always lucky were thought at one time to have compounded with the devil.

Devil's mass. Swearing at everybody and everything.

The Devil's Own. The 88th Foot, the Connaught Rangers. So called by General Picton from their bravery in the Peninsula War, 1809-14. Also the Inns of Court Regiment, which was at one time chiefly recruited from among lawyers.

The Devil's Parliament. The parliament which met at Coventry in 1459 and impeached the Yorkist leaders.

The Devil's Paternoster. See in Phrases above.

Devil's snuff-box. A puff-ball; a fungus full of dust; one of the genus Lycoperdon.

Devonshire. English legend accounts for the name (which is really from that of the ancient Celtic inhabitants, the Damnonii) by saying that it is from Debon, one of the heroes who came with Brutus from Troy. When Brutus allotted out the island, this portion became Debon's share.

In mede of these great conquests by them got Corineus had that province utmost west... And Debon's share was that is Devonshire.

Spenser: Faerie Queene, II, x, 12.

The Devonshire Poet. O. Jones, a journeyman wool-comber, who lived at the close of the 18th century. Other Devonshire poets are John Gay (1685-1732) of The Beggar's Opera, and Edward Capern (1819-94), called Dew Ponds.

Dew Ponds. On the heights of the chalk downs and in other places where there is no visible means of replenishment there are ponds which remain full in the heat of summer when ponds at lower levels dry up. These dew ponds are often of prehistoric origin, dating back to the Stone Age and beyond. They are cunningly made, with a lower layer of straw or reeds, and an upper layer of clay, and are kept filled mostly by mist and dew. The presence of a dew pond is a sure sign that ancient man dwelt in the neighbourhood.

Dexter (dek's tèr). A Latin word meaning “to the right, on the right-hand side”; hence dextrous originally signified “right-handed.” In Heraldry the term dexter is applied to that side of the shield which is to the right of the person bearing it upon the arm, hence it indicates the left side of the shield as seen by the spectator, either when viewed as an actual shield or when seen depicted.

Dey. The title of the Mohammedan governors of Algiers, Tripoli, and Tunis; originally applied to the commander of Janissaries at Algiers who (1710) became ruler. From Turk. dār, maternal uncle.

Diable, Le. Olivier Le Dain, the tool of Louis XI, and once the king’s barber. So called because he was as much feared as the devil himself, and even more disliked. He was hanged in 1484, after the death of the king.

Diabolo. An old game that was revived about 1907, in which the players have each two sticks connected with a cord on which they spin, and pass from one to the other, a reel-shaped top. It used to be called the “devil on two sticks,” the top being the “devil.”

Diadem (di’ à dem). In ancient times the head-band or fillet worn by kings as a badge of royalty was called a diadem; it was made of silk or linen and was tied at the back, with the ends falling on the neck. The diadem of Bacchus was a broad band which might be unfolded to make a veil. The Emperor Constantine was the first to wear a diadem of jewels, and from his time rows of pearls and precious stones have made up the royal and imperial diadems.

To him who wears the royal diadem. Paradise Lost.

Mont Blanc is the monarch of mountains. On a throne of rocks, in a robe of clouds, With a diadem of snow. Byron: Manfred, i, 1.

Dialectics. Logic in general; the art of disputat; the investigation of truth by analysis; that strictly logical discussion which leads to reliable results. Gr. dialegein, to speak thoroughly.

Kant used the word to signify the critical analysis of knowledge based on science, and Hegel for the philosophic process of reconciling the contradictions of experience in a higher synthesis.

The following questions from John of Salisbury are fair specimens of the dialectics of the Schoolmen (q.v.):

When a person buys a whole cloak, does the cowl belong to his purchase? When a hog is driven to market with a rope round its neck, does the man or the rope take him?

Diamond. A corruption of adamant (q.v.). So called because the diamond, which cuts other substances, can be cut or polished with no substance but itself (Gr. a damao, what cannot be subdued).

In Spenser’s Faerie Queene (Bk. iv) Diamond is one of the three sons of Agapē. He was slain by Cambalo.

Diamond is the playing area in the game of Baseball.

A diamond of the first water. A specially fine diamond, one of the greatest value for its size. The colour or lustre of a diamond is called its “water.”

A rough diamond. An uncultivated genius; a person of excellent parts, but without society manners.

As for Warrington, that rough diamond had not had the polish of a dancing-master, and he did not know how to waltz.—Thackeray.

Black diamonds. See Black.

Diamond cut diamond. Cunning outwitting cunning; a hard bargain over-reached. A diamond is so hard that it can only be ground by diamond dust, or by rubbing one against another.

Diamond hammer. A pick for “whetting” millstones. It is provided with several sharp-pointed teeth to give a uniform roughness to the surface of the stone. Also a steel pick with diamond-shaped point at each extremity to recut grooves in stone.

Diamond Jim. Jim Brady, an American railway magnate who liked to cover his person with diamonds of great size in the form of rings, buttons, tie pins, etc.

The diamond jousts. Jousts instituted by King Arthur, “who by that name had named them, since a diamond was the prize.” The story, as embroidered by Tennyson in his Lancelot and Elaine from Malory (Bk. xviii, ch. 9-20) is that Arthur found nine diamonds from the crown of a slain knight and offered them as the prize of nine jousts in successive years.

The Diamond Necklace. The famous “Diamond Necklace Affair” of French history (1783-5) centres round Marie Antoinette, Cardinal de Rohan, a profligate and ambitious churchman, and an adventuress, the Countess de Lamotte. Partly by means of the queen’s signatures, which were almost certainly forged. Rohan was induced to purchase for the queen, for about £85,000, a diamond necklace originally made for Mme Dubarry. He handed the necklace to the countess who was to pass it on to the queen, but she sold it to an English jeweller and kept the money. When the time of payment arrived Boehmer, the jeweller, sent his bill in to the queen, who denied all knowledge of the matter. A nine months' trial ensued which created immense scandal. The necklace is still in existence.

Diamond Pitt. Thomas Pitt (1653-1726), owner of the famous Pitt Diamond (q.v.), and grandfather of the Earl of Chatham, was so known.

The Diamond Sculls. An annual race for amateur single-scullers taking place at the Henley Royal Regatta, and first rowed in 1844. The prize is a pair of crossed silver sculls not quite a foot in length, surmounted by an imitation wreath of laurel, and having a pendant of diamonds. It passes from winner to winner; but each winner receives a silver cup as a souvenir.

Diana (di'ã′nə). An ancient Italian and Roman divinity, later identified with the Olympian goddess Artemis, who was daughter of Zeus and Leto, and twin-sister of Apollo. She was the goddess of the moon and of hunting, protector of women, and—in earlier times at least—the great mother goddess or Nature goddess. Cp. SeLene. The temple of Diana at Ephesus, one of the Seven Wonders of the World (q.v.), built by Dinosoares, was set on fire by Herostratos, for the sake of perpetuating his name. The Ionians decreed that anyone who mentioned his name should be put to death; but this very decree gave it immortality. The temple was discovered in 1872.

Diana of Ephesus. This statue, a cone surmounted by a bust covered with breasts, was told, fell from heaven. If so, it was an arolite; but Minucius (2nd cent. A.D.), who says he saw it, describes it as a wooden statue, and Pliny, a contemporary, tells us it was made of ebony. Probably the real “image” was a meteorite, and in the course of time a wooden statue was substituted.

The Palladium of Troy, the most ancient image of Athena at Athens, the statues of Artemis at Tauris and Cybele at Pessinus, the sacred shield of the Romans, and the shrine of our Lady of Loreto, are examples of objects of religious veneration which were said to have been sent from heaven.

Great is Diana of the Ephesians. A phrase sometimes used to signify that self-interest blinds the eyes, from the story in Acts xix, 4-6 of Demetrius, the Ephesian silversmith who made shrines for the temple of Diana.

The Tree of Diana. See Philosopher's Stone.

Diana's Worshippers. Midnight revellers. So called because they return home by moonlight, and so, figuratively, put themselves under the protection of Diana (q.v.).

Napkin (dî′pā′són). The word is Greek short for dia pason chordon through all the hords) and means an harmonious combination of notes; hence harmony itself. Dryden says:

From harmony, from heavenly harmony
The universal frame began;
From harmony to harmony
Thro' all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason closing full in man.

Song for St. Cecilia's Day.

According to the Pythagorean system, the world is a piece of harmony and man the full chord. Cp. Microcosm.

Diaper (dí′â pér). A sort of variegated white cloth, so called from Gr. dia, through, aspros, white, white in places. The name is not connected with Ypres, nor with Jasper.

It is usually a repeated pattern of squares or lozenges, and in this sense is used in heraldry for a pattern on the field or an ordinary of other than heraldic bearings. A more homely usage of the word applies it to a baby's “nappy.”

Diovalo, Fra. Michele Pozza, an insurgent of Calabria (1760-1806), round whom Scribe wrote a libretto for Aubert's comic opera (1830).

The knuckle-bones of sheep used for gambling purposes are called dibbs; and Locke speaks of stones used for the same game, which he calls dibstones.

Dicer's Oaths. False as dicers' oaths. Worthless or untrustworthy, as when a gambler swears never to touch dice again. (Hamlet, iii, 4.)

Dichotomy (dí′kō tō′mē), the doctrine of division into pairs usually of opposite characteristics. A good example of dichotomy in all its senses is the misliteo, the main stem of which divides into two, each part of which divides again into two, and so on to the little berries which appear in two.

Dick. Richard; from Rich, short for the Anglo-Norman Ricard; the diminutive “Dicky” is also common.

Jockey of Norfolk [Lord Howard], be not too bold, For Dickon [or Dicky], thy master, is bought and sold, Richard III, v, 3.

(Dickon is Richard III)

That happened in the reign of Queen Dick—i.e. never; there never was a Queen Dick.

Richard Cromwell (1626-1712), son of the Protector whom, for a few months, he succeeded, was sometimes scornfully referred to as “King Dick”, and there were many popular sayings introducing the Crown as “Dick's hatband”. Among these are:

“Dick's hatband was made of sand. His regal honours were "a rope of sand."

As queer as Dick's hatband. Few things have been more ridiculous than the exaltation and abdication of the Protector's son.

As tight as Dick's hatband. The crown was too tight for him to wear with safety.

Dickens. Dickens, in What the dickens, is probably a euphemism for the devil, or Old Nick, and is nothing to do with Charles Dickens. In Low German we find its equivalent, De duky! Mrs. Page says:

I cannot tell what the dickens his name is—Merry Wives of Windsor, iii, 2.
Dickey. In George III's time, a flannel petticoat.

A hundred instances I soon could pick ye—
Without a cap we view the fair,
The bosom heaving alto bare,
The hips ashamed, forsooth, to wear a dicky.

Peter Pindar: Lord Auckland's Triumph.

It was afterwards applied to what were called false shirts—i.e. a starched shirt front worn over a flannel shirt; also to any other article of dress pretending to be what it isn’t; and to leather aprons, children's bibs, the rumble behind a carriage, etc.

Dicky, A donkey; especially in East Anglia, where it was customarily called a Dick-ass or Dicky-ass. It is a term of endearment, as we call a pet bird a dicky-bird. The ass is called Dicky (little Richard), Cuddy (little Cuthbert), Neddy (little Edward), Jack-ass, Moke or Mike, etc.

Dicky Sam. A native-born inhabitant of Liverpool, as Tim Bobbin is a native of Lancashire.

Didactic Poetry. Poetry which uses the beauties of expression, imagination, sentiment, etc., for teaching some moral lesson, as Pope's Essay on Man, or the principle of some art or science, as Virgil's Georgics, Garth's Dispensary, or Darwin's Botanic Garden. (Gr. didasko, I teach.)

Diddle. To cheat in a small way, as "I didled him out of..." Edgar Allan Poe wrote an essay on "Diddling Considered as one of the Exact Sciences."

A certain portion of the human race
Has certainly a taste for being diddled.

Hood: A Black Job.

Jeremy Didder. An adept at raising money on false pretences. From Kenny's farce called Manly, Diedrich. See Dietrich.

Dido. The name given by Virgil to Elissa, founder and queen of Carthage. She fell in love with Aeneas, driven by a storm to her shores, who, after abiding awhile at Carthage, was compelled by Mercury to leave the hospitable queen Elissa, in grief, burnt herself to death on a funeral pile. (Æneid, 1, 494-iii, 650.) Dido is really the Phænician name of Astarte (Artemis), goddess of the moon and protectress of the citadel of Carthage.

It was Poison who said he could rhyme on any subject; and being asked to rhyme upon the three Latin gerunds, which, in the old Eton Latin grammar, are called -di, -do, -dum, gave this couplet:

When Dido found Aeneas would not come,
She mourned in silence, and was Di-do dum(b).

Didoes, To cut up. (U.S.A. 19th-century slang), to make merry, rag about.

Didymus (did' i mūs). This being the Greek word for a twin it was applied to St. Thomas (q.v.) as the name Thomas means, in Aramaic, a twin.

Die. The die is cast. The step is taken, and I cannot draw back. So said Julius Cæsar when he crossed the Rubicon—jacta alea esto, let the die be cast!

I have set my life upon the cast,
And I will stand the hazard or the die.

Richard III, v, 4.

Never say die. Never despair; never give up.

Whom the gods love die young. This is from Menander—Honi hoii theoi philousin apotheskei nees. Demosthenes has a similar apophthegm. Plautus has the line oinem di dilegi adolescentis moritur (Bacch. IV, vii, 18).

Die-hards. In political phraseology Die-hards are the crustiest members of any party who stick to their long-held theories through thick and thin, regardless of the changes that time or a newly awakened conscience may bring; those who would rather "die in the last ditch" than admit the possibility of their having been short-sighted.

The Die Hards. The Middlesex Regiment, the 57th Foot, which was raised in 1755. At the Battle of Albuera, May 16th, 1811, the regiment was hard pressed; Colonel Inglis (later General Sir William) who was badly wounded, refused to be taken to the rear, but lay where he fell, crying, "Die hard, men, die hard!"

Diego, San (san di' e' go, de' a' go). A modification of Santiago (St. James), champion of the red cross, and patron saint of Spain.

Dies (di' ēz). Dies Alliensi. See Alliensi.

Dies Irae (Lat., Day of Wrath). A famous mediæval hymn on the last judgment, probably the composition of Thomas of Celano, a native of Abruzzi, who died in 1255. It is derived from the Vulgate version of Joel ii, 31, and is used by Catholics in the Mass for the Dead and on All Souls' Day. Scott has introduced the opening into his Lay of the Last Minstrel.

Dies irae, dies illa
Solvet saeculum in favilla,
Teste David cum Sibylla.

On that day, that wrathful day,
David and the Sibyl say,
Heaven and earth shall melt away.

Dies non (Lat., a "not" day). A non-business day. A law phrase, meaning a day when the courts do not sit and legal business is not transacted, as Sundays; the Purification, in Hilary term; the Ascension, in Easter term; St. John the Baptist, in Trinity term; and All Saints', with All Souls', in Michaelmas term; A contracted form of "Dies non juridicus," a non-judicial day.

Dietrich of Bern (di' trik). The name given by the German minnesingers to Theodoric the Great (454-526), king of the Ostrogoths (Bcnr—Verona). He appears in many Middle High German poems, especially the Nibelungenlied, where he is one of the liegmens of King Etzel.

Dieu (dyē). Dieu et mon droit (God and my right). The parole of Richard I at the battle of Gisors (1198), meaning that he was no vassal of France, but owed his royalty to God alone. The French were signally beaten, but the battle-word does not seem to have been adopted as the royal motto of England till the time of Henry VI.

Dieu-donné. Name given to Louis XIV in his infancy.
Difference. When Ophelia is distributing flowers (Hamlet, iv. 5) and says: "You must wear your rue with a difference," she is using the word in the heraldic sense and means "you must wear it as though it were marked in such a way that slightly change the usual meaning of the plant," which was a symbol of repen tance ("herb of grace"); or, on the assumption that she was offering the flower to the queen, Ophelia may have implied that they were both to wear rue: the one as the alliance of Hamlet, eldest son of the late king; the other as the wife of Claudius his brother, and the cadet branch.

In heraldry. Differences or marks of cadency indicate the various branches of a family.

The eldest son, during the lifetime of his father, bears a label, i.e. a bar or fillet, having three pendants broader at the bottom than at the top. The second son bears a crescent. The third, a mullet (i.e. a star with five points). The fourth, a martlet. The fifth, an annulet. The sixth, a fleur-de-lis. The seventh, a rose. The eighth, a cross-moline. The ninth, a double quatrefoil.

To difference is to make different by the superimposition of a further symbol.

Digest (di' jest). A compendium or summary arranged under convenient headings and titles, especially (and originally) the extracts from the body of Roman law compiled by Tribonian and sixteen assistants by order of Justinian, and arranged in 50 books (A.D. 533). Cp. PANDECTS.

Digger. An Australian. The phrase was in use in that country before 1850, having come into prominence when gold was discovered. It is to make different by the superimposition of a further symbol.

Diligence. A four-wheeled stage-coach, drawn by four or more horses, common in France before the introduction of railroads. The word is the same as the noun from diligent, which formerly meant speed, dispatch, as in Shakespeare's "If your diligence be not speedy I shall be there before you" (King Lear, i. 5).

Dilly. A stage-coach, as in the DerbY Dilly. The word is, of course, an abbreviation of the above.

Dime novel (U.S.A.). Cheap publication of a lurid nature, originally costing a dime.

Dimensions. See FOURTH DIMENSION.

Dimeta (dim' e tê). The ancient inhabitants of Carmarthenshire, Pembrokeshire, and Cardiganshire.

Dimissory (dim' i sôr i). A letter dimissory is a letter from the bishop of one diocese to some other bishop, giving leave for the bearer to be ordained by him. Lat. di-mittere, to send away.

Dimity (dim' i ti). Stout cotton cloth woven with raised patterns. It has been said to be so called from Damietta, in Egypt, but is really from the Gr. di-mitos (double-thread). Cp. SAMITE.

Dine. To dine with Democritus. To die, and dine in paradise.

To dine with Duke Humphrey; to dine with Sir Thomas Gresham. To go dinnerless. See HUMPHREY.

To dine with Mohammed. To die, and dine in paradise.

To dine with the cross-legged knights. That is, to have no dinner at all. Cp. "to dine with Duke Humphrey." The knights referred to are the stone effigies of the Temple Church, where, at one time, lawyers met their clients.

Dingbats. An Australian colloquial term for delirium tremens.

Ding-dong. A ding-dong battle. A fight in good earnest. Ding-dong is an onomatopoeic word, reproducing the sound of a bell; and here the suggestion is that the blows fell regularly and unalteringly, like the hammer-strokes of a bell.

Dinkum (ding' küm) (Austr.). Generally something genuine or honest. Hard dinkum, meaning hard work, was first used in Australia by Rolf Boldrewood in "Robbery Under Arms," 1881. In World War I the Australian troops were called Dinks or Dinkums. The adjective dinky, with the sense of pretty or nice, is probably from the Scottish to dink, or dress up.

Dinmont. See Sheep.

Dandie Dinmont. See Dandie.

DinnyHayser (Austr.). A knock-out blow, as delivered by the fighter Dinny Hayes.

Dinos. See Horse.

Dint. By dint of war; by dint of argument; by dint of hard work. Dint means a blow or striking (A.S. dynit); whence perseverance, power exerted, force; it also means the indentation made by a blow.

Diogenes (di' oj' é néz). A noted Greek cynic philosopher (about 412-323 B.C.), who, according to Seneca, lived in a tub. Alexander the Great so admired him that he said, "If I were not Alexander I would wish to be Diogenes."

The whole world was not half so wide
To Alexander, when he cried
Because he had but one to subdue,
As was a paity narrow tub to Diogenes.

Diogenes was also the surname of Romanus IV, Emperor of the East, 1067-71.

Diomedes (di' o mè déz) or Diomed. In Greek legend, a hero of the siege of Troy, among the Greeks second only to Achilles in bravery. With Odysseus he removed the Palladium from the citadel of Troy. He appears as the lover of Cressida in Boccaccio's "Filostroto" and in later works.

Diomedean exchange, in which all the benefit is on one side. The expression is founded on an incident related by Homer in the "Iliad." Glauces recognizes Diomed on the battlefield, and the friends change armour:-

To Diomed's brass arms, of mean device,
For which nine oxen paid (a vulgar price),
He gave his own, of gold divinely wrought.
An hundred beoves the shining purchase bought.

Pope: "Iliad," vi.

Dione (di' o ni). A Titaness; daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and mother by Jupiter of Venus. The name has been applied to Venus herself, and Julius Caesar, who claimed descent from her, was hence sometimes called Dionaeus Caesar.

So young Dione, nursed beneath the waves,
And rocked by Nereids in their coral caves...
Lisped her sweet tones, and tried her tender smiles.

Darwin: "Economy of Vegetation," ii.

Dionysia. See Bacchanalia.

Dionysus (di' o ni' sús). The Greek name of Bacchus (q.v.).

Diophantine Analysis (di' ó fan' tin). Finding commensurate values of squares, cubes, triangles, etc.; or the sum of a given number of squares which is itself a square; or a certain number of squares, etc., which are in arithmetical progression; so named from Diophantus, a celebrated Alexandrian mathematician of the 4th century A.D.

The following examples will give some idea of the theory:
1. To find two whole numbers, the sum of whose squares is a square;
2. To find three square numbers which are in arithmetical progression;
3. To find a number from which two given squares being severally subtracted, each of the remainders is a square.

The horses of the Dioscuri. Cyllaros and Harpagos. See Horse.

Dip. The dip of the horizon is the apparent slope of the horizon as seen by an observer standing above sea level. This slope is due to the convexity of the earth.

Dip of the needle is the inclination of a compass needle vertically. At the magnetic poles this is 90° and at the magnetic equator 0°.

To dip the flag is to lower it for a moment and then hoist again, as a form of salute.

To dip the headlights of a car is to lower them and turn them on again.

To go for a dip. To go bathing. This is a very old English phrase.

Dip. A cheap and common kind of candle, made by dipping into melted tallow the cotton which forms the wick. A farthing dip, like a rush, is a synonym for something that is almost valueless.

Dipping (U.S.A.). The name given in Virginia and N. Carolina to the habit, there once prevalent, of chewing snuff.

Diphthera (dif' thérá) (Gr.). A piece of prepared hide or leather; specifically, the skin of the goat Amalthea, on which Jove wrote the destiny of man. Diphtheria is an infectious disease of the throat; so called from its tendency to form a false membrane.

Diploma (dip' lō' má) (Gr.). Literally, something folded. Diplomas used to be written on parchment, folded, and sealed. The word is applied to licences given to graduates to assume a degree, to clergymen, to physicians, etc.; and also to the credentials of an ambassador, etc., authorizing him to represent his Government; whence diplomacy, the negotiations, privileges, tact, etc., of a diplomatist.

Diplomatics. The name formerly (and sometimes still) given to the science of palaeography—that is, deciphering and investigating old charts, diplomas, titles, etc. Papebroch, the Bollandist, originated the study in 1675; but Mabillon, another Bollandist, reduced it to a science in his "De re Diplomatica," 1681. Toustain and Tassin further developed it in their treatise entitled "Nouveau Traité de Diplomatique," 1750-60.

Diptych (Gr. diptuchos, folded in two). A register folded into two leaves, opening like a book. The Romans kept in a book of this sort the names of their magistrates, and Catholics employed the word for the registers.
in which were written the names of those who were to be specially commemorated when oblations were made for the dead. The name is also given to altar pieces and other paintings that fold together in the middle on a hinge.

Dirclean Swan. Pindar: so called from Dirce, a fountain in the neighbourhood of Thebes, the poet's birthplace (318-412 B.C.). The fountain is named from Dirce, who was put to death by the sons of Antiope for her brutal treatment of their mother, and was changed into the spring by Bacchus.

Direct Action. A method of attaining, or attempting to attain, political ends by non-political means (such as striking or withdrawing labour).

Direct tax. One collected directly from the owner of property subject to the tax, as the income-tax. Indirect taxes are taxes upon marketable commodities, such as tea and sugar, the tax on which is added to the article, and is thus paid by the purchaser indirectly.

Direction of Labour is a phrase that came into being in World War II to describe the administrative action taken by the British Government to ensure a supply of labour for essential munition and other works. All persons between certain ages, if not in the Forces, were obliged to register; they were then allocated to essential work in the neighbourhood of their homes, and were unable to change this except through a Labour Exchange. This was revoked in 1943, but in 1947 a similar order was issued by the Minister of Labour, though only controlling the re-employment of men and women, without compulsory registration.

Directory, The. In French history, the constitution of 1795, when the executive was vested in five “Directors,” one of whom retired every year. After a sickly existence of four years, it came to an end at Napoleon’s coup d’état of 18 Brumaire (November 9th), 1799.

Dirleton. Doubting with Dirleton, and resolving those doubts with Stewart. Doubting and answering those doubts, but doubting still. It is a Scottish phrase; and the allusion is to food which, when it is chased out of it, someone else contrived to obtain it. Where’s Brummell? Dished! Where? Dished. Where? Dished. Where? Dished.

Dirt. The origin of this word is Teutonic and we find its equivalent in the Icelandic drif, meaning excrement. In modern usage the sense has been extended to include loose or packed soil, alluvial earth, gravel, etc., and, figuratively, obscenity of any kind, especially in language.

Pay dirt. Soil containing gold or diamonds, whichever is being sought.

Dirt cheap. Very low-priced.

Throw plenty of dirt and some will be sure to stick. Scandal always leaves a trail behind; find plenty of fault, and some of it will be believed. In Lat., Fortiter calumniari, aliquid adhaeret.

To eat dirt. To put up with insults and mortification.

Dirt-track racing is a form of motor-cycle racing on a track of cinders or similar substance. Features of the sport are the shortness of the laps (about 440 yards) and the sharpness of the turns. It was introduced into England from Australia in 1928.

The Dirty Half-Hundred. The 50th Foot (The Queen’s Own), so called because during a Peninsular War battle the men wiped their sweaty faces with their black cuffs.

The Dirty Shirts. The 101st Foot (2nd Munster Fusiliers), which fought at Delhi in their shirt-sleeves (1857).

Dis. The Roman name of the Greek Pluto (q.v.).

Proserpine gathering flowers, Herself a fairer flower, by gloomy Dis Was gathered.

Milton: Paradise Lost, iv, 270.

Disastrous Peace, The (La Paix Malheureuse). A name given to the Treaty of Cateau Cambrésis (1559), which followed the battle of Gravelines. It was signed by France, Spain, and England, and by it France ceded the Low Countries to Spain, and Savoy, Corsica, and 200 forts to Italy. But she retained Calais.

Discaled. See BAREFOOTED.

Discharge Bible, The. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

Disciples of Christ. See CAMPBELLITES.

Discipline, A. A scourge used for penitential purposes.

Before the cross and altar a lamp was still burning, ... and on the floor lay a small discipline or penitential scourge of small cord and wire, the lashes of which were stained with recent blood.—Scott: The Talisman, ch. iv.

This is a transferred sense of one of the ecclesiastical uses of the word—the mortification of the flesh by penance.

Discord. Literally, severance of hearts (Lat. discordia). It is the opposite of concord, the coming together of hearts. In music, it means disagreement of sounds, as when a note is followed by or played with another which is disagreeable to a musical ear.

The apple of discord. See APPLE.

Discount. At a discount. Not in demand; little valued; less esteemed than formerly; below par. (Lat. discomputate, to depreciate.)

Dished. I was dished out of it. Cheated out of it; or rather, someone else contrived to obtain it. When one is dished he is completely done for, and the allusion is to food which, when it is quite done, is dished. Hence, “dishing the Whigs.”

Where’s Brummell? Dished! Byron: Don Juan.

Dismal Science, The. See SCIENCE.

Dismas, St. See DYSMAS.

Disney Professor. The Professor of Archaeology at Cambridge. This chair was founded in 1851.
Dispensation

Dispensation (Lat. dispensatio, from dis- and pendere, to weigh). The system which God chooses to dispense or establish between Himself and man. The dispensation of Adam was that between Adam and God; the dispensation of Abraham, and that of Moses, were those imparted to these holy men; the Gospel dispensation is that explained in the Gospels.

A dispensation from the Pope. Permission to dispense with something enjoined; a licence to do what is forbidden, or to omit what is commanded by the law of the Church, as distinct from the moral law.

Displaced Persons, a phrase that arose in World War II when it was applied to the millions of homeless and uprooted people in Germany who had either been imported there by the German government as slaves when their homes were overrun and destroyed or who had lost their homes in the ravages caused by the Russian invasion. Colloquially known as "displaced persons" since their rehabilitation presented such appalling problems to the soldiers first charged with the task.

Distaff. The staff from which the flax was drawn in spinning; hence, figuratively, woman's work, and a woman herself, the allusion being to the old custom of women, because the Christmas festival terminated on Twelfth Day, and on the day following the Distaff Day, a branch descended from the female side.

Distemper. An undue mixture (Lat. distemperare, to mix amiss). In medicine a distemper arises from the redundancy of certain secretions or morbid humours. The distemper in dogs is an undue quantity of certain secretions manifested by a running from the eyes and nose.

Divan (Tur. and Pers.). Primarily, a collection of sheets; hence, a collection of poems, a register (and the registrar) of accounts, the office where accounts are kept, a council or tribunal, a long seat or bench covered with cushions, a court of justice, and a custom house (whence douane). The word, in its ramifications and extensions, is somewhat like our board (q.v.); in England its chief meanings are (1) a comfortable sofa, (2) a bed without head-board or foot-board, and formerly (3) a public smoking-saloon.

Divide. When the members in the House of Commons interrupt a speaker by crying out divide, they mean, bring the debate to an end and put the motion to the vote—i.e. let the ayes divide from the noes, one going into one lobby, and the others into the other.

Divide and govern (Lat. divide et impera). A maxim of Machiavelli (1469-1527) meaning that if you divide a nation into parties, or set your enemies at loggerheads, you can have your own way. Coke, in his Institutes (pt. iv. cap. i) speaks of the maxim as "that exploded adage."

Divination (div i nā' shān). There are numerous species of divination referred to in the Bible. The following are the most notable, and to most of these there are many other allusions in the Bible beside those indicated.

Divination (disp. to weigh). The system which God chooses to dispense or establish between Himself and man. The dispensation of Adam was that between Adam and God; the dispensation of Abraham, and that of Moses, were those imparted to these holy men; the dispensation of the Law of the Church, as distemper.

Dišemper (dit' à ni). This plant (Origanum dictamnum), so named from Dicte in Crete, where it grew in profusion, was anciently credited with many medicinal virtues, especially in enabling arrows to be drawn from wounds and curing such wounds. In Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered (Bk. ix) Godfrey is healed in this way.

Ditto (dit' ô) (Ital. detto, said; from Lat. dictum). That which has been said before; the same or a similar thing. The word is often, in writing, contracted to do.

Ditthyramb (dit' i râm' bik) (Gr. dithyrambo, a choric hymn). Ditthyrambic poetry was originally a wild, impetuous kind of Dorian lyric in honour of Bacchus, traditionally ascribed to the invention of Arion of Lesbos (about 620 B.C.), who has hence been called the father of ditthyrambic poetry.

Ditch. To ditch an aeroplane is to make a forced landing on the sea; to throw away.

Dithyramb (dit' i răm' bik) (Gr. dithyrambo, a choric hymn). Ditthyrambic poetry was originally a wild, impetuous kind of Dorian lyric in honour of Bacchus, traditionally ascribed to the invention of Arion of Lesbos (about 620 B.C.), who has hence been called the father of ditthyrambic poetry.
CASTING LOTS (Josh. xviii, 6).
By NECROMANCY (1 Sam. xxvii, 12).
By RABBALDGE or rods (Hos. i, 12).
By TERAPHIM or household idols (Gen. xxxi; 1 Sam. xiv, 23, R.V.).
By HEPATOSCOPY or inspecting the liver of animals (Ezek. xxii, 21, 26).
By DREAMS and their interpretations (Gen. xxxvii, 10).

Divination by fire, air, and water; thunder, lightning, and meteors; etc.
The Urim and Thummim was a prophetic breastplate worn by the High Priest.
(Consult: Gen. xxxvii, 5-11; xl, xli; 1 Sam. xxviii, 12; 2 Chron. xxxiv, 6; Ezek. xxi, 21; Hos. iii, 4, 5, etc.)

Divine, The. Theophrastus, the name of the Greek philosopher (390-287 B.C.), means “the Divine Speaker,” an epithet bestowed on him by Aristotle, on account of which he changed his name from Tyrtamus.

Hypatia (c. 370-415), who presided over the Neoplatonic School at Alexandria, was known as “the Divine Pagan.”

Jean de Ruysbroeck (see ECSTATIC DOCTOR) was also called “the Divine Doctor.”

A name given to Michael Angelo (1475-1564) was “the Divine Madman.”

Ariosto (1474-1533). Italian poet, Raphael (1483-1520), the painter, Luis de Morales (1509-86), a Spanish religious painter, and Ferdinand de Herrera (1534-67), the Spanish lyric poet, were all known as “the Divine.”

The Divine Plant. Vervain. See HERBA SACRA.

The divine right of kings. The notion that kings reign by direct ordinance of God, quite apart from the will of the people. This phrase was much used in the 17th century on account of the pretensions of the Stuart kings; and the idea arose from the Old Testament, where kings are called “God’s anointed,” because they were God’s vicars on earth, when the Jews changed their theocracy for a monarchy. The right divine of kings to govern wrong.

Divining rod. A forked branch of hazel, one prong of which is held in either hand. The inclination of the rod, when controlled by a diviner, is said to indicate by its movements the presence of water-springs, precious metal, oil, etc.

Divining, or dowsing (see Dowse), as it is also called, has been the subject of numerous scientific investigations, and while these have shown that the claims of diviners can in many cases be substantiated, there is still no satisfactory scientific explanation of the phenomenon. This method of discovering hidden treasure naturally lends itself to the exploitation of the fraudulent and the “gulling” of the credulous.

Division. The sign — for division was brought into use by John Pell (1611-85), the noted Cambridge mathematician who became Professor of Mathematics at Amsterdam in 1643. In its military sense a division is the largest formation in an army which has a constant establishment, so designed as to be self-contained with its own services. Invented by Napoleon. In the British army it totals 15,000 men.

Divisionism. A school of painting in late-9th-century France which applied complementary colours in separate dabs side by side, relying on the eye of the beholder to blend them into the desired effect. The protagonist of Divisionism was Georges Seurat (1859-91).

Divorcement. A bill of divorcement is a phrase going back to the days of the old divorce procedure. Before the Divorce Act of 1857 divorce could be granted only by the ecclesiastical courts of the various dioceses. Even then remarriage by either of the parties was prohibited, except a special Bill was taken to Parliament and passed after debate—a procedure so expensive that few could afford it.

Divus (di’ vüs) (Lat., a god; godlike). After the Augustan period this was conferred as an epithet on deceased Roman emperors, more with the idea of canonizing them, of proclaiming them to be “of blessed memory,” than with that of enrolling them among the divinities. Thus, Divus Augustus means “Augustus of blessed memory,” not “Divine Augustus.”

The new cult of the “divi imperatores” spread throughout the Empire, and became a force which helped to weld together the populations and to secure their loyalty to the ruling power. The cult gave a new semblance of dignity to the Senate. At the end of every reign it sat in judgment and decided whether the dead emperor was to be enrolled among the “divi” or whether his memory was to be reckoned accursed (“damnatio memoriae”).—J. S. Reid (in A Companion to Latin Studies, 1910, ch. vi).

Dixie Land. The Southern States of the U.S.A. The name, according to one story, originated in the “dix,” or ten-dollar bank-note of Louisiana. When times were prosperous, these bills circulated so freely that Louisiana was called the “land of dixies.” It has also been said to have got its name from “Mason and Dixon’s Line” (q.v.), which formed the boundary between the slave-holding and the “free” States. The explanation given below is the most likely to be correct:

When slavery existed in New York, one Dixi owned a large tract of land on Manhattan Island, and a large number of slaves. The increase of the slaves and of the abolition sentiment caused an emigration of the slaves to more thorough and secure slave sections, and the negroes who were thus sent off (many being born there) naturally looked back to their old houses, where they had lived in clover, with feelings of regret, as they could not imagine any place like Dixi’s. Hence it became synonymous with an ideal locality combining ease, comfort, and material happiness of every description.—Charlestown Courier, June 11th, 1885.

A song of this name, by Albert Pike, was adopted as the marching song of the Southern armies:

Advance the flag of Dixie!
Hurrah! Hurrah!
For Dixie’s land we’ll take our stand
To live and die for Dixie.

Dixie, the soldier’s name for a large cooking kettle, is the Hindi degshi, a pot, vessel.

Dizzy. A nickname of Benjamin Disraeli (Lord Beaconsfield) (1805-81).

Djinn. See JINN.

Djinnestan. The realm of the jinns or genii of Oriental mythology.

Do (in Music). See DOH.

Do. A contraction of ditto (q.v.).
Do. A verb, and auxiliary, that forms part of countless phrases and lends itself to almost countless uses. Its chief modern significations are:

(Transitive) To put, as in To do to death; to beswot, cause to befall, etc., as It did him no harm, To do a good turn; to perform, perpetrate, execute, etc., as To do one’s work, Thou shalt do no murder. What will he do with it? All is done and finished.

(Intransitive) To exert actively, to act in some way, as Let us do or die, I have done with you, How do you do? I’m doing very well, thank you, That will do.

(Causal and Auxiliary). Used instead of a verb just used, as He plays as well as you do. Periphrastically as an auxiliary of the Pres. and Past Indicative and the Imperative, used for the sake of emphasis, euphony, or clarity, also in negative and interrogative sentences: I do wish you would let me alone, Not a word did he say, Billiards and drinking do make the money fly, Do you like jazz? I do not care for it. Do tell me where you’ve been! Don’t stop!

A do. A regular swindle, a fraud; a party.

Do as you would be done by. Behave to others as you would have them behave to you.

To do away with. To abolish, put an end to,

To do for. To act for or manage for.

To do oneself proud, or

To do one proud. To flatter him; to treat him well.

To do up brown, or

To do up brown (U.S.A.). To do thoroughly, well provided for.

To do oneself proud, or well. To give oneself a treat.

To do the grand, amiable, etc. To act (usually with some ostentation) in the manner indicated by the adjective.

To do up. To repair, put in order. “This chair wants doing up,” i.e. renovating. Also, to make tidy, to put up or fasten a parcel, and to wear out, tire. “I’m quite done up,” I’m worn out, exhausted. Cp. Dup.

To do up brown (U.S.A.). To do thoroughly, in a good sense, or bad—as beating someone up badly.

To do without so-and-so. To deny oneself it, to manage without it.

To have to do with. To have dealings or intercourse with, to have relation to. “That has nothing to do with the case.”

Well to do. In good circumstances, well off, well provided for.

Dobby. A steady old horse, a child’s horse. Dobby, a silly old man, also a house-elf similar to a brownie. All these are one and the same word, an adaptation of Robin, diminutive of Robert.

Sober Dobby lifts his clumsy heel.

BLOOMFIELD: Farmer’s Bay (Winter).

The dobby elves lived in the house, were very thin and shaggy, very kind to servants and children, and did many a little service when people had their hands full.

The Dobby’s walk was within the inhabited domains of the Hall.—SCOTT: Peveril of the Peak, ch. x.

Docetes. An early Gnostic heretical sect, which maintained that Jesus Christ was divine only, and that His visible form, the crucifixion, the resurrection, etc., were merely illusions. (The word is Greek, and means phantomists.)

Dock-an-doris (Gaelic). A Scottish term made familiar by one of Sir Harry Lauder’s songs, for a stirrup-cup; a final drink before saying “Good-night” and going home. Variants are doch-an-doroch, deoch-an-dorus, etc.

Dock Brief. In English law anyone accused of an offence and brought to trial is entitled to defend himself or be defended by counsel. When a prisoner in the dock pleads inability to employ counsel, the presiding judge can instruct a barrister present in court to undertake the defence, a small fee for this being paid by the court.

Doctor. A name given to various adulterated or falsified articles because they are “doctored,” i.e. treated in some way that strengthens them or otherwise makes them capable of being passed off as something better than they actually are. Thus a mixture of milk, water, nutmeg, and rum is called Doctor; the two former ingredients being “doctored” by the latter two.

Brown sherry is so called by licensed victuallers because it is concocted from a thin wine with the addition of unfermented juice and some spirituous liquor.

In nautical slang the ship’s cook is known as “the doctor,” because he is supposed to “doctor” the food; and a seventh son used to be so dubbed from the popular superstition that he was endowed with power to cure agues, the king’s evil, and other diseases.

Doctored dice. Loaded dice; dice which are so “doctored” as to make them turn up winning numbers; also called simply doctors. “The whole antechamber is full, my lord—knights and squires, doctors and dices.” “The dices with their doctors in their pockets, I presume.”—SCOTT: Peveril of the Peak, ch. xxviii.

Doctor Fell.

I do not like thee, Dr. Fell,
The reason why I cannot tell; But this I know, I know full well, I do not like thee, Dr. Fell.

These well-known lines are by the “facetious” Tom Brown (1663-1704), and the person referred to was Dr. John Fell, Dean of Christ Church (1625-86), who expelled him, but said he would remit the sentence if Brown translated the thirty-third Epigram of Martial:

Non amo te, Zabidi, nec possom dicere quare; Hoc tantum possum dicere non amo te.
The above is the translation, which is said to have been given impromptu.

It was this Dr. Fell who in 1667 presented to the University of Oxford a complete typefoundry containing punches and matrices of a large number of fonts—Arabic, Syriac, Coptic, and other learned alphabets, as well as the celebrated "Fell" Roman.

The three best doctors are Dr. Quiet, Dr. Diet, and Dr. Merryman.

Sit tibi deficient medici, medici tibi fiat
Hac tria: Mens-Umbra, Requies, Moderata-Dietar.

To doctor the accounts. To falsify them. The allusion is to drugging wine, beer, etc., and to adulteration generally.

To doctor the wine. To drug it, or strengthen it with brandy; to make weak wine stronger, and "sick" wine more palatable. The fermentation of cheap wines is increased by fermentable sugar. As such wines fail in aroma, connoisseurs smell at their wine.

To have a cat doctored. A colloquialism for having a young tom-cat "cut," or castrated.

To put the doctor on a man. To cheat him. The allusion to "doctored dice" is obvious.

Who shall decide when doctors disagree? When authorities differ, the question sub judice must be left undecided. (POPE: Moral Essays, p. 33, line 1.)

Doctors of the Church. Certain early Christian Fathers, especially four in the Greek (or Eastern) Church and four in the Latin (or Western) Church.

(a) Eastern Church. St. Athanasius of Alexandria (331), who defended the divinity of Christ against the Arians; St. Basil the Great of Cæsarea (379) and his co-worker St. Gregory of Nazianzen (376); and the eloquent St. John Chrysostom (398), Archbishop of Constantinople.

(b) Western Church. St. Jerome (420), translator of the Vulgate; St. Ambrose (397), Bishop of Milan; St. Augustine (430), Bishop of Hippo; and St. Gregory the Great (604), the pope who sent Augustine, the missionary, to England.

Dr. Faustus. See Faust.

Dr. Fell. See above.

Doctor Mirabilis. Roger Bacon (1214-92).

Dr. Sangrado.

Dr. Slop. See under their names.

Dr. Syntax.

Doctors of Learning. Piety, etc.

Admirable Doctor: Roger Bacon (1214-92).

Angelic Doctor: St. Thomas Aquinas (1224-74).

Divine Doctor: John Ruysbroek (1294-1381).

Incincible Doctor: William Occam (1276-1347).

Refragable Doctor: Alexander of Hales (d. 1263).

Sellfluous Doctor: St. Bernard of Clairvaux (1091-1153).

Graphic Doctor: St. Bonaventura (1221-74).

Wumble Doctor: Duns Scotus (1265-1308).

Ounderful Doctor: Roger Bacon (1214-92).

Doctors' Commons. A locality near St. Paul's, where the ecclesiastical courts were formerly held, wills preserved, and marriage licences granted, and where was held the common table of the Association of Doctors of Civil Law in London (dissolved 1858). To "common" (q.v.) means to dine together; and the doctors had to dine there four days in each term. The actual building was demolished in 1867.

Documentary film. A film devised and produced for the sole purpose of giving a realistic and accurate picture of some aspect of everyday life or work.

Doddytoll. A blockhead, a silly ass. Poll, of course, is the head; and doddy is the modern dotty, silly, from the verb to dose, to be foolish or silly. There is an Elizabethan romantic comedy (about 1593) called The Wisdom of Doctor Doddytoll, thought by some to be by George Peele.

As wise as Dr. Doddytoll. Not wise at all; a dunce.

Dodge. A "knowing fellow". One who knows all the tricks and ways of London life, and profits by such knowledge.

(U.S.A.) A hard cake, or biscuit.

The Artful Dodger. The sobriquet of John Dawkins, a young thief in Dickens's Oliver Twist.

Dodman. A snail; the word is still in use in Norfolk. Fairfax, in his Balk and Selvedge (1674), speaks of "a snayl or dodman."

Doddisman, doddism, put out your horn, Here comes a thief to steal your corn. Norfolk rhyme.

Hodminded is another variation of the same word.

Dodina (do dō' nā). A famous oracle in the village of Dodona in Epiros, and the most ancient of Greece. It was dedicated to Zeus, and the oracles were delivered from the tops of oak and other trees, the rustling of the wind in the branches being interpreted by the priests. Also, brazen vessels and plates were suspended from the branches, and these, being struck together when the wind blew, gave various sounds from which responses were concocted. Hence the Greek phrase Kalkos Dodones (brass of Dodona), meaning a babbler, or one who talks an infinite deal of nothing.

The black pigeons of Dodina. See under PIGEON.

Dodson and Fogg. The lawyers, employed by the plaintiff in the famous case of "Bardell v. Pickwick" (Pickwick Papers), typical of the unscrupulous solicitors who battered on the public before the law reformed of the mid-19th century.

Doe. John Doe and Richard Roe. Any plaintiff and defendant in an action of ejectment. They were sham names used at one time to save certain "niceties of law"; but the clumsy device was abolished in 1852. Any mere imaginary persons, or men of straw. The names "John o' Noakes" and "Tom Styles" are similarly used.

Noakes" Dog

Dog (dö'eg). In Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel (q.v.), is meant for Ekanah Settle, a poet who wrote satires upon Dryden, but was no match for his great rival.

Doff is do-off, as "Doff your hat." So Don is do-on, as "Don your clothes." Dup is do-up, as "Dup the door." (q.v.)

Doff thy harness, youth . . . And tempt not yet the brushes of the war.

Trovilus and Cressida, v, 3.

Dog. This article is subdivided into five parts:

1. Dogs in Phrases and Colloquialisms.
2. Dogs of note in the Classics and in legend.
3. Dogs famous in History, Literature, Fiction, etc.
5. Dog—or dog's—in combination.

(1) IN PHRASES AND COLLOQUIALISMS.

A black dog has walked over him. Said of a sullen person. Horace tells us that the sight of a black dog with its pups was an unlucky omen, and the devil has been frequently symbolized by a black dog.

A cat and dog life. See Cat (To live a, etc.).

A dead dog. Something utterly worthless. A Biblical phrase (see 1 Sam. xxiv, 14, "After whom is the king of Israel come out? After a dead dog?") Cp. also Is thy servant, etc., below.

A dirty dog. One morally filthy; one who talks and acts nastily. In the East the dog is still held in abhorrence, as the scavenger of the streets. "Him that dieth in the city shall the dogs eat" (1 Kings xiv, 11).

A dog in a doublet. A bold, resolute fellow. In Germany and Flanders the strong dogs employed for hunting the wild boar were dressed in a kind of buff doublet buttoned to their bodies. Rubens and Sneyders have represented several in their pictures. A false friend is called a dog in one's doublet.

A dog in the manger. A churlish fellow, who will not use what is wanted by another, nor yet let the other have it to use. The allusion is to the well-known fable of a dog that fixed his place in a manger, would not allow an ox to come near the hay and would not eat it himself.

A living dog is better than a dead lion. The meanest thing with life in it is better than the noblest without. The saying is from Eccles. ix, 4. The Italians say "A live ass is worth more than a dead doctor."

A dog's age. A very long time.

A surly dog. A human being of a surly temper. Dog is often used for "chap" or "fellow": thus we have a gay dog, a man who is always out and about on pleasure, and a sad dog, which means much the same, but carries with it a touch of reproof.

A well-bred dog hunts by nature. Breeding "tells." The French proverb is "Bon chien chasse de race."

Barking dogs seldom bite. See Bark.

Brag's a good dog, etc. See Brag.

Dog don't eat dog. A similar phrase to "There's honour among thieves."

Dogs howl at death. A widespread superstition.

In the rabbinical book it saith

The dogs howl when, with icy breath, Great Sammael, the angel of death, Takes thro' the town his flight.

LONGFELLOW: Golden Legend, iii.

Every dog has his day. You may crow over me to-day, but my turn will come by and by. In Latin Hodie mihi, cras tibi, "To-day to me, tomorrow to thee." "Nunc mihi, nunc tibi, benefica" (fortuna), fortune visits every man once; she favours me now, but she will favour you in your turn.

Thus every dog at last will have his day—

He who this morning smiled, at night may sorrow;
The grub to-day's a butterfly to-morrow.

PETER PINDAR: Odes of Condolence.

Give a dog a bad name and hang him. If you want to do anyone a wrong, throw dirt on him or rail against him. When once a person's reputation has been besmirched he might as well be hanged as try to rehabilitate himself.

He who has a mind to beat his dog will easily find a stick. If you want to abuse a person, you will easily find something to blame. Dean Swift says, "If you want to throw a stone, every lane will furnish one."

Hungry dogs will eat dirty pudding. Those really hungry are not particular about what they eat, and are by no means dainty. The Proverb is given by Heywood (1546). "To the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet" (Prov. xxvii, 7). "When bread is wanting oat cakes are excellent."

When Darius in his flight from Greece drank from a ditch defiled with dead carcasses, he declared he had never drunk so pleasantly before.

I am his Highness' dog at Kew; Pray tell me, sir, whose dog are you? Frederick Prince of Wales had a dog given him by Alexander Pope, and these words are said to have been engraved on his collar. They are still sometimes quoted with reference to an overbearing, bumptious person.

Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing? Said in contempt when one is asked to do something derogatory or beneath him. The phrase is (slightly altered) from 2 Kings, viii, 13.

Sydney Smith, when asked if it was true that he was about to sit to Landseer, the animal painter, for his portrait, replied, "What! is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?"

It was the story of the dog and the shadow. A case of one who gives up the substance for its shadow. The allusion is to the well-known fable of the dog who dropped his bone into the stream because he opened his mouth to seize the reflection of it.

Lazy as Lawrence's, or Ludlam's dog. See Lazy.

Let sleeping dogs lie; don't wake a sleeping dog. Let well alone; if some contemplated course of action is likely to cause trouble or land you in difficulties you had better avoid it.

It is ought good a sleeping hound to wake.

Nor yeve a wight a cause to devyne.

CHAUCER: Troilus and Cressyde, iii, 764.
Love me love my dog. If you love me you must put up with my defects.

Not to have a word to throw at a dog. Said of one who is sullen or sulky.

Cf.: Why, cousin, why, Rosalind! Cupid have mercy! Not a word? Ros.: Not one to throw at a dog.

As You Like It, i, 3.

Old dogs will not learn new tricks. People in old age do not readily conform to new ways.

St. Roch and his dog. Emblematic of inseparable companions; like "a man and his shadow." One is never seen without the other. See Roch, St.

Sick as a dog. Very sick. We also say "Sick as a cat." See Cat. The Bible speaks of dogs returning to their vomit (Prov. xxvi, 11; 2 Pet. ii, 22).

The dogs of war. The horrors of war, especially famine, sword, and fire.

And Caesar's spirit, ranging for revenge,
With Ate by his side, come hot from hell.
Shall in these confines, with a monarch's voice, Cry "Havoc," and let slip the dogs of war.
Julius Caesar, iii, 1.

The hair of the dog that bit you. It used to be considered that the best cure for a "thick head" was another drink; it is, perhaps, a matter for trial and error. The allusion is to an ancient notion that the burnt hair of a dog is an antidote to its bite. Similia similibus curantur.

The more I see of men the more I love dogs. A misanthropic saying, the meaning of which is obvious. It is probably French in origin—Plus je vois les hommes, plus j'admire les chiens.

There are more ways of killing a dog than by hanging. There is more than one way of achieving your object. The proverb is found in Ray's Collection (1742).

Throw it to the dogs. Throw it away, it is useless and worthless.

Throw physic to the dogs! I'll none of it.

Macbeth, v, 3.

To blush like a dog, or like a blue or black dog. Not to blush at all.

To call off the dogs. To desist from some pursuit or inquiry; to break up a disagreeable conversation. In the chase, if the dogs are on the wrong track, the huntsman calls them off.

To die like a dog. To have a shameful, or a miserable, end.

To go to the dogs. To go to utter ruin, morally or materially; to become impoverished.

To help a lame dog over a stile. To give assistance to one in distress; to hold out a helping hand; to encourage.

Do the work that's nearest,
Though it's dull at whiles,
Not a word!
Helping, when we meet them,
Lame dogs over stiles.
Charles Kingsley: The Invitation.

To lead a dog's life. To be bothered and worried from pillar to post, never to be left in peace.

To put on the dog. To behave in a conceited or bumptious manner.

To rain cats and dogs. See Cat (It is raining, etc.).

To wake a sleeping dog. See Let sleeping dogs lie, above.

Try it on the dog! A jocular phrase used of medicine that is expected to be unpalatable, or of food that is suspected of being not quite fit for human consumption.

What! keep a dog and bark myself! Must I keep servants and myself do their work?

You can never scare a dog away from a greasy hide. It is difficult to free oneself from bad habits. The line is from Horace's Satires (ii, v, 83): Canis a corio nunquam absterrebitur uincto.

(2) Dogs of Note in the Classics and in Legend.

Geryon's dogs. Gargittios and Orthos. The latter was the brother of Cerberus, but had one head less. Hercules killed both these monsters.

Icarius's dog. Mæra (the glistener). See Icarius.

Orion's dogs. Arctophonos (bear-killer), and Ptoophagos (the glutton of Ptoon, in Bæotia).

Procris's dog. Lalaps. See Procris.

Ulysses's dog. Argos; he recognized his master after his return from Troy, and died of joy.

Aubry's dog, or the dog of Montargis. Aubry of Montdidier was murdered, in 1371, in the forest of Bondy. His dog, Dragon, excited suspicion of Richard of Macaire, by always snarling and flying at his throat whenever he appeared. Richard was condemned to a judicial combat with the dog, was killed, and, in his dying moments, confessed the crime.

Cuchullain's hound. Luath (q.v.).

Fingal's dog. Bran (q.v.).

King Arthur's favourite hound. Cavall.

Llewelyn's greyhound. Beth Gelert (q.v.).

Mautha's dog. (See Mautha.)

Montargis, Dog of. Aubry's dog. (See above.)

Roderick the Goth's dog. Theron.

Seven Sleepers, Dog of the. Katmir who, according to Mohammedan tradition, was admitted to heaven. He accompanied the seven noble youths who fell asleep for 309 years to the cavern in which they were walled up, and remained standing for the whole time, neither moving, eating, drinking, nor sleeping.

Tristran's dog. Hodain, or Leon.

(3) Dogs Famous in History, Literature, Fiction, etc.

Boatswain. Byron's favourite dog; the poet wrote an epitaph on him and he was buried in the garden of Newstead Abbey.

Boy. Prince Rupert's dog; he was killed at the battle of Marston Moor.

Brutus. Landseer's greyhound; jocularly called "The Invader of the Larder."
Dash. Charles Lamb's dog.
Diamond. The little dog belonging to Sir Isaac Newton. One winter's morning he upset a candle on his master's desk, by which papers containing minutes of many years' experiments were destroyed. On perceiving this terrible catastrophe Newton exclaimed: "Oh, Diamond, Diamond, thou little knowest the mischief thou hast done!" and at once set to work to repair the loss.
Flush. Elizabeth Barrett Browning's dog.
Geist. One of Matthew Arnold's dachshunds. He wrote the poem Geist's Grave in memory of him.
Giallo. Walter Savage Landor's dog.
Hamlet. A black greyhound belonging to Sir Walter Scott.
Kaiser. Another of Matthew Arnold's dachshunds. (See Geist above). In his poem, Kaiser Dead, the poet mentions also Toss, Rover, and Max.
Lyra. The hound of Douglas, in Scott's Lady of the Lake.
Maida. Sir Walter Scott's favourite deerhound.
Mathe. Richard II's greyhound. It deserted the king and attached itself to Bolingbroke.
Toby. Punch's famous dog; named after the dog that followed Tobit in his journeys, a favourite in mediaeval biblical stories and plays.
(4) In Symbolism and Metaphor.
Dogs, in mediaeval art, symbolize fidelity. A dog is represented as lying at the feet of St. Bernard, St. Benignus, and St. Wendelin; as licking the wounds of St. Roch; as carrying a lighted torch in representations of St. Dominic.
Dogs in Effigy. In funeral monuments a dog is often sculptured at the foot of the central effigy; this has no symbolic significance, it is usually a memento of the dead person's pet.
Lovell the Dog. See Rat.
The dog. Diogenes (412-323 B.C.). When Alexander went to see him the young King of Macedonia introduced himself with these words: "I am Alexander, surnamed the Great," to which the philosopher replied: "And I am Diogenes, surnamed the Dog." The Athenians raised to his memory a pillar of Parian marble, surmounted by a dog. (See CYNC.)
The Dog of God. So the Laplanders call the bear which "has the strength of ten men and the wit of twelve."
The Thracian dog. Zoilus (4th cent. B.C.). The carping critic of ancient Greece. Like curs, our critics haunt the poet's feast, And feed on scraps refused by every guest; From the old Thracian dog they learned the way To snarl in want, and grumble o'er their prey.

(5) In combination.
Dog-, or dog's-, in combinations is used (besides in its literal sense as in dog-biscuit, dog-collar) for
(a) denoting the male of certain animals, as dog-ape, dog-fox, dog-otter.
(b) denoting inferior plants, or those which are worthless as food for man, as dog-brier, dog-cabbage, dog-leek, dog-lichen, dog-mercury, dog-parsley, dog-violets (which have no perfume), dog-wheat. Cp. Dog-grass, Dog-rose below.
(c) expressing spuriousness or some mongrel quality, as dog's-logic, dog-Latin (q.v.).

Dogbody. An undistinguished and unskilled individual, required for menial tasks.

Dog-cheap. Extremely cheap; "dirt-cheap."

Dog-days. Days of great heat. The term comes from the Romans, who called the six or eight hottest weeks of the summer caniculares dies. According to their theory, the dog-star Sirius, rising with the sun, added to its heat, and the dog-days (about July 3rd to August 11th) bore the combined heat of the dog-star and the sun. See Dog-star.

Dog's-ears. The corners of pages crumpled and folded down.

Dog's-eared. Pages so crumpled and turned down. The ears of many dogs turn down and seem quite limp.

Dogface. American infantryman (World War II).

Dog-fall. A fall in wrestling, when the two combatants touch the ground together.

Dog fight, a skirmish between fighter planes.

Dog-grass. Couch grass (Triticum repens), which is eaten by dogs when they have lost their appetite; it acts as an emetic and purgative.

Dog-head. The part of a gun which bites or holds the flint.

Dog house. In the dog house. In disgrace, as a dog confined to his kennel. Usually applied to a husband who has been misbehaving and whose wife treats him with disdain.

Dog-Latin. Pretended or mongrel Latin. An excellent example is Stevens's definition of a kitchen:

As the law classically expresses it, a kitchen is "camera necessaria pro usus coquinare; cum saucepannis, stewpannis, scullero, dresserio, coahlo stomis, smook-jackies; pro roostandum boilersium fryandum et plum-pudding-mixandum. . . ."—A law Report (Daniel v. Dishel).

Dog-rose. The common wild rose (Rosa canina, Pliny's cynorrhodon), so called because it was supposed by the ancient Greeks to cure the bite of mad dogs.

Dogs, Isle of. See Istr.

Dog's-nose. Gin and beer.

Dog's-nose, which is, I believe, a mixture of gin and beer. "So it is," said an old lady.—Pickwick Papers.

Dog-sleep. A pretended sleep; also a light, easily broken sleep. Dogs seem to sleep with "one eye open."

Dog-star. Sirius, the brightest star in the firmament, whose influence was anciently supposed to cause great heat, pestilence, etc. See Dog-days.

Dog-vane. A nautical term for a small vane placed on the weather gunwale to show the direction of the wind. Sailors also apply it to a cockade.
Dog-watch. The two short watches on board ship, one from four to six, and the other from six to eight in the evening, introduced to prevent the same men always keeping watch at the same time. See WATCH.

Dog-whipper. A beadle who used to keep dogs from the precincts of a church. Even so late as 1856 Mr. John Pickard was appointed "dog-whipper" in Exeter Cathedral, "in the room of Mr. Charles Reynolds, deceased."

Dog-whipping Day. October 18th (St. Luke's Day). It is said that a dog once swallowed the consecrated wafer in York Minster on this day.

Doggo. To lie doggo. To get into hiding and remain there: to keep oneself secluded.

Dog-gone. An American euphemism for the oath "God-damned."

But when that choir got up to sing,
I couldn't catch a word:
They sung the most doggonedest thing
A body ever heard!
WILL CARLTON: Farm Ballad.
See also DOGS, DOG'S, below.

Dog Tags. American identity discs (World War II).

Dog-tired. Exhausted, usually after exercise; and wanting only to curl up like a dog and go to sleep.

Dogare. The wife of a doge (q.v.).

Dog (dō) (Lat. dux, a duke or leader). The chief magistrate in Venice while it was a Republic. The first doge was Paolo Anafesto (Paoluccio), 697, and the last, Luigi Manin (1789). See BRIDE OF THE SEA.

For six hundred years ... her [Venice's] government was an elective monarchy, her ... dogs possessing, in early times at least, as much independent authority as any other European sovereign.—RUSKIN: Stones of Venice, vol. i, ch. i.

The chief magistrate of Genoa was called a doge from 1339 (Simon Boccaneegra) down to 1751, when the government was abolished by the French.

Doggerel (dog'ør él). This is an old word, with no obvious connexion with dog. It was originally applied to a loose, irregular measure in burlesque poetry, such as that of Butler's Hudibras, and it is in this sense that Chaucer uses the word:

"Now such a rym the devel I beteche!
This may wel be rym doggerel," quod he.
PROL. TO TALE OF MEIBEUS.

The word is now applied only to verse of a mean and paltry nature, lacking both sense and rhythm.

Dogget. Dogget's coat and badge. The prize given in a rowing match for Thames watermen, which takes place, under the auspices of the Freemongers' Company, on or about August 1st every year. So called from Thomas Dogget (d. 1721), an actor of Drury Lane, who signified the accession of George I by instituting the race. It is from the Swan Steps at London Bridge to the Swan at Chelsea. The average time taken is 30 mins. The coat is an orange-coloured livery jacket.

Dogmatic School. See EMPIRICS.

Doh, or Do (dō). The first or tonic note of the solfeggio system of music.

Do, re, mi, fa, sol, la (Ital.); ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la (Fr.). The latter are borrowed from a hymn by Paulus Piaconus, addressed to St. John, which Guido of Arezzo, in the 11th century, used in teaching singing:

Ut queant laxis, Re-sonare fibris.
Mi-va gestorum Fa-muli tuorum.
Sol-ve polluit La-bis reatum.
Sancte Joannes.
Ut erat bede thy wondrous story,
Re-prehensive though I be,
Me make mindful of thy glory,
Fa-mous son of Zacharee;
Sal-ace to my spirit bring.
La-bouring they praise to sing. E. C. B.

See ARETTINIAN SYLLABLES.

Dolijy. A small cloth used to cover dessert plates, or a mat or napier which to stand plates, glasses, bottles, etc. In the 17th century the word was an adjective denoting a cheap woollen material; thus Dryden speaks of "doyley petticoats," and Steele, in No. 102 of the Tatler, speaks of his "doiley suit." The Doyleys, from which the stuff was named, were linen-drapers in the Strand, from the late 17th century to 1850.

Dolit. An old Dutch coin, worth about half a farthing; hence, any coin of very small value. In England the doit was prohibited by 3 Henry V c. 1.

When they will not give a doit to relieve a lame beggar, they will lay out ten to see a dead Indian.—The Tempest, ii, 2.

Dolce far niente (dol'chi far ni en' ti) (Ital.), Delightful idleness. Pliny has "Jucundum tamen nihil agere" (Ep. viii, 9).

Dolcinists. See DUICINISTS.

Doldrums, The. A condition of depression, slackness, or inactivity; hence applied by sailors to a region where ships are likely to be becalmed, especially that part of the ocean near the equator noted for calms, squalls, and baffling winds, between the NE. and SE. trade winds.

But from the bluff-head, where I watched to-day,
I saw her in the doldrums.
BYRON: The Island, canto ii, stanza 21.

In the doldrums. In the dumps.

Dole (Lat. dolor, grief, sorrow). Lamentation. What if . . .
He now be dealing dole among his foes.
And over heaps of slaughtered walk his way?
MILTON: Samson Agonistes, 1529.

To make dole. To lament, to mourn.
Yonder they lie; the poor old man, their father, making such pitiful dole over them that all the beholders take his part with weeping.—As You Like It, i, 2.

Dole (A.S. dal, a portion, dal, deal). A portion allotted; a charitable gift, alms. The word was later usually applied to the weekly payment made for a limited period to certain classes of unemployed from funds contributed by workers, employers, and the State.
Happy man be his dole. May his share or lot be that of a happy or fortunate man.
Your father and my uncle have made motions: if it be my luck, so; if not, happy man be his dole!—Merry Wives, iii. 4.

Dollar. The sign $, is probably a modification of the figure 8 as it appeared on the old Spanish "pieces of eight," which were of the same value as the dollar.
The word is a variant of thaler (Low Ger. dahler; Dan. daler), and means "a valley," (our dale). The counts of Schlick, at the close of the 15th century, extracted from the mines at Joachim's thal (Joachim's valley) silver which they coined into ounce-pieces. These pieces, called Joachim's thalers, gained such high repute that they became a standard coin. Other coins being made like them were called thalers only. The American dollar equals 100 cents, in English money about 7s. 2d. It was adopted as the monetary unit of the U.S.A. in 1785 but was not coined until 1792.

Dolly Shop. A marine store where rags and refuse are bought and sold; so called from the black doll suspended over it as a sign to denote the sale of Indian silks and muslins.

Dolmen (dol' men). The name given in France to cromlechs (q.v.), particularly those of Brittany (Breton sol, a table, men, stone). They are often called by the rural population devils' tables, fairies' tables, and so on.

The Constantine Dolmen, Cornwall, is 33 ft. long, 14 ft. deep, and 18 ft. across. It is calculated to weigh 750 tons, and is poised on the points of two natural rocks.

Dolphin. Cp. Dauphin. The dolphin is noted for its changes of colour when taken out of the water.

Parting day
Dies like the dolphin, whom each pang imbues
With a new colour as it gasps away.
The last still loveliest.
Byron: Childe Harold, iv, 29.

D.O.M., inscribed on bottles of Benedictine liqueur, among other places, stands for Deo optimo maximo, To God the best and greatest.

Dom (Lat. dominus). A title applied in the Middle Ages to the Pope, and at a somewhat later period to other Church dignitaries. It is now restricted to priests and choir monks of the Benedictine Order, and to some few other monastic orders. The Sp. don, Port. dom, and M.E. dan (as in Dan Chaucer) are the same word.

Domdaniel (dom dán' yel). A fabled abode of evil spirits, gnomes, and enchanters, "under the roots of the ocean" off Tunis, or elsewhere. It first appears in Chaves and Cazotte's Continuation of the Arabian Nights (1788-93), was introduced by Southey into his Thalaba, and used by Carlyle as synonymous with a den of iniquity. The word is Lat. domus, house or home, Danielis, of Daniel, the latter being taken as a magician.

Domesday Book. The book containing a record of the census or survey of England, giving the ownership, extent, value, etc., of all the different holdings, undertaken by order of William the Conqueror in 1086. It is in Latin, is written on vellum, and consists of two volumes, one a large folio of 382 pages, and the other a quarto of 450 pages. It was formerly kept in the Exchequer, under three different locks and keys, but is now in the Public Record Office. Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmorland, and Durham are not included, though parts of Westmorland and Cumberland are taken.

The value of all estates is given, firstly, as in the time of the Confessor; secondly, when bestowed by the Conqueror; and, thirdly, at the time of the survey. It is also called The King's Book, and The Winchester Roll because it was kept there. Printed in facsimile in 1783 and 1816.

The book was so called from A.S. dom, judgment, because every case of dispute was decided by an appeal to these registers. Cp. Exon Domesday.

Domiciliary Visit (dom i sil' yá ri). An official visit paid by the police or other authorities to a private dwelling in order to search for incriminating papers, etc. In Britain a magistrate's warrant must be obtained before a domiciliary visit can be made.

Dominations. See Dominions.

Dominic, St. (1170-1221), who preached with great vehemence against the Albigenses, was called by the Pope "Inquisitor General," and was canonized by Gregory IX. He is represented with a sparrow at his side, and a dog carrying in its mouth a burning torch. The devil, it is said, appeared to the saint in the form of a sparrow, and the dog refers to the story that his mother, during her pregnancy, dreamt that she had given birth to a dog, spotted with black and white spots, which lighted the world with a burning torch.

Domical Letters. The letters which denote the Sunday or dies dominica. The first seven letters of the alphabet are employed: if January 1st is a Sunday the dominical letter for the year will be A, if the 2nd is a Sunday it will be B, if the 3rd, C, and so on. In Leap years there are two dominical letters, one for the period up to February 29th, and the other for the rest of the year.

Dominicans. An order of preaching friars, instituted by St. Dominic in 1215, and introduced into England (at Oxford) in 1221. They were formerly called in England Black Friars, from their black dress, and in France Jacobins, because their mother-establishment in Paris was in the Rue St. Jacques. They have always been one of the intellectual pillars of the Church, largely on account of their most distinguished member, St. Thomas Aquinas. They were also called "Hounds of the Lord," Domini canes.

Dominions. The sixth of the nine orders in the medival hierarchy of the angels. See Angel. They are symbolized in art by an ensign, and are also known as "Dominations."
The word is also applied to the self-governing possessions of the British Crown. The word was first given in this sense to the Dominion of Canada, which was formed by the federation of the Canadian provinces in 1867.

The other British Dominions are: the Commonwealth of Australia, 1901; The Dominion of New Zealand, 1907; The Union of South Africa, 1909; the Republic of India, 1947; The Dominion of Pakistan, 1947; the Dominion of Ceylon, 1948. In 1925 a Secretary­-ship of State for Dominion Affairs was created, to deal with business connected with the Dominions, as well as the affairs of Southern Rhodesia and the S. African territories of Basutoland, Bechuanaland, and Swaziland. The Dominions are represented in London by High Commissioners.

Domino (dom’ i nò) (Ital.). Originally a hooded cloak worn by canons; hence a disguise worn at masquerades consisting of a hooded garment, then the hood only, and finally the half mask covering an inch or two above and below the eyes, worn as a disguise.

The name came to be applied to the game probably through a custom of calling faire domino when winning with the last piece—much as the French still say faire capor (capor also means ‘hood’); in the Navy and Army the last lash of a flogging was known as the domino.

Don is do-on, as “Don your bonnet.” See Doff, Duf.

Then up he rose, and donned his clothes, And dupp’d the chamber door. Hamlet, iv. 5.

Don. A man of mark, an aristocrat. At the universities the masters and fellows are termed dons. The word is the Spanish form of Lat. dominus. Cp. DAN. Dom.

Don Juan (don joo’ án). Don Juan Tenorio, the hero of a large number of plays and poems, as well as of Mozart’s opera, Don Giovanni, round whom numerous legends have collected, was the son of a leading family of Seville in the 14th century, and killed the commandant of Ulloa after seducing his daughter. To put an end to his debaucheries the Franciscan monks enticed him to their monastery and killed him, telling the people that he had been carried off to hell by the statue of the commandant, which was in the grounds.

His name has passed into a synonym for a rake, roué, or aristocratic libertine, and in Mozart’s opera (1787) Don Giovanni’s valet, Leporello, says his master had “in Italy 700 mistresses, in Germany 800, in Turkey and France 91, in Spain 1,003.” His dissolute life was dramatized by Gabriel Tellez in the 17th century, by Moliere, Corneille, Shadwell, Grabbe (German), Dumas, and others, and in the 20th century by Bataille and Rostand.

In Byron’s well-known poem (1819-24), when Juan was sixteen years old he got into trouble with Donna Julia, and was sent by his mother, then a widow, on his travels. His adventures in the Isles of Greece, at the Russian Court, in England, etc., form the story of the poem, which, though it extends to sixteen cantos, is incomplete.

Don Quixote (don kwik’ zot). The hero of the great romance of that name by Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra (1547-1616). It was published at Madrid, Part I in 1605, Part II in 1615. Don Quixote is a gaunt country gentleman of La Mancha, gentle and dignified, affectionate and simple-minded, but so crazed by reading books of chivalry that he believes himself called upon to redress the wrongs of the whole world, and actually goes forth to avenge the oppressed and run atilt with their oppressors. Hence, a quixotic man is a dreamy, unpractical, but essentially good, man—one with a “bee in his bonnet.”

Donation of Constantine. See DECRETALEX.

Donation of Pepin, The. When Pepin conquered Ataulf (755) the exarch of Ravenna fell into his hands. Pepin gave it, with the surrounding country and the Republic of Rome, to the Pope (Stephen II), and thus founded the Papal States and the whole fabric of the temporal power of the Pope.

With the exception of the city of Rome the Papal States were incorporated in the kingdom of Italy in 1860, and Rome itself became Italian in 1870, the Pope declaring himself a “prisoner” in the Vatican. In 1929 a concordat was settled with the Italian government whereby a small area on the right bank of the Tiber was declared the Vatican City, together with the estate of Castel Gandolfo in the Alban mountains.

Donatists. Followers of Donatus, a Numidian bishop of the 4th century who, on puritanical grounds, opposed Cecilianus. Their chief dogma is that the outward Church is nothing, “for the letter killeth, it is the spirit that giveth life.” St. Augustine of Hippo vigorously combated their heresies.

Doncaster. The “City on the river Don.” Citt. Don, that which spreads. Siebert, monk of Gemblours, in 1100, derived the name from Tong-ceaster, the “castle of the thong,” and says that Hengist and Horsa purchased of the British king as much land as they could encompass with a leather thong, which they cut into strips, and so encompassed the land occupied by the city.

Donkey. An ass. The word is of comparatively recent origin, being first recorded about 1782 (Hickey’s Memoirs, ii, 276), and seems at first to have rhymed with “monkey.” It is a diminutive, and may be connected with dun, in reference to its tint. “Dun,” in “Dun in the mire” was a familiar name for a horse, and the “donkey” is a smaller, or more diminutive beast of burden. For the tradition concerning the “cross” on the donkey’s back, see Ass.

Not for donkey’s years. Not for a long time. The allusion is to the old tradition that one never sees a dead donkey.

The donkey means one thing and the driver another. Different people see from different standpoints, their own interest in every case directing their judgment. The allusion is to a fable in Phaedrus, where a donkey-driver exhorts his donkey to flee, as the enemy is at hand. The donkey asks if the enemy will load him with double pack-saddles. "No," says the man. "Then," replies the donkey, "what care I whether you are my master or someone else?"

To ride the black donkey. To be pig-headed, obstinate like a donkey. Black is added, not so much to designate the colour, as to express what is bad.

Two more, and up goes the donkey. An old cry at fairs, the showman having promised the credulous rustics that as soon as enough pennies are collected his donkey will balance himself on the top of the pole or ladder, as the case may be. Needless to say, it is always a matter of "two more pennies," and the trick is never performed.

Who stole the donkey? An old gibe against policemen. When the force was first established a donkey was stolen, but the police failed to discover the thief, and this gave rise to the laugh against them. The correct answer is "The man with the white hat," because white hats were made of the skins of donkeys, many of which were stolen and sold to hatters.

Donkey engine, pump, etc. Small auxiliary engines or machines for doing subsidiary work.

Donnybrook Fair. This fair, held in August from the time of King John, till 1855, was noted for its bacchanalian orgies and light-hearted rioting. Hence it is proverbial for a disorderly gathering or a regular rumpus. The village was a mile and a half south-east of Dublin, and is now one of its suburbs.

Donzel. A squire or young man of good birth not yet knighted. This is an anglicized form of Ital. doncello, from late Lat. domicellus. See DAMSEL.

He is esquire to a knight-errant, donzel to the damsels.—BUN. See CHARACTERS.

Doodle. To draw designs, patterns, sketches, etc., aimlessly and absent-mindedly while occupied in conversation, listening, and the like. Psychologists profess to find considerable significance in the drawings thus made.

Though the habit has existed for many centuries the word was brought into prominence as a result of the film Mr. Deeds goes to Town, 1936.

Doodle-bug. This was a name popularly given to the pilotless aeroplane bombs, also known as VI and "Flying Bombs," showered on the southern portions of Britain by the Germans in 1944.

Doom (A.S. dom). The original meaning was law, or judgment, that which is set up, as a statute: hence, the crack of doom, the signal for the final judgment. The book of judgments compiled by King Alfred was known as the don-hoc. This word is sometimes used to designate the frescoes, etc., found in old churches depicting the Day of Judgment, e.g. the Wenhaston Doom.

Doomsday Book. See DOMESDAY.

Doomsday Sedgwick. William Sedgwick (c. 1610-69), a fanatical prophet and preacher during the Commonwealth. He pretended to have it revealed to him in a vision that doomsday was at hand; and, going to the house of Sir Francis Russell, in Cambridgeshire, he called upon a party of gentlemen playing at bowls to leave off and prepare for the approaching dissolution.

Doors. The Anglo-Saxon dor (fem. dur). The word in many other languages is similar; thus, Dan. dor, Icel. dyrr, Gr. thura, Lat. fores, Ger. thiere.

Dead as a door-nail. See DEAD.

Door-money. Payment taken at the doors for admission to an entertainment, etc.

He laid the charge at my door. He accused me of doing it.

Indoors. Inside the house; also used attributively, as, an indoor servant.

Next door to it. Within an ace of it (see AC); very like it; next-door neighbour to it.

Out of doors. Outside the house; in the open air.

Sin lieth at the door (Gen. iv, 7). The blame of sin attaches to the wrongdoer, and he must take the consequences.

The door must be either shut or open. It must be one way or the other: there is no alternative. From De Brueys and de Palaprats's comedy, Le Grondeur (produced 1691): the master scolds his servant for leaving the door open. The servant says that he was scolded the last time for shutting it, and adds: "Do you wish it shut?"—"No."—"Do you wish it open?"—"No."—"Why," says the man, "it must be either shut or open."

To make the door. To make it fast by shutting and bolting it.

Why at this time the doors are made against you.—Comedy of Errors, iii, 1.

Make the door upon a woman's wit, and it will out at the casement.—As You Like It, iv, 1.

Dope. Properly, some thick or semi-fluid liquid used for food or as a lubricant (Dut. doopen, to dip). The name was applied to a varnish used for aeroplane wings, the odour of which in some cases had a stupefying effect upon the workers. Hence it came to be used for noxious drugs, such as cocaine; and confirmed drug-takers have since been called dope-friends. Dope is also used, figuratively, for flattery, or words that are intended to lead one into a false sense of security, power, etc., also for information.

Dora. The popular name of D.O.R.A., the Defence of the Realm Act, 1914-21, under which many hundreds of regulations temporarily curbing the liberty of the subject were made. It passed into common speech in 1914 after having been used in the Law Courts by Mr. Justice Scrutton.

Dorado, El. See EL DORADO.

Dorcas Society. A woman's circle for making clothing for the poor. So called from Dorcas, in Acts ix, 39, who made "coats and garments" for widows.

Dorian, Doric. Pertaining to Doris, one of the divisions of ancient Greece, or to its inhabitants, a simple, pastoral people.
Dorian mode. The scale represented by the white keys on a pianoforte, beginning with D. A simple, solemn form of music, the first of the authentic Church modes.

Doric dialect. The dialect spoken by the natives of Doris, in Greece. It was broad and hard. Hence, any broad dialect such as that of rustics. Robert Burns’s verses are an example of British Doric.

Doric Order. The oldest, strongest, and simplest of the Grecian orders of architecture. The Greek Doric is simpler than the Roman imitation. The former stands on the pavement without fillet or other ornament, and the flutes are not scalloped. The Roman column is placed on a plinth, has fillets, and the flutings, both top and bottom, are scalloped.

The Doric Land. Greece, Doris being a part of Greece.

Through all the bounds
Of Doris land.

_Milton: Paradise Lost_, Bk. i, 519.

The Doric reed. Pastoral poetry. Everything Doric was very plain, but cheerful, chaste, and solid.

The Doric reed once more
Well pleased, I tune.

_Thomson: Autumn_, 3.

Dorien (dōr’ i-en). The heroine of Chaucer’s _Franklin’s Tale_, which was taken from Boccaccio’s _Decameron_ (X, vi), the original being in the _Hindu Vetala Panchavinsati_.

Dorinda, in the verses of the Earl of Dorset, is Catherine Sedley, Countess of Dorchester, mistress of James II.

Doris. See _Nereids_.

Dormer Window. The window of an attic standing out from the slope of the roof; properly, the window of a bedroom. (O.Fr. dormeur, a dormitory.)

Dormy. A golfing term of uncertain origin (perhaps connected with Fr. dormir, to sleep), which is applied to a player who is as many holes ahead of his opponent as there are holes left to play in the round. Thus, if when there are still three holes left A. is three ahead of B., A. is said to be “dormy three.”

Dormy House. Sleeping quarters at a golf club.

Dornick. Stout figured linen for tablecloths, etc.; so called from Doornick, the Flemish name of Tournay, where it was originally made. Cp. _Dannocks_. The word is spelt in many ways, e.g. Dornock, Darnex.

I have got... a fair Darnex carpet of my own Laid cross for the more state.

_Fletcher: The Noble Gentleman_, v. 1.

Dorothea, St. (dor’ ò-thé’ a). A martyr under Diocletian about 303. She is represented with a rose-branch in her hand, a wreath of roses on her head, and roses with fruit by her side; the legend is that Theophilus, the judge’s secretary, scoffingly said to her, as she was going to execution, “Send me some fruit and roses, Dorothea, when you get to Paradise.” Immediately after her execution, a young angel brought him a basket of apples and roses, saying, “From Dorothea in Paradise,” and vanished. The story forms the basis of Massinger’s tragedy, _The Virgin Martyr_ (1620).

Dorset. Once the seat of a British tribe, calling themselves _Dwrr-trigs_ (dwellers by the water). The Romans colonized the settlement, and Latinized _Dwrr-trigs_ into _Duro-triges_. Lastly came the Saxons, who translated the original words into their own tongue, _dor-setta, setta_ being a seat or settlement.

Doss. Slang for a sleep; also for a bed or a place where one sleeps—a _doss-house, dossing-ken_. The word dates from the 18th century, and is probably connected with the old _dorse_, a back (Lat. _dorsum_, Fr. _dos_). Hence also _dossier_, one who sleeps in a common lodging-house.

Dotheboys Hall (doo th’ buz’). A school in Dickens’s _Nicholas Nickleby_ where boys were taken in and done for by Mr. Wackford Squeers, a brutish, ignorant, overbearing knave, who starved them and taught them nothing. The ruthless exposure of this kind of “school” led to the closing or reformation of many of them.

Dot. See I.

Dot and carry one. An infant just beginning to toddle; one who limps in walking; a person who has one leg longer than the other.

Dotterel. A doting old fool; an old man easily cajoled. So called from the bird, a species of plover, which is easily approached and caught.

To dor the dotterel. Dor is an obsolete word meaning to trick or cheat. Whence the phrase means to cheat the simpleton.

Douai Bible. _See Bible, the English_. The English college at Douai was founded by William Allen (afterwards cardinal) in 1568. The Douai Bible translates such words as _penance_ by the word _penance_, etc., and the whole contains notes by Roman Catholic divines.

Double (Lat. _duplus_, twofold). One’s double is one’s _alter ego_ (q.v.). The word is applied to such pairs as the Corsican brothers, the Dromio brothers, and the brothers Antipholus.

Double-bank. A phrase used in Britain in reference to two or more cars or cyclists abreast on a road; in Australia it is applied to two people riding one horse.

To double-cross. To betray or cheat an associate, more especially an associate in an already shady undertaking.

A double first. In the first class both of the classical and mathematical final examinations, Oxford; or of the classical and mathematical triposes, Cambridge. Now, a first class in any two final examinations.

Double dealing. Professing one thing and doing another inconsistent with that promise.

Double Dutch. Gibberish, jargon, of a foreign tongue not understood by the hearer. Dutch is a synonym for foreign; and double implies something excessive, in a twofold degree.
Double-edged. Able to cut either way; used metaphorically of an argument which makes both for and against the person employing it, or which has a double meaning.

"Your Delphic sword," the panther then replied, "is double-edged and cuts on either side."

DRYDEN: Hind and Panther, pt. iii, 191.

Double entendre. An incorrect English version of the French double entente, a word which secretly expresses a rude or coarse covert meaning, generally of an indelicate character. Entendre is the infinitive mood of the French verb, and is never used as a noun.

Double or quits. The winner stakes his stake, and the loser promises to pay twice the stake if he loses again; but if he wins the second throw his loss is cancelled and no money passes.

Double time. A military phrase, applied to orderly running on the march, etc. It is quick march, the rate of progress (officially 165 steps of 33 in., i.e. 453\(\frac{1}{4}\) ft., to the minute) being double that of the ordinary walking pace. See To double up below.

Double-tongued. Making contrary declarations on the same subject at different times; deceitful; insincere.

Double X. See X.

Double-headed Eagle. See Eagle.

To double a cape. Said of a ship that sails round or to the other side of a cape; its course is, as it were, bent back on itself.

What capes he doubled, and what continent,
The gulls and straits strangely he had past.

DRYDEN: Idem, stanza 1.

To double a part. Said of an actor playing two parts in the same piece.

To double and twist. To prevaricate, act evasively, try by tortuous means to extricate oneself out of a dilemma or difficulty. The phrase is taken from coursing—a hare "doubles and twists" in the endeavour to escape from the hounds. In weaving, "to double and twist" is to add one thread to another and twist them together.

To double back. To turn back on one's course.

To double up. To fold together. "To double up the fist" is to fold the fingers together so as to make the hand into a fist. "To double a person up is to strike him in the wind, so as to make him double up with pain."

In military phraseology, "Double up there!" is an order to hurry, to "get a move on," run. Also to put two people in the space normally allocated to one if accommodation is temporarily short. See Double Time above.

Double summer time. See Daylight Saving.

Double take. An acting trick. It consists in looking away from the person who has addressed a remark to you, and then looking back at him quickly when the purport of the remark sinks in.

To work double tides. To work extra hard, with all one's might.

Doubting Castle. The castle of the giant Despair, in which Christian and Hopeful were incarcerated, but from which they escaped by means of the key called "Promise." (BUNYAN: Pilgrim's Progress.)

Doubting Thomas. See THOMAS, St.

Douceur (Fr.). A gratuity for service rendered or promised; a tip.

Doughboy (U.S.A.). First, doughcake baked for sailors, then the buttons on their coats; then buttons on infantry uniforms (civil war), thence infantry man.

Doughface (U.S.A.). Inhabitant of the Northern States who was in favour of maintaining slavery in the South.

Douglas. The Scottish family name is from the river Douglas in Lanarkshire, which is the Celtic diu glaise, black stream, a name in use also in Ireland, the Isle of Man, etc., and in Lancashire corrupted to Diggles. Legend explains it by inventing an unknown knight who came to the assistance of some Scottish king. After the battle the king asked who was the "Du-glass" chief, his deliverer, and received for answer Sholto Douglas, which is said to be good Gaelic for "Behold the dark-grey man you inquired for."

"I will not yield him an inch of way, had he in his body the soul of every Douglas that has lived since the time of the Dark Gray Man."—SCOTT: The Abbot, ch. xxviii.

Black Douglas. Sir William Douglas, lord of Nithsdale, who died about 1392. It was of this Douglas that Scott said:

The name of this indefatigable chief has become so formidable, that women used, in the northern counties, to still their froward children by threatening them with the Black Douglas.—History of Scotland, ch. xi.

The "Black Douglas" introduced by Scott in Castle Dangerous is James, eighth Lord Douglas, who lived about 100 years earlier, and twice took Douglas Castle from the English by stratagem.

The Douglas Tragedy. A ballad in Scott's Border Minstrelsy, telling how Lord William steals away Lady Margaret Douglas and is pursued by her father and two brothers. A fight ensues; the father and his two sons are sore wounded; Lord William, also wounded, creeps to his mother's house and there dies; and the lady dies next morning.

Douse the Glim. Put out the candle; also, by extension, to blind a man. Among sailors "to douse a sail" means to lower it in haste.

Douse in the chops. A heavy blow in the face.

My fellow-servant Humphry Klinker bid him be civil, and he gave the young man a douse in the chops; but I achins, Mr. Klinker wasn't long in his debt—with a good oaken sapling he dusted his doubler.—Smollett: Humphry Clinker, Lett. xxxiv.

Dout. A contraction of do-out, as don is of do-on, doff of do-off, and dup of do-up. In some southern counties they still say dout the candle and dout the fire, and call extinguishers douters.

The dram of eale
Doth all the noble substance dout.

Dove. The name means "the diver-bird"; perhaps from its habit of ducking the head. So also Lat. columba is the Gr. kolymbis (a diver).
In Christian art the dove symbolizes the Holy Ghost, and the seven rays proceeding from it the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost. It also symbolizes the soul, and as such is sometimes represented coming out of the mouth of saints at death.

A dove bearing a ring is an attribute of St. Agnes: St. David is shown with a dove on his shoulder; St. Dunstan and St. Gregory the Great with one at the ear; St. Eucharius with one on his head; and St. Remigius with the dove bringing him holy chrism.

The clergy of the Church of England are allegorized as doves in Dryden's Hind and Panther, part iii, 947, 998-1002.

Dove's dung. In 2 Kings vi. 25, we are told that during the siege of Samaria "there was a great famine ... and ... an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver." "Ass's head" and "dove's dung" are both undoubtedly incorrect, the true rendering probably being "a homer of lentils" and "pods of the carob (or locust) tree," the Hebrew for which expressions could easily be misread for the Hebrew of the others. Locust pods are still commonly sold in the East for food, and during the famine of rage and exasperation, like the Fr. à bas.

He is very much run down. Very out of sorts; in need of a thorough rest and overhauling, like a clock that has run down.

I was down on him in a minute. I pounced on him directly; I detected his trick immediately. The allusion is to birds of prey.

That suits me down to the ground. See Ground.

The down train. The train away from London or the local centre, in contradistinction to the up train, which goes to it. We also have the down platform, etc.

To down tools. To lay one's tools aside and come out on strike.

To have a down on. To have a grudge or spite against.

To run a man down. See Run.

Dowser. Filthy doxas: I have given them away to bakers' wives, and they have made bolsters of them.

Mrs. Quickly. Now, as I am true woman, Holland of eight shillings an ell. 1 Henry IV, iii, 3.
Downright. Thoroughly, from top to bottom, throughout; "downright honest," "downright mad"; outspoken; fixed in opinions; utter, as a "downright shame."

Downright Dunstable. See DUNSTABLE.

Downy. An old slang word long since in disuse.

Gone to the downy, gone to bed; bed being stuffed with down.

A downy cove. A knowing fellow, up to, or, as formerly, down to every dodge.

Downy here means wideawake, knowing; or, as formerly, given as a synonym for down.

Especially an unsophisticated country girl, in poems of day. —The London douse et belle, called a bell.

Dowse The Greater Doxology is the hymn disputed, but as the art was introduced from Germany (in the 16th cent.) it may be connected with Ger. deutet, to declare or interpret.

Doxology (doks ol'). The Greek word meaning a hymn of praise to God. Excelsis Deo Father, etc.) sung at the end of each at the Eucharist. The Lesser Doxology is also known as the Gloria Patri. Gloria in Excelsis Deo at the Eucharist. The Lesser Doxology is the hymn Gloria in Excelsis Deo at the Eucharist. The Lesser Doxology is also known as the Gloria Patri.

Doxology (doks ol' o ji). This comes from a Greek word meaning a hymn of praise to God. The Greater Doxology is the hymn Gloria in Excelsis Deo at the Eucharist. The Lesser Doxology is also known as the Gloria Patri.

Doyx. This is an old word, though it has always been slang, for a paramour, more especially the wench of a tramp or tinker. The common—and inoffensive—habit of calling a girl "ducks" or "ducks" has precisely the same origin.

Doyley. See DOILY.

Dozen. Twelve: the word is all that is left (in English) of the Latin duodecem, twelve, the -en representing the Latin suffix -ema. A long dozen is thirteen. See BAKER'S DOZEN.

To talk nineteen to the dozen. To talk at a tremendous rate, or with excessive vehemence.

D.P. The House of Lords (Lat. Domus Procerum). Also Displaced Persons (q.v.).

Drachenfels (drak' en felz). (Ger., Dragon-rock). So called from the legend that it was the home of the dragon slain by Siegfried, the hero of the Nibelungenlied.

The castled crag of Drachenfels Frowns o'er the wide and winding Rhine, Whose breast of waters broadly swells Between the banks which bear the vine. —BYRON: Childe Harold, iii, 55.

Dracoian Code (drá kô' ni àn). One very severe. Draco was an Athenian law-maker of the 7th cent. B.C., and the first to produce a written code of laws for Athens. As nearly every violation of his laws was a capital offence, Demades the orator said that "Draco's code was written in blood."

Draft. A draft on Aldgate pump. See ALD­GATE.

(Military:) A body of men of any size sent to a unit or formation for service, presumably having the same origin as a draft or cheque, since it fully or partially fills the requirement for which the unit has indented.

Dragle-tail. See DAPPLE-TAIL.

Dragoman (drâg' o mân) (pl. dragomans). A cicerone; a guide or interpreter to foreigners. (Arab. taguman, an interpreter; whence targum.)

My dragoman had me completely in his power, and I resolved to become independent of all interpreters.—BAKER: Albert Nyanza, ch. i, p. 3.

Dragon. The Greek word drakon comes from a verb meaning "to see," "to look at," and more remotely "to watch" and "to flash.

A dragon is a fabulous winged crocodile, usually represented as of large size, with a serpent's tail; whence the words serpent and dragon are sometimes interchangeable. The word was used in the Middle Ages as the symbol of sin in general and paganism in particular, the metaphor being derived from Rev. xii. 9, where Satan is termed "the great dragon" and Ps. xci. 13, where it is said that the saints "shall trample the dragon under their feet." Hence, in Christian art the dragon symbolizes Satan or sin, as when represented at the feet of Christ and the Virgin Mary; and St. John the Evangelist is sometimes represented holding a chalice, from which a dragon is issuing.

Among the many saints who are usually pictured with dragons may be mentioned St. Michael, St. George, St. Margaret, Pope Sylvester, St. Samson (Archbishop of Dol), St. Donatus, St. Clement of Metz; St. Romain of Rouen, who destroyed the huge dragon, La Gargouille, which ravaged the Seine; St. Philip the Apostle, who killed another at Hierapolis, in Phrygia; St. Martha, who slew the terrible dragon, Tarasque, at Aix-la-Chapelle; St. Florent, who killed a dragon which haunted the Loire; St. Cado, St. Muadet, and St. Pol. who did similar feats in Brittany; and St. Keyne of Cornwall.

In classical legend the idea of watching is retained in the story of the dragon who guards the golden apples in the garden of the Hesperides.

Among the ancient Britons and Welsh the dragon was the national symbol on the war standard; hence the term, Pendragon (q.v.) for the dux bellerum, or leader in war (pen = head or chief).

A duenna is poetically called a dragon:—

In England the garden of beauty is kept By a Dragon of prudery placed within call. —T. MOORE: Irish Melodies.

Dragon's Blood. A picturesque name given to no more awesome substance than the red resinous exudation from the fruits of a large palma. It was formerly used as an astringent in medicine, and is still employed as a colouring matter for varnishes.
A flying dragon. A meteor.

The Chinese dragon. In China, a five-clawed dragon is introduced into pictures and embroidered on state dresses as an amulet.

The Dragon of Wantley. See WANTED.

To sow dragons' teeth. To foment contentions; to stir up strife or war; especially to do something that is intended to put an end to strife but which brings it about later. The Philistines sowed dragons' teeth when they took Samson, bound him, and put out his eyes; the ancient Britons did the same when they massacred the Danes on St. Bryce's Day, as also did the Germans when they robbed France of Alsace Lorraine.

The reference is to the classical story of Cadmus, who sowed the dragon that guarded the well of Ares and sowed some of its teeth, from which sprang up the men called Sparti, or the Sow-men, who all killed each other except five, who became the ancestors of the Thebans. Those teeth which Cadmus did not sow came to the possession of Æetes, King of Colchis; one of the tasks he enjoined on Jason was to sow them and slay the armed warriors that rose therefrom.

Dragon's Hill. A site in Berkshire where one legend has it that St. George killed the dragon. A bare place is shown on the hill, where nothing will grow, for there the blood of the dragon ran out. In Saxon annals we are told that Cerdic, founder of the West Saxon kingdom, slew there Naud (or Natanleod, the people's refuge), the pen-dragon, with 5,000 men.

A good draw. A first-rate attraction—
"Performing elephants are always 'a good draw' at circuses." The noun also may mean a drawn game, or the result of drawing lots, etc.

Draw it mild! Don't exaggerate! Don't make your remarks (or actions, as the case may be) stronger than necessary. The allusion is to the drawing of a line.

Hanged, drawn, and quartered. Strictly speaking, the phrase should read Drawn, hanged, and quartered; for the allusion is to the sentence formerly passed on those convicted of high treason, which was that they should be drawn to the place of execution on a hurdle or at a horse's tail instead of being carried or allowed to walk, then hanged, and then quartered.

Later, drawing, or disembowelling, the criminal was added to the punishment after the hanging and before the quartering, and it was sometimes supposed that the "drawn" in the phrase referred to this process instead of to the earlier one. Thus the sentence on Sir William Wallace was that he should be drawn (dehrahatur) from the Palace of Westminster to the Tower, then hanged (suspendatur), then disembowelled or drawn (devaleatur), then beheaded and quartered (decolletur et decapietur).

Lord Ellenborough used to say to those condemned, "You are drawn on hurdles to the place of execution, where you are to be hanged, but not till you are dead; for, while still living, your body is to be taken down, your bowels torn out and burnt before your face; your head is then cut off, and your body divided into four quarters—Gentlemen's Magazine, 1803.

To draw a bead on somebody. To take aim at him with a rifle or revolver. The " bead" referred to is the foresight.

To draw a badger. See Badger.

To draw a furrow. To plough or draw a plough through a field so as to make a furrow.

To draw a person out. To entice a person to speak on any subject, to obtain information, to encourage one too shy to talk.

To draw amiss. To take the wrong direction. A hunting term, to draw meaning to follow scent.

To draw blank. To meet with failure in one's pursuit. The allusion is to sportsmen "drawing" a covert and finding no game. To draw a blank refers to having no luck in a lottery, sweatstake, etc. To fail in a search.

To draw the cork. To give one a bloody nose.

To draw the nail. To release oneself from a vow. It was a custom in Cheshire to register a vow by driving a nail into a tree, swearing to keep your vow as long as it remained there. If you wished to retract, the nail was withdrawn and the vow thereby cancelled.

To draw rations, stores, etc. A military phrase, to go to the appointed place of issue and receive same.

To draw rein. To pull up short, to check one's course.

To draw stumps. To mark the final close of a game of cricket the stumps are drawn from the ground and taken away.

To draw the line. To set a definite limit beyond which one refuses to go; to impose a restriction on one's behaviour from fear of going too far. "He was utterly unprincipled, but he drew the line at blackmail," i.e. he would stop short at blackmail.

To draw a bow at a venture; to draw the long bow. See Bow.

Drawback. Something to set against the profits or advantages of a concern. In commerce, it is duty charged on goods paid back again when the goods are exported.

It is only on goods into which dutiable commodities have entered in large proportion and obvious ways that drawbacks are allowed.—H. GEORGE: Protection or Free Trade? ch. ix.

In common parlance a drawback is an inconvenience in something otherwise desirable.

Drawcansir. A burlesque tyrant in Buckingham's Rehearsal (1671); hence, a blustering braggart. The character was a caricature of Dryden's Almanzor (Conquest of Granada). Drawcansir's opening speech (he has only three) is:

- He that dares drink, and for that drink dares die,
- And, knowing this, dares yet drink on, am I.

which parodies Almanzor's:

- He who dares love, and for that love must die,
- And, knowing this, dares yet love on, am I.

Conquest of Granada, IV, iii.

Cp. BAYES; BOBADIL.

Drawing-room. This was originally a room into which the women withdrew after dinner, leaving the men to remain at table drinking. When this custom fell into desuetude the drawing-room became a room for entertainment and conversation as distinct from the dining-room reserved for meals. In the Victorian suburban villa the drawing-room was a sort of state apartment rarely entered and yet more rarely used. The word is also applied to a levee where ladies are presented to the sovereign.

Drawlatch. An old name for a robber, a housebreaker; i.e., one who entered by drawing up the latch with the string provided for the purpose and stole all he could carry away with him.

Dreadnought. The name given to a large battleship (17,900 tons) in the British Navy, built in 1906, and hence to the class of which it was the earliest. The name was in use in Queen Elizabeth's time.

The Seamen's Hospital at Greenwich (founded in 1821) is often spoken of as the Dreadnought Hospital, because it was originally housed in the Thames on an old man-of-war of this name. It was drawn ashore in 1870.

Dreams, The Gates of. There are two, viz. that of ivory and that of horn. Dreams which delude pass through the Ivory Gate, those which come true pass through the Gate of Horn.

That children dream not the first half-year; that men dream not in some countries, with many more, are unto me sick men's dreams; dreams out of the ivory gate, and visions before midnight.—SIR THOMAS BROWNE: On Dreams.
This fancy depends upon two puns: ivory in Greek is elephas, and the verb elephairo means "to cheat with empty hopes"; the Greek for horn is keras, and the verb karanoo means "to accomplish."

The Immortal Dreamer. John Bunyan (1628-88).

Driend. An ancient Northumbrian term (from Danish) for a free tenant who held his land by a tenure dating from before the Conquest. It occurs in Domesday Book.

Dresser. In theatrical parlance this is the person who looks after dresses, and prepares for the stage an actor or actress. In furniture a dresser is a large stand with shelves for holding dishes, plates, etc., and drawers for cutlery and silver.

Dreyfusard, Dreyfusite. An advocate of the innocence of Capt. Alfred Dreyfus (1859-1935), a French artillery officer of Jewish descent, who was convicted in 1894 on a charge of having betrayed military secrets, degraded and sent to Devil's Island. In 1899 the first trial was annulled. He was brought back to France, retried, and again condemned, but shortly afterwards pardoned, though it was not until 1914 that he was finally and completely rehabilitated.

Drink, Drink-money. A "tip"; a small gratuity to be spent on drinking the health of the giver; a pourboire (Fr., for drink).

Drinking horns. In the East drinking cups made of rhinoceros horn used to be specially valued, as they were supposed to sweat if they contained any poison. In the North those made of narwhal tusk were considered the best, they were said to contain any poison. In the North those made of narwhal tusk were considered the best, they were held to counteract any poisonous effects.

Drinking of healths. See Garbara; Health.

In the drink. In the sea, in the water, a service colloquial term of World War II.

The big drink. An American expression for any large stretch of water, such as the Atlantic (cf. HERRING-POND) or Lake Superior.

In airman's slang to be ditched in the drink is to make a forced landing on water, esp. the sea.

It is meat and drink to me. It is something that is almost essential to my well-being or happiness; something very much to be desired.

It is meat and drink to me to see a clown. As You Like It, v. 1.

One must drink as one brews. One must take the consequences of his actions; "as one makes his bed so must he lie in it."

I am grieved it should be said he is my brother, and take these courses: well, as he brews, so shall he drink. —Villon: Every Man in his Humour, ii, 1.

Those who drink beer will think beer. A saying attributed to Warburton, Bishop of Gloucester (1696-1779). Some non-teetotaller parodied it with "And those that drink water will think water." Neither explanation calls for elucidation.

To drink at Freeman's Quay. To get one's drink at someone else's expense. It is said that at one time all porters and carmen calling at Freeman's Quay, near London Bridge, had a pot of beer given them gratis, but the explanation is scarcely necessary and probably untrue.

To drink deep. To drink heavily, to excess, or habitually. Shakespeare uses the expression metaphorically:

Cont.: If it pass against us, we lose the better half of our possession; . . .
And to the coffers of the king beside, A thousand pounds by the year. Thus runs the bill.
Ely: This would drink deep.
Cont.: 'Twould drink the cup and all. Henry V, i, 1.

To drink like a fish. To drink abundantly or excessively. Many fish swim with their mouths open, thus appearing to be continually drinking. The expression is found in Beaumont and Fletcher.

To drink the cup of sorrow, etc. See Cup.

To drink the waters. To take medicinal waters, especially at a spa.

Drive. He is driving pigs, or driving pigs to market. Said of one who is who is so reckless, because the grunt of a pig resembles the snore of a sleeper.

To drive a good bargain. To exact more than is quite equitable.
Henry: Heaven would no bargain for its blessings drive. —Dryden: Astrea Redux, i, 137.

To drive a quill. See Quilldrivers.

To drive a roaring trade. To do a brisk business.

To drive the swine through the hanks of yarn. To spoil what has been painfully done; to squander thrift. In Scotland, the yarn wrought in the winter (called the gude-wife's thrija) is laid down by the burn-side to bleach, and is thus exposed to damage from passing animals, such as a herd of pigs, which may stray over it and do a vast amount of harm.

To let drive. To attack; to fall foul of. Thou knowest my old ward; here I [Falstaff] lay, and thus I bore my point. Four rogues in buckram let me at me.—Shakespeare: Henry IV, ii, 4.

What are you driving at? What do you want to prove? What do you want me to infer?

Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat. Henry Brooke, in his Gustavis Vasa (1739), says: "Who rules o'er free-men should himself be free"; Dr. Johnson parodied the line—and the sentiment, with which he did not agree. (Boswell.)

Droit d'Aubaine (dra' dô bän). Aubain (Fr.), means "alien," and droit d'aubaine the "right over an alien's property." In France the king was entitled, at the death of foreign residents (except Swiss and Scots), to all their movables, a right that was not finally abolished till 1819.
Had I died that night of an indigestion, the whole world could not have suspended the effects of the droits d'aubaine. My shirts and black pair of breeches, portmanteau and all must have gone to the king of France.—Sterne: Sentimental Journey (Intro.).

Dromio (drö' mi ô). The brothers Dromio. Two brothers exactly alike, who served two brothers exactly alike, and the mistakes of masters and men form the fun of Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, based on the Menæchmi of Plautus.

Drone. The male of the bee, which does no work but lives on the labours of the worker-bees; hence, a sluggard; an idle person who lives on the work or means of another.

The three lower pipes of a bagpipe are called the drones, because they produce an unchanging, monotonous bass humming like that of a bee.

Drop. A drop in one's eye. Not exactly intoxicated, but having had quite enough.

We are na fou, we're nae that fou,
But just a drappie in our e'e!

BURNS: Willie Brew'd a Peck o' Maut.

A drop in the ocean. An infinitesimal quantity; something that scarcely counts or matters in comparison with the whole.

A drop of the crater. See Creature.

A dropping fire. An irregular fusillade from small-arms, machine guns, etc.

Drop serene. An old name for amaurosis, a disease of the optic nerve, causing blindness, without affecting the appearance of the eye. It was at one time thought that it was caused by a transparent, watery humour distilling on the nerve. The name is the Latin form of the Lat. gutta serena.

So thick a drop serene hath quenched these orbs. MILTON: Paradise Lost, iii, 25.

Prince Rupert's drops. See Rupert.

To drop across. To encounter accidentally or casually.

To drop an acquaintance. To allow acquaintance to lapse.

To drop in. To make a casual call, not invited; to pay an informal visit.

To get the drop on someone. To have him in your power, probably from the early method of pistol shooting whereby the weapon was raised high and then lowered, or dropped, towards its target.

To drop off. "Friends drop off," fall away gradually. "To drop off to sleep," to fall asleep (especially in weariness or sickness).

To take a drop. A euphemism for taking what the drinker chooses to call by that term. It may be anything from a sip to a Dutchman's draught.

To take one's drops. To drink spirits in private.

Drown. Drowning men catch at straws. Persons in desperate circumstances cling in hope to trifles wholly inadequate to rescue or even help them.

To drown the miller. See Miller.

Drows. See Trows.

Drug. See Dope. A drug in the market. Something not called for, which no one will buy.

Druid (droo' id). A member of the ancient Gaulish and British order of priests, teachers of religion, magicians, or sorcerers. The word is the Lat. druidae or druides (always plural), which was borrowed from the Old Irish druí and Gaelic draoi. The druidic cult presents many difficulties, and practically our only literary sources of knowledge of it are Pliny and the Commentaries of Cæsar, whence we learn that the rites of the Druids were conducted in oak-groves and that they regarded the oak and the mistletoe with peculiar veneration; that they studied nature generally; that they believed in the transmigration of souls, and dealt in "magic." Their distinguishing badge was a serpent's egg (see below), to which very powerful properties were credited. The order seems to have been highly organized, and according to Strabo every chief had his druid, and every chief druid was allowed a guard of thirty men.

In Butler's Hudibras (III, i) there is an allusion to the Money by the Druids borrowed, In t'other world to be restored.

This refers to a legend recorded by one Patricius (? St. Patrick) to the effect that the Druids were wont to borrow money to be repaid in the life to come. His words are "Druide pecuniam mutuo acceptibant in posteriori vita redditur."

On account of the inferred connexion between the Druids and the bards the name is still kept in use by the Welsh Eisteddfods, and it is with this sense that Collins employed it in his eulogy on Thomson:—

In yonder grave a Druid lies.

United Ancient Order of Druids. A secret benefit society founded in London in 1781 and introduced to U.S.A. in 1883. It now has lodges, or "groves" as they are called, in many parts of the world.

The Druids' egg. This wonderful egg was hatched by the joint labour of several serpents, and was buoyed into the air by their hissing. The person who caught it had to ride off at full speed, to avoid being stung to death; but the possessor was sure to prevail in every contest, and to be courted by those in power. Pliny says he had seen one of them, and that it was about as large as a moderate-sized apple.

Druj. See Ahriman.

Drum. A popular name in the 18th century—and later—for a crowded evening party, so called from its resemblance in noise to the drumming up of recruits. The more riotous of these parties were called drum-majors.

This is a riotous assembly of fashionable people, of both sexes, at a private house, consisting of some hundreds, not unealy stiled a drum, from the noise and emptiness of the entertainment.—SMOLLETT: Advice, a Satire (1746).

To drum up. To get together unexpectedly or in an emergency, as "to drum up a meal."

John (or Jack) Drum's entertainment. Turning an unwelcome guest out of doors. O! for the love of laughter, let him fetch his drum: hoy he has a stratagem for 't. When your lordship sees the bottom of his success in 't, and to what metal this counterfeit lump of ore will be melted, if you give him not John Drum's entertainment, your inclining cannot be removed.—Alf's Well, iii, 6.

John Marston wrote a comedy with the title Jack Drum's Entertainment (1600), in which he is supposed to have satirized Ben Jonson.
Drum ecclesiastic. The pulpit cushion, often vigorously thumped by what are termed "rousing preachers.

When Gospel trumpeter, surrounded
With long-eared rout, to battle sounded;
And pulpit, drum ecclesiastic,
Was beat with fist instead of a stick.

Butler: Hudibras, I, l.

Drum-head court-martial. One held in haste; a court-martial summoned on the field round the drum to deal summarily with an offender.

Drumsticks. Legs, especially very thin ones, or the legs of a cooked fowl.

Drummers. An Americanism for commercial travellers, their vocation being to collect customers as a recruiting officer "drums up" recruits.

Drummond Light. The limelight. So named from the inventor, Thomas Drummond (1797-1860), about 1825.

Drunk. Drunk as a fiddler. The reference is to the fiddler at wakes, fairs, and on board ship, who used to be paid in liquor for playing to the dancers.

Drunk as a lord. In the late 18th century and early 19th the habit of gross drinking was at its height and a man of fashion was judged—or prided himself—on the number of bottles of port he could drink at a sitting. Few dinners ended without placing the guests under the table in a hopeless state of intoxication; hence the expression.

Drunk as Chloe. Chloe was the cobbler's wife of Linden Grove, to whom Prior, the poet, was attached. She was notorious for her drinking habits.

Drunk as David's sow. See Davy's Sow.

Chaucer has drunk as a mouse, Wilson (1553) drunk as a rat, Massinger drunk as a beggar; other common similes are drunk as a tinker, and drunk as a boiled owl, or "as an owl."

Drunkard's cloak. A tub with holes for the arms to pass through, used in the 17th century for drunkards and scolds by way of punishment.

Drunken Parliament, The. The Parliament assembled at Edinburgh, January 1st, 1661, of which Burnet says the members "were almost perpetually drunk."

Drury Lane. This famous London street (and, consequently, the theatre) is named from Drury House, built in the time of Henry VIII by Sir William Drury. It stood on a site about in the middle of the present Aldwych.

The first Drury Lane Theatre was opened on April 8, 1663, and nine years later was burned down. Its successor was designed by Wren, and this was replaced in 1794 by a third theatre, which was destroyed by fire in 1809. The present building was designed by Wyatt and opened in 1812. It was on its boards that Edmund Kean achieved his first great triumph, as Shylock, in 1814.

Druses. A people and sect of Syria, living about the mountains of Lebanon and Anti- Libanus. Their faith is a mixture of the Pentateuch, the Gospel, the Koran, and Sufism. They offer up their devotions in both mosques and churches, worship the images of saints, and yet observe the fast of Ramadan. Their name is probably from that of their first apostle, Isma'il Darazi, or Durzi (11th century A.D.).

Dry. Thirsty. Hence to drink is to "wet your whistle" (i.e. throat); and malt liquor is called "heavy wet."

Dry bob. A boy at Eton College who plays cricket and football instead of going in for rowing.

Dry goods. Merchandise such as cloth, stuffs, silks, laces, and drapery in general, as opposed to groceries.

Dry lodgings. An old expression for sleeping accommodation without board. Gentlemen who took their meals at clubs lived in "dry lodgings."

Dry rot is a diseased condition of timber due to the ravages of certain species of fungi. The affected parts crumble away to a brownish powder upon exposure to a dry atmosphere. Dry rot cannot develop in wood to which air currents have free access, hence the necessity of having air-bricks in an outside wall beneath the floor level.

Dry shave. A shave without soaping the face; to scrape the face with a piece of iron hoop; to scratch the face; to box it and bruise it.

The fellow will get a dry shave.

Peter Pindar: Great Cry and Little Wool, Ep. 1. I'll shave her, like a punished soldier, dry.

Peter Pindar: The Lousiad, canto ii.

Dry wine. Opposed to sweet or fruity wine. In sweet wine some of the sugar is not yet decomposed; in dry wine all the sugar has been converted into alcohol. In the same way we speak of a dry biscuit as opposed to a sweet biscuit.

Not dry behind the ears. As innocent as a new-born child. When young animals are born, the last place to become dry after birth is the small depression behind each ear.

Dryad (drı́'əd). In classical mythology, a tree-nymph (Gr. drı́s, a tree) who was supposed to live in the trees and die when the trees died. Eurydice, the wife of Orpheus the poet, was a dryad. Also called hamadryads (Gr. hama, with).

Dryasdust (drı́'ə dzı̂st). The name given by Scott to the fictitious "reverend Doctor," a learned pundit, to whom he addressed the prefaces, etc., of many of his novels; hence, a heavy, plodding author, very prosy, very dull, and very learned; an antiquary.

The Prussian Dryasdust, otherwise an honest fellow, and not afraid of labour, excels all other Dryasdusts yet known. . . . He writes big books wanting in almost every quality; and does not even give an Index to them.—Carlyle.

Dualism (dú̅'ə lı̂zm). A system of philosophy which refers all things that exist to two ultimate principles, such as Descartes' Thought (res cogitans) and Extension (res extensa), or—in the theological sense—good and evil. In modern philosophy it is opposed to monism (q.v.), and insists that the creator and creation, mind and body, are distinct entities.
Dub. To make a knight by striking him on the shoulder with a sword; to give the accolade. The word probably comes from the Old French aduber, to equip with arms, to invest with armour, though it has undoubtedly got mixed with the other Old French word dober, to strike.

Dub up. Pay down the money; "fork out!" Another form of dup (q.v.), do up.

Dubglas. According to the Historia Brittonum by Nennius (about A.D. 800), the second, third, fourth, and fifth of King Arthur's twelve great battles were fought on this river. Nennius places it in Linnuis (i.e. Lindsey, Lincolnshire); but, as is the case in all Arthurian topography, its probable site is matter for conjecture.

Ducat (dük' åt). A piece of money first coined in 1140 by Roger II of Sicily as Duke of the duchy (ducato) of Apulia. This was a silver coin. In 1284 the Venetians struck a gold coin with the legend Sìt tì, Christe, datus, quem tu régis, iste ducatus (may this duchy which you rule be devoted to you, O Christ), and through this the name, already in use, gained wider currency. The ducat mentioned by Shakespeare in The Merchant of Venice is the Spanish coin, valued at about 6s. 8d.

Duce (doo' châ). This title, meaning in Italian a leader, was adopted by the Fascist dictator Benito Mussolini (1883-1945) on his assumption of power in 1922. "Duce! Duce!" was the cry of the crowds stirred almost to frenzy by his impassioned oratory.

Duchess. The wife or widow of a duke; in slang use contracted to duch, and applied to the wife of a coater, as in the song "My old dutch."

Duck. A contraction of duck's egg (see below).

A lame duck. A stock-jobber or dealer who will not, or cannot, pay his losses. He has to "waddle out of the alley like a duck." "I don't like the looks of Mr. Sedley's affairs... He's been dabbling on his own account I fear... and unless I see Amelia's ten thousand down you don't marry her. I'll have no lame duck's daughter in my family."—Thackeray: Vanity Fair, ch. xiii.

Duck Lane. Duck Lane (now Duke Street, leading from Little Britain to Long Lane, in the City of London), in Queen Anne's time was famous for its second-hand bookstalls. Scotists and Thomists now in peace remain Amidst their kindred cohebws in Duck Lane.

Duck's egg. In cricket a score of 0—i.e. no score at all; the cipher on the sheet resembling an egg. To break one's duck's egg, or one's duck, is, of course, to make one run or more.

Ducks and drakes. The ricocheting or re-binding of a stone thrown from the hand to skim along the surface of a pond or river. To play ducks and drakes with one's money is to throw it away carelessly and just on amusement, or for the sake of watching it go and making a splash.

What figured slates are best to make
On watery surface duck and drake.

Like a dying duck in a thunderstorm. Quite chop-fallen, very woebegone.

Dud. Something or somebody that is useless or a failure. The word became very common in World War I, when it was applied to shells that did not explode, inefficient officers, unworkable pieces of mechanism, etc. Its origin is not known. Dud, duod means dead, but no connexion between this and did has been traced.

A dudder or dusman is a scarecrow, or man of straw dressed in cast-off garments to frighten birds; also a pedlar who deals in articles of clothing and materials.

Dude (didd). A masher. One who renders himself conspicuous by affectation of dress, manners, and speech. The word was invented in America about 1883, and soon became popular in London.

I should just as soon expect to see Mercutio smoke a cigarette, as to find him ambulating about the stage with the mincing manners of a dude.—Jefferson: Century Magazine, January, 1890.

Dude Ranch. Ranch in the Western States of America especially organized as a holiday camp for inexperienced horsemen.

Dudgeon (duj' ön). The handle of a dagger, at one time made of boxwood root, called "dudgeon-wood"; a dagger with such a handle. Shakespeare says,

I see thee still:
And on thy blade and dudgeon gouts of blood.
Which was not so before.

SHAKESPEARE: Macbeth, ii, i.

As indicating resentment or sulkiness, the word dudgeon comes from an old Welsh word, dyger, meaning malice.

Dudman and Ramhead. When Dudman and Ramhead meet. Never. Dudman and Ramhead (now spelt Ramehead) are two forelands on the Cornish coast, about twenty miles apart. See Never.

Duds. A word in use for five hundred years at least, signifying clothes of some sort; formerly coarse cloaks. but in modern use slang for any clothes, usually with a disparaging implication. Its origin is unknown.

Duenna (dû en' â). The female of the Spanish don (q.v.); strictly, the chief lady in waiting on the Queen of Spain, but, in common parlance, a woman who is half companion and half governess, in charge of the younger female members of a Spanish or Portuguese family; hence, in England, a chaperon—especially one who takes her duties very seriously.

There is no duenna so rigidly prudent and inexorably decorous as a superannuated coquette.—W. Irving: Sketch-book (Spectre Bridegroom).

Duessa (dû es' â) (Double-mind or Falsehood). In Spenser's Faerie Queene (Bk. I) the "scarlet woman," typifying the Roman Catholic Church, and (Bk. V) Mary Queen of Scots. She was the daughter of Deceit and Shame, and assumed divers disguises to beguile the Red Cross Knight.

Duffer. A stupid, foolish, incompetent person, one of slow wit; the origin of the word is not clear, but duff is old thieves' slang for "to fake," and as a counterfeit coin was called a duffer the name may have been transferred to persons who, similarly, were "no good."
Dug-out. (1) A canoe cut out of a solid tree trunk. (2) An artificial cave in war or peace. (3) A retired officer brought back into service.

Duke (Lat. dux, leader). The title belonging to the highest rank of nobility in England. The first English dukedom to be created was that bestowed by Edward III on his eldest son, the Black Prince, in 1338, when he was raised from Earl of Cornwall to Duke of Cornwall. The title is very rarely conferred; and except for royal dukes, since 1874 (Duke of Westminster) it has been conferred only on the Earl of Fife, who was created Duke of Fife on his marriage with Princess Louise (1889). On his death in 1912 his daughter, Princess Arthur of Connaught, became Duchess of Fife in her own right, by special remainder. There are four royal and twenty-six noble dukedoms.

Duke Combe. William Combe (1741-1820), author of The Tours of Dr. Syntax, etc., was so called, because of the splendour of his dress, the profusion of his table, and the magnificence of his deportment, in the days of his prosperity. Having spent all his money he turned author, but passed the last fifteen years of his life in the King's Bench Prison.

Duke Humphrey. See Humphrey.

The Duke of Exeter's daughter. A rack in the Tower of London, so called from a minister of Henry VI, who sought to introduce its use into England (1447).

The Great Duke. The Duke of Wellington (1769-1852), also called “the Iron Duke,” a name later given to a famous battleship (1913).

To meet one in the Duke's Walk. To fight a duel. Duke’s Walk, near Holroyd Palace, was the favourite promenade of the Duke of York, afterwards James II, during his residence in Scotland; and it became the common rendezvous for settling “affairs of honour,” as the fields behind the present British Museum were in England.

Dukeries. A district in Nottinghamshire, so called from the number of noble residences in the vicinity, including Welbeck Abbey Duke of Portland, Clumber (Duke of Newcastle), Thoresby (Earl Manvers), etc.

Dulcarnon (dul’ karg’ n’). The horns of a limella (or Syllogismum cornutum); at my vis’ end; a puzzling question. From an Arabic word meaning “the possessor of two horns.” The 47th proposition of the First Book of Euclid is called the Dulcarnon, as the 5th is the Pons Asinorum, because the two squares which contain the right angle roughly represent horns. Chaucer uses the words in Troilus and Criseyde. Bk. iii, 931, 933.

To be in Dulcarnon. To be in a quandary, or in the horns of a dilemma.

To send me to Dulcarnon. To daze with puzzles.

Dulce Domum (dul’ si dö’ müm). A school holiday song: the words mean—not, as often supposed, “sweet home,” but—“the sweet sound of the word) 'home.'” The song originated at Winchester, and is said to have been written by a boy who was confined for misconduct during the Whitsun holidays, “as report says, tied to a pillar.” On the evening preceding the Whitsun holidays, the master, scholars, and choristers still walk in procession round the pillar, chanting the six stanzas of the song. The music is by John Reading (d. 1692), organist of Winchester Cathedral, who also composed the Adeste Fideles (q.v.).

Dulce domum resonemus. Let us make the sweet song of home to resound.

Dulce est desipere in loco (dul’ si et de eri in lò’ kò). It is delightful to play the fool occasionally; it is nice to throw aside one's dignity and relax at the proper time (Horace: 4 Odes, xii, 28).

Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori. (dul’ si et de kor’ um est prò pát’ ri à mór’ i). It is sweet and becoming to die for one's country (Horace: 3 Odes, ii, 13).

Dulcimer (dul’ si mer). In Dan. iii, 5, etc., this word is used to translate a Hebrew word rendered in Greek by symphonia, which was applied to a kind of bagpipe. In modern use a dulcimer is a hollow triangular box strung with wires of varying lengths, which are struck with a little rod held in each hand.

Dulcinea (dul sin’ é á). A lady-love. Taken from the name of the lady to whom Don Quixote paid his knightly homage. Her real name was Aldonza Lorenzo, but the knight dubbed her Dulcinea del Toboso.

Sanché Panza says she was “a stout-built sturdy wench, who could pitch the bar as well as any young fellow in the parish.”

Dulcinists (dul’ si nists). Heretics who followed the teaching of Dulcin or Dolcinus, who taught that God reigned from the beginning to the coming of Messiah; and that Christ reigned from his ascension to the 14th century, when he gave up his dominion to the Holy Ghost. Dulcin was burnt by order of Clement IV (1307). There is a reference to Dulcin in Dante's Inferno (xxviii, 55).

Dulia. See Latria.

"God save king Cibber!" mounts in every note. . . .

So when Jove's block descended from on high

Loud thunder to the bottom shook the bog,

And the hoarse nation croaked, "God save king Log."

POPE: Dunciad, Bk. i.

Dum-dum. A half-covered steel-cased bullet which expands on impact and so produces a very terrible wound. So called from Dum-dum, near Calcutta, the former headquarters of the Bengal artillery and of the ammunition factory where they were first made. A similar effect is produced by filing flat the steel cap of an ordinary bullet. The use of dum-dum bullets is prohibited in warfare by practically every civilized nation.

Dum sola (Law Lat.). While single or unmarried.

Dum vivimus vivamus (dum vi vi’ müs vi vá’ müs) (Lat.). While we live, let us enjoy life. The motto adopted by Dr. Doddridge (1702-
Dumb-bell, originally, an apparatus for developing the muscles, similar to that which sets church bells in motion. It consisted of a flywheel with a weight attached, which the gymnast had to raise. The present dumb-bell, which answers a similar purpose, has been given the same name.

The dumb-bell Nebula. Nebula in the constellation Vulpecula, so called from its apparent shape.

Dumb barge. The name given to a barge without sails, generally used as a pier or wharf.

Dumb crambo. See Crambo.

Dumb Ox, The. St. Thomas Aquinas (1224-74), known afterwards as "the Angelic Doctor," or "Angel of the Schools." Albertus Magnus, his tutor, said of him: "The dumb ox will one day fill the world with his lowing."

Dumb waiter. A piece of dining-room furniture, fitted with shelves, to hold glasses, dishes, and plate. So called because it answers all the purposes of a waiter, and is not possessed of a tongue.

Dun. One who importunes for payment of a bill. The tradition is that it refers to Joe Dun, a bailiff of Lincoln in the reign of Henry VII. The British Apollo (1708) said he was so active and dexterous in collecting bad debts that when anyone became "slow to pay" the neighbours used to say to the creditors, "Dun him" (send Dun after him).

An Universite dunne . . . is an inferior creditor of some ten shillings or downwards, contracted for horse hire, or perchance drink, too weak to be put in suite.—Earle: Microcosemographia (1628).

Squire Dun. The hangman between Richard Brandin and Jack Ketch.

And presently a halter got.

Made of the best strong hempen teer;

And, ere a cat could lick her ear,

Had tied him up with as much art

As Dunn himself could do for: 's heart.

Cotton: Virgil Travestied, Bk. iv.

Dun Cow. The savage beast slain by Guy of Warwick (q.v.). A huge tusk, probably that of an elephant, is still shown at Harwich Castle as one of the horns of the dun cow.

The fable is that it belonged to a giant, and was kept on Mitchell (Middle) Fold, Shropshire. Its milk was inexhaustible; but one day an old woman who had filled her pail, wanted to fill her sieve also. This so enraged the cow that she broke loose from the fold and wandered to Dunsmore heath, where she was slain.

The Book of the Dun Cow. A twelfth-century Irish manuscript, Lebor na h-Uidre, compiled in part by Moelmuire Mac Celcchair, who was slain in 1106. It derives its name from a legend that Ciaran of Clonmacnois took down the things are at a standstill. The log is made to roll, to throw quantities of goods on a foreign market, usually at a loss.

The noun, a dump, besides meaning a refuse heap, is more generally applied to a military or other deposit of supplies for storage, or waiting for future use.

The word is also used for various "dumpy" objects of little value, such as leaden disks, and small coins such as one that was current in Australia in the early 19th century and was made by cutting a portion out of a Spanish dollar. Hence, not worth a dump. The word is probably a back formation from dump, short and thick.

Dumps. To be in or down in the dumps. Out of spirits; Gay's Third Pastoral is Wednesday, or the Dumps.

Why, how now, daughter Katharine? In your dumps?—Taming of the Shrew, ii. 1.

In Elizabethan times the name was given to any plaintive tune, and also to a slow and mournful sort of dance.

They would have handled me a new way;

The devil's dump had been danced then.

Beaumont and Fletcher: The Pilgrim, v. 4.

Dunce. A dolt; a stupid person. The word is taken from Dun Scotus (about 1265-1308), so called from his birthplace, Dunse, in Scotland, the learned schoolman. His followers were called Dunsers or Scotists (q.v.). Tyndal says, when they saw that their hair-splitting divinity was giving way to modern theology, "the old barking curs raged in every pulpit" against the classics and new notions, so that the name indicated an opponent to progress, to learning, and hence a dunce.

He knew what's what, and that's as high

As metaphysic wit can fly . . . .

A second Thomas, or at once

To name them all, another Dunse.

Butler: Hudibras, i. 1.
Duns Scotus was buried at Cologne; his epitaph reads:—
Scota me genuit, Anglia me suscepit,
Gallia me docuit, Colonia me tenet.

The Parliament of Dunces. Convened by Henry IV at Coventry in 1404, and so called because all lawyers were excluded from it. Also known as the Lawless, and Unlearned, Parliament.

Dunciad. The dunci-epic, a satire by Alexander Pope, first published in 1728 with Theobald setting as the Poet Laureate of the realm of Dullness, but republished with an added fourth part in 1741 with Colley Cibber in that rôle. Pope makes use of his mock epic to pillory many of the writers of his time—writers who would now be forgotten were it not for his scathing gibes and denunciations.

Dunderhead. A blockhead, or, rather, a middle-headed person. The history of the word is obscure: dunder may be connected with the Scottish donnered, or merely be modelled on blunder. It appears in early-17th-century works.

Dundreary, Lord. The impersonation of a good-natured, indolent, blundering, empty-headed swell, from the chief character in Tom Taylor's Our American Cousin (1858). E. A. Sothern created the character by the genius of his acting and the large additions he made to the original text. The theatrical make-up for the part included a long of silk, pink whiskers, which set a fashion among the young men about Town.

Dunedin. See EDINBURGH.

Dungarees (dūng' gā rēz). This comes from a Hindustani word, dungri, meaning a kind of coarse cotton cloth. It is applied to an overall suit of coarse (usually blue) cloth.

Dunghill! Coward! Villain! This is a cockpit phrase: all cocks, except gamecocks, being called dunghills.

Out, dunghill! dar'st thou brave a nobleman? King John, iv, 3.

That is, Dare you, a dunghill cock, brave a thoroughbred gamecock?

Every cock crows on its own dunghill. See COCK.

Dunheved Castle. See CASTLE TERABIL.

Dunk, To. (U.S.A.). To dip bread, toast, or doughnuts in one's coffee.

Dunkers. See TUNKERS.

Dunmow (dūn' mō). To eat Dunmow bacon. 'To live in conjugal amity, without even wishing the marriage knot to be less firmly tied. The illusion is to a custom said to have been instituted by Juga, a noble lady, in 1111, and restored by Robert de Fitzwalter in 1244; which was, that any person from any part of England going to Dunmow, in Essex, and humbly kneeling on two stones at the church door, may claim a gammon of bacon, if he can swear that for twelve months and a day he has ever had a household brawl or wished himself unmarried.

Between 1244 and 1772 eight claimants were admitted to eat the flitch. Their names merit immortality:

1445. Richard Wright, labourer, Bauburgh, near Norwich.
1467. Steven Samuel, of Little Ayton, Essex.
1510. Thomas Ley, fuller, Coggeshall, Essex.
1751. Thomas Shakeshaft, woolcomber, Weathersfield, Essex.
1763. Names not recorded.

Allusions to the custom are very frequent in 17th- and 18th-century literature; and in the last years of the 19th century it was revived. A travesty of the old ceremony.

Dunscore. The saut lairds o' Dunscore. Gentlefolk who have a name but no money. The tale is that the “puir wee lairds of Dunscore” (a parish near Dumfries) clubbed together to buy a stone of salt, which was doled out to the subscribers in small spoonfuls, that no one should get more than his due quota.

Duns Scotus. See DUNCE.

Dunstable (dūn' stāb). Bailey, as if he actually believed it, gives the etymology of this word Dun's stable; adding Duns or “Dunus was a robber in the reign of Henry I, who made it dangerous for travellers to pass that way.” It is Celtic dun, a hill-fortress, and staple, an emporium or market (from late Lat. or O.Fr.).

Downright Dunstable. Very blunt, plain speaking, straightforward; like the Dunstable road (a part of the Roman Watling Street), which runs very evenly from London and has many long, straight stretches. Hence also the phrase Plain as the road to Dunstable. As Shakespeare says, “Plain as way to parish church.”

Dunstan, St. (d. 988). Archbishop of Canterbury (961), and patron saint of goldsmiths, being himself a noted worker in gold. He is represented in pontifical robes, and carrying a pair of pincers in his right hand, the latter referring to the legend that on one occasion at Glastonbury (his birthplace) he seized the devil by the nose with a pair of red-hot tongs and refused to release him till he promised never to tempt him again. See also HORSESHOES.

The name St. Dunstan's is now intimately associated with work for the blind, on account of the institution founded during World War I, and for many years run by Sir Arthur Pearson (himself blind), at St. Dunstan's House, Regent's Park, for the welfare and training of blinded soldiers and later of blind civilians.

Dunsterforce. The name given to the men sent to Baku in 1918 under the command of Maj.-Gen. L. C. Dunsterville (1865-1946), who had been a schoolfellow of Rudyard Kipling and the hero of Stalky & Co. The purpose of this expedition was to prevent the Turks and Germans reaching Baku and its oil wells. Dunsterforce held the town successfully and prevented the enemy from reaching the Caspian Sea, the whole affair making a very gallant adventure.
Duodecimo (dū'ō des'° i mô'). A book whose sheets are folded into twelve leaves each (Lat. duodecim, twelve), often called "twelvemo," from the contraction 12mo. The book is naturally a small one, hence the expression is sometimes applied to other things of small size, such as a dwarf. Cp. DECIMO-SEXTIO.

Dup is do up. Thus Ophelia says in one of her snatches, he "dipped the chamber door," i.e. did up or pushed up the latch, in order to open the door, that he might "let in the maid" (Hamlet, iv, 1).

"I he weene the porters are drunk. Will they not dup the gate to-day."—EDWARDS: Damon and Pythias (1571).

Dupes, Day of the. In French history, November 11th, 1630, when Marie de' Medics and Gaston, Duc d'Orleans extorted from Louis XIII a promise that he would dismiss his Minister, the Cardinal Richelieu. The cardinal went in all speed to Versailles, the king repented, and Richelieu became more powerful than ever. Marie de' Medics and Gaston, the "dupes," had to pay dearly for their short triumph.

Duration. In World Wars I and II the engagement of men called to the colours in Britain was "for the duration of the emergency," which meant that their services could be retained until the King signed an Order declaring the state of emergency to be at an end. Hence the phrase became synonymous with "a long time," or a time in the far distant future.

Durbar (dér' bar). The word comes from the Persian der, a door, and bar, admittance, and is properly used in India for the court, council, or council-chamber of a native ruler. It is also used for an official reception on a large scale, or for a state ceremony such as the magnificent durbar for the proclamation of George V as Emperor of India, in 1911.

Darden, Dame. A generic term for a good, old-fashioned housewife. In the old song she kept five serving girls to carry the milking pails, and five serving men to use the spade and flail: of course the five men loved the five maids. 'Twas Moll and Bet, and Doll and Kate, and Dorothy Draggtail; And John and Dick, and Joe and Jack, and Humphrey with his flail.

Dust. Slang for money; probably in allusion to the moralist's contention that money is worthless.

Down with the dust! Out with the money; dub up! The expression is at least three hundred years old, and it is said that Swift once took for the text of a charity sermon, "He who giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord." Having thrice repeated his text, he added: "Now, brethren, if you like the security, down with your dust." That ended his sermon!

I'll dust your jacket for you. Give you a good beating; also used with doublet, trousers, etc., in place of jacket. See quotation from Smollett, under DOUSE IN THE CHOPS.

To bite the dust. See BITE.

To kiss or lick the dust. See Kiss.

To raise a dust, to kick up a dust. To make a commotion or disturbance.

To shake the dust from one's feet. To show extreme dislike of a place, and to leave it with the firm intention of never returning. The allusion is to the Eastern custom. And whosoever shall not receive you or hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet.—Matt. x, 14.

But the Jews... raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas, and expelled them out of their coasts. But they shook off the dust of their feet against them, and came unto Iconium.—Acts xiii, 50, 51.

To throw dust in one's eyes. To mislead. The allusion is to "the swiftest runner in a sandy race, who to make his fellows follow aloof, casteth dust with his heels into their envious eyes" (Cotgrave, 1611).

The Mohammedans had a practice of casting dust into the air for the sake of confounding the enemies of the faith. This was done by the Prophet on two or three occasions, as in the battle of Honein; and the Koran refers to it when it says: "Neither didst thou, O Mahomet, cast dust into their eyes; but it was God who confounded them."

The dustman has arrived. or "The sandman is about." It is bedtime, for the children rub their eyes, as if dust or sand was in them.

Well, it is none so dusty, or Not so dusty. I don't call it bad; rather smart. Here dusty means mean, soiled, worthless.

Dustfoot. See PEPPOWDER COURT.

Dutch. The word, properly meaning "Hol­landish," is the M.Dut. Deutsch or Ger. Deutsch, and formerly denoted the people of Germany or Teutons generally. The Pennsylvania Dutch, for example, were originally German immigrants. In colloquial English use the adjective has a belittling or derisive application, sometimes meaning little more than "foreign" or "un-English," and sometimes with reference to the drinking habits of the 17th-century Dutchman. See DUTCH COURAGE, CONCERT, GOLD, etc., below.

Dutch auction. An auction in which the auctioneer offers the goods at gradually decreasing prices, the first bidder to accept being the purchaser; the reverse process to that of an ordinary auction. Anyone can sell by Dutch auction, whereas an ordinary auction can be conducted only by a duly licensed auctioneer.

Dutch comfort. 'Tis a comfort it was no worse. The comfort derivable from the consideration that how bad soever the evil which has befallen you, a worse is at least conceivable.

Dutch concert. A great noise and uproar, like that made by a party of intoxicated Dutchmen, some singing, others quarrelling, speechifying, wrangling, and so on.

Dutch courage. The courage excited by drink; pot valour.

The Dutch their wine, and all their brandy lose, Disarmed of that from which their courage grows; While the glad English, to relieve their toil, In healths to their great leader drink the spoil.

WALLER: Instructions to a Painter for a Picture of the Victory over the Dutch, June 3, 1665.
Dutch gleeck. Tippling. Gleeck (q.v.) is a game, and the phrase implies that the game loved by Dutchmen is drinking.

Nor could be partaker of any of the good cheer except it were the liquid part of it, which they call “Dutch Gleeck.”—GATTON: Pleasant Notes upon Don Quixote (1654).

Dutch gold. Deutsche or German gold. An alloy of copper and zinc, invented by Prince Rupert of Bavaria.

Dutch nightingales. Frogs. Similarly, Cambridgeshire nightingales; Liège nightingales, etc.

I will talk to you like a Dutch uncle. Will you prove to you smartly. For “uncle” cp. Horace, Od. xii. 3, “Metuentes patruae verbera linguæ” (dreading the castigations of an uncle’s tongue), and 2 Sat. iii. 88, “Ne sis patruus miliit” (“don’t come the uncle over me”).

Dutch treat. A meal, amusement, etc., at which each person pays for himself.

My old Dutch. Here the word is a contraction of dueness (q.v.), and is nothing to do with Holland or Germany.

The Dutch have taken Holland. A quiz when anyone tells what is well known as a piece of wonderful news. Similar to Queen Bee (or Queen Anne) is dead.

In Dutch. In prison.

I am a Dutchman if I do. A strong refusal. During the rivalry between England and Holland in the 17th century, the word Dutch was synonymous with all that was false and hateful, and when a man said, “I would rather be a Dutchman than do what you ask words,” he used the strongest terms of refusal that words could express.

If not, I am a Dutchman, means, I will do it, or I will call myself a Dutchman.

The Flying Dutchman. See Flying.

Well, I am a Dutchman! An exclamation of strong incredulity.

Duty means what is due or owing, a debt which should be paid. In this sense it is applied to the ax or impost charged by government on certain goods when imported from foreign countries. Obedience is the debt of citizens to rulers for protection, and service is the debt of persons employed for wages received.

Strictly considered, all duty is owed originally to God only; but...duties to God may be distributed...into duties towards self, towards mankind, and towards God.—GREGORY: Christian Ethics, i, 1.

England expects that every man will do his duty. Nelson’s signal to his fleet just before the battle of Trafalgar (1805).

Diumvirs (duc’um vérz) (Lat. duumvir, one of he two men). Certain Roman officials who were appointed in pairs, like our London sheriffs; originally, those who had charge of he Sibyl’s books. Later, duumviri were appointed as magistrates, as naval directors, directors of public works, etc.

Dwarf. Dwarfs have figured in the legends and mythology of nearly every race and, Pliny gives particulars of whole races of them, b.d.—11 possibly following travellers’ reports of African pigmies. Among the Teutonic and Scandinavian peoples dwarfs held an important place in mythology. They generally dwelt in rocks, caves, and recesses of the earth, were the guardians of its mineral wealth and precious stones, and were very skilful in the working of these. They had their own king, as a rule they were not inimical to man, but could on occasion be intensely vindictive and mischievous.

In England diminutive persons—dwarfs—were popular down to the 18th century as court favourites or household pets; and in later times they have frequently been exhibited as curiosities at circuses, etc.

Among those recorded in legend or history (with their reputed heights) the following are, perhaps, the most famous:—

ALBERICH (q.v.), the dwarf of the Nibelungenlied. ANDROMEDA and CONOPAS, each 2 ft. 4 in. Dwarfs of Julia, niece of Augustus. BENE, or Nicholas Ferry, 2 ft. 9 in. A native of France (1714-37). He had a brother and sister, both dwarfs. BORUWLASKI (Count Joseph), 3 ft. 3 in. at the age of thirty (d. 1837). BUCKINGER (Matthew), a German, born 1674. He was born without hands, legs, or feet. Facsimiles of his writings are amongst the Harleian MSS. CHE-MAH (a Chinaman), 2 ft. 1 in., weight 52 lb. Exhibited in London in 1880. COBMBR (Prince) of Sleswieg, 2 ft. 1 in., weight 25 lb. at the age of 25 (1851). CONOPAS. See ANDROMEDA above. COPPERNIN, the dwarf of the Princess of Wales, mother of George III. The last court dwarf in England. CRACHAMI (Caroline). Born at Peramo; 1 ft. 8 in. at death. (1814-24.) Exhibited in Bond Street, London, 1824. DECKER or DUCKER (John), 2 ft. 6 in. An Englishman (1610). FAIRY QUEEN (The), 1 ft. 4 in., weight 4 lb. Exhibited in Regent Street, London, 1850. Her feet were less than two inches. GIBSON (Richard), a good portrait painter (1615-90). His wife’s maiden name was Anne Shepherd. Each measured 3 ft. 10 in. Waller sang their praises:—

Design or chance makes others wise, But Nature did this match contrive.

HIDSON (Sir Jeffrey). Born at Oakham, Rutlandshire; 3 ft. 9 in. at the age of thirty (1619-78); he figures in Scott’s Peveril of the Peak. JARVIS (John), 2 ft. Page of honour to Queen Mary (1508-56). LOLIES (Wybrand), 2 ft. 3 in., weight 57 lb. Exhibited at Astley’s in 1790. LUCUS, 2 ft., weight 17 lb. The dwarf of the Emperor Augustus. MAGRI, COUNT PRIMO. See WARREN below. MARINE (Lizzie), 2 ft. 9 in., weight 45 lb. MIDGETS, THE. Lucia Zarate, the elder sister, 1 ft. 8 in., weight 45 lb. at the age of eighteen. Her sister was a little taller. Exhibited in London, 1881. MILLER (Miss), of Virginia, 2 ft. 2 in. MITE (General), 1 ft. 9 in. (weight 9 lb.) at the age of seventeen. Exhibited in London, 1881. NULT, COMMODORE. See Tom Thumb below. PAAP (Simon). A Dutch dwarf, 2 ft. 4 in., weight 27 lb. SAWYER (A. L.), 2 ft. 64 in., weight 39 lb. Editor in 1883, etc. of the Democrat, a paper of considerable repute in Florida. STOBERIN (C. H.), of Nuremberg, 2 ft. 11 in. at the age of twenty. STOCKER (Nannette), 2 ft. 9 in. Exhibited in London in 1815. STRASSE DAVID Family. Man 1 ft. 8 in.; woman, 1 ft. 6 in.; child, at age of seventeen, only 6 in. Em-balm in the chemical library of Rastadt. TEREOS (Madame), A Corso, 2 ft. 10 in., weight 27 lb. Exhibited in London 1773.
Tom Thumb (General), whose name was Charles S. Stratton, born at Bridgeport in Connecticut, U.S., (1835-83). Exhibited first in London in 1844. In 1864 he married Lavinia Warren, and was then 31 in height, she being 32 in., and 21 years old. They visited England in the following year with their dwarf son, Commodore Nutt.

Warren (Lavinia). See Tom Thumb above. In 1885 she married another dwarf, Count Primo Magni, who was 2 ft. 8 in.

Wormeg (John), 2 ft. 7 in. at the age of thirty-eight (Hanoverian period).

Xit was the dwarf of Edward VI.

Zarate. See Midgets above.

The Black Dwarf. A gnome of the most malignant character, once held by the men of the border as the author of all the mischief that befell their flocks and herds. Scott has a novel so called (1816), in which the name is given to Sir Edward Mauley, alias Elshander, the reclusie, Annie Elsieh, and the Wise Wight of Mucklestane Moor.

Dwarf Alberich. See Alberich.

Dyed in the Wool. Thorough-going, 100 per cent. (16th-century origin).

Eagle. Thy youth is renewed like the eagle’s P. cii. 5). This refers to the ancient superstition that every ten years the eagle soars into a "fiery region," and plunges thence into the sea, where, moulting its feathers, it acquires new life. Cp. PHOENIX.

She saw where he upstart brave Out of the well . . .
As eagle fresh out of the ocean wave,
Where he hath lethe his plumes all hory gray,
And decks himself with fethers youthly gray.
SPENSER: Faerie Queene, 1, xi, 34.

In Christian art the eagle is emblematic of St. John the Evangelist, St. Augustine, St. Gregory the Great and St. Prisca. Emblematically or in heraldry the eagle is a charge of great honour. It was called the Bird of Jove by the Romans, and borne on their army standards. France (under the Empires), Austria, Prussia and Russia adopted it as a royal or imperial emblem.

The American Eagle, with outspread wings—proud-eagle—is specifically the emblem of the U.S.A. It is sometimes erroneously called the Bald Eagle, though it is really the white-headed eagle of N. America, Haliaeetus leucocephalus. The U.S. coin called an eagle is good coin of the value of 10 dollars. An earlier coin known as an eagle was found in Ireland in the first years of Edward I, about 1272—again because of the bird impressed upon it.

The Golden Eagle and the Spread Eagle are commemorative of the Crusades; they were the devices of the emperors of the East, and formerly figured as the ensigns of the ancient kings of Babylon and Persia, of the Ptolemies and Seleucides.

The Romans used to let an eagle fly from the funeral pile of a deceased emperor. Dryden alludes to this custom in his stanzas on Oliver Cromwell after his funeral, when he says, "Officious haste did let too soon the sacred eagle fly."

Grand eagle. Paper, 28½ by 42 in.; so called from a watermark first met with in 1314.

The two-headed eagle. The German eagle has its head turned to our left hand, and the Roman eagle to our right hand. When Charlemagne was made "Kaiser of the Holy Roman Empire," he joined the two heads together, one looking east and the other west; consequently, the late Austrian Empire, as the direct successor of the Holy Roman Empire, included the Double-headed Eagle in its coat of arms.

In Russia it was Ivan Vasilievitch who first assumed the two-headed eagle, when, in 1472, he married Sophia, daughter of Thomas Palæologus, and niece of Constantine XIV, the last Emperor of Byzantium. The two heads symbolize the Eastern or Byzantine Empire and the Western or Roman Empire.

The eagle doesn't hawk at flies. See AQUILA.

The Eagle. Gaudenzio Ferrari (1481-1549), the Milanese painter.

The Eagle of the doctors of France. Pierre d'Ailly (1350-1420), French cardinal and astrologer, who calculated the horoscope of Our Lord, and maintained that the stars foretold the deluge.

The Eagle of Brittany. Bertrand Duguesclin (1320-80), Constable of France.

The Eagle of Divines. St. Thomas Aquinas (1225-74).

The Eagle of Meaux. Jacques Bénigne Bossuet (1627-1704), Bishop of Meaux, the grandest and most sublime of the pulpits orators of France.

The Eagle of the North. Count Axel Oxenstierna (1583-1654), the Swedish statesman.

Eagle-stones. See AETITES.

Ear (A.S. eare). If your ears burn someone is talking about you. This is a very old superstition; Pliny says, "When our ears do glow and tingle, some do talk of us in our absence."

In Much Ado About Nothing (iii, 1), Beatrice says when Ursula and Hero had been talking of her, "What fire is in mine ears?" Sir Thomas Browne ascribes the conceit to guardian angels, who touch the right ear if the talk is favourable and the left if otherwise. This is done to cheer or warn.

One ear tingles; some there be
That are snarling now at me.
HERRICK: Hesperides.
About one's ears. Causing trouble. The allusion is to a hornet's nest buzzing about one's head; thus, to bring the house about one's ears is to set the whole family against him.

Bow down thine ear. Condescend to hear or listen (Ps. xxxi, 2).

By ear. To sing or play by ear means to sing or play without reading the musical notes, depending on the ear only.

Dionysius's Ear. A bell-shaped chamber connected by an underground passage with the king's palace. Its object was to enable the tyrant of Syracuse to overhear what was passing in the prison.

A similar remarkable whispering gallery is to be found cut from the solid rock beneath Hastings Castle, where pre-Roman gaolers could listen to prisoners talking—the listening post is again shaped like an ear.

Give ear to. Listen to; give attention to.

I am all ear. All attention.

... and took in strains that might create a soul

Under the ribs of death.

Milton: Comus, 574.

I'll send you off with a flea in your ear. See Flea.

In at one ear, and out of the other. Forgotten as soon as heard.

... the sermon ... of Dame Resoun ...

It toke no sojour in myn hede.

For alle yede out at oon er

That in at that other she did lee.

Romaunt of the Rose, 5148 (c. 1400).

Lend me your ears. Pay attention to what I am about to say.

Friends, Romans, countrymen, lend me your ears;

I come to bury Caesar, not to praise him.

Julius Cæsar, iii, 2.

Little pitchers have large ears. See Pitcher.

Mine ears hast thou bored. Thou hast accepted me as thy bond-sla[v]e for life. If a Hebrew servant declined to go free after six years' service, the master was to bore his ear with an awl, in token of his voluntary servitude for life (Exod. xxv, 6).

No ear. A bad ear for music; "ear-blind" or "sound-blind."

Over head and ears. Wholly, desperately; said of being in love, debt, trouble, etc.

To be willing to give one's ears. To be prepared to make a considerable sacrifice. The allusion is to the old practice of cutting off the ears of those who refused to disown offensive opinions.

To come to the ears of. To come to someone's knowledge, especially by hearsay.

To get the wrong sow by the ear. See Sow.

To fall together by the ears. See Fall.

To have itching ears. To enjoy scandal-mongering, hearing news or current gossip. (2 Tim. iv, 3.)

To prick up one's ears. To listen attentively to something not expected, as horses prick up their ears at a sudden sound.

Like unbacked colts, they pricked their ears. Shakespeare: Tempest, iv, 1.

To set people together by the ears. To create ill-will among them; to set them quarrelling and, metaphorically, pulling each other's ears, as dogs do when fighting.

When civil dudgeon first grew high, And men fell out, they knew not why; When hard words, jealousies, and fears, Set folks together by the ears. Butler: Hudibras (opening lines).

To tickle the ears. To gratify the ear either by pleasing sounds or flattering words.

To turn a deaf ear. To refuse to listen; to refuse to accede to a request.

Walls have ears. See Wall.

Within earshot. Within hearing.

You cannot make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. See Silk.

Ear-finger. The little finger, which is thrust into the ear if anything tickles it.

Ear-marked. Marked so as to be recognized; figuratively, marked or set aside for some special purpose. The allusion is to setting owner's marks on the cars of cattle and sheep.

The late president [Balmaceda] took on board a large quantity of silver, which had been ear-marked for a particular purpose.—Newspaper paragraph, Sept. 4, 1891.

Ears to Ear Bible, The. See Bible, especially named.

Earing. Ploughing. (A.S. eorian, to plough; cp. Lat. arari.)

And yet there are five years, in the which there shall neither be earing nor harvest.—Gen. xiv, 6.

If the first heir of my invention prove deformed, I shall be sorry it had so noble a godfather, and never after ear so barren a land, for fear it yield me still so bad a harvest.—Shakespeare: Dedication to "Venus and Adonis."

Earl (A.S. eorl, a man of position, in opposition to ceorl, a churl or freeman of the lowest rank; cp. Dan. jarl). The third in dignity in the British peerage, ranking next below Marquess (q.v.). In Anglo-Saxon times, it was a title of the highest dignity and eminence, and was even applied to sovereign princes. Earl Godwin was a ruler of enormous power, as also were the earls created by the Norman kings. Cp. Viscount. William the Conqueror, tried to introduce the word Count, but did not succeed, although the wife of an earl is still called a countess.

An earl's coronet has eight silver balls mounted on gold rays which reach to the top of the cap, with small strawberry leaves alternating between them.

The sheriff is called in Latin vice-comés, as being the deputy of the earl or comte, to whom the custody of the shire is said to have been committed.—Blackstone: Commentaries, i, ix.

Earl Marshal. A high officer of state who presides over the College of Arms, grants armorial bearings, and is responsible for the arrangement of State ceremonials, processions, etc. Since 1483 the office has been hereditary in the line of the Dukes of Norfolk.

Earl of Mar's Grey Breeks. The 21st Foot (the Royal Scots Fusiliers) are so called because they wore grey breeches when the Earl of Mar was their colonel (1678-86).
Earthquakes. According to Indian mythology, the world rests on the head of a great elephant, "Muha-pudma," and when, for the sake of rest, the huge monster refreshes itself by moving its head, an earthquake is produced. The lamas say that the earth is placed on the back of a gigantic frog, and when the frog stretches its limbs or moves its head, it shakes the earth. Other Eastern mythologists place the earth on the back of a tortoise.

Greek and Roman mythologists ascribe earthquakes to the restlessness of the giants whichunker buried under high mountains. Thus Virgil (Aeneid, iii, 578) ascribes the eruption of Etna to the giant Enceladus.

Earwig. A.S. ear-wicga, ear-beetle; so called from the erroneous notion that these insects are apt to get into our ears, and so penetrate the brain.

Metaphorically, one who whispers all the news and scandal, in order to curry favour; a flatterer.

Court earwigs banish from your ears. Political ballads (1688).

Ease. From O.Fr. eise, Mod.Fr. aise.

At ease. Without pain or anxiety.

Chapel of ease. See chapel.

Ease her! An order given on a small steamer to reduce speed. The next order, is generally "Back her!" and then "Stop her!"

Ill at ease. Uneasy, not comfortable, anxious.

Stand at ease! An infantry drill command for a position less rigid than attention, with the feet apart and hands joined behind the back. It is intermediate between attention and stand easy, in which complete freedom (short of moving away) is allowable.

To ease one of his money or purse. To steal it.

East. The custom of turning to the east when the creed is repeated is to express the belief that Christ is the Dayspring and Sun of Righteousness. The altar is placed at the east end of the church to remind us of Christ, the Dayspring and Resurrection; and persons are buried with their feet to the East to signify that they died in the hope of the Resurrection.

The ancient Greeks always buried their dead with the face upwards, looking towards heaven; and the feet turned to the east or the rising sun, to indicate that the deceased was on his way to Elysium, and not to the region of night. Diogenes Laertius: Life of Solon, in Greek.)

East is East and West is West. A phrase from Rudyard Kipling emphasizing the divergence of views on ethics and life in general between the Oriental and Western races—a dichotomy that appears to admit of no compromise.

Oh, East is East, and West is West and never the twain shall meet; till Earth and Sky stand presently at God's great Judgment Seat;

But there is neither East nor West, Border, nor Breed no' birth,

When two strong men stand face to face, though they come from the ends of the Earth.

The Ballad of East and West.

Near East, Turkey, Syria, Palestine, Asia Minor, etc.

East-ender. See under End.

He came safe from the East Indies, and was drowned in the Thames. He encountered many dangers of great magnitude, but was at last killed where he thought himself secure.

To send to the East Indies for Kentish pippins. To go round about to accomplish a very simple thing. To crush a fly on a wheel.

Eastern Shore, The. Maryland between the Atlantic Ocean and Delaware Bay.

Easter. The name was adopted for the Christian Paschal festival from A.S. eastre, a heathen festival held at the vernal equinox in honour of the Teutonic goddess of dawn, called by her English (cognate with Lat. aurora and Sanskrit ushas, dawn). On the introduction of Christianity it was natural for the name of the heathen festival to be transferred to the Christian, the two falling about the same time.

Easter Sunday is the first Sunday after the Paschal full moon, i.e. the full moon that occurs on the day of the vernal equinox (March 21st) or on any of the next 28 days. Consequently, Easter Sunday cannot be earlier than March 22nd, or later than April 25th. This was fixed by the Council of Nicaea, A.D. 325.

It was formerly a common belief that the sun danced on Easter Day.

SIR JOHN SUCKLING: Ballad upon a wedding.

Sir Thomas Browne combats the superstition:

We shall not, I hope, disparage the resurrection of our Redeemer, if we say the sun doth not dance on Easter day. And though we would willingly assent unto any sympathetical exultation, yet cannot conceive therein any more than a tropical expression. Pseudodoxia Epidemica, V, xxii.

Easter eggs, or Pasch eggs, are symbolical of creation, or the re-creation of spring. The practice of presenting them at Easter came into England from Germany in the 19th century. It probably derives from the old ecclesiastical prohibition of eating eggs during Lent, but allowing them again at Easter. In modern times the Germans have favoured the rabbit as an Easter symbol.

Bless, Lord, we beseech thee, this Thy creature of eggs, that it may become a wholesome sustenance to Thy faithful servants, eating it in thankfulness to Thee, on account of the resurrection of our Lord.—Pope Paul V: Ritual.

Easterlings. An old name (first used in the 16th century) for any foreigner coming to England from the East; but specially applied to the merchants from the Hanse towns of northern Germany.

Eat. To eat together was, in the East, a sure pledge of protection. A man once prostrated himself before a Persian grandee and implored protection from the rabble. The nobleman gave him the remainder of a peach which he was eating, and when the incensed multitude arrived, and declared that the man had slain the only son of the nobleman, the heart-broken father replied, "We have eaten together; go in peace," and would not allow the murderer to be punished.

Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. Is. xxii, 13. A traditional saying of the Egyptians who, at their banquets, exhibited a skeleton to the guests to remind them of the brevity of human life.

To eat a man's salt. See SALT.

To eat coke, humble pie, the leek. See these words.

To eat dog. An Indian custom at councils of importance. Later when white men took exception, they were permitted to avoid offence by placing a silver dollar on the dish and passing it: the next man took the dollar and ate the dog. Hence the expression in American politics to eat dog for another.

To eat its head off. Said of an animal (usually a horse) that eats more than he is worth, or whose work does not pay for the cost of keeping.

To eat one out of house and home. To eat so much that one will have to part with house and home in order to pay for it. It is the complaint of hostess Quickly to the Lord Chief Justice when he asks for "what sum" she had arrested Sir John Falstaff. She explains the phrase by "he hath put all my substance into that fat belly of his." (2 Henry IV, ii, 1.)

To eat one's heart out. To fret or worry unreasonably; to allow grief or vexation to predominate over the mind, tincture all one's ideas, and absorb all other emotions.

To eat one's terms. To be studying for the bar. Students are required to dine in the Hall of an Inn of Court at least three times in each of the twelve terms before they are "called" to the bar.

To eat one's words. To retract in a humiliating manner; to unsay what you have said.

To eat well. To have a good appetite. But "It eats well" means that what is eaten is agreeable or flavorful. To "eat badly" is to eat without appetite or too little.

Eau de Cologne. A perfumed spirit, originally prepared at Cologne. It was invented by an Italian chemist, Johann Maria Farina, who settled in Cologne in 1709. The usual recipe prescribes twelve drops of each of the essential oils, Bergamot, citron, neroli, orange, and rosemary, with one dram of Malabar cardomoms and a gallon of rectified spirits, which are distilled together.

Eau de vie (ö de vê) (Fr., water of life). Brandy. A translation of the Latin aqua vitae (q.v.). This is a curious perversion of the Spanish agua di vite (water or juice of the vine), rendered by the monks into aqua vitae instead of aqua vitæ, and confounding the juice of the grape with the alchemists' elixir of life. The same error is perpetuated in the Italian acqua vitæ.

Eavesdropper. One who listens stealthily to conversation. The eavesdrop or eavesdrip was the space of ground liable to receive the water dripping from the eaves of a house. An eavesdropper is one who places himself in the eaves-drip to overhear what is said in the house.

Under our tents I'll play the eavesdropper, To hear if any mean to shrink from me. Richard III, v, 3.

Ebonites (eb' i on itz). An heretical sect of the 1st and 2nd centuries, who denied the Divinity of Jesus Christ and his birth of a Virgin, and held that he was merely an inspired messenger. The name is from Heb. ebyon, poor, probably in allusion to some claim that they were "the poor in spirit."

Eblis (eb' lis). A jinn of Arabian mythology, the ruler of the evil genii, or fallen angels. Before his fall he was called Azazel (q.v.). When Adam was created, God commanded all the angels to worship him; but Eblis replied, "Me thou hast created of smokeless fire, and shall I reverence a creature made of dust?" God turned the disobedient angel into a Sheytan (devil), and he became the father of devils.

When he said unto the angels, "Worship Adam," all worshipped him except Eblis.—Al Koran, ii.

Ebony. God's image done in ebony. Negroes. Thomas Fuller gave birth to this expression.

Ecce homo (ek' si hô' mò) (Lat., Behold the man). The name given to many paintings of Our Lord crowned with thorns and bound with ropes, as He was shown to the people by Pilate, who said to them, "Ecce homo!" (John xix, 5), notably those by Correggio, Titian, Guido Reni, Van Dyck, Rembrandt, Poussin, and Albrecht Dürer. In 1865 Sir John Seeley published a survey of the life and work of Christ with the title "Ecce Homo."

Ecce signum (ek' si sig' nûm). See it, in proof. Behold the proof.

I am eight times thrust through the double, four through the horse; my buckler cut through and through; my sword hacked like a handsaw—ecce signum!—1 Henry IV, ii, 4.

Eccentric. Deviating from the centre (Lat. ex centrum); hence irregular, not according to rule. Originally applied to those planets which apparently wander round the earth, like comets, the earth not being in the centre of their orbit.

In geometry the term is applied to two circles, one within the other, with different centres; in mechanics it is a wheel with its axle not coaxial with the exact centre of the wheel.

In general speech eccentric means out of the ordinary, odd, unconventional, abnormal, and an eccentric is a person with these characteristics.

Ecclesiastes (e klê' si ás' têz). One of the books in the Old Testament, arranged next to Proverbs, formerly ascribed to Solomon, because it says (verse 1), "The words of the Preacher, the son of David, king in Jerusalem," but now generally assigned to an unnamed author of the 3rd century B.C., writing after Malachi but before the time of the Maccabees. The Hebrew name is Koheleth, which means "the Preacher."

Ecclesiasticius. One of the books of the Old Testament Apocrypha, traditionally (and probably correctly) ascribed to a Palestinian sage named Ben Sirah, or Jesus, the Son of Sirach. In the Talmud it is quoted as Ben Sira, and in the Septuagint its name is "The Wisdom of Jedid the Son of Sirach." It was probably written early in the 2nd century B.C. It was given its present name by early Greek Christians because, in their opinion, it was the chief of the apocryphal books, designated by them "Ecclesiastici Libri" (books to be read in churches), to distinguish them from the canonical Scriptures.

Echidna (e kid' nä). A monster of classical mythology, half woman, half serpent. She was mother of the Chimera, the many-headed dog Orthos, the hundred-headed dragon of the Hesperides, the Colchian dragon, the Sphinx, Cerberos, Scylla, the Gorgons, the Lernaean hydra, the vulture that gnawed away the liver of Prometheus, and the Nemean lion.

Spenser makes her the mother of the Blant Beast (q.v.).

Echidna is a Monster direfull dreed,
Whom Gods doe hate, and heavens abhor to see;
So hideous is her shape, so huge her hed,
That even the helish fiends affrighted bee.
At sight thereof, and from her presence flee:
Yet did her face and former parts profess
A faire young Mayden full of comely glee;
But all her hinder parts did plaine express
A monstreous Dragon, full of fearefull ugliness.
Faerie Queene, VI, vi, 10.

In zoology an echidna is a porcupine ant-eater found in Australia and New Guinea, allied to the platypus.

Echidna (ek' ō). The Romans say that Echo was a nymph in love with Narcissus, but her love not being returned, she pined away till only her voice remained.

Sweet Echo, sweetest nymph, that liv'st unseen
Within thy airy shell,
By slow Meander's margent green...
Canst thou not tell me of a gentle pair
That likest thy Narcissus are?
Millton: Comus, 230.

To applaud to the echo. To applaud vigorously—so loudly as to produce an echo.

Eckhardt (ek' hart). A faithful Eckhardt, who warneth everyone. Eckhardt, in German legends, appears on the evening of Maundy Thursday to warn all persons to go home, that they may not be injured by the headless bodies and two-legged horses which traverse the streets on that night.

Eclectics (ek lek'tiks). The name given to those who do not attach themselves to any special school (especially philosophers and painters), but pick and choose from various systems, selecting and harmonizing those doctrines, methods, etc., which suit them (Gr. ek-legein, to choose, select). Certain Greek philosophers of the 1st and 2nd centuries B.C. were styled Eclectics; and there is the Eclectic school of the Italians of the 17th century who followed the great masters.

Eclipse, one of the most famous of English race-horses. The great-grandson of Darley Arabian (q.v.) he was foaled April 1st, 1764, ran his first race May 3rd, 1769, and from then until October, 1770, ran in eighteen races, never being beaten. His skeleton is preserved in the Royal Veterinary College, London. The Eclipse Stakes is a race for horses of three years and upwards, run at Sandown Park. It was inaugurated in 1884.

Eclipses were considered by the ancient Greeks and Romans as bad omens. Nicias, the Athenian general, was so terrified by an eclipse of the moon, that he durst not defend himself from the Syracusans; in consequence of which his whole army was cut to pieces, and he himself was put to death.

The Romans would never hold a public assembly during an eclipse. Some of their poets feign that an eclipse of the moon is because she is on a visit to Endymion.

A very general notion was and still is common among backward races that the sun or moon has been devoured by some monster and hence the custom of beating drums and kettles to scare away the monster. The Chinese, Laps, Persians, and some others call the evil beast a dragon. The East Indians say it is a black griffin.

The notion of the ancient Mexicans was that eclipses were caused by sun and moon quarrels.

Ecliptic (e klip' tik). The track in the heavens along which the sun appears to perform its annual march. It lies in the middle of the Zodiac (q.v.) and is, of course, a purely imaginary line produced by the earth's motion about the sun.

Eclogue (Gr., a selection). The word was originally used for Virgil's Bucolics, because they were selected poems; as their were all pastoral dialogues it came to denote such poems, and hence an Eclogue is now a pastoral or rustic dialogue in verse.

Economy. Literally, "household management" (Lat. economia, from Gr. oikos, house nemein, to deal out).

There are many British proverbs and sayings teaching the value of economy:

"No alchemy like frugality"; "ever save, ever have"; "a pin a day is a groat a year"; "take care of the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves"; "many a mickle makes a muckle"; "frae saving, comes having"; "a penny saved is a penny gained"; "little and often fills the purse"; and there is Mr. Micawber's wise saying:

Annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure nineteen nineteen six, result happiness. Annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure twenty pounds, result misery. —Dickens: David Copperfield, ch. xii.

The Christian economy. The religious system based on the teachings of Jesus Christ as recorded in the New Testament.

The economy of nature. The laws of nature, whereby the greatest amount of good is obtained; or the laws by which the affairs of nature are regulated and disposed; the system and interior management of the animal and vegetable kingdoms, etc.

Animal... economy, according to which animal affairs are regulated and disposed. —Shaftesbury: Characteristics.

Political economy. Science of the production, distribution, and management of wealth, especially as dealing with the principles whereby the revenues and resources of a nation are made the most of.

Ecstasy (Gr. ek, out, stasis, a standing). Literally, a condition in which one stands out of one's mind, loses one's wits, or is "beside oneself." St. Paul refers to this when he says he was caught up to the third heaven and heard unutterable words, "whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell!" (2 Cor. xii, 2-4). St. John also says he was "in the spirit"—i.e. in an ecstasy—when he saw the apocalyptic vision (Rev. i, 10). The belief that the soul left the body at times was very general in former ages, and there was a class of diviners among the ancient Greeks called Estatici, who used to lie in trances, and when they came to themselves gave strange accounts of what they had seen while they were "out of the body."

Ecstatic Doctor, The. Jean de Ruysbroek, the mystic (1294-1381).

Ectoplasm (ek'tō plāsm) (Gr. ectos, outside; plasma, form). In biology this is an external modified layer of protoplasm, but it has acquired a wider sense in its spiritualistic meaning of the tangible emanation from a medium employed in materialization.

Ector, Sir. The foster-father of King Arthur.

Edda. This name—which may be from Edda, the great-grandmother in the Old Norse poem Rígsthul, or from the old Norse odhr, poetry, is given to two separate works or collections, viz. The Elder or Poetic Edda, and The Younger Edda, or Prose Edda of Snorri. The first-named was discovered in 1643 by an Icelandic bishop, and consists of mythological poems dating from the 9th century, and supposed to have been collected in the 13th century. They are of unknown authorship, but were erroneously attributed to Sæmund Sigfusson (d. 1133), and this has hence sometimes been called Sæmund's Edda. The Younger Edda is a work in prose and verse by Snorri Sturluson (d. 1242), and forms a guide to poets and poetry. It consists of the Gylfaginning (an epitome of Scandinavian mythology), the Skaldskaparmal (a glossary of poetical expressions, etc.), the Hattatal (a list of metres, with examples of all known forms of verse, with a preface, history of the origin of poetry, lists of poets, etc.).

Eden. Paradise, the country and garden in which Adam and Eve were placed by God (Gen. ii, 15) but lost by their disobedience. The word means delight, pleasure.

Eden Hall. The luck of Eden Hall. An enamelled drinking-glass, made probably in Venice in the 10th century, in the possession of the Musgrave family at Eden Hall, Cumberland, and traditionally supposed to be endowed with fortune-bringing properties. The tale is that it was taken from St. Cuthbert's Well in the garden, when the fairies left this glass by the well while they danced. The superstition is—
If that glass shall break or fall,
Farewell the luck of Eden Hall.

With the break-up of the estate in 1920 the cup was sold.

Edge (A.S. eage). It is dangerous to play with edged tools. It is dangerous to tamper with mischief or anything that may bring you into trouble.

Not to put too fine an edge on it. Not to mince the matter; to speak plainly.

To be on edge. To be very eager or impatient.

To edge away. To move away very gradually, as a ship moves from the edge of the shore.

To edge on. See Egg on.

To fall by the edge of the sword. By a cut from the sword; to be slain in battle.

To have the edge on someone. To have an advantage.

To set one's teeth on edge. To give one the horrors; to induce a tingling or grating sensation in one's teeth, as from acids or harsh noises.

In those days they shall say no more, the fathers have eaten a sour grape, and the children's teeth are set on edge.—Jer., xxxi, 29.

I had rather hear a brazen canstick turned,
Or a dry wheel grate on the axle-tree;
And that would set my teeth nothing on edge,
Nothing so much as mincing poetry.

1 Henry IV, iii, 1.

 Edge-bone. See Aitch-bone.

Edies. See Aédiles.

Edinburgh. Edwin's burgh; the fort built by Edwin, king of Northumbria (616-33). Dunedin (Gaelic dun, a fortress) and Edina are poetical forms.

Eel. A salt eel. A rope's end, used for scourging. At one time eelskins were used for whips. With my salt eele, went down in the parcer, and there got my boy and did beat him.—Pepp's Diary.

Eel-skins. Old-fashioned slang for extra tight trousers, or tightly fitting frucks.

Holding the eel of science by the tail. To have a smattering of the subject, the kind which slips from the memory as an eel would wriggle out of one's fingers if held by the tail.

To get used to it, as a skinned eel. It may be unpleasant at first, but habit will get the better of such annoyance; arising from the strange old notion that eels feel little more than a slight discomfort when skinned alive.

To skin an eel by the tail. To do things the wrong way.

Effendi (ē fen'di). A Turkish title, equivalent to the English "Mr." or "Esq.," but always following the name. It is given to emirs, men of learning, the imams of mosques, etc.

Effigy. To burn or hang one in effigy. To burn or hang the representation of a person, instead of the person himself, in order to show popular hatred, dislike, or contempt. From earliest times and in all countries magic has been worked by treating an effigy as one would fain treat the original. In France the public executioner used to hang the effigy of the criminal when the criminal himself could not be found.

Égalité (ā gäl’ītā). Philippe, Duc d'Orléans (b. 1747, guillotined 1793), father of Louis-Philippe, King of the French, assumed the name when he renounced his title and voted for the death of Louis XVI. The motto of the revolutionary party, with which he sided, was "Liberty, fraternity, and equality (égalité)."

Egeria (ē’gī’ā). The nymph who instructed Numa in his wise legislation; hence, a counselor, adviser.

It is in these moments that we gaze upon the moon. It is in these moments that Nature becomes our Egeria.—Lord Beaconsfield: Vivian Grey, III, vi.

Egg. See also Shell.

A bad egg. A bad speculation; a "bad-lot"; a person or thing that does not come up to expectations.

Curate's egg. See Curate.

A duck's egg. See Duck.

Don't put all your eggs in one basket. Don't venture all you have in one speculation; don't put all your property in one bank. The allusion is obvious.

Easter eggs. See Easter; Egg Feast.

Golden eggs. Great profits. See Goose.

I got eggs for my money. I gave valuable money, and received such worthless things as eggs. When Wolsey accused the Earl of Kildare for not taking Desmond prisoner, the Earl replied, "He is no more to blame than his brother Ossory, who (notwithstanding his high promises) is glad to take eggs for his money," i.e. is willing to be imposed upon. (Campion: History of Ireland, 1633.)

I have eggs on the spit. I am very busy, and cannot attend to anything else. The reference is to roasting eggs on a spit. They were first boiled, then the yolk was taken out, braided up with spices, and put back again; the eggs were then drawn on a spit, and roasted. As this required both dispatch and constant attention, the person in charge could not leave them.

I forgot to tell you, I write short journals now; I have eggs on the spit.—Swift.

Like as two eggs. Exactly alike.

They say we are almost as like as eggs.—Winter's Tale, i, 2.

Show him an egg, and instantly the whole air is full of feathers. Said of a very sanguine man, because he is "counting his chickens before they are hatched."

Sure as eggs is eggs. Professor de Morgan suggested that this is a corruption of the logician's formula, "x is x."

Teach your grandmother to suck eggs. Attempt to teach your elders.

The mundane egg. The Phænicians, Egyptians, Hindus, Japanese, and many other ancient nations maintained that the world was egg-shaped, and was hatched from an egg made by the Creator; and in some mythologies a bird is represented as laying the mundane egg on the primordial waters.

Anciently this idea was attributed to Orpheus, hence the "mundane egg" is also called the Orphic egg.

The opinion of the oval figure of the earth is ascribed to Orpheus and his disciples; and the doctrine of the mundane egg is so peculiarly his, that it is called by Proclus the Orphick egg.—Burnet: The Sacred Theory of the Earth (1684).

There is reason in roasting eggs. Even the most trivial thing has a reason for being done in one way rather than in some other. When wood fires were usual, it was more common to roast eggs than to boil them, and some care was required to prevent their being "ill-roasted, all on one side," as Touchstone says (As You Like It, iii, 2).

One likes the pheasant's wing, and one the leg; the vulgar boil, the learned roast an egg.

Pope: Epistles, ii.

To crush in the egg. To nip in the bud; to ruin some scheme before it has been fairly started.

To egg on. To incite, to urge on. Here egg is simply another form of edge—to edge on, i.e. to drive one nearer and nearer to the edge until the plunge is taken.

To tread upon eggs. To walk gingerly, as if walking over eggs, which are easily broken.

Will you take eggs for your money? "Will you allow yourself to be imposed upon? Will you take kicks for halfpence?" This saying was in vogue when eggs were plentiful as blackberries.

My honest friend, will you take eggs for money?—Winter's Tale, i, 2.

Egg Feast or Egg Saturday. In Oxford the Saturday preceding Shrove Tuesday used to be so called because, as the eating of eggs was forbidden during Lent, the scholars took leave of them on that day. They were allowed again at Easter, hence the coloured "Easter egg."

Egg-trot, or Egg-wife's trot. A cautious, jog-trot pace, like that of a housewife riding to market with eggs in her panniers.

Egil. Brother of Weland, the Vulcan of Northern mythology. Egil was a great archer, and in the Saga of Thidrik there is a tale told of him the exact counterpart of the famous story about William Tell and the apple. See Tell.

Eglantine. In the romance of Valentine and Orson, daughter of King Pepin, and bride of her cousin Valentine. She soon died.

Madame Eglantine. The prioress in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. Good-natured, wholly ignorant of the world, vain of her courtly manners, and noted for her partiality to lap-dogs, her delicate oath, "by seint Eloy," her "entuning the service sweetely in her nces," and her speaking French "after the scole of Stratford atte Bowe."

Ego (Lat., "I"). In various philosophical systems ego is used of the conscious thinking subject and non-ego of the object. The term ego was introduced into philosophy by Descartes, who employed it to denote the whole man, body and mind. Fichte later used the term the absolute ego, meaning thereby the non-individual being, neither subject nor object, which posits the world of individual egos and non-egos.

In psycho-analysis the ego is that part of the mind that perceives and takes cognisance of external reality and adjusts responses to it. See Id.

Egoism. The theory in Ethics which places man's summum bonum in self. The correlative of altruism, or the theory which places our own greatest happiness in making others happy. Egoism is selfishness pure, altruism is selfish benevolence. Hence egoist, one who upholds and practises this theory.

To say that each individual shall reap the benefits brought to him by his own powers... is to enunciate egoism as an ultimate principle of conduct.—Spencer: Data of Ethics, p. 189.

Egoism. The too frequent use of the word I; the habit of talking about oneself, or of parading one's own doings. Egotist, one addicted to egoism.

Egypt, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, means France.

Egypt and Tyrus [Holland] intercept your trade, and Jebusites [Papists] your sacred rites. invade.

Crows of Egypt. Ancient Egypt was divided into two parts, Upper Egypt, or the South Land, and Lower Egypt, or the Northern Land, the kings styling themselves suten bat, kings of the north and south. As ruler of the two countries each king wore the crown made up of the White Crown of the South and the Red Crown of the North, and it is from this crown, named Pschent, that they can be distinguished in hieroglyphics or on monuments.

Egyptian days. Unlucky days, days on which no business should be undertaken. The Egyptian astrologers named two in each month, but the last Monday in April, the second Monday of August, and the third Monday of December seem to have been specially baneful.

For there ben xxviii Egyptian days it foloweth that gyve the two wreeches upon the Egyptian ten. —Trevis: Trans. of De Proprietatis Rerum by Bartholomeus Anglicus (1398).

Eight. Behind the eight ball. In a dangerous position, from which it is impossible to escape. The phrase comes from the game of Kelly pool, in one variety of which all the balls must be pocketed in a certain order, except the black ball, numbered eight. If another ball touches the eight ball, the player is penalized. Therefore, if the eight ball is in front of the one which he intends to pocket, he is in a hazardous position.

One over the eight, a euphemism for slightly drunk.

Elkon Basilike (i kon baza' i ki) (Gr., royal likeness). Eikon BASILAIKH; the Portraiture of His Sacred Majesty in His Solitudes and Sufferings, was published in 1649 and purported to set forth the private meditations, prayers, and thoughts of Charles I on the political situation during and before his imprisonment. Its authorship was at first attributed by Royalists to the king himself, and so late as 1824 this theory was supported by Christopher Wordsworth, Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. At the time of the Restoration John Gauden (1605-62) claimed authorship of it when putting up for the bishopric of Worcester; but who actually wrote it is still an open question.

Elisell (i's el). An old name for vinegar (acetic acid); through old Fr. from late Lat. acetilium, diminutive of acetum. Hamlet asks Laertes, Wouldest drink to show your love to the dead Ophelia? In the Troy Book of Lydgate we have the line "Of bitter eyssl and of eager (sour) wine." And in Shakespeare's sonnets:—

I will drink Potions of eyssl, gainst my strong infection;
No bitterness that I will bitter think,
Nor double penance to correct correction.

Eisenhower Platz, Nickname of Grosvenor Square, London, during World War II, when all the buildings surrounding the square were occupied by American Military Headquarters.

Eisteddfod (i steth' vod). The meetings of the Welsh bards and others now held annually for the encouragement of Welsh literature and music. (Welsh, "a sessions," from eistedd, to sit.)

El Dorado (el dór a'dó). Sp., the gilded. Originally, the name given to the supposed king of Manoa, the fabulous city of enormous wealth as located by the early explorers on the Amazon. He was said to be covered with gold and then powdered with gold-dust, an operation performed from time to time so that he was permanently, and literally, gilded. Many expeditions, both from Spain and England (two of which were led by Sir Walter Raleigh) tried to discover this king, and the name was later transferred to his supposed territory. Hence any extraordinarily rich region, or vast accumulation of gold, precious stones, or similar wealth.

Elagabalus (el à gáb' a lus). A Syro-Phænician sun-god, worshipped in Rome and represented under the form of a huge conical stone. The Roman emperor, originally Varius Avitus Bassianus (A.D. 205-22), son of a cousin of Caracalla but put forward as a son of Caracalla himself, was so called because in childhood he had been a priest of Elagabalus (or Heliogabalus). Of all the Roman emperors none exceeded him in debauchery. His cruelties were so hideous and his personal habits so loathsome that there can be no doubt of his insanity. He reigned about four years (A.D. 218-22), and was put to death by the praetorians.

Elaine. The "lily maid of Astolat" (q.v.), who in Tennyson's Lancelot and Elaine (Idylls o, the King), in which he follows Malory (Bk. xvi, ch. 9-20), loved Sir Lancelot "with that love which was her doom." See DIAMOND JOUSTS.

Elbow. See Ell.

A knight of the elbow. A gambler.

At one's elbow. Close at hand.

Elbow grease. Hard manual labour, especially rubbing and scrubbing. A humorous Elbow room. Sufficient space for the work in hand.

More power to your elbow. A jocast toast implying that a stronger elbow will lift more glasses to the mouth.

Out at elbows. Shabbily dressed, “down at heel.”

To elbow one’s way in. To push one’s way through a crowd; to get a place by hook or crook.

To elbow out; to be elbowed out. To supersede: to be ousted by a rival.

To lift the elbow. To drink; usually said of an habitual drinker.

Up to one’s elbow. Very busy, full of work. Work piled up to one’s elbows.

Eckle. Eckle needs filling. A reproach given to great braggarts. Eckle is a deep esasm in the Derbyshire Peak, long reputed to be bottomless. See Scott’s Peveril of the Peak, ch. iii.

Elder Brethren. See Trinity House.

Elder-tree. A tree of evil associations in popular legend, and, according to medieval fable, that on which Judas Iscariot hanged himself, the mushroom-like excrescences on the bark still being known as Judas’s (or Jew’s) ears.

Sir John Maudenelle, speaking (1364) of the Pool of Siloë, says, “Fast by is the elder-tree on which Judas hanged himself . . . when he sold and betrayed our Lord.” Shakespeare, in Love’s Labour’s Lost, v. 2, says, “Judas was hanged on an elder.”

Judas he japed
With Jewen silver,
And sithen on an ellel
Hanged hynsmelv.

Vision of Piers Plowman: Passus I. See also Fig-tree; Judas Tree.

A pleasant, old-fashioned country wine is made from elderberries.

Eleanor Crosses. The crosses erected by Edward I to commemorate his queen, Eleanor, whose body was brought from Nottinghamshire to Westminster for burial. At each of the following places, where the body rested, a cross was set up: Lincoln, Grantham, Stamford, Gedlington, Northampton, Stony Stratford, Waltham, West Cheap (Cheapside). Of these only the crosses at Gedlington, Northampton and Waltham now exist.

See Charing Cross.

Eleatic Philosophy. Founded by Xenophanes of Elea (about 530 B.C.), who, in opposition to the current Greek system founded on polytheism and anthropomorphism, taught the unity and unchangeableness of the Divine. Thorough Parmenides and Zeno in the 5th century the school exercised great influence on Plato.

Elecampane. A composite plant (Inula helenium), the candied roots of which (like ginger) are used as a sweetmeat, and which was formerly fabled to have magical properties, such as curing wounds, conferring immortality, etc. Pliny tells us it sprang from Helen’s tears.

Here, take this essence of elecampane;
Rise up, Sir George, and fight again.
M miracle Play of St. George.

Elector. A prince who had a vote in the election of the Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire. As established by the Golden Bull of 1356 these were the spiritual rulers of Mayence, Treves and Cologne; the temporal rulers of the Rhine Palatinate, Saxony, Brandenburg and Bohemia, and from time to time other German princes such as the rulers of Bavaria (1648), Hanover (1692), etc. In 1806 Napoleon broke up the old Empire, and the College of Electors was dissolved.

The Great Elector. Frederick William of Brandenburg (1620-88). See also Fig-tree; Judas Tree.

A pleasant, old-fashioned country wine is made from elderberries.

Elector. One of the Pleiades (q.v.), mother of Dardanus, the mythical ancestor of the Trojans. She is known as “the Lost Pleiad,” for it is said that she disappeared a little before the Trojan war, that she might be saved the mortification of seeing the ruin of her beloved city. She showed herself occasionally to mortal eye, but always in the guise of a comet. See Od., v, and II., xviii.

Electra, the sister of Orestes, figures in the Orestia of Aeschylus and two other dramas, both entitled Electra, by Sophocles and Euripides. The daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, she incited Orestes to kill their mother in revenge for the latter’s murder of Agamemnon on his return from Troy. In modern psychology an Electra complex is a girl’s attraction towards her father accompanied with hostility towards her mother.

Electricity (Gr. elektron, amber). Thales (600 B.C.) observed that amber when rubbed attracted light substances, and this observation followed out has led to the present science of electricity.

Electronic Brain. An inaccurate term invented by newspaper journalists to describe a calculating machine in which the ordinary mechanical processes of reckoning are performed by the employment of thermionic valves.

Electuary (elek’ tō ār’ i). Coming from a Greek word meaning to lick up, this term is applied in pharmacy to medicines sweetened with honey or syrup, and originally meant to be licked off the spoon by the patient.

Elegant Extracts. The 85th Foot, remodelled in 1813 after the numerous courts-martial which then occurred. The officers of the regiment were removed, and officers drafted from other regiments were substituted in their places. The 85th is now called the “Second Battalion of the Shropshire Light Infantry.” The first battalion is the old 23rd.

At Cambridge, in the good old times, men who were too good to be plucked and not good enough for the poll, but who were yet allowed to pass, were nicknamed the Elegant Extracts. There was a similar limbo in the honour list, called the Gulf (q.v.), in allusion to the “great gulf fixed.” Both nicknames come from the late-18th-century liking for anthologies called “Elegant Extracts.”
Elegiacs. Verse consisting of alternate hexameters (q.v.) and pentameters (q.v.), so called because it was the metre in which the elegies of the Greeks and Romans were usually written. In Latin it was commonly used by Ovid, Catullus, Tibullus, and others; the following is a good specimen of English elegiacs:

Man with inviolate caverns, impregnable holds in his nature,
Depths no storm can pierce, pierced with a shaft of the sun;
Man that is galled with his confines, and burdened yet more with his vastness,
Born too great for his ends, never at peace with his goal.

Sir WM. Watson: Hymn to the Sea (1899).

Element. In modern scientific parlance an element is a substance which resists analysis or splitting up into different substances. There are 96 of these. But in ancient and medieval philosophy an element was one of the simple substances of which all things were held to be composed. Aristotle, following Empedocles of Sicily (c. 450 B.C.), taught that there were four, viz. fire, air, water, and earth; but later a fifth, the quinta essentia, or quintessence, which was supposed to be common to the four and to unify them, was added.

Does not our life consist of the four elements? Twelfth Night, ii, 3.

The word is often applied loosely and figuratively, and is used to describe the resistance wire and former of a resistance type of electric heater; also to denote one of the electrodes of a primary or secondary cell. In military parlance it is used to describe portions of a unit or formation detached from their parent unit.

In one's element. In one's usual surroundings, within one's ordinary range of activity, enjoying oneself thoroughly. The allusion is to the natural abode of any animal, as the air for birds, water to fish.

Ferguson was in his element... with the malvolent activity and dexterity of an evil spirit, he ran from outlaw to outlaw, shattered in every ear, and stirred up in every bosom savage animosities and wild desires.

The elements. Atmospheric powers; the atmospheric agents that control the weather. They are wind, storms, etc.

Rumble they bellyful! Spit, fire! spout, rain!
Nor rain, wind, thunder, fire, are my daughters:
I tax not you, you elements, with unkindness;
I never gave you kingdom, call'd you children,
You owe me no subscription: then, let fall
Your horrible pleasure.

King Lear, iii, 2.

Elephant. Elephants have been used by oriental potentates for state ceremonies or as engines of war from time immemorial. When the Romans first saw elephants, in the army of Pyrrhus, they called them "Leucorian oxen"; their horses refused to face the great beasts, and galloped back, causing panic among the infantry. In 250 B.C. Caecilius Metellus vanquished Hasdrubal at Panormus and captured 120 elephants which were taken in strong rafts across the sea to adorn the proconsul's triumph.

A white elephant. Some possession the expense or responsibility of which is more than it is worth. The allusion is to the story of a King of Siam who used to make a present of a white elephant to courtiers whom he wished to ruin.

The Order of the White Elephant is a Danish military order of knighthood, traditionally said to have been founded in 1189 in memory of a Danish soldier who slew one. Historically it dates from 1462; it was reconstituted in 1693, and is limited to princes of the blood and thirty knights. The badge is a white elephant carrying a tower and with a Hindu driver seated on its neck.

King of the White Elephant. The proudest title borne by the old kings of Ava and Siam. In Ava the white elephant bore the title of "lord" and had a minister of high rank to superintend his household.

Only an elephant can bear an elephant's load. An Indian proverb: Only a great man can do the work of a great man: also, the burden is more than I can bear; it is a load fit for an elephant.

Elephant paper. A large-sized drawing-paper measuring 23 inches by 28. Double Elephant is a standard size of printing paper 27 by 40 inches. Long Elephant is a term employed for paper hangings, 12 yards long, usually 22 inches wide. The name is probably from an ancient watermark.

To see the elephant. (U.S.A.). To see all there is to see.

Elephant and Castle. A public-house sign at Newington that has given its name to a railway station and to a district in South London. The sign is the crest of the Cutlers' Company, who owned the site and into whose trade the use of ivory entered largely. In ancient times war elephants bore fortified "castles" on their backs from which bowmen and armed knights penetrated into the enemy's ranks.

Elephanta (el e fán'tä). A small island in Bombay harbour, 6 miles east of the city. It is about 41 miles in circumference, and is famous for its rock temples and caves with Hindu sculpture. It should not be confused with Elephantine Island, in the Nile, off Assouan, from which sprang the kings of the Vth dynasty. There are royal tombs on the island and the famous Nilometer, dating from Ptolemaic days.

Eleusinian Mysteries. The religious rites in honour of Demeter or Ceres, performed originally at Eleusis, Attica, but later at Athens as part of the state religion. There were Greater and Lesser Eleusinia, the former being celebrated between harvest and seedtime and the latter in early spring. Little is known about the details, but the rites included sea bathing, processions, religious dramas, etc., and the initiated attained thereby a happy life beyond the grave.

Elevation of the Host. This is the term used for the raising of the Host and the Chalice after consecration in the Mass, for the adoration of the faithful.

Eleven. This is the A.S. endleson, from a Teutonic ainfol, the ain- representing "one," and the suffix being cognate with the Lithuanian -ika (and probably with Lat. linquare, to leave, liqui, left) in wenoika, eleven, the meaning being that there is still one left to be counted after counting ten (the fingers of the two hands).

At the eleventh hour. Just in time; from the parable in Matt. xx. 1-16.

The Eleven Thousand Virgins. See Ursula.

Elf. Originally a dwarfish being of Teutonic mythology, possessed of magical powers which it used either for the benefit or to the detriment of mankind. Later the name was restricted to a malignant kind of imp, and later still to those airy creatures that dance on the grass in the full moon. Have fair golden hair, sweet musical voices, magic harps, etc.

Spenser relates (Faerie Queene, II, x, 70):—

How first Prometheus did create
A man of many parts from beasts derived . . .
That man so made he called Elfe, to weet
Quick, the first author of all Elfin kind.

Spenser’s remark that elf means “quick” is, of course, an invention; as also is the amusing one (mentioned with disapproval by Johnson, s. v. Goblin) that Elf and Goblin are derived from “Guelf and Ghielline”; the word is A.S. ælf from Icel. álfr, and Teut. ælf, a nightmare.

Elf-arrows. Arrow-heads of the neolithic period so called. At one time they were supposed to be shot by elves at people and cattle out of malice or revenge.

Elf-fire. The ignis-fatua; also popularly called Will o’ the Wisp, Jack o’ lanthorn, Peg-a-lantern, or Kit o’ the canstick (candle-stick).

Elf-locks. Tangled hair. It used to be said that one of the favourite amusements of Queen Mab was to tie people’s hair in knots. When Edgar impersonates a madman, “he elfs all his hair in knots.” (Lear, ii, 3.)

This is that very Mab
That plats the manes of horses in the night,
And bakes the elf-locks in foul sluttish hairs.
Romeo and Juliet, i, 4.

Elf-marked. Those born with a natural defect, according to the ancient Scottish superstition are marked by the elves for mischief. Queen Margaret called Richard III:

Thou elvish-marked, abortive, rooting hog!
Richard III, i, 3.

Elf-shot. Afflicted with some unknown disease which was supposed to have been caused by an elf-arrow.

Elgin Marbles (el’ gin). The 7th Earl of Elgin (1766-1841) was envoy to the Sublime Porte (Turkey) from 1799 to 1803, and on visits to Greece at that time a Turkish possession—he observed that from neglect and depredations many Classical sculptures, etc., were in danger of destruction. At his own expense he made a collection of statuary and sculpture (including several works of Phidias) from the Parthenon and the Erechtheion and brought them to England. In 1812 he sold them to the British Government for £35,000, which was half what he had paid for their removal. He also brought casts of various objects left in situ, and a comparison of these casts with the originals as preserved to-day reveals considerable damage in the century that has elapsed, and justifies Elgin’s removal of what was brought to England.

The adoption of this signature was purely accidental. Lamb’s first contribution to the London Magazine was a description of the old South-Sea House, where he had passed a few months’ novitiate as a clerk, . . . and remembering the name of a gay light-hearted foreigner, who fluttered there at the time, substituted his name for his own.—TALFOURD.

Elidure (el’ i dôr). A legendary king of Britain, who, according to some accounts, was advanced to the throne in place of his elder brother, Arthgallo (or Artegal), supposed by him to be dead. Arthgallo, after a long exile, returned to his country, and Elidure resigned to him the throne. Wordsworth has a poem on the subject (Artegal and Elidure); and Milton (History of Britain, Bk. i) says that Elidure had “a mind so noble, and so moderate, as is almost incredible to have been ever found.”

Eligius, St. See Eliot, St.

Elizabeth. The name is originally Hebrew and means “the oath of God,” i.e. the oath in memory of the covenant made with Abraham. Among its large number of variants are: Eliza, Elsie, Elisabrin (Scandinavian), Elspeth, Lizzy, Elisabet, Elisabetta, Elisavetta, Elise, Isabel, Isabeau, Isa, Lescinska (Russian), Betty, Betsy, Bettina, Bess, Bessy, Beth, etc.

St. Elizabeth of Hungary. Patron saint of queens, being herself a queen. She died in 1231 at the age of 24, and her day is November 19th. For the story of the conversion of flowers into bread, see Melon.
Elizabethan. Belonging to, or having the characteristics of the period of Queen Elizabeth (1558-1603), used especially of literature, architecture, costume and the like. The period was one of great vitality, which resulted in a high level of accomplishment in all the arts, especially in poetry and the drama.

Ell. An old measure of length which, like foot, was taken from a part of the body, viz. the forearm. The word (A.S. eln) is from a Teutonic word alina, the forearm to the tip of the middle finger, which also gives us elbow (q.v.) and is cognate with Lat. ulna. The ell was of various lengths. The English ell was 45 inches, the Scots ell only 37 inches, while the Flemish ell was three-quarters of a yard, and a French ell a yard and a half.

Give him an inch, and he'll take an ell. Give him a little licence, and he will take great liberties, or make great encroachments.

The King's Ell-wand. The group of stars called "Orion's Belt."

Elyon. The name given by the ancient Welsh bards to the souls of the Druids, which, being too good for hell, and not good enough for heaven, wander upon earth till the Judgment Day, when they will be admitted to a higher state of being.

Elmo. See St. Elmo.

Elohim. The plural form of the Heb. elohah, God, sometimes used to denote heathen gods collectively (Chemosh, Dagon, Baal, etc.), but more frequently used as a singular denoting one god, or God Himself. In 1 Sam. xxviii, 13, where the witch of Endor tells Saul "I saw gods [Heb. elohim] ascending out of the earth," this is an exceptional use of the word, and would seem to imply spirits of the departed, rather than gods. See next article.

Elohistic and Jehovistic Scriptures. Elohim and Jehovah (Jahveh or Yahwe) are two of the most usual of the many names given by the ancient Hebrews to the Deity, and the fact that they are both used with interchangeable senses in the Pentateuch gave rise to the theory, widely held by Hebraists and biblical critics, that these books were written at two widely different periods; the Elohistic paragraphs, being more simple, more primitive, more narrative, and more pastoral, being held to be the older; while the later Jehovistic paragraphs, which indicate a knowledge of geography and history, seem to exalt the priestly office, and are altogether of a more elaborate character, were subsequently enwoven with these. See Jehovah.

Eloi, St., or St. Eligius (el' oi, el ij' i us). Patron saint of artists and smiths. He was a famous worker in gold and silver, and was made Bishop of Noyon in the reign of Dagobert (6th century). His day is December 1st.

Eloquent. The old man eloquent. Isocrates (436-338 B.C.), the Greek orator. When he heard that Grecian liberty was extinguished by the battle of Chaeronea, he died of grief.

That dishonest victory
At Chaeronea, fatal to liberty,
Killed with report that old man eloquent.
Milton: Sonnets (To Lady Margaret Ley).

The eloquent doctor. Peter Aurelius (14th century), Archbishop of Aix, a schoolman.

Elsinore. The castle at which the action of Shakespeare's Hamlet takes place. It is actually the Castle Kronstadt, north of Copenhagen. The modern Danish name is Helsingør.

Elysium (e' liz' i um). The abode of the blessed in Greek mythology; hence the Elysian Fields, the Paradise or Happy Land of the Greek poets. Elysian means happy, delightful.

O'er which were shadowy east Elysian gleams.

Thomson: Castle of Indolence, i, 44.

Would take the poisoned soul,
And lap it in Elysium.
Milton: Comus, 261-2.

Elzevir (el' zé vór). An edition of a classic author, published and printed by the family of Elzevir over the period from 1583 to about 1710. Louis, founder of the family, settled in Leyden about 1580; in 1583 he printed J. Druisi Ebraicum quaestionum, and in 1592 published at his own risk a Eutropius, by P. Merula. Louis and his descendants carried on the press at Leyden until 1654, when it was moved to Amsterdam. After some years it split up, a few Elzevir volumes being published in Utrecht (1667-72), and Abraham, the last of the family, being university printer at Leyden, 1681-1712. Many Elzevir editions bear no other typographical mark than the words Apud Elzevierus, or Ex Officina Elzevieriana. The total number of works bearing the name of Elzevir is 1213, of which 968 are in Latin, 44 in Greek, 126 in French and 75 in other languages.

Em. The unit of measure in printing. The square of the body of any size of type. For standard purposes the pica em is taken, measuring 12 points or one-sixth of an inch. The depth and width of a printed page is measured in ems. An en is half an em, and is the average width of the letters in a fount; it is thus used as a basis for casting-off or estimating a quantity of typed matter.

Embargo (em bar' go). To lay an embargo on. To prohibit, to forbid. The word comes from the Spanish embargo, to detain, and is especially applied to the prohibition of foreign ships to enter or leave a port, or undertake any commercial transaction, also to the seizure of a ship, goods, etc., for the use of the State.

Emharras de Richesse (om ba ra' de ré shess') (Fr.). A perplexing amount of wealth, or too great an abundance of anything; more matter than can conveniently be employed. The phrase was used as the title of a play by the Abbé d'Allainval (1753).

Ember Days. The Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday of the four Ember Weeks, which were fixed by the Council of Placentia (1095), as those containing the first Sunday in Lent, Whit Sunday, Holy Cross Day (September 14th), and St. Lucia's Day (December 13th). The name is the M.E. ymber, from A.S. ymbern (i.e. ym, about, rynne, running), a period or revolution.

Ember goose. The northern diver or loon, called in Norway imbro, because it appears on the coast about the time of the Ember days in Advent. The German name of the bird is Adventsvogel.

Emblem. A symbolical figure; a picture with a hidden meaning which is "cast into" (Gr. em, in, bullein, to cast) the visible device. Thus, a balance is an emblem of justice, white of purity, a sceptre of sovereignty.

Some of the most common and simple emblems of the Christian Church are:—

A chalice. The eucharist.
The circle inscribed in an equilateral triangle, or the triangle in a circle. To denote the co-equality and co-eternity of the Trinity.

A cross. The Christian's life and conflict; the death of Christ for man's redemption.

A crown. The reward of the perseverance of the saints.

A dove. The Holy Ghost.
A hand from the clouds. To denote God the Father.
A lamb, fish, pelican, etc. The Lord Jesus Christ.
A phoenix. The resurrection.

Emblematical poems. Poems consisting of lines of different lengths so that when printed or written the outline of the poem on the page can be made to represent the object of the verse. Thus George Herbert often prints a poem on the Altar that is shaped like an altar, and one on Easter Wings like wings. George Puttenham in his Arte of English Poesie (1589) gives a chapter on this form of word-torture (which he calls "Proportion in Figure"), giving examples of eggs, crosses, pyramids, etc., and it was gibbeted by Ben Jonson, Dryden, Addison, and others.

As for altars and pyramids in poetry, he has out-done all men that way; for he has made a gridiron and a flying-pan in verse, that besides the likeness in shape, the very tone and sound of the words did perfectly represent the noise that is made by these stenils.—SAMUEL BUTLER: Character of a Small Poet.

Emelye (em' e li). The sister-in-law of "Duke Theseus," beloved by the two knights, Palmon and Arcyte, the former of whom had her to wife.

Emerald. According to Eastern tradition, if a serpent fixes its eyes upon an emerald it becomes blind (Ahmed ben Abdalaziz; Treatise on Jewels). Other properties were also given to it, and in The Lover's Complaint usually printed as though by Shakespeare) he author speaks of:—

The deep-green emerald, in whose fresh regard Weak sights their sickly radiance do amend.

The Emerald Isle. Ireland. This term was first used by Dr. Drennan (1754-1820), in the poem called Erin. Of course, it refers to the whole island of the country.

Nor one feeling of vengeance presume to defile
The cause or the men of the Emerald Isle.

Emmeritus (e mer' i tûs). Deriving from the Latin emereri, to serve but one's time, the word is now used of a professor, minister, etc., who is retired from his office by reason of age or illness but retained on the rolls with full honour.

Emeute (em e yt') (Fr.). A seditious rising or mob riot. Literally, a moving-out (Lat. movere).

Emilie (em' e lé). The "divine Emilie," to whom Voltaire wrote verses, was the Marquise du Châtelet, with whom he lived at Cirey for some ten years, between 1735 and 1749.

Empanel and empanel. These similar words have very different meanings. To empanel is to form a list of jurors, or to enrol them; to empanel (a rarely used word, it is true) is to saddle a horse or ass, or more particularly to put the pack-saddle on a beast of burden.

Empedocles (em ped' o klêz). A Greek philosopher, poet, and statesman (about 500-430 b.c.), a disciple of Pythagoras. According to Lucian, he cast himself into the crater of Etna, that persons might suppose he was returned to the gods; but Etna threw out his sandal, and destroyed the illusion. (Horace: Ars Poetica, 404.)

He who, to be deemed
A god, leaped fondly into Ætna flames,
Empedocles. MILTON: Paradise Lost, iii, 471.

Matthew Arnold published (1853) a classical drama with the title Empedocles on Ætna.

Emperor. A title applied to sovereigns of the highest class. It was first used in this sense by Julius Cæsar in 38 B.C. and was assumed by all his successors, the last Roman Emperor of the West was Augustulus, A.D. 475; the last emperor of the East was Constantine, A.D. 1453. In 800 Charlemagne revived the Empire and as the Holy Roman Empire it lasted until 1806; the Emperors of Austria retaining the title until the fall of Austria in 1918.

In 1804 Napoleon crowned himself Emperor of the French; the First Empire fell in 1815, and the Second Empire under Napoleon III lasted from 1853 until 1870.

In 1870 William I, King of Prussia, was declared Emperor of Germany (Kaiser) and that empire lasted until the abdication of William II, in 1918.

Ivan the Terrible was called Tsar, or Emperor of Moscow in 1533, but it was Peter the Great who established the Tsardom of Russia in 1689. The Russian Empire as an autocracy lasted until 1917.

Victor Emanuel III, King of Italy, was declared Emperor of Abyssinia in 1936; eight years later he and his family were deposed and exiled from Italy.

The British sovereigns were Emperors of India from 1876 until the partition of the continent into the Republic of India and Dominion of Pakistan, in 1947.

Outside Europe: Brazil was an empire 1821-89; Mexico, 1822-3 and 1864-7; Haiti, 1804-6. The term Emperor has also been applied loosely to the sovereigns of China, Japan, Mongolia, Ethiopia and Manchuria.

Emperor. A standard size of drawing paper measuring 48 by 72 inches. This is the largest sheet made by hand.

Emperor, not for myself, but for my people. The maxim of Hadrian, the Roman Emperor (117-138).

The Emperor of Believers. Omar I (581-644), father-in-law of Mohammed, and second caliph of the Mussulmans.

Empire City, The. New York, the great commercial city of the United States. New Empire State, on account of its leading position in wealth, population, etc., is called the Empire State. Hence the name of the tallest skyscraper in the city.

Empire Style. The style of furniture, costume, etc., that came into vogue during the Consulate and Empire of Napoleon, lasting approximately from 1800 until 1820. The Empire style followed on after the pseudo-classical fervour of the Revolution, but was itself largely inspired by Napoleon's wish to embellish his court with something of the splendour of imperial Rome. The campaign in Egypt added certain Egyptian touches, such as the introduction of the sphinx, into its style of ornamentation. In architecture the Empire style was largely an imitation of the Roman; in furniture there was a certain massiveness and angularity, and a great use of metal (chiefly bronze) applique ornament. Though Napoleon himself observed the utmost simplicity the court costume was rich and ornate, especially in the military and civil uniforms. Women's fashions changed constantly, but the high-waisted Grecian style remained a constant motif.

Empirics. An ancient Greek school of medicine founded by Serapion of Alexandria, who changed constantly, but the high-waisted Grecian style largely an imitation of the Roman; in furniture there was a certain massiveness and angularity, and a great use of metal (chiefly bronze) applique ornament. Though Napoleon himself observed the utmost simplicity the court costume was rich and ornate, especially in the military and civil uniforms. Women's fashions changed constantly, but the high-waisted Grecian style remained a constant motif.

We must not so stain our judgment, or corrupt our hope, to prostitute our past-cure malady to empirics.

All's Well That Ends Well, ii, 1.

Empyrean (em pi' ré' án). According to Ptolemy, there are five heavens, the last of which is pure elemental fire and the seat of deity; this fifth heaven is called the empyrean (Gr. empuros, fiery); hence, in Christian angelology, the abode of God and the angels. See Heaven. Now had the Almighty Father from above, From the pure empyrean where He sits High throned above all height, bent down his eye. MILTON: Paradise Lost, iii, 56.

En bloc (ong blok) (Fr.). The whole lot together; en masse.

En garçon (ong gar' song) (Fr.). As a bachelor. “To take me en garçon,” without ceremony, as a bachelor fares in ordinary life.

En grande toilette; en grande tenue (ong gron tew' let) (Fr.). In full dress; dressed for a great occasion.

En masse (ong màs) (Fr.). The whole lot just as it stands; the whole.

En papillotes (Fr.). In a state of undress; literally, in curl-papers. Cutlets with frills on them are en papillotes.

En famille (ong fa mé) (Fr.). In the privacy of one's own home.

En passant (ong pás' ong) (Fr.). By the way. A remark made en passant is one dropped in, almost an aside.
The French Encyclopédie ou Dictionnaire raisonné des sciences, etc., appeared in 28 folio volumes (11 of which were of plates) between 1751 and 1765, with supplements, and an index which was published in 1780. It was edited by Diderot, assisted by d'Alembert, and many of the leading men of letters (hence called Encyclopedists) contributed to it. Its frank and objective attitude towards the problems of the times, towards science and religion, made it a potent weapon in the service of the philosophic doctrines that were influential causes of the Revolution.

End. A rope's end. A short length of rope bound at the end with thread, and used for punishing the refractory.

A shoemaker's end. A length of thread pointed with a bristle, and used by shoemakers.

At a loose end. See Loose.

At my wits' end. At a standstill how to proceed farther; nonplussed.

East End. See West End below.

End it or mend it. Said when an impasse or a crisis is reached, when things are unbearable and something simply must be done.

He is no end of a fellow. A capital chap; a most agreeable companion.

Odds and ends. Fragments, remnants, odd ends of miscellaneous articles; bits and pieces of trifling value.

On end. Erect; also, in succession, without a break, as "he'll go on talking for days on end."

One's latter end. The close of one's life.

So the Lord blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning.—Job xiii, 12.

The end justifies the means. A false doctrine, frequently condemned by various popes, which teaches that evil means may be employed to produce a good effect. The true doctrine is that an act is vitiated by any defect in the act itself; not even the smallest sin may be committed that good may come.

The End must justify the means:
He only sins who Intends
Since therefore 'tis to Combat Evil;
'Tis lawful to employ the Devil.
Prior: Hans Carvel.

The ends of the earth. The remotest parts of the earth, the regions farthest from civilization.

To be one's end. The cause or agent of his death.

This apoplexy will be his end.

2 Henry IV, iv, 4.

To begin at the wrong end. To attempt to do something unmethodically.

To burn the candle at both ends. See Burn.

To come to the end of one's tether. See Tether.

To go off the deep end. To get unnaturally excited.

To have it at my finger's end. See Finger.

To make ends meet. To make one's income cover expenses; to keep out of debt.

To put an end to. To terminate or cause to terminate.

To the bitter end. See Bitter.

West end, East end. The quarter or part of a town west or east of the central part. In London, and many other large towns, the West End is the fashionable quarter and the East End the part where the population lives that do the work.

End of the world, The. According to rabbinical legend, the world is to last six thousand years. The reasons assigned are (1) because the name Yahweh contains six letters; (2) because the Hebrew letter מ occurs six times in the book of Genesis; (3) because the patriarch Enoch, who was taken to heaven without dying, was the sixth generation from Adam (Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalaleel, Jared, Enoch); (4) because God created the world in six days; (5) because six contains three binaries—the first 2000 years were for the law of nature, the next 2000 years the written law, and the last 2000 the law of grace.

End-iron. Two movable iron cheeks or plates, used in cooking-stoves to enlarge or contract the grate at pleasure. The term explains itself, but must not be mistaken for andirons or "dogs."

End papers. The two leaves front and back of a book, one of which is pasted down on to the inside of the cover and the other is a flyleaf; they may be coloured or marbled.

End-stopped. A term used in prosody denoting that the sense of the line to which it is applied is completed with the line and does not run over to the next; the opposite of enjambment. In the following lines the first is an example of enjambment, and the second is end-stopped:—

Awake, my St. John, leave all meaner things
To low ambition, and the pride of kings.

Pope: Essay on Man, i, 1.

Endymion (en dim' i on). In Greek mythology, a beautiful youth, sometimes said to be a king and sometimes a shepherd, who, as he slept on Mount Latmus, so moved the cold heart of Selene, the Moon goddess, that she came down and kissed him and lay at his side. He woke to find her gone, but the dreams which she gave him were such that he begged Zeus to give him immortality and allow him to sleep perpetually on Mount Latmus. Other accounts say that Selene herself bound him by enchantment so that she might come and kiss him whenever she liked. Keats used the story as the framework of his long allegory, Endymion (1817), and it forms the basis of Lyly's comedy, Endimion, the Man in the Moone (1585).

The moon sleeps with Endymion,
And would not be awaked.

Merchant of Venice, v, 1.

Enemy. How goes the enemy? or What says the enemy? What o'clock is it? Time is the enemy of man, especially of those who are behind hand.

Enfant terrible (ong fong te rêb) (Fr.). Literally, a terrible child. An embarrassing person, one who says or does awkward things at inconvenient times.

Enfilade (en filäd) (Fr.). means literally to spin out; to put thread in (a needle), as en filer une England. The name comes from the Angles (land of the Angles), who migrated from the east of the Elbe to Schleswig (between the Jutes and the Saxons), and passed over in great numbers to Britain during the 5th century; but Verstegan (1605) has a story that Egbert was "chiefly moved" in the course of Pope Gregory's changing the name of Englisce into Angelyske." And this "may have moved our kings upon their best gold coins to set the image of an angel."

England's Darling. A name given to Hereward the Wake (fl. 1070), the patriot who held the Isle of Ely against William the Conqueror. After a blockade of three months, Hereward and some of his followers escaped.

Little Englisher. One who would rather see England small, contented, and as self-contained as possible than have her the head of a world-wide Empire, the possession of which might be a source of trouble and danger to her; the opposite to an Imperialist. The term was in use at the time of the South African War of 1899-1902.

English. The language of the people of England; also the people themselves. Middle English is the language as used from about 1150 to 1500; Old English, also called somewhat incorrectly Anglo-Saxon, is that in use before 1150.

In typography, English was the name given to a large size of type, two points (i.e. one-thirty-sixth of an inch) larger than pica and four points smaller than grand primer.

Borough English. See BOROUGH.

English French. A kind of perversity seems to pervade many of the words which we have borrowed from the French. Thus, our curate is the Fr. curé, our vicar is the Fr. curé. Encore (Fr. bis). Epergne (Fr. surroit): Surtout (Fr. pardessus). Screw (Fr. vis), whereas the French écrou we call a nut; and our vice est au in French. Some still say à l'outrance (Fr. à outrance). We say double entendre, the French a deux entente.

Plain English. Plain, unmistakable terms. To tell a person in plain English what you think of him is to give your very candid opinion without any beating about the bush.

The King's (or Queen's) English. English as it should be spoken. The term is found in Shakespeare (Merry Wives, i, 4), but it is older, and was evidently common. Queen's English occurs in Nash's Strange Newses of the Intercepting Certaine Letters (1593), and "tho clispt the King's English" in Dekker's Satiromastix (1602).

These fine English clerkes will saith thei speake in their mother tongue, if a manne should charge them to counterfeiting the Kings English.—WILSON: Arte of Rhetorick (1553).

To put on English (U.S.A.). In billiards, to apply spin to the ball.

Englishman. The national nickname of an Englishman is "John Bull" (q.v.). The old French nickname for him was "Goddam."

An Englishman's house is his castle. Because so long as a man shuts himself up in his own house, no bailiff can break through the door to arrest him or seize his goods. In the third of his Institutes Sir Edward Coke (d. 1634) says:—

"A man's house is his castle, et domus sua cuique tutissimum refugium."

And, again, in his report on Semayne's case:—

"The house of everyone is to him as his castle and fortress, as well for his defence against injury and violence as for his repose."

Enjambment. See END-STOPPED.

Enlightened Doctor. The, Raymond Lully of Palma (about 1234-1315), a Spaniard, and one of the most distinguished of the 13th-century scholastic philosophers.

Enniskillen. See INNISKILLING.

Ennui (en' i ús). The earliest of the great epic poets of Rome (about 239-169 B.C.), and chief founder of Latin literature.

The English Ennuius. Layamon (fl. c. 1200), who made a late Anglo-Saxon paraphrase of Wace's Roman de Brut, has been so called, but the title is usually given to Chaucer.

The French Ennuius. Guillaume de Lorris (about 1235-65), author of the Romance of the Rose. Sometimes Jehen de Meung (about 1260-1318), who wrote a continuation of the romance, is so called.

The Spanish Ennuius. Juan de Mena (d. 1456), born at Cordova.

Enow. The representative of the inflexional plural of the A.S. adjective genogli (mod. enough), and still called by Johnson in his Dictionary (1755) "the plural of enough." It was used for numbers reckoned by tale, as: There are chairs enow, nails enow, men enow, etc.; but now enough does duty for both words, and enow is archaic.

Ensign (en' sén). The British Navy. The Union Jack (q.v.). The white ensign (Royal Navy) is the banner of St. George with the Jack cantioned in the first quarter; the red ensign is that of the merchant navy; the blue, that of the Navy reserve. See FLAG.

U.S.A. The Stars and Stripes.

In the British Army an ensign was formerly an officer to whom was entrusted the bearing of the regimental colours. It was the lowest commissioned rank, and in 1871 it was abolished, that of second lieutenant being substituted though the rank is still retained in the Footguards. In Shakespearean times the word was twisted into "ancient" or "auncient." In the U.S. Navy ensign is the lowest commissioned rank; it was instituted in 1862 when the rank of passed midshipman was abolished.

Entail (en' tal). An estate in which the right of the owner are cut down (Fr. tailler, to cut) by his being deprived of the power of alienating them and so barring the rights of his issue.

To cut off the entail is to put an end to the limitation of an inheritance to a particular line or class of heirs.
Entelechy (en'tel-ik) (Gr. telos, perfection). Aristotle's term for the complete realization of full expression of a function or potentiality; the result of the union of Matter (potentiality) and Form (reality): e.g. the soul, considered as an end that is attained, is the Entelechy of the body.

You can never get at the final entelechy which differentiates Shelley and Shakespeare from the average versifier. Clavilienus and myself from Pater or from Browne.—SANTÉREY: Hist. of English Prose Fiction, Preface (1912).

In Rabelais's Pantagruel (Bk. V, ch. xix), entelechy is the name given to the kingdom of the Lady Quintessence. The argument on the name: whether it is entelechy (perfecting and coming into actuality) or endelechy (duration) reflects the fierce disputes that took place among the medieval schoolmen on these two words.

Entente cordiale (on tont' kör di al') (Fr.). A cordial understanding between nations; not amounting to an alliance, but something more than a rapprochement. The term is not new, but is now usually applied to the entente between England and France that was arranged largely by the personal endeavours of Edward VII in 1906.

If Guizot remains in office Normanby must be recalled, as the only chance of a renewal of the entente cordiale.—Greville's Diary, p. 189 (1847).

Enthusiast. Literally, one who is possessed or inspired by a God (Gr. en theos). Inspired is very similar, being the Lat. in spirare, to breathe in (the god-like essence). In the 17th and 18th centuries the word enthusiasm was applied disparagingly to emotional religion. It is, according to Locke, "founded neither on reason nor divine revelation, but rises from the conceits of a warmed or over-weening brain."

Entire. A term rarely used now in connexion with beer but still seen on inn signs, etc. Before the introduction of porter in the early 18th century the chief malt liquors were ale, beer, and twopenny (a superior kind of ale sold at 2d. a pint). The constant demand for a mixture induced the brewers to combine the flavours of these three in a liquor drawn from one cask. This was called Entire, or, being much drunk by porters and their like, Porter. Entire is also used of stallions and other incrastrated animals.

Entrée (on' trá). In full-course dinners a made dish served between the fish and the joint; from this it has come to mean almost any made dish of meat or poultry.

To have entrée. To have the right or privilege of admission.

Entremets (on'tré mä) are served between the roast and the dessert; in other words they are the sweet course, which in the U.S.A. is known as dessert.

Entire nous (Fr.). Between you and me, in confidence.

Séolian Harp. See AEOLIAN.

Eolithic Age. The (é'ö lith' ik). The name given by paleontologists to the earliest part of the stone Age (Gr. eos, dawn, lithos, a stone), which is characterized by the rudest stone implements.

Eolas. See AEOLUS

Eon. See AEON.

Epact (é' pakt) (Gr. epaggein, to intercalate). The excess of the solar over the lunar year, the former consisting of 365 days, and the latter of 354, or eleven days fewer. The epact of any year is the number of days from the last new moon of the old year to the 1st of the following January. It was formerly used in determining the date of Easter. See Tables at beginning of Prayer Book.

Epaulet (é' aw let). A shoulder ornament worn by officers of the Royal Navy above the rank of sub-lieutenant, when in full dress. Epaulettes ceased to be worn in the Army in 1835. Officers of the U.S. Navy above the rank of ensign wear epaulettes, but since 1872 in the army they are worn by generals only.

Ephesian. A jolly companion; a roysterer. The origin of the term is unknown. Cp. CORINTHIAN, which Shakespeare used in much the same way.

Merry Wives of Windsor, iv, 5.

Diana of the Ephesians. See DIANA.

The Ephesian poet. Hipponax, born at Ephesus in the 6th century B.C.

Ephialtes. A giant, brother of Otus (q.v.), who was deprived of his left eye by Apollo, and of his right eye by Hercules.

Ephors. Spartan magistrates, five in number, annually elected from the ruling caste. They exercised control even over the kings and senate.

Epic. A poem of dramatic character dealing by means of narration with the history, real or fictitious, of some notable action or series of actions carried out under heroic or supernatural guidance. Epic poetry may be divided into two main classes: (a) the popular or national epic, including such works as the Greek Iliad and Odyssey, the Sanskrit Mahabharata, and the Teutonic Niebelungenlied; and (b) the literary or artificial epic, of which the Aeneid, Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, Tasso's Jerusalemme Liberata, and Milton's Paradise Lost are examples.

Father of Epic Poetry. Homer.

Epicurus (ep i' kú' rus). The Greek philosopher (c. 340-270 B.C.) who founded the Epicurean school. His axioms were that "happiness or enjoyment is the summum bonum of life." His disciples corrupted his doctrine into "Good living is the object we should all seek."

Hence, epicure, one devoted to the pleasures of the table; epicurean, pertaining to good eating and drinking, etc.

Epicurean cooks

Sharpen with cloyless sauce his appetite.

Antony and Cleopatra, ii, 1.
Epigoni. See Thebes (The Seven against Thebes).

Epigram (ep’i grám). This was originally a simple inscription attached to religious offerings, etc., but even in Classic times it came to mean any short piece of verse conveying a single idea with neatness and grace, though usually with a sting in its tail:

Treason doth never prosper; what’s the reason? For if it prosper, none dare call it treason.

Sir John Harrington, 1618.

You beat your pate, and fancy wit will come:
Knock as you please, there’s nobody at home.

Alexander Pope.

The Devil having nothing else to do
Went off to tempt My Lady Pelaguite.

My Lady, tempted by a private whim,
To his extreme annoyance, tempted him.

Hilaire Belloc.

Sir, I admit your general rule,
That every poet is a fool:
But you yourself may serve to show it,
That every fool is not a poet.

Matthew Prior.

Epimenides (e pi men’ i déz). A Cretan poet and philosopher of the 7th century B.C. who according to Pliny (Natural History), fell asleep in a cave when a boy, and did not wake for fifty-seven years, when he found himself endowed with miraculous wisdom. Cp. Rip Van Winkle.

Epiphany (e pip’ á ni) (Gr. epiphaneia, an appearance, manifestation). The time of appearance, meaning the period when the star appeared to the wise men of the East. January 6th is the Feast of the Epiphany in commemoration of this.

Episcopal Signatures. It is the custom of bishops of the Church of England to sign themselves with their Christian name and name of their see. In some of the older dioceses the Latin form is used, sometimes abbreviated:—

Cantuar: Canterbury
Roffen: Rochester.
Winton: Winchester.
Sarum: Salisbury.
Cicestr: Chichester.
Durum: Truro.
Exon: Exeter.
York.
Gloucest: Gloucester.
Durham.
North: Norwich.
Carlisle.
Oxon: Oxford.
Chester.
Petriburg: Peterborough.

Episode (Gr., coming in besides—i.e. adventitious). Originally, the parts in dialogue which were interpolated between the choric songs in Greek tragedy; hence, an adventitious tale introduced into the main story that can be naturally connected with the framework but which has not necessarily anything to do with it.

In music, an intermediate passage in a fugue, whereby the subject is for a time suspended.

Epistle (e pis’ él). This word, akin in origin to apostle, comes from a Greek verb meaning to send to, and is properly applied to a letter sent to a person at a distance. In modern usage a long and somewhat wordy letter is facetiously called an epistle. The word is more generally applied to the letter sent by the apostles to the various churches in which they were interested. There are thirteen from St. Paul, one from St. James, two from St. Peter, three from St. John, one from St. Jude and the epistle to the Hebrews of unknown authorship.

The epistle side of an altar is to the celebrant’s right as he faces it.

Epitaph (ep’i taf). In its strict meaning this is an inscription on a tomb, but it is frequently extended to include any brief and strikingly apt commemoration of a dead person:

Si monumentum requiris circumspice.

Sir Christopher Wren’s epitaph in St. Paul’s.

Thomas Fuller’s epitaph on himself, 1661.

Life is a jest, and all things show it.

I thought so once, and now I know it.

John Gay’s epitaph on himself, 1732.

Here a pretty baby lies
Sung asleep with lullabies;
Pray be silent, and not stir
Th’ easy earth that covers her.

His foe was folly and his weapon wit.

Epitaph on W. S. Gilbert by “Anthony Hope” Hawkins.

Epoch (é’ pok) (Gr., a stoppage, pause). A definite point of time; also the period that dates from such, the sequence of events that spring from it. The word is used with much the same sense as “era”; we speak of both the “Epoch” and the “Era” of the Reformation, for instance.

Epode (Gr. epodos, from adein, to sing). In ancient Greek lyric poetry, the part after the strophe and antistrophe; in the epode the chorus returned to their places and remained stationary.

Father of Choral Epode. Stesichorus of Sicily (632-552 B.C.).

Eppur si muove! (e poor sì mu ó’ vi) (Ital., and yet it [i.e. the earth] does move). The phrase said by a fable that dates only from 1757 to have been uttered in an undertone by Galileo immediately after his recantation of belief in the Copernican theory of the earth, which was made before the Inquisition in 1633. It is certainly apocryphal.

Epsom Races. Horse races instituted in the early 17th century and held on Epsom Downs for four days in May. The second day (Wednesday) is “Derby day” (q.v.), and on the fourth the “Oaks” (q.v.) is run.

There are other races held at Epsom besides the great four-day races—for instance, the City and Suburban and the Great Metropolitan (both handicap races).

Epsom salts. Magnesium sulphate; used medicinally as a purgative, etc., and so called because it was originally (from 1618) obtained by the evaporation of the water of a mineral spring in the vicinity of Epsom, Surrey.

Equality. The sign of equality in mathematics, two parallel lines (=), was invented by Robert Recorde, who died 1558.

As he said, nothing is more equal than parallel lines.

Equation of Time. The difference between mean and apparent time—i.e. the difference between the time as shown by a perfect clock and that indicated by a sundial. The greatest difference is at the beginning of November, when the sun is somewhat more than sixteen minutes slow. There are days in December, April, June, and September when the sun and the clocks agree.

Equipage (ek’ wi pá). To equip means to arm or furnish, and equipage is the furniture of a military man or body of troops. Hence camp equipage (all things necessary for an encampment); field equipage (all things necessary for the field of battle: tea equipage (a complete tea-service); a prince’s equipage, and so on. The word was often used for carriage and horses.

Era. A series of years beginning from some epoch or starting-point as:—

The Christian Era begins theoretically from the birth of Christ, though the actual Nativity was probably in 4 B.C.

Erastians. The followers of Thomas Lieber (1524-83), a German heretic who wrote a work on excommunication in which he advocated the imposition of restrictions on ecclesiastical jurisdiction. His name was grecized into Erastus (i.e. the lovely, or beloved). Erastianism, i.e. state supremacy or interference in ecclesiastical affairs, is named from him. The Church of England is sometimes called "Erastian," because the State controls its ritual and temporalities, and the sovereign, as the "head" of it, appoints bishops and other dignitaries.

Erato. One of the nine Muses (q.v.); the muse of erotic poetry; usually represented holding or playing a lyre.

Erebus. In Greek mythology, the son of Chaos and brother of Night; hence darkness personified. His name was given to the gloomy cavern underground through which the Shades had to walk in their passage to Hades.

Not Erebus itself were dim enough
To hide thee.

Eretria. The Eretrian bull. Menedemos of Eretria, in Euboea; a Greek philosopher of about 350-270 B.C., who founded the Eretrian school, a branch of the Socratic.

Erewhon (ér’ won, är’e won). The name of the ideal commonwealth in Samuel Butler’s philosophical novel of the same name (1872). It is an anagram of "Nowhere." Cp. Commonwealth, Ideal.

Erigena. John Scotus, called "Scotus the Wise," who died about 890. He must not be confounded with Duns Scotus (see DUNCE), who lived some four centuries later.

Erigone. See ICARUS.

Erin. Ireland (q.v.).

Erin go bragh! Ireland forever. See MAVOUR- NIN.

Erinyes (e rin’yez). In Greek mythology, daughters of Ge (Earth), avengers of wrong; the Furies. See Eumenides; Furies.

Erix. A giant mentioned by Rabelais.

Erk. As "airk" (abbreviation of aircraftsman) this nickname was given by the R.A.F. in World War I to aircraftsmen and mechanics. It was later transformed into "erk" and, in World War II, the Christian name of Joe was frequently added to it. By an extension of meaning any beginner at a new job was called an erk.

Erling. In German legend, a malevolent golem who haunts forests and lures people, especially children, to destruction. Goethe has a poem on him, set to music by Schubert.

Ermine (ér’ min). This is another name for the stoat, Putorius erminea, which has a brown coat in summer and a white one in winter, with a black tip to the tail. The word ermine is applied chiefly to the fur, which in its white state is used for the robes of judges and peers, and women’s cloaks. It is one of the furs in heraldry, being represented by a number of small arrowheads beneath three dots, all black and symmetrically arranged on a white field. There are two other furs, variations of this: ermine (ér’ minz) which is the reverse of ermine, being white spots on a black field; and ermineots (ér’ min ois), black spots on a gold (or) field. It is unheraldic to wear fur on a fur.

Ermine Street. One of the most ancient roads in Britain; originally running from Colchester by way of Godmanchester and Lincoln to York, but later connected by the Romans with London, in the south, and the Wall of Hadrian in the north. The origin of the name is obscure, but it is not Roman. It may be connected with Old Teutonic irmin, mighty, large. The most important of the other so-called "Roman roads" in Britain are Watling Street, Icknield Street, and the Fosse Way (qq.v.).

Eros. The Greek god of love, the youngest of all the gods; equivalent to the Roman Cupid (q.v.). The name is also given to the bronze winged archer surmounting the memorial to the 7th Earl of Shaftesbury, in the centre of Piccadilly Circus, London. The memorial was designed and the figure executed by Sir Alfred Gilbert (1854-1934) and unveiled in 1893.

Erra-Pater. The supposititious author of an almanack published about 1535 as The Pronostycacion for ever of Erra Pater: a Jewe born in Jewery, a Doctor in Astronomye and Physycye. It is a collection of astrological tables, rules of health, etc., and is arranged for use in any year.

[He] had got him a suit of durance, that would last longer than one of Erra Pater’s almanacks, or a constable’s browne bill.—Nash: Nashe’s Lenten Stuffe (1599).

The almanacks were frequently reprinted, and nearly a hundred years later Butler says of William Lilly, the almanack-maker and astrologer:—

In mathematics he was greater Than Tycho Brahe or Erra Pater.

Ersatz (är’ zats). A German word meaning artificial, something substituted for a natural product. In a wider application it includes anything of the nature of an inferior imitation or substitute.

Erse. The native language of the West Highlanders of Scotland. The word, which is now nearly obsolete, is a variant of Irish, and was applied by the Lowlanders to the Highland Gaelic. In the 18th century Scots was often called Erse, without distinction of Highland and Lowland; and Irish was spoken of as Irish Gaelic.

Erythynus (e' rith-i n' üs). Have no doings with the Erythynus, i.e. "don't trust a braggart." The Erythynus is mentioned by Pliny (ix, 77) as a red fish with a white belly, and Pythagoras used it as a symbol of a bragadocio, who fable says is white-livered.

Escapist (es' kap' ist.). The term applied by psycho-analysts to one who shirks unpleasant realities by withdrawing into a world of fantasy, or by concentrating on other and pleasanter activities or subjects for thought.

Escorial, or Escorial (es' kor' i all). The ancient palace of the Spanish sovereigns, containing also a monastery, church, and mausoleum, about twenty-seven miles north-west of Madrid. It is one of the most superb structures in Europe, and is built among rocks. It was erected in 1563-84 as the result of a vow to St. Laurence (hence the "gridiron" shape of its plan) made by Philip II at the battle of St. Quentin, 1557.

Escuage (es' kû' áj) (O.Fr. escu, Lat. scutum, a shield). A feudal term meaning "shield service," i.e. the obligation which bound a vassal to serve his lord in the field for forty days in the year at his own private charge.

Escolapius. See Æscolapius.

Esutechon of Pretence. In heraldry, the small shield of a wife, either heiress or co-heiress, placed in the centre of her husband's shield.

Esop. See Æsop.

Esoteric. See Æsop.

Esoteric (Gr.). Those within, as opposed to exoteric, those without. The term originated with Pythagoras, who stood behind a curtain when he gave his lectures. Those who were allowed to attend the lectures, but not to see his face, he called his exoteric disciples; but those who were allowed to enter the veil, his esoteric.

Aristotle adopted the same terms; those who attended his evening lectures, which were of a popular character, he called his exotericics; and those who attended his more abstruse morning lectures, his esoterics.

Esoteric Buddhism. See Theosophy.

Espirit de corps (es' pré de kôr) (Fr.). The spirit of pride in the society with which you are associated, and regard for its traditions and institutions.

Esquire (Lat. scutiger, a shield-bearer). One who carried the escu or shield of a knight. According to a dictum of the College of Heralds:—

The following persons are legally "Esquires":—The sons of peers, the sons of baronets, the sons of knights, the eldest sons of the younger sons of peers, and the eldest sons of peers, the eldest sons in perpetuity, the eldest son of a knight, and his eldest son in perpetuity, the kings of arms, the heralds of arms, officers of the Army or Navy of the rank of captain and upwards, sheriffs of Counties for life, J.P.'s of counties whilst in commission, serjeants-at-law, Queen's [King's] counsel, serjeants-at-arms, Companions of the Orders of Knighthood, certain principal officers in the Royal household, deputy lieutenants, commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy, masters of the Supreme Court, those whom the Sovereign, in any commission or warrant, styles esquire, and any person who, in virtue of his office, takes precedence of esquires."

To these, doctors of law, barristers, physicians and graduates of the universities not in holy orders are often added; but the general use of the suffix has robbed it of all distinction. It is never used in America, and rarely in the overseas parts of the Empire.

Essays. Lord Bacon's essays were the first in English that bore the name.

To write just treatises requireth leisure in the writer and leisure in the reader . . . which is the cause which hath made me choose to write certain brief notes . . . which I have called essays. The word is late, but the thing is ancient.—Suppressed Dedication to Prince Henry.

Essenes. A puritanical and mystical sect of Jews, originating about the 2nd century B.C., whose doctrines are supposed by some to have influenced those of our Saviour. They were communists who abjured every sort of fleshly indulgence, ate no animal food, drank only water, and whose only sacrifices to God were the fruits of the earth. They kept the Sabbath extremely strictly, always dressed in white, devoted themselves to contemplative studies, and held the Scriptures in great reverence, but interpreted them allegorically.

Essex Lions. Calves, for which the county is famous.

Estate (O.Fr. estat, Lat. status from stare, to stand). Estates of the realm. The powers that have the administration of affairs in their hands, that on which the realm stands. The three estates of Britain are the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons; popularly speaking, the public press is termed the "fourth estate" (q.v.). It is a mistake to call the three estates of England the Sovereign, the Lords, and the Commons.

The king and the three estates of the realm assembled in parliament.—Collect not Nov. 5.

Est-il-possible (ä têl pos e)l). A nickname of Prince George of Denmark (1653-1708), the consort of Queen Anne. The story goes that when he was told of the abdication of his father-in-law, James II, all he did was to exclaim, "Est-il possible?" and when told, further, of the several noblemen who had fallen away from him, "Est-il possible?" exhausted his indignation.

Estotiland (es' tôt' i land). An imaginary tract of land near the Arctic Circle in North America, said to have been discovered by John Scalve. a Pole. It is mentioned, and shown, in Peter Heylin's Microcosmos (1622).

The snow
From cold Exotiland.

Milton: Paradise Lost, x, 685.

Estramazon (es tre mə son) (Fr.). A blow or cut with a sword, hence also "estramaçonner".

Estrich. The old name for the ostrich (q.v.).

Eternal. The. God.

The Eternal City. Rome. The epitaph occurs in Ovid. Tibullus, etc., and in many official documents of the Empire; also Virgil (Enéid, i. 79) makes Jupiter tell Venus He would give to the Romans imperium sine fine (an eternal empire).

The eternal fitness of things. The congruity between an action and the agent.

Can anything have a higher notion of the rule of right and the eternal fitness of things?—Fielding: Tom Jones, Bk. iv, ch. iv.

The eternal tables. In Mohammedan legend, a white pearl extending from east to west, and from heaven to earth, on which God has recorded every event, past, present, and to come.

Etesian Wind (e tē' zhan). A Mediterranean wind which rises annually (Gr. etos, a year) about the dog-days, and blows forty days together in the same direction. It is gentle and mild.

Does not, good Porus, that in this my song
I mean to harrow up thy humble mind,
And stay that voice in London known so long;
For balm and softness, an Etesian wind.

Peter Pindar: Nil Admirare.

Ethiopia (ē thi' o' pya). This very ancient name has been revived in modern times as the official designation of Abyssinia. From the 11th century B.C., until the 4th century A.D., Ethiopia was an independent state, often of considerable power, when as in the 8th century B.C. it conquered Egypt and for two hundred years imposed its rulers upon her. In the 4th century A.D., Ethiopia was ravaged by Abyssinia; and in the 6th century its place was taken by the Christian state of Nubia. Tradition has it that the Queen of Sheba was an Ethiopian, and from her Menelik and the sovereigns of Abyssinia claim descent. Candace was the hereditary title of the Queens of Meroë, in Upper Nubia. The monarch of Ethiopia styles himself Emperor, King of Kings, Conquering Lion of the Tribe of Judah, Elect of God. The country was conquered and overrun by the Italians in 1936, but liberate in 1945. The ancient Ethiopian language of the Church and literature is Geez (gēz), of the Semitic group.

From earliest times the Ethiopians have been proverbial for their blackness:

Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard its spots?—Jer. xiii, 23.

Her beauty hangs upon the cheek of night
As a rich jewel in an Ethiopian's ear.

Romeo and Juliet, i. 5.

Thetis (Gr. ethē's, woman, heathen-named deity) was a prophetess and a heretic of the 7th century, who combined such pagan practices as divination, augury, astrology, etc., with Christianity.

Ethan. The eagle or vulture that gnawed the liver of Prometheus.

Etiquette. The usages of polite society. The word means a ticket or card, and refers to the ancient custom of delivering a card of directions and regulations to be observed by all those who attended court. In French the word originally meant a soldier's billet.

Etiquette... had its original application to those ceremonial and formal observances practised at Court.

... The term came afterwards... to signify certain formal methods used in the transactions between Sovereign States.—Burke: Works, vol. viii, p. 329.

Etna (et' nà). The highest active volcano in Europe. It stands over the Straits of Messina, 10,750 ft. high, covering an area of 460 sq. miles, and is ever active from some of its 200 minor cones. Serious eruptions occurred in 1923 and 1928, yet many towns and villages live within its continual menace. In Sicily Etna is known as Monte Gibello. Virgil (Enéid, iii, 578, etc.) ascribes its eruption to the restlessness of Enceladus, a hundred-headed giant, who lies buried under the mountain, where also the Greek and Latin poets placed the forges of Vulcan and the smithy of the Cyclops.

Etreme. See Strenia.

Etruria is a district in Stoke-upon-Trent founded and so named by Josiah Wedgwood when he established his pottery works there in 1769.

Etruscans (e trüs' kânž). These ancient and mysterious people lived in the region of Italy now corresponding more or less to Tuscany. The many monuments in their old lands have never been deciphered, and very little is known of their language. Their art is of high quality, and they have never been excelled in the making of gold jewellery. Of recent years it has been discovered that the Etruscans were Orientals, coming from Asia Minor originally, perhaps from Lydia but certainly from between the Hellespont and Syria.

Ettrick Shepherd. The name given to James Hogg (1770-1835), the Scottish poet who was born at Ettrick, Selkirkshire, the son of a shepherd, and himself a shepherd at Willanslee. He obtained his first success in 1807 with a volume of verse entitled The Mountain Bard; his principal work is, however, The Queen's Wake, 1813. Hogg figures largely in Wilson's Noctes Ambrosianae.

Etzel. The name given in German heroic legend to Attila (d. A.D. 453), King of the Huns, a monarch ruling over three kingdoms and more than thirty principalities.

Eucharist. The consecrated Elements in Holy Communion. (Gr. eucharistos, grateful).

Literally, a thank-offering. Our Lord said,
"Do this in remembrance of me"—i.e. out of gratitude to me. Cp. Impatience.

Euclid (ō' klid). Many generations of schoolboys knew geometry only as "Euclid," for the teaching of that branch of mathematics was based on the Elements of Euclid, a Greek geometer who lived in Alexandria about 300 B.C. Of his 15 books some have been lost and others mutilated by commentators and transcribers. Euclid's methods have been Eucrates (ὕ κρά τεύ). More shifts than Eucra­ tes. Eucrates, the miller, was one of the archons of Athens, noted for his shifts and excuses for neglecting the duties of the office.

Eudoxians (ὕ δόκσ’ ι ἄν). Heretics, whose founder was Eudoxius, patriarch of Antioch in the 4th century. They maintained that the Son had a will independent of the Father, and that sometimes their wills were at variance.

Eugenia (ὕ ηέ’ νι ις). The friend and coun­sellor of Yorick in Sterne’s Tristram Shandy is intended for John Hall Stevenson (1718-85), the disreputable author of Crazy Tales, and a relative of Sterne’s.

Eulalie, St. (ὕ ο’ λα λέ). Eulalon (i.e. “the sweetly-spoken”) is one of the names of Apollo, but there is a virgin martyr called Eulalie, born at Barcelona. When she was only twelve but there is a virgin martyr called Eulalie, born at Barcelona. When she was only twelve.

Eulenspiegel (οϊ λεν σπέ’ γέλι) (i.e. “Owl-glass”). Tyll. A 14th-century villager of Brunswick round whom clustered a large number of popular tales of all sorts of mischievous pranks, first printed in 1515. The work has been attributed (probably erroneously) to Thomas Murner (1475-1530); it was translated into many languages and rapidly achieved wide popularity. The tone poem on the subject by Richard Strauss was first performed in 1895.

Eumeus (ὕ με’ ύς). The slave and swineherd of Ulysses; hence, a swineherd.

This second Eumeus strode hastily down the forest glade, driving before him ... the whole herd of his inharmonious charges.—Scorr.

Eumenides (ὕ με’ νι ις) (Gr., the good­tempered ones). A name given by the Greeks to the Furies, as it would have been ominous and bad policy to call them by their right name, Erin­yes (q.v.).

Eupatridae (ὕ πάτ’ ρι δέ). The land-owning aristocracy of ancient Attica. These lords of creation were set aside by the time of Pericles, and a democratic form of government established.

Euphemism (ὕ έ’ φε’ μίζμ). Word or phrase substituted, to soften an offensive expression. Pope refers to the use of euphemisms in his lines.

To rest, the cushion and soft dean invite, Who never mentions hell to ears polite. Moral Essays, epist. iv, 149.

“His Satanic majesty”; “light-fingered gentry”; “a gentleman on his travels” (one transported); “an obliquity of vision” (a squint) are common examples.

Eureka (ὕ ṛε’ κά) (Gr., more correctly Heure­ka, I have found it). An exclamation of delight at having made a discovery; originally that of Archimedes, the Syracuse philosopher, when he discovered how to test the purity of Hiero’s crown. The tale is, that Hiero delivered a certain weight of gold to a smith to be made into a votive crown, but, suspecting that the gold had been alloyed with an inferior metal, asked Archimedes to test it. The philosopher did not know how to proceed, but in stepping into his bath, which was quite full, observed that some of the water ran over. It immediately struck him that a body must remove its own bulk of water when it is immersed; silver is lighter than gold, therefore a pound-weight of silver will be more bulky than a pound-weight of gold, and would consequently remove more water. In this way he found that the crown was deficient in gold; and Vitruvius says:

When the idea flashed across his mind, the philosopher jumped out of the bath exclaiming “Heureka! heureka!” and, without waiting to dress himself, ran home to try the experiment.

“Eureka!” is the motto of California, in allusion to the gold discovered there.

Eurus (ὕ ο’ ῥος). The east wind; connected with Gr. ἐσ and Lat. aurora, the dawn.

While southern gales or western oceans roll, And Eurus steals his ice-winds from the pole.

Eurydice (ὕ ρι’ δि). In Greek mythology the wife of Orpheus, killed by a serpent on her wedding night. Orpheus went down to the infernal regions to seek her, and was promised she would return on condition that he looked not back till she had reached the upper world. When the poet got to the confines of his journey, he turned his head to see if Eurydice were following, and she was instantly caught back again into Hades.

Restore, restore Eurydice to life: Oh, take the husband or return the wife, Pope: Ode on St. Cecilia’s Day.

Eustathians (ὕ στα θι άν). The followers of Eustathius, Bishop of Sebaste, in Armenia, who was deposed by the council of Gangra in 380.

Euterpe (ὕ τέ’ ρι πι). One of the nine Muses (q.v.); the inventor of the double flute; the muse of Dionysiac music; patroness of joy and pleasure, and of flute-players.

Eutychians (ὕ τι’ κ´ γανζ). Heretics of the 5th century, violently opposed to the Nestorians. They maintained that Jesus Christ was entirely God previous to the incarnation, and entirely man during His sojourn on earth, and were thus the forerunners of the Monophysites (q.v.). The founder was Eutyches, an abbott of Constantinople, excommunicated in 448.

Euxine Sea (ὕ κσ’ ιν). The Greek name for the Black Sea (q.v.), meaning the “ hospitable.” It was originally called by that people Axteinas, inhospitable, on account of its stormy charac­ter and rocky shores; but this name was changed euphemistically, as it was never thought wise to give a derogatory (even though true) name to any force of nature. Cp. Erin­yes and Eumenides.

Evangelists. The four Evangelists, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, are usually represented in art as follows:—

Matthew. With a pen in his hand, and a Evans's Supper Rooms

scroll before him, looking over his left shoulder at an angel.

Mark. Seated writing, and by his side a couchant winged lion.

Luke. With a pen, looking in deep thought over a scroll, and near him a cow or ox chewing the cud. He is also frequently shown as painting a picture, from the tradition that he painted a portrait of the Virgin.

John. A young man of great delicacy, with an eagle in the background to denote sublimity.

The more ancient symbols were—for Matthew, a man’s face; for Mark, a lion; for Luke an ox; and for John, a flying eagle; in allusion to the four living creatures before the throne of God, described in the Book of Revelation: “The first . . . was like a lion, and the second . . . like a calf, and the third . . . had a face as a man, and the fourth . . . was like a flying eagle” (iv, 7).

Another explanation is that Matthew is symbolized by a man, because he begins his gospel with the humanity of Jesus, as a descendant of David: Mark by a lion, because he begins his gospel with the scenes of John the Baptist and Jesus in the Wilderness; Luke by a calf, because he begins his gospel with the priest sacrificing in the temple; and John by an eagle, because he soars high, and begins his gospel with the divinity of the Logos. The four symbols are those of Ezekiel’s cherubim. Irenæus says: “The lion signifies the royalty of Christ; the calf His sacrificial office; the man’s face His incarnation; and the eagle the grace of the Holy Ghost.”

Evans’s Supper Rooms. In the early 19th century this was one of the best-known resorts of London night life. The house, at the north-west corner of Covent Garden, was on the site later occupied by the National Sporting Club.

In its heyday Evans’s was a supper room with entertainment provided solely by male artists. Women were not admitted except on giving their names and addresses, and even then were forced to enjoy the privilege of watching from behind a screen. Evans’s and the Cyder Cellar, described so graphically in Pindennis were the forebears—though far removed—of the music hall and variety show.

He that hath desdains of his neighbour, that is to say, of his evenchristian. —CHAUER: Parson’s Tale.

The more pity that great folk should have countenanced in this world to drown or hang themselves, more than their evenchristian.—Hamlet, v. 1.

Events. At all events. In any case; be the issue what it may; utcumque ceciderit.

In the event. “In the event of his being elected,” means in case, or provided he is elected; if the result is that he is elected.

Eve and Anon. From time to time. See Anon.

By 1864 it had stamped out the Taeping rebellion, which had broken out in 1851.

Everyman. The central character in the most famous 15th-century English morality play (q.v.) of the same name, which is considered by some to be a translation from a Dutch original (c. 1495), by others to have been the original. Everyman is summoned by Death and invites all his acquaintances (such as Kindred, Good Deeds, Goods, Knowledge, Beauty, Strength, etc.) to accompany him on his journey, but of them all only Good Deeds will go with him. The play in a German translation became world famous between the two world wars on account of Max Reinhardt’s lavish production of it upon the steps of the cathedral at successive Salzburg festivals.

The Everyman Library was started by Dents, London, in 1906 with 50 titles of which the first was Boswell’s Johnson. By the end of 1951 the library included 990 titles.

Evidence, In. Before the eyes of the people; to the front; actually present (Lat.). Evidence, meaning testimony in proof of something, has a large number of varieties, as:—

Circumstantial evidence. That based on corroborative incidents.

Demonstrative evidence. That which can be proved without leaving a doubt.

Direct evidence. That of an eye-witness.

External evidence. That derived from history or tradition.

Internal evidence. That derived from conformity with what is known.

Material evidence. That which is essential in order to carry proof.

Moral evidence. That which accords with general experience.

Presumptive evidence. That which is highly probable.

Prima facie evidence. That which seems likely, unless it can be explained away.

King’s evidence. That of an accessory against his accomplices, under the promise of pardon.

Self evidence. That derived from the senses: manifest and indubitable.

Evil. Evil communications corrupt good manners. The words are usually attributed to St. Paul (1 Cor. xv, 33); but he was evidently quoting Menander’s saying, “It must be that evil communications corrupt good dispositions.” Similar proverbs are, “he who touches pitch must expect to be defiled” (from Eccles., xiii, 1); “one scabbed sheep will infect a whole flock.”

Evil Eye. The alleged faculty of causing material harm by means of a glance; in rural England it is called “overlooking.” From its Latin name, fascinum, comes the word “fascination.” The evil eye is a form of witchcraft, owing its origin to the presumption that the human eye is capable of operating at a distance. In southern European countries the baleful effect of the evil eye is counteracted by closing the fist except for the forefinger and little finger, which are extended. This is a gesture of primeval antiquity. Virgil speaks of an evil eye making cattle lean.

Nescio quis teneros oculus mihi fascinat agnos. —Ecl. iii, 103.

Evil May Day. The name given to the serious rioting made on May lst, 1517, by the London apprentices, who fell on the French residents. The insurrection forms the basis of the anonymous Elizabethan play, Sir Thomas More.
The Evil One. The Devil.

Evil Principle. See AHRI MAN.

Of two evils, choose the least. See Choice.

Ewe-lamb. A single possession greatly prized; in allusion to the story told in 2 Sam. xii, 1-14.

Ex (Lat.). From, out of, after, or by reason of; it forms part of many adverbial phrases, of which those in common use in English are given below. As a prefix ex, when joined to the name of some office or dignity denotes a former holder of that office, or the holder immediately before the present holder. An ex-president is some former holder of the office; the ex-president is the same as "the late president," the one just before the present one.

Ex cathedra. With authority. The Pope, speaking ex cathedra, is said to speak with an infallible voice—to speak as the successor and representative of St. Peter, and in his pontifical character. The words mean "from the chair"—i.e. the ordination of the pope—and are applied to all dicta uttered by authority, and ironically to self-sufficient, dogmatic assertions.

Ex hypothesi. According to what is supposed or assumed; in consequence of assumption made.

Ex libris. Literally, "from the (collection of) books." The phrase is written in the books or printed on the bookplate, and is followed by the name of the owner in the genitive. Hence, a bookplate is often called an ex libris.

Ex luce lucellum. A gain or small profit out of light. It was originally said of the old window-tax, and when Lowe in 1871, proposed to tax lucifer matches, he suggested that the boxes should be labelled Ex luce lucellum.

Ex officio. By virtue of office. As, the Lord Mayor for the time being shall be ex officio one of the trustees.

Ex parte. Proceeding only from one of the parties; hence, prejudiced. An ex-parte statement is a one-sided or partial statement, a statement made by one side without modification from the other.

Ex pede Herculem. From this sample you can judge of the whole. Plutarch says that Pythagoras calculated the height of Hercules by comparing the length of various stadia in Greece. A stadium was 600 feet in length, but Hercules' stadium at Olympia was much longer; therefore, said the philosopher, the foot of Hercules was proportionately longer than an ordinary foot; and as the foot bears a certain ratio to the height, so the height of Hercules can be easily ascertained. Ex ungue leonem, a lion (may be drawn) from its claw, is a similar phrase.

Ex post facto. From what is done afterwards; retrospective. An ex post facto law is a law made to meet and punish a crime after the offence has been committed.

Ex professo. Avowedly; expressly.

I have never written ex professo on the subject. —GLADSTONE: Nineteenth Century, Nov., 1885.

Ex proprio motu. Of his (or its) own accord; voluntarily.

Ex uno omnes. From the instance deduced you may infer the nature of the rest. A general inference from a particular example; if one oak bears acorns, all oaks will.

Exaltation. In astrology, a planet was said to be in its "exaltation" when it was in that sign of the zodiac in which it was supposed to exercise its strongest influence. Thus the exaltation of Venus is in Pisces, and her "dejection" in Virgo.

And thus, god woot, Mercurie is desolate
In Pisces, wher Venus is exaltat.

Chaucer: Wife of Bath's Prologue, 703.

Exaltation of the Cross. A feast held in the Roman Catholic Church on September 14th (Holy Cross Day), in commemoration of the victory over the Persians in 627, when Heracles recovered and restored to Calvary the cross that had been carried away by Khosroes the Persian.

Excalibur (eks kal'i bér). The name of Arthur's sword (O. Fr. Escalibor), called by Geoffrey of Monmouth Caliburn, and in the Mabinogion Caledwch. There was a sword called Caladbolg, famous in Irish legend, which is thought to have meant "hard-belly," i.e. capable of consuming anything; this and the name Excalibur are probably connected.

By virtue of being the one knight who could pull Excalibur from a stone in which it had been magically fixed Arthur was acclaimed as "the right born king of all England." After his last battle, when the king lay sore wounded, it was returned at his command by Sir Bedivere to the Lady of the Lake. See Malory, Bk. xxi, ch. v, and Tennyson's Passing of Arthur (Idylls of the King).

Excellor (Lat., higher). Aim at higher things still. It is the motto of the United States, and has been made popular by Longfellow's poem so named.

Exception. The exception proves the rule. Without a rule, there could be no exception; the very fact of an exception proves there must be a rule.

To take exception. To feel offended; to find fault with.

Exchequer. Court of Exchequer. In the subdivision of the court in the reign of Edward I, the Exchequer acquired a separate and independent position. Its special duty was to order the revenues of the Crown and recover the king's debts. It was called the Scaccarium, from Lat. scaccum, a chess-board, because a chequered cloth was used on the table of the court. Foss, in his Lives of the Judges (1848-57), says:—

All round the table was a standing ledge four fingers broad, covered with a cloth bought in the Easter Term, and this cloth was "black rowed with stripes about a span," like a chess-board. On the spaces of this cloth counters were arranged, marked for checking computations.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is an office that originated under Henry III. Now a leading member of the Cabinet, he presents the Budget to the House of Commons and is responsible for the collecting and spending of the national revenue.
Excise. Literally, a piece cut off (Lat. excido). It is a toll or duty levied on articles of home consumption.

Excises on commodities are either on production within the country, or on importation into it, or on conveyance or sale within it; and are classed respectively as excise, customs, or tolls.—Mill: Political Economy, bk. v, ch. iii, p. 362.

In his Dictionary Dr. Johnson defined excise as "A hateful tax levied upon commodities."

Excommunication. An ecclesiastical censure by which a person is deprived of the communion of the Church. Excommunicates lose the right of attending divine service and receiving the sacraments; they have no share in indulgences or in public prayers or Masses. If clerics they are forbidden to administer the sacraments. Formal sentence is ordinarily required, but in certain cases excommunication is incurred at once by the commission of a forbidden act, ipso facto. The practice of excommunication was no doubt derived from the Jewish practice at the time of Christ, which entailed exclusion from religious and social intercourse (cp. Luke vi, 23; cp. Interdict; Bell, Book and Candle).

From the same word-origin, a prisoner could be held ex communicado, i.e. no one whatsoever could talk to him.

Exeat (Lat., he may go out). Permission granted by a bishop to a priest to leave his diocese. In the universities, permission to a student to be out of College for one or more nights, as opposed to an absit permitting his absence during the inside of a day.

Execrate. This is the direct opposite to onseccrate, and means to curse, to imprecate, to execrate, and means to curse, to imprecate. They gaze upon the links that hold them fast, with eyes of anguish, execrate their lot, and is in itself meaningless.

Cower: The Task, ii.

Exempli gratia (Lat.). For the sake of example: abbreviated to "e.g." when used as the introduction to an example.

Equaturs. An official recognition of a person authorizing him to exercise his power; formerly, the authoritative recognition of a papal bull by a bishop, sovereign, etc. The word is Latin, and means, "he may exercise" his function to which he has been appointed.

Exeter. See also Exeter.

The Duke of Exeter's daughter. See Duke.

The Exeter Book. A MS. collection of Anglo-Saxon poetry presented about 1060 by bishop Leofric to Exeter Cathedral, and still "reserved" in the library there. It includes riddles and "riddles" by Cynewulf (8th cent.), the Legends of St. Guthlac and St. Chad, "Widsith," "The Wanderer," "The Complaint of Deor," etc.

The Exon or Exeter Domesday (q.v.) is also sometimes called the "Exeter Book."

Exhibition. A scholarship, i.e. a fixed sum read over a definite period given by a school university, etc., as a result of an examination, for the purpose of assisting in defraying the st of education. The word was formerly used for maintenance generally, pecuniary support, an allowance of meat and drink.

They have founded six exhibitions of £15 each per annum, to continue for two years and a half.—Taylor: The University of Dublin, ch. v.

Exhibitions. Trade "fairs" for the display of manufactured goods to interested parties date from the Middle Ages, but the idea of attracting the general public was first brought forward by the Paris Exhibition of 1798. Several more were held in France during the first half of the 19th century, and the great success of the Paris exhibition of 1851 inspired the Prince Consort to promote the Great Exhibition of 1851, held in the Crystal Palace which was erected in Hyde Park, London. Since that date major exhibitions have been:

- Paris, 1855, 1867, 1878, 1889, 1900, 1937.
- Philadelphia, 1876.
- Melbourne, 1880, 1888.
- Chicago, 1893, 1933.
- St. Louis, 1904.
- San Francisco, 1915, 1939.
- New York, 1939.

Exhibitionism. In psycho-pathology this is an act of sexual gratification obtained by publicly exhibiting some part of the body normally clothed. In a less marked form exhibitionism takes the shape of performing acts likely to attract attention; in a yet milder form, to mere showing-off.

Existentialism (eks is ten' shal iizm). A philosophical theory originating with Soren Kierkegaard (1815-55) and current for a time in France after World War II, largely owing to the teaching of Jean-Paul Sartre. Man, say the Existentialists, can be free only through the full consciousness of his illogical position in a universe that has little relation to himself and is in itself meaningless.

Exit (Lat., he goes out). A stage direction showing when an actor is to leave the stage; hence, the departure of an actor from the stage and departure generally, especially from life; also a door, passage, or way out.

All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players:
They have their exits and their entrances. As You Like It, ii, 7.

Exodus (Gr. ex odos, a journey out). The second book of the Old Testament, which relates the departure of the Israelites from Egypt under the guidance of Moses; hence, a going out generally, especially a transference of population on a considerable scale, as the Exodus from Ireland, meaning the departure of the Irish in large numbers for America; and the expulsion of colonists from Nova Scotia in 1755.

Exon. One of the four officers in command of the Yeomen of the Guard; the acting officer who resides at the court; an exempt. The word is an Anglicized pronunciation of the Fr. exempt, this having been the title of a junior officer (next below an ensign) in the Life Guards.

Exon (short for Lat. Exoniensis, of Exonia, i.e. Exeter) is the signature of the Bishop of Exeter. See Episcopal Signatures.
Exon Domesday. A magnificent MS. on 532 folio vellum leaves, long preserved among the muniments at Exeter Cathedral, containing the survey of Wilts, Dorset, Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall. In 1816 it was published by Sir Henry Ellis as a Supplement to Domesday Book (q.v.).

Exoteric. See ESOTERIC.

Expectation Week. Between the Ascension and Whit Sunday, when the apostles continued praying “in earnest expectation of the Comforter.”

Experimental Philosophy. Science founded on experiments or data, in contradistinction to moral and mathematical sciences; also called natural philosophy.

Experto crede (Lat.). Believe one who has had experience in the matter. The phrase is used to add significance or weight to a warning.

Exposé (Fr.). A formal exposition; also, an exposure of something discreditable.

Exter. That's Exter, as the old woman said when she saw Kerton. A Devonshire saying, meaning, I thought my work was done, but I find much still remains before it is completed. “Exter” is the popular pronunciation of Exeter, and “Kerton” is Crediton. The tradition is that the woman in question was going for the first time to Exeter, and seeing the grand old church of Kerton (Crediton), supposed it to be Exeter Cathedral. “That’s Exter,” she said, “and my journey is over”; but alas! she had still eight miles to walk.

Extradition. The return of a criminal to stand trial, on request of the country in which his crimes are committed to the country to which he has fled. The first extradition treaty was signed between England and France in 1843.

Extreme Unction. One of the seven sacraments of the Catholic Church, founded on James v, 14, “Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the Church; and let them pray over him, anointing him of the oil in the name of the Lord.”

Eye. A sheet in the wind’s eye. An early stage of intoxication.

A sight for sore eyes. A proverbial expression used of something that is very welcome, pleasant, and unexpected.

Do you see any green in my eye? Do I look credulous and easy to be bamboozled? Do I look like a greenhorn?

Eyes to the blind. A staff; perhaps in allusion to that given to Tiresias (q.v.) by Athene, to serve him for the eyes of which she had deprived him.

In my mind’s eye. In my perceptive thought.

In the wind’s eye. Directly opposed to the wind.

In the twinkling of an eye. Immediately, very soon.

Mind your eye. Be careful or vigilant; keep a sharp look out; keep your eyes open to guard against mischief.

My eye! or Oh, my eye! an exclamation of astonishment. See ALL MY EYE.

One-eyed. An expression of contempt; as, “I’ve never been in such a one-eyed town,” i.e. such a poverty-stricken, mean, or unpleasing town.

One-eyed peoples. See ARIMASPIONS; CYCLOPS.

One might see that with half an eye. Easily; at a mere glance.

The eye of a needle. The words of Christ in Matt. xix, 24:— It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God, enshrine a proverbial saying, and there is no need to suppose that by “the eye of a needle” was intended the small arched entrance through the wall of a city, nor is there any evidence that such a gateway had any such name in Biblical times. See CAMEL. A similar Eastern proverb occurs at Matt. xxiii, 24:— Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat and swallow a camel; and “In Media a camel can dance on a bushel,” meaning that there are all things possible, is another ancient Eastern saying.

The Eye of Greece. Athens.

The eye of the storm. An opening between the storm clouds. Cp. BULL’S EYE.

To cast sheep’s eyes at one. See SHEEP.

To cry one’s eyes out. To cry immoderately or excessively.

To get one’s eye in. To adjust one’s sight at cricket, billiards, golf, bowls, etc.

To give the glad eye to. To cast inviting glances at.

To have, or keep, an eye on. To keep strict watch on the person or thing referred to.

To have an eye to. To keep constantly in view; to act from motives of policy. See MAIN CHANCE.

To keep one’s eyes skinned. To be particularly watchful.

To make eyes at. To look amorously or lovingly at.

To make someone open his eyes. To surprise him very much, and make him stare with wonder or admiration.

To pipe your eye. See PIPE.

To see eye to eye. To be of precisely the same opinion; to think both alike.

Up to the eyes. Wholly, completely; as up to the eyes in work, very fully occupied, mortgaged up to the eyes, to the last penny obtainable.

To hang on by one’s eyelashes. To be just able to maintain one’s position; hence, to be in difficulties.

Eye-opener. Something that furnishes enlightenment, also, a strong, mixed drink, especially a morning pick-me-up.
Eye-service. Unwilling service; the kind that is only done when under the eye of one's master.

Servants be obedient to them that are your masters... not with eye service, as men pleasers; but as the servants of Christ.—Eph. vi, 5, 6.

Eye-picking. The phrase used in Australia during the settling days for the practice of buying up here and there the choice lots of land, leaving the waste parts in between to settlers of smaller means; it was called "picking the eyes out of the country." Those who pursued this practice were known as pea-cockers.

Eye-teeth. The canine teeth; so called because their roots extend upwards nearly to the orbits of the eyes.

He has cut his eye-teeth. See Tooth.

To draw one's eye-teeth. To take the conceit out of a person; to fleece one without mercy;

Eye-wash. Flattery; soft sawder; fulsome adulation given for the purpose of blinding one to the real state of affairs.

Eyre (âr). Justices in Eyre. The ancient itinerant judges, who, from about 1100 to 1285, used to ride on circuit from county to county holding courts. Eyre is from late Lat. iterare, to journey, Lat. iter, a journey.

F

F. The first letter in the Runic futhorc (q.v.), but the sixth in the Phœnician and Latin alphabets, and their derivatives. The Egyptian hieroglyph represented a homed asp, and the Phœnician and Semitic character a peg.

Double F (Ff or ff) as an initial in a few personal names, as Ffoulkes, ffrench, etc., is a mistaken use in print of the mediæval or Old English capital F (f) as it appears written in engrossed leases, etc. In script the old capital F looked very much like two small f's entwined, and it so appears in all old documents, and in many modern legal ones, not only in the case of personal names but of all words beginning with a capital F. Its modern use is an affectation.

F is written on his face. The letter F used to be branded near the nose, on the left cheek of felons, on their being admitted to "benefit of clergy." The same was used for brawling in church. The custom was abolished by law in 1822.

F.A.N.Y. (British). First Aid Nursing Yeomanry, founded 1909. The first women to serve with the British Army besides regular nurses. In 1916 they began to drive ambulance convoys, and transport duties replaced their previous medical duties. Retained after 1918. Called out during the General Strike 1926. Active again on transport work, 1939-45.

F. E. R. T. See Annunciation, Order of the.

F.F.V. First Families of Virginia, a snobbish term used in the 19th century by descendants of the first settlers.

F.O.B. Free on board; meaning that the shipper, from the time of shipment, is free from all risk. Also prices are quoted as, for instance, "F.O.B. Detroit" where the goods have to make a long and expensive journey from the place of manufacture to their purchaser.

Fabius (fa' bi ús). See Cunctator, and Fabian Society, below.

The American Fabius, George Washington (1732-99), whose military policy was similar to that of Fabius. He wore out the English troops by harassing them without coming to a pitched battle.

Fabian Society (fa' bi án). An association of socialists founded in January, 1884, by a small group of "intellectuals," which included George Bernard Shaw (1856-1950) and Sidney Webb (1859-1947) among others. As announced in its prospectus, it aims at "the reorganization of society by the emancipation of land and industrial capital from individual and class ownership and the vesting of them in the community for the general benefit... and at "the transfer to the community of the administration of such industrial capital as can conveniently be managed socially."

The name is derived from Quintus Fabius (275-203 B.C.), surnamed "Cunctator" (q.v.), the Roman general, who won his way against Hannibal by wariness not by violence, by caution, not by deliberation.

Fables. See Æsop; Pilpay. La Fontaine (1621-95) has been called the French Æsop, and John Gay (1685-1732) the English.

Fabliaux (fab' lâ). Metrical tales, for the most part comic and satirical, and intended primarily for recitation by the Trouvères, or early poets north of the Loire, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The word is used very widely, for it includes not only such tales as Reynard the Fox, but all sorts of familiar incidents of knavery and intrigue, legends, family traditions, and caricatures, especially of women.

Fabricius (fa' brish' ús). A Roman hero (died c. 270 B.C.), representative of incorruptibility and honesty. The ancient writers tell of the frugal way in which he lived on his farm, how he refused the rich presents offered him by the Samnite ambassadors, and how at death he left no portion for his daughters, whom the senate provided for.

Fabulinus. The god, mentioned by Varro, who taught Roman children to utter their first word (fabulator, to speak). It was Vagianus who taught them to utter their first cry.

Face. A colloquialism for cheek, impudence, self-confidence, etc., as "He has face enough for anything," i.e. cheek or assurance enough. The use is quite an old one:

I admire thy impudence; I could never have had the face to have wheedled the poor knight so.—Etherege: She Would if She Could, i (1668).

A wry face. The features drawn awry, expressive of distaste.

Face to face. In the immediate presence of each other; two or more persons facing each other.
On the face of it. To all appearance; in the literal sense of the words.

That puts a new face on the matter. Said when fresh evidence has been produced, or something has happened which sets the case in a new light and makes it look different.

To draw a long face. To look dissatisfied or sorrowful, in which case the mouth is drawn down at the corners, the eyes are dejected, and the face has an elongated appearance.

To face down. To withstand with boldness and effrontery.

To face it out. To persist in an assertion which is not true. To maintain without changing colour or hanging the head.

To face the music. To stand up boldly and meet a crisis without faltering.

To fly in the face of. To oppose violently and unreasonably: to set at defiance rashly.

To have two faces, or to keep two faces under one hood. To be double-faced; to pretend to be very religious, and yet live an evil life.

To look a person in the face, or full in the face. To meet with a steady gaze; implying lack of fear, or, sometimes, a spirit of defiance.

To lose face. To be lowered in the esteem of others through an affront to one's dignity—a matter of the utmost importance in the Far East.

To make faces. To make grimaces with the face.

To put a bold, or a good, face on the matter. To make the best of a bad matter; to bear up under something disagreeable.

To save one's face. Narrowly to avoid almost inevitable disgrace, disaster, or discomfiture.

To set one's face against something. To oppose it; to resist its being done.

To shut the door in one's face. To put an end to the negotiations, or whatever is in hand.

Face-lifting. A method of enhancing beauty or concealing the marks of age by an operation in which the skin of the face is tightened and wrinkles removed.

Faced. With a facing, lining of the cuffs, etc.; used of an inferior article bearing the surface of a superior one, as when cotton-velvet has a silk surface.

Bare-faced. See Barefaced.

Facer. A blow in the face, a sudden check, a dilemma.

Face-card or Faced-card. A court card, a card with a face on it.

Facile princeps. By far the best; admittedly first.

Facilis descensus Averno. See Avernus.

Facings. To put someone through his facings. To examine; to ascertain if what appears on the surface is superficial only. The term is also used for the lapels and cuffs on regimental uniforms, which used to differ in colour from the body of the coat, e.g. The Buffs (q.v.), so called from wearing buff facings to their red coats.

Façon de parler. Idiomatic or usual form of speech.

Faction. The Romans divided the combatants in the circus into classes, called factions, each class being distinguished by its special colour, like the crews of a boat-race. The four original factions were the leek-green (præsina), the sea-blue (veneta), the white (alba), and the rose-red (rosea). Two other factions were added by Domitian, the colours being golden yellow (aurata) and purple. As these combatants strove against each other, and entertained a strong esprit de corps, the word was easily applied to political partisans.

Factor. An agent, a substitute in mercantile matters, a commission merchant.

A sleep and naked as an Indian lay
An honest factor stole a gem away.

Pope: Moral Essays, Ep. iii.

This refers to Thomas Pitt, Governor of Fort St. George, who obtained the famous Pitt Diamond (q.v.).

Factory King. The name given to Richard Oastler (1789-1861), of Bradford, who devoted his life to the betterment of factory conditions, especially to the prohibition of child-labour and to the promotion of a Ten Hours Bill.

Factotum (Lat. facere totum, to do everything required). One who does for his employer all sorts of services. Sometimes called a Johannes Factotum. Formerly the term meant a "Jack-of-all-trades," and it is in this sense that Greene used it in his famous reference to Shakespeare:

There is an upstart Crow, beautified with our feathers, that with his Tygers heart wrapt in a Players hide, supposes he is as well able to bumbast out a blanke verse as the best of you: but being an absolute Johannes fac totum, is in his owne conceit the onely Shake-scene in a countrie.—Green's Greatworth of Wit (1592).

Fad. A hobby, a temporary fancy, a whim. Perhaps a contraction of faddle in "fiddle-faddle."

Fade. To fade in, to fade out. Phrases applied in cinematography to the operation of causing a picture to appear or disappear gradually; and similarly in broadcasting, it describes the fading of sound into silence.

In golf, a ball so struck that towards the end of its flight it drifts towards the right is said to have a bit of fade.

Fadge. A contraction of face and fuddle.

Fadge. Probably a Scandinavian word, connected with fage, to suit. To suit or fit together as, It won't fadge; we cannot fudge together; he does not fadge with me.

Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, ii, 2.

How will this fadge?

The word is also old slang for a farthing.

Færie (fa' er i). The land of the fays or faeries.

The chief fay realms are Avalon, an island somewhere in the ocean; Oberon's dominions, situate "in wilderness among the holtis hairy"; and a realm somewhat in the middle of the earth, where was Parle clan's palace.

For learned Colin [Spenser] lays his pipes to gate, And is to Faery gone a pilgrimage.

Drayton: Elogue, iii.
Faerie Queene, The (fəˈri kwən). An allegorical romance of chivalry by Edmund Spenser, originally intended to have been in 12 books, each of which was to have portrayed one of the 12 moral virtues. Only six books of twelve cantos each, and part of a seventh, were written (I to III published in 1590, IV to VI in 1596, and the remaining fragments in 1611). It details the adventures of various knights, who personify different virtues, and belong to the court of Gloriana, the Faerie Queene, who sometimes typifies Queen Elizabeth.

Fag. Slang for a cigarette. The origin of the word is not known. Fag-end. The stub of a cigarette.

In public schools a fag is a small boy who awaits upon a bigger one. The system was already established at Eton and Winchester in the 16th century. Dr. Arnold (1795-1842) the famous headmaster of Rugby, described it as "the power given by the supreme authorities of the School to the Sixth Form to be exercised by them over the lower boys for the sake of securing a regular government among the boys themselves and avoiding the evil of anarchy." Tom Brown's School Days and many volumes of reminiscences reveal the system at its best and worst.

It's too much fag. Too much trouble, too much needless exertion.

Quite fagged out. Wornied with hard work; tired out.

Fag-end. Originally the coarse end of a piece of cloth; hence the remaining part of anything; as "the fag-end of a leg of mutton," "the fag-end of a conversation," or "the fag-end of a session," which means the last few days before dissolution.

I never yet saw a great House so neatly kept. . . . The Kitchen and Gutters and other Offices of noise and drudgery are at the fag-end; there's a Back-gate for the Beggars and the meaner sort of Swains to come in at.—Howell's Familiar Letters (20 May, 1619).

Faggot. A bundle of sticks.

In mediaeval times heretics were often burned at the stake with faggots, hence an embroidered representation of a faggot was worn on the arm by those who had recanted their "heretical" opinions. It was designed to show what they had done but had narrowly escaped.

Faggot votes. Votes obtained by the nominal transfer of property to a person whose income was not otherwise sufficient to qualify him for being a voter.

The "faggot" was a bundle of property divided into small lots for the purpose stated above.

Lord Lonsdale had conveyed to him a certain property, on which he was to vote in that borough, as, what was familiarly called a faggot vote.—Sir F. BURLETT: Parl. Debates, 1817.

The culinary faggot, deriving from the Latin ficatum, the liver of a pig fattened on figs, is a dish of liver chopped and seasoned with herbs before baking.

Fagin (fā' gin). The rascally Jew who taught boys and girls how to pick pockets. This figure from Dickens's Oliver Twist was for many years proverbial.

Faience. Majolica. So called from Faenza, where, in 1299, it was first manufactured. It is termed majolica because the first specimens the Italians saw came from Majorca.

Faineant. Les Rois Fainéants (the "nonchalent" or "do-nothing" kings) Clovis II (d. 656) and his ten Merovingian successors on the French throne. The line came to an end in 751, when Pepin the Short usurped the crown. Louis V (last of the Carolingian dynasty, d. 987) received the same name.

Fains (fänz). A schoolchildren's formula of unknown origin. When there is some undesirable task to be done, whoever says "Fains I" first is exempted from performing it; e.g. "Fains I carry the bag!"

Faint. Faint heart ne'er won fair lady. An old proverb, with obvious meaning. It occurs in Phineas Fletcher's Britain's Ida (ca. v, st. 1), 1628, but is probably a good deal older.

Fair. As personal epithets.

Edwy, or Eadwig, King of Wessex (938-58).

Charles IV, King of France, le Bel (1294, 1322-8).

Philippe IV of France, le Bel (1268, 1285-1314).

Fair Geraldine. See Geraldine.

The Fair-haired. Harold I, King of Norway (reigned 872-930).

Fair Maid of Anjou. Lady Edith Plantagenet (fl. 1200), who married David, Prince Royal of Scotland.

Fair Maid of Brittany. Eleanor (d. 1241), granddaughter of Henry II, and, after the death of Arthur (1203), the rightful sovereign of England. Her uncle, the usurper King John, imprisoned her in Bristol Castle, which she left to enter a nunnery at Amesbury. Her father, Geoffrey, John's elder brother, was Count of Brittany.

Fair Maid of Kent. Joan (1282-85), Countess of Salisbury, wife of the Black Prince, and only daughter of Edmund Plantagenet, Earl of Kent. She had been twice married ere she gave her hand to the prince.

Fair Maid of Norway. Margaret (1283-90), daughter of Eric II of Norway, and granddaughter of Alexander III of Scotland. On his death she was recognized by the states of Scotland as successor to the throne. She set out for her kingdom, but died at sea from seasickness.

Fair Maid of Perth. Katie Glover, heroine of Scott's novel of the same name, is supposed to have lived in the early 15th century, but is not a definite historical character, though her house is still shown at Perth.

Fair Rosamund. See Rosamond.

A day after the fair. Too late for the fun; wise after the event. Here fair is (through French) from Lat. feria, a holiday, and is quite unconnected with the adjective fair, which is the A.S. fager.

A fair field and no favour. Every opportunity being given.

By fair means. Straightforwardly; without deception or compulsion.
Fair and soft goes far in a day. Courtesy and moderation will help one to effect a good deal of his purpose.

Fair and square. Honestly, justly, with straightforwardness.

Fair fall you. Good befall you.

Fair game. A worthy subject of banter; one who exposes himself to ridicule and may be fairly made a butt of.

Fair Trade. An old euphemism for smuggling.

In politics the phrase signifies reciprocity of protection or free trade; that is, free trade to those nations that grant free trade to us.

Fair words butter no parsnips. See Butter.

In a fair way. On the right tack.

Fairway. The clear run from hole to hole on a golf-course, etc.

The fair sex. Women generally; the phrase was modelled on the French le beau sexe.

To bid fair. To give good promise; to indicate future success or excellence as “he bids fair to be a good . . . .”

Fair Isle. One of the Shetlands where a special pattern of knitting is done.

Fairlop Oak. A huge tree in the forest of Hainault, Essex, blown down in 1820. Prior to that a fair was held annually in July beneath its spreading branches.

Fairy. The names of the principal fairies and of groups of similar sprites known to fable and legend are given throughout the Dictionary.

Fairies of nursery mythology wear a red conical cap; a mantle of green cloth, inlaid with wild flowers; green pantaloons, buttoned with bobs of silk; and silver shoon. Some accounts add that they carry quivers of arrows and dipped in the dew from the cup of a harebell.

Fairies small two foot tall,
With caps red on their head
Dance a round on the ground.

JASPER FISHER: Song from Fauns Tres (1633).

Fairy darts. Flint arrow-heads. See Elf Arrows.

Fairy loaves or stones. Fossil sea-urchins, said to be made by the fairies.

Fairy money. Found money. Said to be placed by some good fairy at the spot where it was picked up. “Fairy money” is apt to be transformed into leaves.

Fairy of the mine. A malevolent gnome (q.v.) supposed to live in mines, busying itself with cutting ore, turning the windlass, etc., but effecting nothing.

No goblin, or swart fairy of the mine,
Hath hurtful power o’er true virginity.

Milton: Comus, 447.

Fairy rings. Circles of rank or withered grass, often seen in lawns, meadows, and grass-plots, and popularly supposed to be produced by fairies dancing on the spot. In sober truth, these rings are simply an agaric or fungus below the surface, which has seeded circularly, as many plants do. Where the ring is brown and almost bare, the “spawn” has enveloped the roots and thus prevented their absorbing moisture; but where the grass is rank the “spawn” itself has died, and served as manure to the young grass.

You demi-puppets, that
By moonshine do the green-sour ringlets make,
Whereof the ewe not bites.

SHAKESPEARE: Tempest, v. 1.

Fairy sparks. The phosphoric light from decaying wood, fish, and other substances. Thought at one time to be lights prepared for the fairies at their revels.

Fait accompli (fä tê kom’ plô) (Fr.). An accomplished fact, something already done; a scheme which has been already carried out; often used in the sense of stealing a march on some other party.

I pointed out to Herr von Jagow that this fait accompli of the violation of the Belgian frontier rendered, as he would readily understand, the situation exceedingly grave.—Sir Edward Goschen, Ambassador in Berlin, to Sir Edward Grey, 8 Aug., 1914.

Faith. Act of faith. See Auto da Fe.

Defender of the Faith. See Defender.

In good faith. “Bona fide”; “de bonne foi”; with no ulterior motive.

To pin one’s faith to. See Pin.

Faithful, in Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress, is seized at Vanity Fair, burnt to death, and taken to heaven in a chariot of fire. A Puritan used to be called Brother Faithful. The active disciples of any cult are called the faithful.

Commander of the Faithful. The Caliph is so called by Mohammedans.

Father of the faithful. Abraham (Rom. iv; Gal. iii, 6-9).

Most Faithful King. The. The appellation by which the kings of Portugal used to be addressed by the Vatican. Cp. Religious.

Fake. A fraud or swindle; also verb, as “to fake antiques,” “to fake the accounts,” i.e. to “cook” them, falsify them. The word is old thieves’ slang from Dutch or German, and was originally feague. Fea­quing a horse was making it look younger or stronger for purposes of sale. Cp. To Bishop.

Fakir (fä’ kér). Properly, a Mohammedan religious beggar or mendicant. Fakirs wear coarse black or brown dresses, and a black turban over which a red handkerchief is tied, turban over which a red handkerchief is tied, and perform menial offices connected with burials, the cleaning of mosques, and so on. The use of the word has been extended to include both Moslem and Hindu holy men, often distinguished by their asceticism and indifference to pain or discomfort.

Falbalas. Flounces on petticoats and sleeves; introduced by Madame de Maintenon in the late seventeenth century.
Fall. So Yereigns kneel the NtJ. ble folding chair of Adam. There were three sorts—the rough, the stool, the church, than the desk at which Drayton. Middleton, Falernus. There were three sorts—the rough, the sweet, and the dry.

Fall. In music, a sinking of tone, a cadence. That strain again! it had a dying fall: O! it came over my ear like the sweet sound That breathes upon a bank of violets, Stealing and giving odour. Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, i, 1. The strains decay, and melt away, in a dying, dying fall. Pope: St. Cecilia's Day.

In the fall. In the autumn, at the fall of the leaf. Though now commonly classed as an Americanism the term was formerly in good use in England, and is found in the works of Drayton, Middleton, Raleigh, and other Elizabethans. What crowds of patients the town doctor kills, O! how, last fall, he raised the weekly bills. Dryden: Juvenal.

The Fall of man. The degeneracy of the human race in consequence of the disobedience of Adam. The fall of the drop, in theatrical parlance, means the fall of the drop-curtain at the end of the act or play. The fall line. The point at which rivers begin to fall on their way to the sea. It is a term of American geology, but its implications are largely sociological. The fall line determining the location of cities and influencing the lives of those inhabiting the area, who are known as Fall Liners. For example, in the Southern States of U.S.A. the fall line runs through Virginia, down to Georgia and turns across to the Mississippi, producing circumstances and problems of national importance.

To ride for a fall. See Ride.
To try a fall. To wrestle, when each tries to fall or throw the other. I am given, sir, to understand that your younger brother, Orlando, hath a disposition to come a disguised against me to try a fall.—As You Like It, i, 1.
See also Falling-bands.

To fall away. To lose flesh; to degenerate. To quit a party, as “his adherents fell away one by one.”
To fall back upon. To have recourse to.
To fall between two stools. To fail, through hesitation between two choices. The French say, “Etre assis entre deux chaises.”
To fall flat. To lie prostrate or procumbent; to fail to interest, as “the last act fell flat.”

To fall foul of one. To make an assault on someone; to quarrel with, or run up against someone. A sea term. A rope is said to be foul when it is entangled; and one ship falls foul of another when it runs against her and prevents her free progress.
To fall from. To violate, as “to fall from his word”; to tumble or slip off, as “to fall from a horse”; to abandon or go away from, as “to fall from grace,” to relapse into sin.
To fall in. To take one’s place with others; to concur with, as “he fell in with my views”—that is, his views or ideas fell into line with my views or ideas. Cp. Fall out.

To fall in love with. To become enamoured of.
To fall in with. To meet accidentally; to come across. This is a Latin phrase, in aliquam casu incidere.

To fall into a snare. To stumble accidentally into a snare. This is a Latin phrase, insidias incidere. Similarly, to fall into disgrace is the Latin in oppositionem cadere.
To fall out. To quarrel; also, to happen. Cp. Fall in.

Three children sliding on the ice Upon a summer’s day: The rest they rain away. Porson: Mother Goose.

To leave the ranks; hence, to take one’s departure, to desert some cause.

To fall short of. To be deficient of a supply. To fall short of the mark is a figure taken from archery, quots. etc., where the missile falls to the ground before reaching the mark.

To fall through. To fail of being carried out or accomplished.

To fall to. To begin (eating, fighting, etc.). Come, Sir, fall to, then; you see my little supper is always ready when I come home, and I’ll make no stranger of you.—Cotton, in Walton’s Compleat Angler.

To fall to the ground. To fall from lack of support; to become of no account. “In view of what has happened my proposals fall to the ground,” i.e. are rendered useless.

To fall together by the ears. To fight and scratch each other; to contend in strife. See Ear.

To fall under. To incur, as, “to fall under the reproach of carelessness”; to be submitted to, as, “to fall under consideration.”

To fall upon. To attack, as “to fall upon the rear”; to throw oneself on, as, “he fell on his sword”; to happen on, as, “On what day does Easter fall?”

To fall upon one’s feet. To find oneself unexpectedly lucky; to find oneself in a situation where everything seems to go right. Evidently from the old theory that a cat always falls on its feet and is able to get away unhurt.

Fall-back chaise. A chaise with an adjustable hood.
Falling-bands. Neck-bands which fall on the breast. They were common in the 17th century, when they were also called falls.

Under that hayre ruffe so sprucely set
Appears a fall, a falling-band forsooth!
MARSTON: Scourge of Villainie, III (1599).

Falling sickness. Epilepsy, in which the patient falls suddenly to the ground. Shakespeare plays on the term:—
And honest Casca, we have the falling-sickness.

Brutus: He hath the falling-sickness.
Cassius: No, Caesar hath it not; but you, and I,
Julius Caesar, i, 2.

Falling stars. Meteors. Mohammedans believe them to be firebrands flung by good angels against evil spirits when they approach too near the gates of heaven. A wish wished as a star falls is supposed to come true.

Evelyn's Diary.

Familarity. Familiarity breeds contempt. The proverb appears in English at least as early as the mid-16th century (Udall), and was well known in Latin.

Family. Familiar spirit (Lat. famulus, a servant). A spirit slave, sometimes in human form, sometimes appearing as a cat, dog, raven, or other dumb creature, petted by a raven, or other dumb creature, petted by a witch,” and supposed to be her demon in disguise.

Away with him! he has a familiar under his tongue.
—2 Henry VI, iv, 7.

Fan.

- Could brain him with his lady's fan (1 Henry IV, ii, 3)—i.e. knock his brains out with something whose weight and strength is very trifling.

- Your head were broken with the handle of a fan, or your nose bored with a silver bodkin?

FLETCHER: Wit at Several Weapons, v, 1.

Fanatic. Literally one who is possessed of the enthusiasm or madness of the temple, i.e. engendered by over-indulgence in religious observances (Lat. fanum, a temple—the Eng. fane). Among the Romans there were certain persons who attended the temples and fell into strange fits, in which they were credited with being able to see the spirits of the past and to foretell the events of the future.

Earth's fanatics make Too frequently heaven's saints.
Mrs. BROWNING: Aurora Leigh, ii, 448.

Fancy. Love—i.e. the passion of the fantasy or imagination.

Tell me where is fancy bred,
Or in the heart or in the head.
Merchant of Venice, iii, 2.

The fancy. In early 19th-century sporting parlance a collective name for prize-fighters.

The patrons of the Fancy are proud of their champion's condition.

GEORGE ELIOT, Janet's Repentance.

Fancy-man. Originally a cavalier servente (q.v.) or circuito (q.v.); one selected by a married woman to escort her to theatres, etc., to ride about with her, and to amuse her. It is now more usually applied to a harlot's souteneur.

Fancy-sick. Love-sick.

All fancy-sick she is, and pale of cheer.
Midsummer Night's Dream, iii, 9.

Fanfaron. (fan' fahr on). A swaggering bully; a cowardly boaster who blows his own trumpet. Scott uses the word for finery, especially for the gold lace worn by military men. Fr. fanfare, a flourish of trumpets.

Hence, fanfaronade, swaggering; vain boasting; ostentatious display.

The bishop copied this proceeding from the fanfaronade of M. Boufflers.—SWIFT.

Fanny, Lord. A nickname given by Pope to Lord Hervey (1696-1743) for his effeminate and foppish manners. He painted his face, and was as pretty in his ways as a boarding-school miss. See SPORUS.

The lines are weak, another's pleased to say,
Lord Fanny spins a thousand such a day.
POPE: Satires of Horace, i.

Fanny Adams. Sweet Fanny Adams, meaning “nothing at all,” though (especially by its initials alone) with a somewhat ambiguous connotation, is a phrase with a tragic origin. In 1810 a girl Fanny Adams was murdered at Alton, Hants, and her body cut up and thrown into the river Wey. With gruesome humour the Navy took up her name as a synonym for tinned mutton, and Sweet Fanny Adams became a phrase for anything worthless or, in fact, for nothing at all.

Fantigue (fàn teg'). A fussy anxiety: that restless, nervous commotion which persons have who are over-wrought. To get in a fantigue over something, is to get thoroughly excited, hysterical, or out of humour about it.

Fantoccini (fàn to chè' ni). A dramatic performance by puppets. (Ital. fantoccio, a puppet.)

Fantom. An old spelling of Phantom (q.v.).

Far. A far cry. See CRY.

Far and away. Beyond comparison; as, “far and away the best,” some person or thing beyond all rivalry.

Far and wide. To a good distance in every direction. “To spread the news far and wide,” to blazon it everywhere.

Far-fetched. Not closely connected; strained, as, “a far-fetched simile,” a “far-fetched allusion.”

The passion for long, involved sentences ... and far-fetched conceits ... passed away, and a clearer and less ornate style became popular.—LECKY: England in the Eighteenth Century, vol. i, ch. 1.

Far from it. Not in the least; by no means; quite the contrary. If the answer to “Was he sober at the time?” is “Far from it,” the implication is that he was in a considerably advanced state of intoxication.

Far gone. Deeply affected: as, “far gone in love.”

Farce. A grotesque and exaggerated kind of comedy, full of ludicrous incidents and expressions. The word is the Old French farcire, stuffing (from Lat. farcire, to stuff), hence an interlude stuffed into or inserted in the main piece, such interludes always being of a racy, exaggerated comic character.

Farce is that in poetry which grotesque is in a picture. The persons and action of a farce are all unnatural, and the manners, false, that is inconsistent with the characters of mankind.—DRYDEN: Parallel of Poetry and Painting.

The following couplet was written by Garrick on the self-knighted Sir John Hill (d. 1775) a quack whose adventures would make a book in themselves. He had written a farce in which Garrick played, and which was a failure:

For physic and farces his equal there scarce is,
His farces are physic, his physic a farce is.

Fancy or Farcin. A disease in horses, which consists of a swelling of the ganglions and lymphatic vessels and shows itself in little knots; very like glanders. The name is, like farce (above) from Lat. farcire, to stuff.

Farde or Fardel. A variant of obsolete fardle (from which comes furl, to furl a sail), meaning to roll up; hence, that which is rolled up, i.e. a bundle or package.

Who would fardels bear,
To grunt and sweat under a weary life?

Hamlet, iii, 1.

Like a pedlar she went up and down:
For she had got a pretty handsome pack,
Which she had fardled neatly at her back.

Fare. (A.S. faran, to go, to travel: connected with Lat. portare, to carry.) The noun formerly denoted a journey for which a sum was paid; but now the sum itself, and, by extension, the person who pays it. In certain English dialects, e.g. Suffolk, the verb fare is used in its original sense of “to go,” also as an auxiliary with much the same sense as “to do.”

Farewell. Good-bye; adieu. It was originally addressed to one about to start on a journey, expressing the wish that the fare would be a good one.

He cannot fare well but he must cry out roast meat. Said of one who blazons his good fortune on the house-top.

Farmer George. George III; so called from his farmer-like manners, tastes, dress, and amusements.

A better farmer ne'er brushed dew from lawn.

Byron: Vision of Judgment.

Farnese (far nā' zi). A noted Italian family, celebrated in the 16th and 17th centuries as soldiers and patrons of the arts. Its fortunes were laid by Alessandro Farnese, who was Pope as Paul III (1534-49), and who created the Duchy of Parma for his son, Pietro Luigi (1545).

The Farnese Bull. A colossal group attributed to Apollonius and Tauriscus of Tralles, in Asia Minor. They belonged to the Rhodian school, and lived about 300 B.C. The group represents Dirce bound to the horns of a bull by Zethus and Amphion, for ill-using their mother. It was discovered in the Baths of Caracalla in 1546, and placed in the Farnese palace, in Rome. It is now at the Museo Nazionale, Naples.

The Farnese Hercules. Glykon's copy of the famous statue of Lyssipus, the Greek sculptor in the time of Alexander the Great. It represents the hero leaning on his club, with one hand on his back, as if he had just got possession of the apple of the Hesperides. It is now at the Museo Nazionale, Naples.

Farrago (fā ra' go). A farrago of nonsense. A confused heap of nonsense. Farrago (Lat.) is properly a mixture of far (meal) with other ingredients for the use of cattle.

A farrago
Or a made dish in Court: a thing of nothing.

Ben Jonson: Magnetick Lady, i, 1.

Yet do I carry everywhere with me such a confounded farrago of doubts, fears, hopes, wishes.—Sheridan: Rivals, ii, 1.

Farthing. A fourth part. Silver penny pieces used to be divided into four parts thus, ². One of these quarters was a fourthing or fourth part.

I don't care for it a brass farthing. James II debased all the coinage, and issued, amongst other worthless coins, brass pence, halfpence, and farthings.

Farthingale (far' thing gál). The hooped understructure of the large protruding skirt fashionable in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. The word is the O.Fr. verdugale, which is a corruption of Span. verdugado, green rods, referring to the twigs or switches of which the framework was made before whalebone was used for the purpose.

Fascinate. Literally, to cast a spell by means of the eye (Lat. fascinum, a spell). The allusion is to the ancient notion of bewitching by the power of the eye. Cp. Evil Eye.

None of the affections have been noted to fascinate and bewitch, but love and envy.—Bacon: Essays; Of Envy.

Fascinator. An opera cloak was thus termed in the 18th century; an evening-wear head veil.

Fascines (fäs' énz). Bundles of faggots used to build up defences, or to fill ditches impeding an attack. For the latter they were revived in World War II and carried forward by tanks which dumped them mechanically in ditches and small streams. From Roman fasses.

Fascism (fash' izm, fäs' izm). A political movement, originating in Italy, that takes its name from the old Roman fasses, a bundle of sticks borne by licitors as an emblem of office. Its leader was Benito Mussolini (1883-1945), who took advantage of the discontent felt in Italy after World War I to form a quasi-military party, to combat communism. In 1922 the Fascists "marched on Rome," overthrew the existing government and replaced it by a government under Mussolini, with the king as a figurehead. Thenceforward Italy was a Fascist country until her defeat in 1943.

Fascism is strictly authoritarian and as such has its followers and imitators in other countries and societies. As evolved by Mussolini it was a technique for obtaining power, for exacting a ruthless militarism and rejecting all appeal to ethics. Struggles between races are beneficial, said Mussolini: "War is to the man what maternity is to the woman. I find peace depressing and the negation of the fundamental values of man." Fascism denies democracy; the liberty of the individual is abolished in favour of the state; the inequality of men and races is proclaimed as immutable and even beneficial. "Credere, obbedire, combattere" (To have faith, to obey, to fight) is the final slogan.

Fash. Dinna fash yourself! Don't get excited; don't get into a fantigue about it. The word is looked on as Scots, but it is the O.Fr. facher (Mod.Fr. facher).

Fashion. In a fashion or after a fashion. "In a sort of a way"; as, "he spoke French after a fashion."

Fast. The adjective was used figuratively of a person of either sex who is addicted to pleasure and dissipation; of a young man or woman who "goes the pace."

To play fast and loose. To run with the hare and hunt with the hounds; to blow both hot and cold; to say one thing and do another. The allusion is probably to an old cheating game that used to be practised at fairs. A belt was folded, and the player was asked to prick it with a skewer, so as to pin it fast to the table; having so done, the adversary took the two ends, and loosened it or drew it away, showing that it had not been pierced at all.

He forced his neck into a noose, To show his play at fast and loose; And when he chanced to escape, mistook, For art and subtlety, his luck.

Butler: Hudibras, iii, 2.

Fasti (fäs' ti). Working days; when, in Rome, the law-courts were open. Holy days (dies sanius), when the law-courts were not open, were, by the Romans, called ne-fasti.

The Fasti were listed in calendars, and the registers of events occurring during the year of office of a pair of consuls was called fasti consulares; hence, any chronological list of events or office-holders became known as fasti, and hence such titles as Fasti Academi Mariscallane Aberdonenses, selections from the records of the Marischal College, Aberdeen.

Fasting. In its literal meaning this is a complete abstention from food and drink, but the word is more usually applied to an extreme limitation of diet. In this sense its therapeutic value has been proved in various forms of disease. Fasting has, however, been adopted more as a religious exercise from the earliest times. Celts, Mexicans, Peruvians, Assyrians, Egyptians, Hebrews, and Mohammedans have alike used it as a means of penance or purification. Contemplatives and men of the stature of Mahatma Gandhi have found it helpful.

Fasting plays an important part in Christian Church discipline; with more or less strictness the 40 days of Lenten fasting are observed throughout the Christian world.

In more recent times fasting (under the epithet of hunger-striking) has been practised by political and other prisoners as a method of calling attention to alleged injustices.

Fat. In printer's slang is composition that does not entail a lot of setting, and hence can be done quickly. A bit of fat. An unexpected stroke of luck; also, the best part of anything, especially, among actors, a good part in a play.

Fat-head. A silly fool, a dolt.

The fat is in the fire. Something has been let out inadvertently which will cause a "regular flare up"; it's all over, all's up with it. The allusion is to frying; if the grease is split into the fire, the coals smoke and blaze so as to spoil the food.

The Fat:—
Alfonso II of Portugal (1212-23).
Charles II of France, le Gros (832, 884-8).
Louis VI of France, le Gros (1078, 1108-37).

Fata (fä' tå) (Ital., a fairy). Female supernatural beings introduced in Italian medieval romance, usually under the sway of Demo­gorgon (q.v.).

Fata Morgana. A sort of mirage in which objects are reflected in the sea, and sometimes on a kind of aerial screen high above it, occasionally seen in the neighbourhood of the Straits of Messina, so named from Morgan le Fay (q.v.) who was fabled by the Norman settlers in England to dwell in Calabria.
Fatal Gifts.

See CADAUS, HARMONIA, NECKLACE, NESSUS, NIBELUNGEN, HOARD, OPAL, TOLOSA, etc.

Fatality. The cruel fates. The Greeks and Romans supposed there were three Parcae or Fates, who arbitrarily controlled the birth, life, and death of every man. They were Clotho (who held the distaff), Lachesis (who spun the thread of life), and Atropos (who cut it off when life was ended); called "cruel" because they paid no regard to the wishes of anyone.

Father. The name is given as a title to Catholic priest; also to the senior member of a body or profession, as the Father of the House of Commons, the Father of the Bench, and to the originator or first leader of some movement, school, etc., as the Father of Comedy (Aristophanes), the Father of English Song (Caedmon). In ancient Rome the title was given to the senators (see Patrician; Conscript Fathers), and in ecclesiastical history to the early Church writers and doctors.

To father a thing on one. To impute it to him; to assert that he was the originator of it.

Father Matthew, Neptune, Prout, etc. See these names.

Father of Courtesy. Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick (d. 1439).

Father of English History. The Venerable Bede (q.v.).

Father of his Country.

Cicero was so entitled by the Roman senate. They offered the same title to Marcus, but he refused to accept it.

Several at Rome the title was given to the Caesars were so called—Julius, after quelling the insurrection of Spain; Augustus, etc.

Cosimo de' Medici (1389-1464), George Washington, the first President of the United States (1732-99).

Andrea Doria (1468-1560), inscribed on the base of his statue by his countrymen of Genoa.

Andronicus Palaeologus II assumed the title (about 1260-1332).

Victor Emmanuel II (1820-78), first king of Italy, was popularly called Father of his Country in allusion to his unnumbered progeny of bastard children.

Father of the Chapel. See Chapel.

Lorenzo de' Medici, the Magnificent (1448-92).

Father of Lies. Satan.

Father of the People. Louis XI of France (1462, 1498-1515).

Henri IV was also termed "the father and friend of the people" (1553, 1589-1610).

Christian III of Denmark (1502, 1534-59).

Father of Waters. The Irrawaddy, in Burma, and the Mississippi, in North America. The Nile is so called by Dr. Johnson in his Rasselas.

The epithet Father is not uncommonly applied to rivers, especially those on which cities are built.

Say, Father Thames, for thou hast seen
Full many a sprightly race
Disporting on thy margent green,
The paths of pleasure trace.

GRAY: Distant Prospect of Eton College.

O Tiber, Father Tiber,
To whom the Romans pray.

MACAULAY: Lay of Horatius.

Father Thoughtful. Nicholas Catinat (1637-1712), a marshal of France; so called by his soldiers for his cautious and thoughtful policy.

Fathers of the Church. All those writers of the first twelve centuries whose works on Christian doctrine are considered of weight and worthy of respect. But the term is more strictly applied to those teachers of the first twelve, and especially of the first six centuries, who added notable holiness and complete orthodoxy to their learning. The chief are:

1st cent., Clement of Rome; 2nd cent., Cyril of Jerusalem, Ignatius of Antioch, Justin, Irenaeus, Polycarp, 3rd cent., Cyprian, Dionysius; 4th cent., Hilary, Ephebus the Syrian, Optatus, Epiphanius; 5th cent., Peter Chrysologus, Pope Leo the Great, Cyril of Alexandria, Vincent of Lerins; 6th cent., Caesarius of Arles; 7th cent., Isidore; 8th cent., John the Damascene, Venerable Bede; 11th cent., Peter Damian; 12th cent., Anselm, Bernard.

Fathers of the Desert. The monks and hermits of the Egyptian deserts in the 4th century from whom all Christian monasticism derives. The most famous were St. Anthony, who ruled 5,000 monks; Pachomius, the hermit; and Hilarion. There is a good description of their mode of life in Kingsley's Hypatia.

Fatima (fat'i mâ). The last of Bluebeard's wives. See BLUEBEARD. She was saved from death by the timely arrival of her brother with a party of friends. Mohammed's daughter was called Fatima.

Fatted Calf. See CALF.

Fault. In geology, the break or displacement of a stratum of rock.

At fault. Not on the right track. Hounds are at fault when the fox has jumped upon a wall, crossed a river, cut through a flock of sheep, or doubled like a hare, because the scent, i.e. the track, is broken.

For fault of a better (Merry Wives, i, 4). In default of a better; no one (or nothing) better being available.

I am the youngest of that name, for fault of a worse. —Romeo and Juliet, ii, 4.

In fault, at fault. To blame.

Is Antony or we in fault for this? Antony and Cleopatra, iii, 13.

No one is without his faults. No one is perfect.

To a fault. In excess; as, kind to a fault. Excess of every good is more or less evil.

To find fault. To blame; to express disapprobation.

Fauna (faw' ná). The animals of a country at any given period. The term was first used by Linnaeus in the title of his Fauna Suecica (1746), a companion volume to his Fauna Suecica of the preceding year, and is the name of a Roman rural goddess, sister of Faunus.
Nor less the place of curious plant he knows—
He both his Flora and his Fauna shows—
CRABBE: Borough.

Faust (fouast). The hero of Marlowe's Tragical History of Dr. Faustus (about 1589) and Goethe's Faust (1790-1833) is founded on Dr. Johann Faust, or Faustus, a magician and astrologer, who was born in Wurtemberg and died about 1538.

The idea of making a pact with the devil for worldly reasons is of Jewish origin and dates back to the time of Christ. All subsequent legends of necromancers became crystallized round the person of Faustus. In 1587 he appeared for the first time as the central figure in The History of Dr. Faustus, the Notorious Magician and Master of the Black Art (published at Frankfort-on-Main), which immediately became popular and was soon translated into English, French, and other languages.

The basis of the legend is that, in return for twenty-four years of further life during which he is to have every pleasure and all knowledge at his command, Faust sells his soul to the devil, and the climax is reached when, at the close of the period, the devil claims him for his own.

The story of Faust has struck the fancy of composers. Spohr's opera Faust, 1816; Wagner's Overture Faust, 1839; Berlioz's Damnation de Faust, 1846; Gounod's opera, 1859; Boito's Mefistophele, 1868; Zoller's opera Faust, 1887. In addition to these are numerous musical compositions, ballets, etc.

There was another Faust of whom stories used to be told in the 16th century. This was Johann Fust or Faust (d. c. 1466), a German money-lender, who formed a partnership with the printer Gutenberg in 1450. On the termination of this in 1455 Fust demanded the repayment of the capital he had put into the business, and in default of this seized all Gutenberg's types and plant. With this Fust started business on his own account, with his son-in-law Peter Schoffer as manager. Gutenberg was obliged to carry on his business with inferior types and presses.

Fauvist (fô' vist). A phrase, meaning "wild beast," applied to an important school of painters, beginning 1904-5, under the leadership of Matisse, and including Derain, Othon Friesz, Marquet, Vlaminck, and Rouault. All the group were concerned primarily with the importance of pattern in their work, and prepared to subordinate all else.

Faux pas (fô pa) (Fr.). A "false step"; a breach of manners or moral conduct.

The fact is, his Lordship, who hadn't it seems, Form'd the slightest idea, not e'en in his dreams, That the pair had been wedded according to law,
Conceived that his daughter had made a faux pas.
BARRAM (INGOLDSBY): Some account of a New Play.

Favonius (fâ vô' ni ús). The Latin name for the zephyr or west wind. It means the wind favourable to vegetation.

If to the torrid Zone her way she bend,
Her whole breathing of Favonius lend,
Thenバー command the birds to bring their quires,
That Zone is temp'rate.
HABINGTON: Castara: To the Spring (1634).

Favour. Ribbons made into a bow are called favours from being bestowed by ladies on the successful champions of tournaments (Cp. TRUE-lovers' KNOT.)

Here, Fluellen; wear thou this favour for me, and stick it in thy cap.—SHAKESPEARE: Henry V, iv, 7.

To curry favour. See CURRY.

Favourites. False curls on the temples; a curl of hair on the temples plastered with some cosmetic; whiskers made to meet the mouth.
Yet tell me, sire, don't you as nice appear
With your false calves, bardash, and fav'rites here?
MRS. CENTLIVRE: The Platonic Lady; Epilogue (1721).

Fay. See FAIRY.

Morgan le Fay. See MORGAN.

Feast. A day set apart for the commemoration of some event or mystery in the life of Our Lord, His mother, or some event of religious importance. Feasts are either immovable or movable.

The chief immovable feasts in the Christian calendar are the four quarter-days—viz. the Annunciation or Lady Day (March 25th), the Nativity of John the Baptist (June 24th), Michaelmas Day (September 29th), and Christmas Day (December 25th). Others are the Circumcision (January 1st), Epiphany (January 6th), All Saints' (November 1st), and the several Apostles' days.

The movable feasts depend upon Easter Sunday. They are—Palm Sunday. The Sunday next before Easter Sunday.
Good Friday. The Friday next before Easter Sunday.
Ash Wednesday. The first day of Lent, 40 days before Easter.
Sexagesima Sunday. Sixty days before Easter Sunday.
Ascension Day or Holy Thursday. Fortieth day after Easter Sunday.
Pentecost or Whit Sunday. The seventh Sunday after Easter Sunday.
Trinity Sunday. The Sunday next after Pentecost.

Feast of Reason. Conversation on and discussion of learned and congenial subjects.
There St. John mingles with my friendly bowl
The feast of reason and the flow of soul.
Pope: Imitations of Horace, ii, 1.

Feasts of Reason. See REASON, GODDESS OF.

Feather. A broken feather in one's wing. A scandal connected with one.

A feather in your cap. An honour to you. The allusion is to the very general custom in Asia and among the American Indians of adding a feather to the headgear for every enemy slain. The ancient Lycians, and many others had a similar custom, and it is still usual for the sportsman who kills the first woodcock to pluck out a feather and stick it in his cap.

The custom, in one form or another, seems to be almost universal; in Hungary, at one time, none might wear a feather but he who had slain a Turk, and it will be remembered that when Gordon quelled the Taiping rebellion he was honoured by the Chinese Government with the "yellow jacket and peacock's feather."

Birds of a feather flock together. See Bird.

Fine feathers make fine birds. Said sarcastically of an overdressed person who does not live up to his (or her) clothes.

In full feather. Flush of money. In allusion to birds not on the moult.

In grand feather. Dressed "to the nines"; also, in perfect health, thoroughly fit.

In high feather. In exuberant spirits, joyous. Of that see. See Birds of a Feather.

Prince of Wales's feathers. See Prince of Wales.

Tarred and feathered. See Tar.

Tickled with a feather. Easily moved to laughter. "Pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw" (Pope: Essay on Man), is more usual.

To cut a feather. A ship going fast is said to cut a feather, in allusion to the ripple which she throws off from her bows. Metaphorically, "to cut a dash."

To feather an oar. To turn the blade parallel with the surface of the water as the hands are moved forward for a fresh stroke. The oar throws off the water in a feathery spray.

He feathered his oars with such skill and dexterity. — John Young Waterman.

To feather one's nest well. To provide for one's own interests; to secure one's own financial well-being. The phrase is commonly used with a somewhat disapproving implication.

To show the white feather. See White.

To smooth one's ruffled feathers. To recover one's equanimity after an insult, etc.

Featherweight. Something of extreme lightness in comparison with others of its kind. The term is applied to a jockey weighing not more than 4 st. 7 lb. or to a boxer weighing not more than 9 st. In the paper trade the name is given to very light antique, laid, or wove book papers. They are manufactured mainly from esparto, and are very loosely woven.

Feature (Lat. facere, to make) formerly meant the 'make' or general appearance of anything. Spenser speaks of God's "secret understanding of our feature" — i.e. make or structure. It now means principally that part which is most conspicuous or important. Thus we speak of the chief feature of a painting, a garden, a book, etc.; a moving picture is said to feature such and such a popular favourite or incident.

February. The month of purification amongst the ancient Romans. (Lat. februa, to purify by sacrifice.)

Candlemas Day (q.v.), February 2nd, is the feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary. It is said, if the weather is fine and frosty at the close of January and beginning of February, we may look for more winter to come than we have seen up to that time.

So sol sperdecant Maria Purificante.

Major erit glacies post festum quam fuit ante.

Sir T. Browne: Vulgar Errors.

The Dutch used to term the month Spokkelmaand (vegetation-month); the ancient Saxons, Srote-cal (from the sprouting of potwort or kele); they changed it subsequently to Sow-monath (from the returning sun). In the French Republican calendar it was called Pluviose (rain-month, January 20th to February 20th). See also Fill-dyke.

Feedit (Lat., he did it). A word inscribed after the name of an artist, sculptor, etc., as David fecit, Goujon fecit; i.e. David painted it, Goujon sculptured it, etc.

Federal. The modern usage of this term in the U.S.A. relates to the central government of the country as distinct from the governments of the various component States. In this sense the Federal Bureau of Investigation (F.B.I.) is an organization of the Department of Justice of the U.S. Government which investigates offences against the laws of the U.S.A., especially such crimes as bank robberies, espionage, blackmail, etc. Its agents are known familiarly as G-men (Government men) and are all specially selected for intrepidity as criminal-hunters.

Federalist. The party in America which in 1787 was in favour of adopting the constitution of that year. Besides Washington, it was led by Alexander Hamilton and John Adams, who later became enemies. The party controlled the government until 1801. It was also the name of a newspaper during this period which provided a model of good prose.

Federal States. The name given in the American War of Secession (1861-65) to those northern states which combined against the eleven southern states which combined against the Federal States. The name given in the American War of Secession (1861-65) to those northern states which combined against the Federal States. The name given in the American War of Secession (1861-65) to those northern states which combined against the Federal States. The name given in the American War of Secession (1861-65) to those northern states which combined against the Federal States.

See. This is an Anglo-French word, from Old High Ger. fehu, wages, money, property, cattle, and is connected with the A.S. feoh, cattle, goods, money. So in Lat. pecunia, money, from pecus, cattle. Capital is capita, heads (of cattle), and chattels is a mere variant.

At a pin's fee. See Pin.

Fee-farm. A tenure by which an estate is held in fee-simple without any other services from the tenant beyond a perpetual fixed rent. Fee-farm-rent is rent paid on lands let to farm, and not let in recompense of service at a greatly reduced value.

Fee-penny. A fine for money overdue; an earnest or pledge for a bargain. Sir Thomas Gresham often wrote for money in order to save the fee-penny.

Fee simple. An estate held by a person in his own right, free from condition or limitation, such as that of inheritance by any particular class of heirs. If restricted by conditions, it is called a "Conditional Fee."

Fee-tail. An estate limited to a person and his lawful heirs; an entail estate.

To hold in fee. To hold as one's lawful and absolute possession.

Once did she hold the gorgeous east in fee:

And was the safeguard of the west.

Wordsworth: The Venetian Republic.
Felle. Most forcible Felle. Fleeble is a "woman's tailor," brought to Sir John Falstaff as a recruit (2 Henry IV, iii, 2). He tells Sir John "he will do his good will," and the knight replies, "Well said, courageous Fleeble! Thou wilt be as valiant as the wrathful dove, or most magnanimous mouse ... most forcible Fleeble."

Fede of Corn. A quarter of oats, the quantity given to a horse on a journey when the ostler is told to give him a feed.

Feet. See Foot.

Fehmgericht. See Vehmgericht.

Felix the Cat, hero of early animated cartoons, appeared in 1921, in a production by Pat Sullivan. Throughout his many adventures Felix the black cat kept on walking, and thus originated a once-familiar catch-phrase.

Fellow Dr. See Doctor Fell.

Fellow Commoner. An undergraduate of Cambridge, who was formerly privileged to "common" (i.e., dine) at the fellows' table. In Oxford, these demi-dons are termed Gentlemen Commoners.

In 'varsity slang these names were given to empty bottles, the suggestion being that such students are, as a class, empty-headed.

Fellow-traveller. A person in sympathy with a political party but not a member of that party; used most often of Communist sympathizers.

"He is but one of a reputed short list of seven fellow-travellers under threat of expulsion." —Comment in Time and Tide, May 1st, 1948, on the Labour Party's expulsion of one of its members.

Felo de se (fé' lò dé sè). The act of a suicide when he commits self-murder; also, the self-murderer himself. Murder is felony, and a man who murders himself commits this felony—felo de se.

Feme-covert (fem kòv' ert). A married woman, i.e. a woman who is under the cover, authority, or protection of her husband. The word is the Anglo-French and Old French form of Mod. Fr. femme couverte, and couverte is still used in fortification, etc., with the sense "protected."

Feme-sole (fem söl). A single woman. Femme-sol merchant, a woman, married or single, who carries on a trade on her own account.

Feminine ending. An extra unaccented syllable at the end of a line of verse, e.g. in lines 1 and 3 of the following:

With rue my heart is laden
For golden friends I had,
For many a rose-lipt maiden
And many a light-foot lad.

A. E. Housman.

Femynye (fem' i ni). A medieval designation for the kingdom of the Amazons. Gower terms Penthesilea "queen of Femynye."

He [Theseus] conquered all the regne of Femynye,
That whylom was y-claped Scithia;
And weddede the quene Ipolita.

Chaucer: Knights Tale, 8.

Fence. Slang term for a receiver of stolen goods.

Fence month, or season. The finding time of deer, i.e. from about fifteen days before Midsummer to fifteen days after it. Also the close season for fishing, etc.

To sit on the fence. To take care not to commit oneself; to hedge. The characteristic attitude of "Mr. Facing-Both-Ways."

Fencibles. Regiments of horse and foot militia raised for home service in 1759, again in 1778-9, and again in 1794, when a force of 15,000 was raised. It was disbanded in 1802. The word is short for defensible.

Fenians. An Anti-British secret association of Irishmen, formed simultaneously in Ireland by James Stephens and in New York by John O'Mahony in 1857, with the object of overthrowing the domination of England in Ireland, and making Ireland a republic. The word is from the Old Irish Fen, a name of the ancient Irish, confused with Fianna, the semi-mythological warriors who defended Ireland in the time of Finn.

The Fenian Brotherhood quickly spread in the United States, and invasions of Canada were attempted. The Association made many insurrectionary attempts (including dynamite outrages at Clerkenwell, 1865, and at the Tower of London and Houses of Parliament, 1885), but did nothing that could further their aims. Their leaders were termed "head centres," and their subordinates "centres." Cp. Clanna-Gael; Sinn Fein.

Fennel. Fennel was anciently supposed to be an aphrodisiac, thus "to eat conger and fennel" (two hot things together) was provocative of sexual licence. Hence Falstaff's remark about Poins:—

He plays at quoit's well, and eats conger and fennel, and drinks off candles' ends for flap-dragons, and rides the wild mare with the boys.—2 Henry IV, ii, 4.

It was also emblematical of flattery, and may have been included among the herbs distributed by Ophelia (Hamlet iv, 5) for this reason.

Fenel is for flatterers.

An evil thing it is sure:
But I have alwa'es meant true:
With constant heart most pure.

Uppon a banke, bordring by, grew women's weedes
Fenel I meanes for flatterers; fit for flatterers' neses.

Greene: A Quip for an Upstart Courtier (1592).

The herb was also credited with being able to clear the sight, and was said to be the favourite food of serpents, with the juice of which they restore their sight when dim.

Fen Nightingale. A frog, which sings at night in the fens, as nightingales sing in the groves.

Fennir or Fenris (fen'r ré). In Scandinavian mythology the wolf of Loki (q.v.). He was the brother of Hel (q.v.), and when he gaped one jaw touched earth and the other heaven. In the Ragnarok he swallows the sun and conquers Odin; but being conquered by Vidar, he was cast into Niftheim, where Loki was confined.

Fere Nature (fer' é nà tō' rē) (Lat., of savage nature). The legal term for animals living in a wild state, as distinguished from those which are domesticated.

Women are not comprised in our Laws of Friendship: they are Fere Nature.—Dryden: The Mock Astrologer, iv.
all; anJ cenain species of fern is so small as to be among their good for the liver, and so on. Thus, the yellow celandine was said to cure fungous. Fermiers Généraux. Those who in France in the 18th century farmed the state taxes. They there the name of the 18th century. Fermier was a small sequestered village near Geneva, from which obscure retreat he poured forth his invectives against the French Government, the more modern days was, “You can’t do that there ‘ere.”

Fern Seed. We have the receipt of fern seed, we walk invisible (1 Henry IV, iv, 4). The seed of certain species of fern is so small as to be invisible to the naked eye, and hence the plant was believed to confer invisibility on those who carried it about their person. It was at one time believed that plants have the power of imparting their own speciality to their wearer. Thus, the yellow celandine was said to cure jaundice; wood-sorrel, which has a heart-shaped leaf, to cheer the heart; liverwort to be a balm to the liver; holy-ghost to guard against the smell of death; and many other plants to aid in the cure of certain ailments. Beaudmont and Fletcher: Fair Maid of the Inn, i, 1. The seeds of fern, which, by prolific heat, are less a thousand times than what the eye can unassisted by the tube descry. Blackmore: Creation. Ferny. The Patriarch or Philosopher of Ferney, Voltaire (1694-1778); so called because for the last twenty years of his life he lived at Ferney, a small sequestered village near Geneva, from which obscure retreat he poured forth his invectives against the French Government, the Church, nobles, nuns, priests, and indeed all families, or parties. Feuds have never played much part in the English manner of life. See Vendetta. In its other sense a feud is a fief, or land held in fee (q.v.). Feudal System, The. A system founded on the tenure of fiefs or feuds, given in compensation for military service to the lord of the tenants. It was introduced into England by William the Conqueror, who made himself owner of the whole country and allowed the nobles to hold it from him by payment of homage and military service. The nobles in turn had vassals bound to them by similar obligations. Feuille des, See Feu de joie. Feu de joie (Fr.). A running fire of guns on an occasion of rejoicing. Feud (fud). A word of two very different meanings. In its more usual sense a feud is a continuous, bitter quarrel between individuals, families, or parties. Feuds have never played much part in the English manner of life. See Vendetta. In its other sense a feud is a fief, or land held in fee (q.v.). Feuillants (fér’ yong). A reformed Cistercian order instituted by Jean de la Barrière in 1586. So called from the convent of Feuillants, in Languedoc, where they were established in 1577. The club of the Feuillants, in the French Revolution, was composed of moderate Jacobins. So called because the convent of the Feuillants, near the Tuileries, was their original club-room (1791-2).

Feuilleton (fé yö tong) (Fr., from feuille, a leaf). The part of French newspapers devoted to tales, light literature, etc.; hence, in England a serial story in a newspaper, or the "magazine page."

Fey (fä). Epithet applied when a person suddenly breaks into a state of light-heartedness. This was formerly supposed to be an indication of an early approaching death. The word is the A.S. fage (on the point of death, or doomed to die).

FFI. Forces Françaises de l'Interieure. Frenchmen within France who continued the struggle against Germany after the fall of their country in 1940. They were first armed by Britain and their co-operation with British parachute agents was co-ordinated and directed by an organization at the War Office. Later the United States also co-operated through their OSS (q.v.). These Frenchmen were familiarly known as Maquis (q.v.). As soon as the allied invasion landed in June 1944 they came into the open as a civilian army.

Fiacre (fé akr'). A French cab or hackney coach. So called from the hotel de St. Fiacre, Paris, where the first station of these coaches was established by M. Sauvage, about 1650. Legend has it that St. Fiacre was the son of an Irish king, born in 600, who settled in France and built a monastery at Breuil. His day is August 30th.

Fiars (f' ars). Striking the fiars. Taking the average price of corn. Fiars are the legal prices of grain as fixed by the sheriff of a county for the current year. It is a Scottish term, from M.E. and O.Fr. fior, Lar. Forum, a market.

Fiasco. A failure. In Italy they cry Ola, ola, fiasco! to an unpopular singer.

In Italian fiasco means a flask, and it is uncertain how it came, in Venetian slang, to mean a failure, an attempt that comes to nothing.

Fiat (fi' át) (Lat., let it be done). I give my fiat to that proposal. I consent to it. A fiat in law is an order of the court directing that something stated be done.

Fiat experimentum in corpore vili. See Corpus vile.

Fiat justitia ruat coelum. See Piso's Justice.

Fib. An attendant on Queen Mab in Drayton's Nymphidia. Fib, meaning a falsehood, is the Latin fabula, a fable.

Fico (fi kō). See Fig. Fico for the phrase. Merry Wives of Windsor, i, 3.

I see contempt marching forth, giving me the fico with his thombe in his mouth.—Wit's Miserie (1596).

Fiddle (A.S. fithele; perhaps connected with medieval Lat. vitula or viudla, whence violin). A violin or stringed instrument of that nature. In Stock Exchange slang a fiddle is one-sixteenth of a pound—ls. 3d.

Fiddle-de-dee! An exclamation signifying what you say is nonsense. All the return he ever had ... was a word, too common, I regret to say, in female lips, viz., fiddle-de-dee.—De Quincey: Secret Societies.

Fiddle-faddle. To busy oneself with nothing; to dawdle; to talk nonsense.

Ye may as easily Outrun a cloud, driven by a northern blast, As fiddle-faddle so.

John Ford: The Broken Heart, i, 3. (1633).

Fiddler. Slang for a sixpence; also for a farthing.

Drunk as a fiddler. See Drunk.

Fiddler's fare or pay. Meat, drink, and money.

Fiddler's Green. The land of sailors where there is perpetual mirth, a fiddle that never ceases playing to untiring dancers, plenty of grog, and unlimited tobacco.

Fiddler's money. A silver penny. The fee given to a fiddler at a wake by each dancer.

Fiddler's news. Stale news carried about by wandering fiddlers.

Oliver's fiddler. Sir Roger L'Estrangé (1616-1704). So called because he, at one time, was playing a fiddle or viol with others in the house of John Hingston, the composer, when Cromwell was one of the guests.

Fiddlesticks! An exclamation signifying what you say is not worth attention; much the same as fiddle-de-dee (q.v.).

The devil rides on a fiddlestick. See Devil (Phrases).

Fidei Defensor. See Defender of the Faith.

FIDO. Fog Investigation and Dispersal Operation. A method of dispersing fog on airfields by ejecting burning petrol from jets along the runways, developed in Britain during World War II.

Fie! An exclamation indicating that what is reprieved is indecorous or undesirable. It is an old word, and is found in many languages; it seems to be an instinctive sound uttered on experiencing something disagreeable.

No word ne wryth he Of thilke wikkene example of Canacee, That lovede hir owne brother sinfully; Of swiche cursed stories I say "fie."

Chaucer: Man of Lawes Prologue, 77.
Field.

In huntsman's language, the field means all the riders.

In heraldry, the entire surface of the shield. In military language, the place where a battle is fought, or is about to be fought; the battle itself, or the campaign.

In sportsmen's language it means all the horses except one.

To back the field, means to bet against all the horses except one.

To keep back the field, is to keep back the riders.

In the field. A competitor for a prize. A term in horse-racing, as, "So-and-so was in the field." Also in war, as, "the French were in the field already."

Master of the field. The winner; the conqueror in a battle.

To take the field. To make the opening moves in a campaign; to move the army preparatory to battle.

To win the field. To win the battle.

Field-day. A day of particular excitement or importance. A military term, meaning a day when troops have manoeuvres or field practice.

Field-Marshals. A general officer of the highest rank in the British Army. The title was first used in 1736, and is conferred on generals who have rendered conspicuous services, and on members of royal families.

Field Officer. In the British Army any officer between the rank of captain and that of general, i.e., major, lieutenant-colonel, colonel, brigadier.

Field piece. A piece of field artillery, a field gun.

Field works. Works thrown up by an army besieging or defending a fortress, or in strengthening its position.

Field of Blood. Aceldama (q.v.).

Field of fire. (Mil.). That part of the terrain before infantry or machine guns which their weapons can cover — i.e., which is not interrupted by woods, buildings, or the contours of the ground.

Field of force. A term used in physics to denote the range within which a force, such as magnetism, is effective.

Field of the Cloth of Gold. The plain, near Guines, where Henry VIII met François I in 1520 to discuss the succession to the Empire on the death of Maximilian. It was so called from the splendour and magnificence displayed. Accompanied by Cardinal Wolsey in an immense panoply of state, Henry met the French king and his nobles who were overawed by this magnificence. Many of the imposing ceremonies were spoiled by the rain and wind that swept the countryside.

Field of vision or view. The space in a telescope, microscope, etc., within which the object is visible.

Field of the Forty Footsteps, or The Brother's Steps. At the back of the British Museum, once called Southampton Fields, near the extreme north-east of the present Upper Montagu Street. The tradition is that at the time of the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion two brothers fought each other here till both were killed, and for many years forty impressions of their feet remained on the field, and no grass would grow there, or upon the spot upon a bank where the young woman they were fighting for sat watching the duel. The site was built upon about 1800.

Fierabras, Sir (fi' er à brás). One of Charlemagne's paladins, and a leading figure in many of the romances. He was the son of Balan (q.v.), King of Spain, and for height of stature, breadth of shoulder, and hardness of muscle he never had an equal. His pride was laid low by Olivier, he became a Christian, was accepted by Charlemagne as a paladin, and ended his days in the odour of sanctity. See BALAN.

Fiere facias (fi' ér i fás'i ás) (L. Lat., cause it to be done). A judicial writ for one who has recovered damages in the courts, commanding the sheriff to see the judgment of the court duly carried out. It is often abbreviated to fi fa. The term was punningly used in Elizabethan times in connexion with red noses and men with "fiery faces" through drink.

Fiery Cross, The. A signal anciently sent round the Scottish clans in the Highlands summoning them to assemble for battle. It was symbolical of fire and sword, and consisted of a cross the ends of which had been burnt and then dipped in the blood of some animal slain for the purpose—a relic of Gaelic rites. See Scott's Lady of the Lake, canto iii, for an account of it. The Ku Klux Klan adopted this symbol when it arose after the American Civil War.

Fifteen, The. The Jacobite rebellion of 1715, when James Edward Stuart, "the Old Pretender," with the Earl of Mar, made a half-hearted and unsuccessful attempt to gain the throne.

Fifth. Fifth column. Persons in a country who, whether as individuals or as members of an organization, are ready to give help to an enemy. The origin of the term is attributed to General Mola who, in the Spanish Civil War (1936-39), said that he had four columns, that Jesus Christ was about to come a second time to the earth, and establish the fifth universal monarchy. The four preceding monarchies were the Assyrian, the Persian, the Macedonian, and the Roman. In politics, the Fifth Monarchy Men were zealous reformers and levellers.

Fifty-four Forty or Fight. A slogan used in the U.S.A. presidential election of 1846. For some years there had been a dispute with Britain as to the northern boundary of the U.S.A. in the far west. The U.S.A. claimed that their territory should extend as far north as the southern border of Russia, Alaska, which was 54° 40' N.; Great Britain rejected this, and in 1818 it was agreed that the disputed territory should be jointly administered for ten years, which was later extended indefinitely. In 1846 the question was brought forward again in the U.S.A. as an issue in the election. Shortly afterwards, the new President Polk came to an amicable agreement that U.S. territorial claims should end on the 49th parallel.

Fig. Most phrases that include the word fig have reference to the fruit as being an object of trifling value; but in

In full fig, meaning "in full dress," figged out, "dressed up," etc., the word is a variant of feague (see Fake).

To fig up a horse is to make it lively and spirited by artificial means.

To fig oneself out, is to dress oneself up "regardless."

The speaker sits at one end all in full fig, with a clerk at the table below.—TROLLOPE: West Indies, ch. ix.

I don't care a fig for you; not worth a fig. Nothing at all. Here fig is either an example of something comparatively worthless or the Spanish figo (q.v.)—adopted as English by the Elizabethans—a gesture of contempt made by thrusting the thumb between the first and second fingers, much as we say, "I don't care that for you," snapping the fingers at the same time. See Thumb (To bite one's thumb).

A fig for Peter.

2 Henry VI, ii, 9.

The figo for thy friendship.

Henry V, iii, 6.

I shan't buy my Attic figs in future, but grow them. Said by way of warning to one who is building castles in the air—"don't count your chickens before they are hatched." Xerxes boasted that he was going to conquer Attica, where the figs grew, and add it to his own empire; but he met defeat at Salamis, and "never loosed his sandal till he reached Abdera."

In the name of the Prophet, Figs! A burlesque of the solemn language employed in eastern countries in the common business of life. The line occurs in the imitation of Dr. Johnson's pompous style, in Rejected Addresses, by James and Horace Smith.

Mercury fig. See Mercury.

Fig leaf. The leaf of the fig tree or the banyan, according to the Bible story (Gen. iii, 7) used by Adam and Eve to cover their nakedness after the Fall. In the days of Victorian prudery tin fig leaves were fitted to statuary in the museums, Crystal Palace, etc.

Fig Sunday. An old provincial name for Palm Sunday. Figs used to be eaten on that day in commemoration of the blasting of the barren fig-tree by Our Lord (Mark xi) which took place on the day following the triumphant entry into Jerusalem.

Many festivals still have their special foods; as, the goose for Michaelmas, pancakes for Shrove Tuesday, salt cod for Ash Wednesday, etc.

Fig-tree. It is said that Judas hanged himself on a fig-tree. See Elder-tree.

Figaro (fig’à rô). A type of cunning dexterity, and intrigue. The character is in the Barber de Séville (1775) and Mariage de Figaro (1784), by Beaumarchais. In the former he is a barber, and in the latter a valet; but in both he outwits everyone. There are several operas founded on these dramas, as Mozart’s Nozze di Figaro, Paisiello’s Il Barbieri di Siviglia, and Rossini’s Il Barbieri di Siviglia.

Fight. He that fights and runs away May live to fight another day. An old saw found in many languages. Demosthenes, being reproached for fleeing from Philip of Macedon at Cheronaca, replied, "A man that runs away may fight again."

He that fights and runs away May turn and fight another day; But he that is in battle slain Can never rise to fight again.

These lines occur in James Roy’s Complete History of the Rebellion, 1749. A similar sentiment is expressed in Hudibras, iii, 3: For those that fly may fight again, Which he can never do that’s slain.

The Fighting Fifth. See Regimental Nicknames.

The Fighting Prelate. Henry Spencer, Bishop of Norwich, who greatly distinguished himself in the rebellion of Wat Tyler. He met the rebels in the field, with the temporal sword, then absolved them, and sent them to the gibbet.

To fight for one’s own hand. To uphold one’s own cause, to struggle for one’s own interest.

To fight shy of. To avoid; to resist being brought into contest or conflict.

To fight the tiger. To play against the bank at faro.

To fight with gloves on. To spar without showing animosity, like boxers, with boxing gloves. Disputants fight with gloves on so long as they preserve all the outward amenities of debate, and conceal their hostility to each other by courtesy and forbearance.

To live like fighting cocks. See Cock.

Fighting French, or La France Combattante, included all Frenchmen at home and abroad who joined together to collaborate with the Allied Nations in their war against Germany. After the fall of France, in 1940, General de Gaulle gathered round him such French troops, etc., as had escaped from France and formed them into a body called the Free French, with the cross of Lorraine for their emblem. On July 14th, 1942, this name was changed to The Fighting French. Not only did French troops fight side by side with the Allies in Africa, Italy, and wherever else there was fighting to be done, but in France itself they worked and fought behind the lines, organizing resistance and making themselves an annoyance and terror to the German occupying authorities.

One of the greatest deeds of this body was the march of General Leclerc with his column from Lake Chad across the Sahara to join the British 8th Army in Libya. Strengthened and made into an armoured division Leclerc’s men fought thenceforward throughout the war.
and were given the honour of being the first formation to enter Paris, 23rd August, 1944.

Figure. From Lat. fingere, to shape or fashion; not etymologically connected with Eng. finger, though the primitive method of calculating was doubtless by means of the fingers. For Roman figures, etc., see NUMERALS.

A figure of fun. Of droll appearance, whether from untidiness, quaintness, or other peculiarity. "A pretty figure" is a rather stronger expression.

Figure-head. A figure on the head or projecting cutwater of a sailing ship, which has ornamental value but is of no practical use; hence a nominal leader who has no real authority but whose social or other position inspires confidence.

To cut a figure. To make an imposing appearance through dress, equipage, and bearing.

To cut a sorry or a pretty figure is the reverse.

To make a figure. To make a name or reputation, to be a notability, as "he makes no figure at court."

What's the figure? How much am I to pay? What "figure" or sum does my debt amount to?

Filch. To steal or purloin. A piece of 16th-century thieves' slang of uncertain origin. Filch (q.v.) was used in much the same sense, but there is no evidence of etymological connexion.

With cunning hast thou filched my daughter's heart. Midsummer Night's Dream, 1, 2.

A filch or filchman was a staff with a hook at the end, for plucking clothes from hedges, articles from shop windows, etc.

File. Old slang for a rascallion or worthless person; also for a pick-pocket. It comes from the same original as the word vile, though in the sense in which it is sometimes used, as meaning a hard-headed, heartless person, it seems to have been connected with the hard, rasping tool, a file.

In single file. Single line; one behind another. (Fr. file, a row.)

Rank and file. Soldiers and non-commissioned officers as apart from commissioned officers; hence, the followers in or private members of a movement as apart from its leaders. Rank refers to men standing abreast, file to men standing behind each other.

Filibuster (fil'i bús·ter). A piratical adventurer, a buccaneer (q.v.). The word is through Span. filibustero from Dut. vrijbuiter, a freebooter.

To filibuster. In U.S.A. politics, to manoeuvre to frustrate the passing of a bill. It is based on the right of a member of Congress not to be interrupted so long as he holds the floor of the House. The member may recite or talk about any subject under the sun until the time available for passing the bill is exhausted.

Filioque Controversy (fil'i ó' kwé). An argument that long disturbed the Eastern and Western Churches, and the difference of opinion concerning which still forms one of the principal barriers to their fusion. The point was: Did the Holy Ghost proceed from the Father and the Son (Filioque), or from the Father only? The Western Church maintains the former, and the Eastern the latter dogma. The filioque was recognized by the Council of Toledo, 589.

The gist of the argument is this: If the Son is one with the Father, whatever proceeds from the Father must proceed from the Son also. This is technically called "The Procession of the Holy Ghost."

Fill-dyke. The month of February, when the rain and melted snow fills the ditches to overflowing. February fill-dyke, be it black or be it white [wet or snowy];

But if it be white it's better to like. Old Proverb.

Filter (Lat. feltrum, felt; filtrum, a strainer). Literally, to run through felt, as jelly is strained through flannel. The Romans strained the juice of their grapes through felt into the wine-vat, after which it was put into the casks.

Fin de siècle (Fr., end of the century). It has come to mean decadent with particular reference to the 19th century.

Finality John. Earl Russell, who maintained that the Reform Bill of 1832 was a finality, yet in 1854, 1860, and 1866 brought forth other Reform Bills.

Finance. By devious routes this word comes from the late Latin finis, a settlement of a debt, or the winding up of a dispute by the payment of ransom. Hence, revenue derived from fines or subsidies and, in the plural, available money resources. Thus we say, "My finances are exhausted," meaning I have no more funds or available money.

Financial year. The annual period for which accounts are made up. The Finance Act is the name given to the annual Act of Parliament that legalizes the proposals contained in the Budget. The financial year of the British Government ends on the 31st of March.

Find. Findings keepings! An exclamation made when one has accidentally found something that does not belong to him, and implying that it is now the finder's property. This old saying is very faulty law.

Fidow Haddock. See Finnann.

Fine. Fine as fivepence. An old alliterative saying meaning splendidly dressed or turned out.

Fine feathers make fine birds. See Feather.

In fine. To sum up; to come to a conclusion; in short.

One of these fine days. Some time or other; at some indefinite (and often problematical) date in the future.

The fine arts. Those arts which chiefly depend on a delicate or fine imagination, as music, painting, poetry, and sculpture, as opposed to the useful arts, i.e. those which are practised for their utility and not for their own sake, as the arts of weaving, metal-working, and so on.

Fingal (fing' gal). The great Gaelic semi-mythological hero, father of Ossian (q.v.), who was purported by Macpherson to have been the original author of the long epic poem Fingal (1762), which narrates the hero's adventures.

Fingal's cave. The basaltic cavern on Staffa, said to have been a home of Fingal. This is the place given to Mendelssohn's Hebridean Overture.

Finger (A.S. finger). The old names for the fingers are:

- A.S. thuma, the thumb.
- Towcher (the finger that touches), foreman, or pointer. This was called by the Anglo-Saxons the scite-finger, i.e. the shooting finger, and is now commonly known as the index finger, because it is the one used in pointing.
- Long-man or long finger.
- Lech-man or ring-finger. The former means "medical finger," and the latter is a Roman expression, "digitus annularis." Called by the Anglo-Saxons the gold-finger. This finger between the long and little finger was used by the Romans as a ring-finger, from the belief that a nerve ran through it to the heart. Hence the Greeks and Romans used to call it the medical finger, and used it for stirring mixtures, under the notion that nothing noxious could touch it without its giving instant warning to the heart. It is still a general notion in parts of England that it is bad to rub salve or scratch the skin with any but the ring finger.

At last he put on her medical finger a pretty, handsome gold ring, wherein was engraven a precious gaudstone of Beauesse.—RABELAIS: Pantagruel, iii, 17.

Little-man or little finger. Called by the Anglo-Saxons the ear-finger, because it can, from its diminutive size, be most easily introduced into the orifice of the ear.

The fingers each had their special significance in alchemy, and Ben Jonson says—

The thumb, in chiromancy, we give to Venus; The fore-finger to Jove; the midst to Saturn; The thumb, in chiromancy, we give to Venus; The ring to Sol; the least to Mercury. Alchemist, i, 2.

Blessing with the fingers. See Blessing.

Cry, baby, cry; put your finger in your eye, etc. This nursery rhyme seems to be referred to in Comedy of Errors, ii, 2:—

No longer will I be fool, To put the finger in the eye and weep.

Fingers and toes. Thefarrier's name for anbury, or ambury, i.e. a spongy wart on horses and oxen.

Fingers were made before forks. The saying is used (especially at mealtimes) when one wants to convey that ceremony is unnecessary. It makes an interesting commentary on this self-service. Fingers were not introduced into England until about 1620, before which period fingers were used.

Finished to the finger-nail. Complete and perfect in every detail, to all the extremities. The allusion is obvious.

His fingers are all thumbs. Said of a person awkward in the use of his hands.

To keep one's fingers crossed. To hope for success, to try to ensure against disaster. From the superstition that making the sign of the cross will avert bad luck.

Lifting the little finger. Tippling. In holding a tankard or glass, many persons stick out or lift up the little finger.

Light-fingered gentry. Pickpockets, thieves.

My little finger told me that. The same as "A little bird told me that." (See Bird), meaning, I know it, though you did not expect it. The expression is in Molière's Malade Imaginaire.

By the pricking of my thumbs, Something wicked this way comes. Macbeth, iv, 1.

The popular belief was that an itching or tingling foretold some change or other.

To be finger and glove with another. To be most intimate. The more usual expression is to be hand in glove with.

To burn one's fingers. See Burn.

To have a finger in the pie. To assist or mix oneself officiously in any matter. Said usually in contempt, or censoriously.

To have it at one's fingers' ends. To be quite familiar with it and able to do it readily. The Latin proverb is Scire tenuam ungen digitosque suis, to know it as well as one's fingers and nails. The allusion is obvious; the Latin tag is referred to by Shakespeare in Love's Labour's Lost, v, 1:—

Costard: Go to; thou hast it ad dunghill, at the fingers' ends, as they say. Holofernes: O, I smell false Latin: dunghill for ungum.

To lay, or put, one's finger upon. To point out precisely the meaning, cause, etc.; to detect with complete accuracy.

To twist someone round one's little finger. To do just what one likes with him, to be master of his actions.

With a wet finger. Easily, directly. The allusion is to spinning, in which the spinner constantly wetted the fore-finger with the mouth.

Sailors find the wind by holding up a wet finger for the breeze to cool that side whence it comes.

Finger-print. An impression taken in ink of the whole of lines on the finger. In no two persons are they alike, and they never change through the entire life of any individual; hence, they are of very great value as a means of identifying criminals.

Though the individuality of finger-prints had long been known, the publication of Sir Francis Galton's Finger Prints (1893) and Finger Print Directory (1895) drew attention to the facts. The full value of finger-prints was developed by Sir Edward Henry who devised a numerical formula for classifying the impressions. The Henry system has been widely adopted by the police organizations of the world.

Fingle-fangle. A ricochet word from Jangle (see NEW FANGLED) meaning a fanciful trifle. It was fairly common in the 17th century, but is not heard nowadays, except as an archaism.
Finnan Haddocks. Haddocks smoked with green wood: so called from a place-name, either Findhorn in Elgin, or Findon in Kent, both fishing villages where haddocks are cured.

Fionnuala. The daughter of Lir in old Irish legend, who was transformed into a swan, and condemned to wander over the lakes and rivers of Ireland till the introduction of Christianity into that island. Moore has a poem on the subject in his Irish Melodies.

Firbolgs. See MILESIANS.

Fir-tree. Atys and the Firbolgs. Fir-tree. Atys was metamorphosed into a fir-tree by Cybele, as he was about to lay violent hands on himself. (Ovid: Metamorphoses, x, 2.)

Fir-cone. This forms the tip of the thyrsus (q.v.) of Bacchus because the juice of the fir-cone (turpentine) used to be mixed by the Greeks with new wine to make it keep.

Fire. (A.S. fyre; Gr. pur.)

A burnt child dreads the fire. See BURN.

Between two fires. Subjected to attack, criticism, etc., from both sides at once.

Coals of fire. See COALS.

Fire away! Say on; say what you have to say. The allusion is to firing a gun; as, You are primed up to the muzzle with something you want to say; fire away and discharge your thoughts.

Greek fire. See GREEK.

I have myself passed through the fire; I have smelt the smell of fire. I have had experience in trouble, and am all the better for it. The allusion is to the refining of gold, which is passed through the fire and so purged of all its dross.

I will go through fire and water to serve you; i.e. through any difficulties or any test. The reference may be to the ordeals of fire and water which were common methods of trial in Anglo-Saxon times.

If you will enjoy the fire you must put up with the smoke. You must take the sour with the sweet, every convenience has its inconvenience.

Letters of fire and sword. Formerly in Scotland if a criminal refused to answer his citation, it was accounted treason, and "letters of fire and sword" were sent to the sheriff, authorizing him to use either or both these instruments to apprehend the contumacious party.

More fire in the bed-straw. More mischief brewing. A relic of the times when straw was used for beds.

No smoke without fire. To every scandal there is some foundation. Every effect is the result of some cause.

St. Anthony’s Fire, St. Elmo’s Fire, St. Helen’s Fire, etc. See these names.

The fat is in the fire. See FAT.

The Great Fire of London (1666) broke out at Master Farryner’s, the king’s baker, in Spital Lane (the Monument now marks the spot) and after three days and nights was arrested at Pie Corner, Smithfield, and at the Temple, Fleet Street. St. Paul’s Cathedral, eighty-nine other churches, 13,200 houses were burnt down, and 373 acres within the walls and 64 acres without were devastated. In the City itself only 75 acres 3 roods remained unconsumed.

To fire, or to fire out. To discharge from employment suddenly and unexpectedly.

This use was originally an Americanism.

To fire up. To become indignantly angry; to flare up, get unduly and suddenly excited.

To set the Thames on fire. See THAMES.

We do not fire first, gentlemen. According to tradition this very chivalrous reply was made to Lord Charles Hay (in command of the Guards) at the opening of the battle of Fontenoy (1745) by the French Marquis d'Aueroche after the former had advanced from the British lines and invited the French commander to order his men to fire. The story is told by the historian Espagnac as well as by Voltaire, but it is almost certainly ben trovato, and is not borne out by the description of the battle written a few days after the encounter by Lord Charles to his father, the Marquis of Tweeddale.

Fire-brand. An incendiary; one who incites to rebellion; like a blazing brand which sets on fire all it touches.

Our fire-brand brother, Paris, burns us all. Troilus and Cressida, iii, 2.

Fire-bug. An habitual committer of arson (usually a psychiatric case); a fire-raiser (see below). The term is also applied to a glow-worm.

Fire-cross. See Fiery Cross.

Fire-drake or Fire-dragon. A fiery serpent, an ignis-fatuus of large proportions, superstitionally believed to be a flying dragon keeping guard over hid treasures.

There is a fellow somewhat near the door, he should have accosted her; and with some mischief in his eye, for, o’ my conscience, twenty of the dog-days now reign in ‘s nose. . . . That fire-drake did I hit three times on the head.—King Henry VIII, v, 3.

Fire-eaters. Persons ready to quarrel for anything. The allusion is to the jugglers who "eat" flaming tow, pour molten lead down their throats, and hold red-hot metal between their teeth. Richardson, in the 17th century; Signora Josephine Girardelli (the original Salamander), in the early part of the 19th century; and Chaubert, a Frenchman, of the present century, were the most noted of these exhibitors.

Fire hunting. An American term for hunting at night with the aid of fire-pans, or links.

Fire-new. Spick and span new (q.v.).

You should have accosted her; and with some excellent jests fire-new from the mint.—Twelfth Night, iii, 2.

Fire raiser. One guilty of arson for profit, usually to collect insurance money.

Fire-ship. A ship filled with combustibles sent against enemy vessels in order to set them on fire.

Fire-worship. Said to have been introduced into Persia by Phœdimas, widow of Smerdis, and wife of Hystaspes (521-485 B.C.). It is not the sun that is worshipped, but God, who is supposed to reside in it; at the same time the Fire Worshippers reverence the sun as the throne of deity. Cp. Parsees.

First. A diamond of the first water. See DIAMOND.

At first hand. By one's own knowledge or personal observation.

First-chop. See Chop.

First Fleet. The first convoy of ships taking convicts to Australia in 1788. The second fleet arrived in 1790. To have been a first fleeter became a matter of some pride, and the expression was in use as late as 1848.

First floor. In England the first floor is the story next above the ground-floor, or entrance floor; but in America it is the ground floor itself.

First foot, or first footer. The first visitor at a house after midnight on New Year's Eve. In Scotland and the North of England the custom of "first-footing" is still very popular.

First-fruits. The first profitable results of labour. In husbandry, the first corn that is cut at harvest, which, by the ancient Hebrews, was offered to Jehovah. We also use the word figuratively, as, the first-fruits of sin, the first-fruits of repentance.

First light. Roughly, dawn. Used in World War II to signify the earliest time at which infantry can see to make their way forward: first tank light, about half an hour later, is the earliest time that a tank, closed down for battle, can see to move. The phrases last light and last tank light are used at the end of the day.

First nighter. One who makes a practice of attending the opening performance of plays.

The First Gentleman of Europe. A nickname given to George IV, who certainly was first in rank.

He the first gentleman of Europe! There is no stronger satire on the proud English society of that day than that they admired George. No, thank God, we can tell of better gentleman.—Thackeray: The Four Georges: George IV.

The First Grenadier of the Republic. A title given by Napoleon to Latour d'Auvergne (1743-1800), a man of extraordinary courage and self-effacement. He refused all promotion beyond that of captain.

The first stroke is half the battle. "Well begun is half done." "A good lather is half the shave."

Fish. The fish was used as a symbol of Christ by the early Christians because the letters of its Greek name—Icththus (q.v.)—formed a monogram of the words Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour.

Ivory and mother-o'-pearl counters used in card games, some of which are more or less fish-shaped, are so called, not from their shape, but from Fr. fiche, a peg, a card-counter. La fiche de consolation (a little piece of comfort or consolation) is the name given in some games to the points allowed for the rubber.

Fish-flake. An 18th-century American term for a frame on which fish were dried.

Fish day (Fr. jour maigre). A day when persons in the Roman Catholic Church are forbidden to eat meat without ecclesiastical permission; viz. all Fridays and ember days, Ash Wednesday, the Wednesdays of Lent, the vigils of Pentecost, Assumption, All Saints, and Christmas.

Fish-wife. A woman who hawks fish about the streets.

Fish-wives are renowned for their powers of vituperation; hence the term is applied to any blatant, scolding woman.

A fish out of water. Said of a person who is out of his usual environment and so feels awkward and in the way; also of one who is without his usual occupation and is restless in consequence.

A loose fish. A man of loose or dissolve habits. Fish as applied to a human being usually carries with it a mildly derogatory implication.

A pretty kettle of fish. See KETTLE.

A queer fish. An eccentric person.

All is fish that comes to my net. I turn everything to some use; I am willing to deal in anything out of which I can make a profit.

He eats no fish. An Elizabethan way of saying that he is an honest man and one to be trusted, because he is not a papist. Roman Catholics were naturally opposed to the Government, and Protestants, to show their loyalty, refused to adopt their ritual custom of eating only fish on Fridays.

I do profess . . . to serve him truly . . . and to eat no fish.—King Lear, 1, 4.

I have other fish to fry. I am busy and cannot attend to anything else just now.

Neither fish, flesh, nor fowl; or neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring. Suitable to no class of people: neither one thing nor another. No fish (food for the monk), not flesh (food for the people generally), nor yet red herring (food for paupers).

The best fish swim near the bottom. What is most valuable commercially is not to be found on the surface of the earth, nor is anything else really worth having to be obtained without trouble.

There's as good fish in the sea as ever came out of it. Don't be disheartened if you've lost the chance of something good; you'll go another.

Fisherman, King. In the legends of the Holy Grail (q.v.) the uncle of Perceval, and dwelle in the Castle of the Grail, where the holy vessel is enshrined.

Fisherman's Ring. A seal-ring with which the Pope is invested at his election, bearing the device of St. Peter fishing from a boat. It is used for sealing legal briefs, and is officially broken up at his death by the Chamberlain of the Roman Church.

Flamboyant Architecture. A florid style which prevailed in France in the 15th and 16th centuries. So called from its flame-like tracery. The flamboyant architects of the decline, says Ruskin, were “nothing but skilful masons, with more or less love of the picturesque, and redundancy of undisciplined imagination, flaming itself away in wild and rich traceries, and crowded bosses of grotesque figure sculpture.”

Flaming. Superb, captivating, ostentations. The fr. flamant, originally applied to those persons who dressed themselves in rich dresses “flaming” with gold and silver thread.

Flaming swords. Swords with a wavy or flameboyant edge, used now only for state purposes. The Dukes of Burgundy carried swords of this sort, and they were worn in our country till the accession of William III.

The Flaming Tinman, or Black Jack Bosville, is one of the startling characters in George Borrow's Lavenmore, and the fight in the dingle one of the great scenes of English literature.
Flaminian Way. The great northern road of ancient Italy, constructed by C. Flaminius in 220 B.C. It led from the Flaminian gate of Rome to Ariminium (Rimini).

Flanders Mare. The. So Henry VIII called Anne of Cleves, his fourth wife whom he married in January, 1540, and divorced in July of the same year. She died at Chelsea in 1557.

Flanders Poppies. The name given to the red artificial poppies sold in the streets on Remembrance Day for the benefit of ex-service men. The connexion with poppies comes from a poem by John McCrae, which appeared in Punch, December 8th, 1915:-

If we break faith with those who die
We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
In Flanders fields.

Flaneur (Fr.). A lounger, gossiper. From flaner, to saunter about.

Flannels. To be awarded one's flannels. To gain one's cricket colours at Eton.

Flap-dragons. An old name for our "snap-dragon," i.e. raisins soaked in spirit, lighted, and floating in a bowl of spirituous liquor. Gallants used to drink flap-dragons to the health of their mistresses, and would frequently have lighted candle-ends floating in the liquor to heighten the effect. Hence:-

He drinks off candles' ends for flap-dragons.—2 Hen., IV, ii, 4.

Flap-jack. A cake baked on a griddle or in a shallow pan, and so called from the practice of tossing it into the air when it was done on one side, and catching it flat with the brown side uppermost.

We'll have flesh for holidays, fish for fasting-days, and more o'er puddings and flap-jacks.—Pericles, ii, 1.

In the 20th century the word has been applied to a woman's flat powder compact.

Flapper. In the early years of this century a familiar term for a young girl in her teens. The hair was worn long and plaited in a pigtail, tied with a large bow, which may have suggested a flapper.

Flash. Showy, smart. "swagger"; as a flash wedding, a flash hotel. In Australia the term flash or flashy is applied "to anyone who is proud and has nothing to be proud of," J. Kirby: Old Times in the Bush of Australia, 1895.

Also counterfeit, sham, fraudulent. Flash notes are forged notes; a flash man is a thief or the companion of thieves.

A mere flash in the pan. All sound and fury, signifying nothing; like the attempt to discharge an old flint-lock gun that ends with a flash in the lock-pan, the gun itself "hanging fire."

Flat. One who is not sharp.

Flat-foot. U.S.A. slang for a policeman. In English slang he is a flat-t.

To come out flat-footed. To state one's beliefs positively, as though firmly planted on one's feet.

Flat top. British and American name for aircraft-carrier (World War II).

Flat as a flounder. I knocked him down flat as a flounder. A flounder is one of the flat-fish.

Flat as a pancake. Quite flat.

Flat race. A race on the "flat" or level ground without obstacles, as opposed to a steeplechase, or "over the sticks."

He is a regular flat-fish. A dull, stupid fellow. The play is upon flat (stupid), and such fish as place, dabs, and soles.

Flatterer. Vitellius (A.D. 15-69), Roman Emperor for a short while in 69. He was a sycopath of Nero's, and his name became a synonym for a flatterer (Tacitus, Ann., vi, 32).

When flatterers meet, the devil goes to dinner. Flattery is so pernicious, so fills the heart with pride and conceit, so perverts the judgment and disturbs the balance of the mind, that Satan himself could do no greater mischief, so he goes to dinner and leaves the leaven of wickedness to operate its own mischief.

Porteus, there is a proverb thou shouldst read: "When flatterers meet, the devil goes to dinner."

PETER PINDAR: Nil Admirari.

Flea. A flea's jump. It has been estimated that if a man, in proportion to his weight, could jump as high as a flea, he could clear St. Paul's Cathedral with ease.

Aristophanes, in the Clouds, says that Socrates and Charephon tried to measure how many times its own length a flea jumped. They took in wax the size of a flea's foot; then, on the principle of ex pede Herculem, calculated the length of its body. Having found this, and measured the distance of the flea's jump from the hand of Socrates to Charephon, the knotty problem was resolved by simple multiplication.

A mere flea-bite. A thing of no moment.

Great fleas have lesser fleas. No matter what our station in life, we all have some "hangers on."

Hobbes clearly proves that every creature lives in a state of war by nature; so naturalists observe a flea has smaller fleas that on him prey.

Sent off with a flea in his ear. Peremptorily. A dog which has a flea in the ear is very restless, and runs off in terror and distress.

The phrase is quite an old one, and dates from at least the 15th century in English, and earlier in French. It is found in Heywood's Proverbs, Nash's Pierce Penilesse, Skoggin's Jests, etc.

Ferardo . . . whispering Philantus in the ear (who stood as though he had a flea in his ear), desired him to keep silence.—LYLY: Euphues (1578).

Here the phrase implies that confidential news has been heard; and in Deloney's Gentle Craft (1597) we have a similar instance, where a servant goes away shaking his head "like one that hath a flea in his eare."
Fleche, Richard. An Irish priest who printed a host of poems, letters, and travels, and died about 1678. He is now only remembered through Dryden's satire, MacFlechne; where it is said he

Reigned without dispute

Through all the realms of nonsense absolute.

Fleeced. Cheated of one's money; sheared like a sheep.

Fleet, The. Fleet Marriages. Clandestine marriages, at one time performed without banns or licence by needy chaplains, in the Fleet Prison, London. As many as thirty marriages a day were sometimes celebrated in this disgraceful manner; and Malcolm tells us that 2,954 were registered in the four months ending with February 12th, 1705. The practice was suppressed and declared null and void in 1774.

Fleet Book Evidence. No evidence at all. The books of the Old Fleet prison are not admissible as evidence to prove a marriage.

Fleet Prison. The most notorious of the old debtors' prisons, the Fleet Prison stood on the site now occupied by the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street. Its history was as dismal as the building itself. Originally used for prisoners committed by the Star Chamber, on the abolition of that court it became a prison for debtors, bankrupts, and persons charged with contempt of court. It was in charge of a warden, who bought the job and reimbursed himself from the exorbitant fees he charged prisoners for board, lodging, and innumerable privileges they never received. Every day a prisoner took it in turns to beg from passers-by; standing in a barred cage opening on the street. The prison was burned down in the Great Fire (1666) and again by the Gordon Rioters in 1780. It was rebuilt again but in 1844 the prisoners were removed to the Queen's Bench Prison, and in 1864 the place was pulled down. See Liberties of the Fleet, Under Liberty.

Fleet Street. Now synonymous with journalism and newspaperdom, Fleet Street in London was a famous thoroughfare centuries before the first newspaper was published there at the close of the 18th century. It takes its name from the old Fleet River, which ran from Hampstead Heath into the Thames at Blackfriars. It was navigable for coal-boats, etc., as far as Holborn Bridge (near the present Viaduct), but latterly became so foul that in 1764 it was arched over; and it is now used as a sewer. From earliest times there was a bridge (the Fleet Bridge) across the river at the modern Ludgate Circus.

Flemish Account. A sum less than that expected. In Antwerp accounts were kept in livres, sols, and pence; but the livre or pound was only 12s.; hence, an account of 100 livres Flemish was worth £60 only, instead of £100, to the English creditor.

Flemish School. A school of painting established by the brothers Van Eyck, in the 15th century. The chief early masters were Memling, Weyden, Matsys, and Mabuse. Of the second period, Rubens and Van Dyck, Snyders, and the younger Teniers.

Flesh. Sighing for the flesh-pots of Egypt. Hankering for good things no longer at your command. The children of Israel said they wished they had died "when they sat by the flesh-pots of Egypt" (Exod. xvi, 3) rather than embark on their long sojourn in the wilderness.

He fleshe his sword. Used it for the first time. Men fleshe in cruelty—i.e. initiated or used to it. A sportsman's expression. A sportsman allows a young dog or hawk to have the first game it catches for its own eating, thus at the same time rewarding it and encouraging its taste for blood. This "flesh" is the first it has tasted, and flesheing its tooth thus gives the creature a craving for similar food.

The wild dog Shall flesh his tooth on every innocent.

2 Henry IV, iv, 5.

Fleshy School, The. In the Contemporary Review for October, 1871, Robert Buchanan published a violent attack on the poetry and literary methods of Swinburne, Rossetti, Morris, O'Shaughnessy, John Payne, and one or two others under the heading The Fleshy School of Poetry, over the signature "Thomas Maitland." The incident created a literary sensation; Buchanan at first denied the authorship but was soon obliged to admit it, and some years later was reconciled to Rossetti, his chief victim. Swinburne's very trenchant reply is to be found in his Under the Microscope (1872).

Fleur-de-lys, -lys, or -luce (fler de le, loos) (Fr. lily-flower). The name of several varieties of iris, and also of the heraldic lily, which is here shown and which was borne as a charge on the old French royal coat-of-arms.

In the reign of Louis VII (1137-80) the national standard was thickly charged with flowers. In 1365 the number was reduced by Charles VI to three (the mystical church number). Guillem, in his Display of Heraldrie, 1611, says the device is "Three toads erect, sallant"; in allusion to which Nostradamus, in the 16th century, calls Frenchmen craponds. The fleur-de-lys was chosen by Flavio Gioja to mark the north point of the compass, out of compliment to the King of Naples, who was of French descent. Gioja was an early-14th-century Italian navigator to whom has been (incorrectly) ascribed the invention of the mariner's compass (q.v.).

Flibbertigibbet. One of the five fiends that possessed "poor Tom" in King Lear. Shakespeare got the name from Harset's Declaration of Egregious Popish Impostures (1603), where we are told of forty fiends which the Jesuits cast out, and among the number was "Fiberdigibet," a name which had previously been used by Latimer and others for a mischievous gossip. Elsewhere the name is apparently a synonym for Puck.

Flick. A cinematograph film; to go to the flicks, to go to the pictures.

Flimsy (flim' zi). A newspaper journalist's term for newspaper copy, or a telegram. It arises from the thin paper (often used with a sheet of carbon paper to take a copy) on which the reporters and others write up their matter for the press. Flimsy is also used for a £5 bank note.

Fling. I must have a fling at . . . Throw a stone at something. To attack with words, especially sarcastically. To make a haphazard venture. Allusion is to hurling stones from slings.

To have his fling. To sow his wild oats. The Scots have a proverb:—Let him tak' his fling and find out his ain wecht (weight). meaning. give him a free hand and he'll soon find his level.

Flint. To skin a flint. See Skin.

Flirt. A coquette. The word is from the verb flirt, as, “to flirt a fan,” i.e. to open it, or wave it, with a sharp, sudden motion. The fan being used for coquetting. those who coquetted were called “flirts.” In Dr. Johnson's day a flirt, according to his Dictionary, was "a pert bussey": and he gives an account of one in No. 84 of The Rambler, which, in some few particulars, resembles the modern article.

Fluttermouse. A bat (cp. Ger. Fledermaus). An earlier name was flinder mouse.

Then came . . . the flyndermows and the wezel and ther cam moo than xx whiche wolde not have femme of the foxe had loste the feeld.—Caxton: Reynard the Fox, xii.

Floating Academy. The hulks (q.v.); a convict ship.

Flogging a dead horse. See Horse.

Floor. I floored him. Knocked him down on the floor: hence figuratively, to overcome, beat, or surpass.

Flora’s Dial. A fanciful or imaginary dial supposed to be formed by flowers which open or close at stated hours.

Florizel (flor’ i zel). George IV, when Prince of Wales, corresponded under this name with Mrs. Robinson, the actress, generally known as Perdita, that being the character in which she first attracted the prince’s attention. The names come from Shakespeare’s Winter’s Tale.

In Lord Beaconsfield’s Endymion (1880) Prince Florizel is meant for Napoleon III.

Flotsam and Jetsam. Wreckage found in the sea or on the shore. "Flotsam,” goods found floating on the sea; "jetsam,” things thrown out of a ship to lighten it. (O.Fr. floter, to float; Fr. jeter, to throw out). Cp. Lagan.

Flowers and Trees.

N.B.—The laurel, oak, olive, myrtle, rosemary, cypress, and amaranth are all funereal plants.
Flowers in Christian Traditions. Many plants and flowers, such as the aspen, elder, passionflower, etc., play their part in Christian tradition. The following are said to owe their stained blossoms to the blood which trickled from the cross:—

The red anemone; the arum; the purple orchis; the crimson-spotted leaves of the roodselenk (a French tradition); the spotted persicaria, snake-weed.

Flowery Kingdom, The. China; a translation of the Chinese Hwa-kuo.

Flower of Chivalry. A name given to several knights of spotless reputation, e.g.—

Sir William Douglas, Knight of Liddesdale (slain 1353).

Bayard (le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche) (1475?-1524).

Sir Philip Sidney (1554-86).

Flower of Kings (Lat. Flos regum). King Arthur was so called by John of Exeter, who was Bishop of Winchester and died 1268.

Fluellen (flou' el' en). A Welsh captain and great pedant in Shakespeare's Henry V who, amongst other learned quiddities, attempted to draw a parallel between Henry V and Alexander the Great; but when he had said that one was born at Monmouth and the other at Macedon, both beginning with the same letter, and that there was a river in both cities, had exhausted his parallelisms.

Fluff. To bungle, to foozle, to do something accidentally meets with success, as in billiards by skill or judgment. Hence an advantage gained by luck more than by chance.

Flummery. Flattering nonsense, palaver. In Wales it is a food made of oatmeal steeped in water and kept till it has become sour. In Cheshire and Lancashire it is the prepared skin of oatmeal mixed with honey, ale, or milk; pap; blanc-mange. (Welsh, Ilymry, wash-brew, from Iym, sour or sharp.)

Flummux, To. To bamboozle; to deceive; to be in a quandary. "I am regularly flummuxed"—i.e. perplexed. It is probably the Old English provincial word flummocks, to maul or mangle, or flummnock, bewilderment, also untidiness or an untidy person.

Flunk. To fail in examinations or a test completely; found in U.S.A. by mid-19th century.

Flunkey. A male livery servant, a footman, lackey. The word usually has a contemptuous implication and suggests snobbry and toadyism; hence flunkkeydom, flunkyish, etc., pertaining to toadies. Probably a Scottish form of flanker, i.e. one who runs at the side (of carriages, etc.).

Flurry. The death-struggle of a whale after harpooning.

Flush. In cards, a whole hand of one suit.

Flush of money. Full of money. Similarly a flush of water means a sudden and full flow of water (Lat. flux-us).

To flush game. A gun dog is said to flush game when he disturbs them and they take to the air.

Flute. The Magic Flute, an opera by Mozart (Die Zauberflöte). The "flute" was bestowed by the powers of darkness, and had the power of inspiring love. Tamino and Pamina are guided by it through all worldly dangers to the knowledge of Divine Truth.

Flutter. Colloquial term for a small gamble.

Flutter the Dovecotes, To. To disturb the equanimity of a society. The phrase occurs in Coriolanus (v, 6).

Fly (plural flies). A hackney coach, a cab. A contraction of Fly-by-night, as sedan chairs on wheels used to be called in the Regency. These "Fly-by-nights," patronized greatly by the Regent and his boon companions during their wild night pranks at Brighton, were invented in 1809 by a carpenter, John Butcher.

Fly. An insect (plural flies). For the theatrical use, see Flyman.

It is said that no fly was ever seen in Solomon's temple; and according to Mohammedan legend, all flies shall perish except one, that is the bee-fly.

The god or lord of flies. In the temple of Actium the Greeks used annually to sacrifice an ox to Zeus, who, in this capacity, was surnamed Apomyios, the averter of flies. Pline tells us that at Rome sacrifice was offered to flies in the temple of Hercules Victor and the Syrians offered sacrifice to the same insects. See Achor; Beelzebub.

Flies in amber. See Amber.

Fly. Perspicacious in an unpleasant way, unlikely to be caught.

No flying without wings. Nothing can be done without the proper means.

The eagle doesn't hawk at flies. See Aquila.

The fly in the ointment. The trifling cause that spoils everything; a biblical phrase.

Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savour; so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honour.—Eccles. x, 1.

The fly on the coach-wheel. One who fancies himself of mighty importance, but who is in reality of none at all. The allusion is to Aesop's fable of a fly sitting on a chariot-wheel and saying, "See what a dust I make!"

There are no flies on him. He's all right; he's very alert; you won't catch him napping.

To crush a fly on a wheel. An allusion to the absurdity of taking a wheel used for torturing criminals and heretics for killing a fly.

To fly a kite. See Kite.

To fly in one's face. To get into a passion with a person; to insult; as a hawk, when irritated, flies in the face of its master.
To fly in the face of danger. To run in a fool-hardy manner into danger, as a hen flies in the face of a dog or cat.

To fly in the face of providence. To act rashly, and throw away good opportunities; to court danger.

To fly out at. To burst or break into a passion.

To rise to the fly. To be taken in by a hoax, as a fish rises to the angler’s fly and is caught.

Fly-boy. The boy in a printing-office who lifts the printed sheets off the press; so called because he catches the sheets as they fly from the tympan immediately the frisket is opened.

Fly-by-night. One who defrauds his creditors by décamping at night-time; also the early name of a sedan-chair, and later of a horsed vehicle (hence Fly, a cab).

Fly-flat. A racing man’s term for a punter who thinks he knows all the ins and outs of the turf, but doesn’t.

Flyman. In theatrical language, the scene-shifter, or the man in the “flies,” i.e. the gallery over the prosenium where the curtains, scenery, etc., are controlled.

The flyman’s plot. The list of all the articles required by the flyman in the play produced.

To come off with flying colours is to succeed triumphantly, as a ship coming out of action with all her colours flying.

Flying Dutchman. In the superstitions of seamen a spectral ship that is supposed to haunt the southern seas round the Cape of Good Hope. She is only to be seen in stormy weather and bodes no good to those who pass her. There are various stories to account for this mysterious and ghostly craft; that worked out by Wagner in his opera Der Fliegende Holländer (1843) was partly suggested by Heinrich Heine. Captain Marryat’s novel The Phantom Ship (1839) tells of Philip Vanderbecken’s successful but disastrous search for his father, the captain of the Flying Dutchman.

So’c’isle. See FORECASTLE.

Fogy or Fogey. An old fogey. A man of advanced years and somewhat antiquated ideas. A disrespectful but good-humoured description. Several fanciful derivations have been put forward for this word, but its origin is unknown.

foil. That which sets off something to advantage. The allusion is to the metallic leaf used by jewellers to set off precious stones. Fr. feuille; Lat. folium; Gr. phallon, a leaf.)

I’ll be your foil, Laertes. In mine ignorance Your skill shall, like a star in the darkest night, Stuck hereby off indeed. Hamlet, v. 2.

To run a foil. To puzzle; to lead astray. The rack of game is called its foil; and an animal bent will sometimes run back over the same all in order to mislead its pursuers. In another sense the word means “to baffle, frustrate, confound.” It comes from the O.Fr. fouler, to ramble upon (we have the same word in the phrase “to full cloth”). His schemes were foiled, e was prevented in what he had in mind.

‘olio. Properly, a ream or sheet in its standard size: but when used of books it denotes a book whose sheets have been folded once only, so that each sheet makes two leaves; hence, a book of large size. Demy folio = 11½ × 17½ in., crown folio = 10 × 15 in., and so forth. It is from the Ital. un libro in foglio, through the Fr. in-folio.

Folio so-and-so, in mercantile books, means page so-and-so, and sometimes the two pages which lie exposed at the same time, one containing the credit and the other the debit of one and the same account. So called because ledgers, etc., are made in folio.

Printers call a page of MS. or printed matter a folio regardless of size.

In conveyances, MSS., typewritten documents, etc., seventy-two words, and in Parliamentary proceedings ninety words, make a folio.

Folkland. See BUCKLAND.

Folk-lore. The study or knowledge of the superstitions, mythology, legends, customs, traditions, sayings, etc., of a people. The word was coined in 1846 by W. J. Thoms (1803-85), editor of the Athenaeum.

Folk-mote (folk meeting). A word used in England before the Conquest for what we now call a county or even a parish meeting.

Follow. Follow-my-leader. A parlour game in which each player must exactly imitate the actions of the leader, or pay a forfeit.

Follow your nose, go straight on.

He who follows truth too closely will have dirt kicked in his face. Be not too strict to pry into abuse.

To follow suit. To do as the person before you has done. A phrase from card-playing.

Follower. In addition to its proper meaning of one who follows a leader, the word was used in Victorian days to designate a maid-servant’s young man.

Mr. Marker . . . offers eighteen guineas . . . Five servants kept . . . No followers.

Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby.

Folly. A fantastic or foolishly extravagant country seat, built for amusement or vainglory. Fisher’s Folly, a large and beautiful house in Bishopsgate, with pleasure-gardens, bowling-greens, and hothouses, built by Jasper Fisher, one of the six clerks of Chancery and a Justice of the Peace, is an historical example. Queen Elizabeth lodged there; in 1620 it was acquired by the Earl of Devonshire, and its site is now occupied by Devonshire Square.

Kirby’s castle, and Fisher’s folly, Spinola’s pleasure, and Megse’s glory.

Fond. A foolish, fond parent. Here fond does not mean affectionate, but silly, from the obsolete fon, to act the fool, to become foolish (connected with our fun). Chaucer uses the word fondne for a simpleton (Reeve’s Tale, 169); Shakespeare has “fond desire,” “fond wretch,” “fond madwoman,” etc., also the well known:—

Pray, do not mock me: I am a very foolish fond old man, Fourscore and upward, not an hour more or less; And, to deal plainly, I fear I am not in my perfect mind.

King Lear, iv, 7.
Font or Fount. A complete set of type of the same body and face, with all the points, accents, figures, fractions, signs, etc., that ordinarily occur in printed books and papers. A complete font (which, of course, includes italics) comprises 275 separate pieces of type, not including the special characters needed in algebra, astronomical and medical works, etc. The word is French, fonte, from fondre (to melt or cast). Cp. Type; Letter.

Fontange. An extravagant head-dress or top-knot introduced in France in 1680 by Mlle Fontange (d. 1681). In England it was called a Tuque Commode. Pieces of gummed linen, rolled into circular bands, served as a foundation to keep in place various feathers, bows and jewelled ornaments. This head-dress, sometimes rising to a height of 2 feet, was abolished by Louis XIV in 1699.

Fontarabia (font á rá’ bi á). Now called Fuenterrabia (in Lat., Fons rapidus), near the Gulf of Gascony. Here, according to legend, Charlemagne and all his chivalry fell by the sword of the Saracens. The French romancers say that the rear of the king’s army being cut to pieces, Charlemagne returned and revenged their death by a complete victory.

With which Charlemagne with all his pugbear fell.
By Fontarabia. Milton: Paradise Lost, i, 587.

Food. Food for powder. Soldiers; especially raw recruits levied in times of war: cannon fodder. Prince: Tell me, Jack, whose fellows are these that come after? Fal.: Mine, Hal, mine. Prince: I did never see such pitiful rascals. Fal.: Tut, tut; good enough to toss; food for powder; they’ll fill a pit as well as better; tush, man, mortal men, mortal men. Henry IV, iv, 2.

The food of the gods. See Ambrosia; Nectar.

To become food for the worms, or to be drowned.

Fool. We have many old phrases in which this word plays the chief part; among those which need no explanation are: A fool and his money are soon parted; Fortune favours fools; There’s no fool like an old fool; etc. Others that may be mentioned are:

A fool’s bolt is soon shot (Henry V, iii, 7). Simpletons cannot wait for the fit and proper time, but waste their resources in random endeavours. The allusion is to bowmen in battle; the good soldier shot with a purpose, but the foolish soldier at random. Cp. Prov. xxix, 11.

A fool’s paradise. To be in a fool’s paradise is to be in a state of contentment or happiness that rests only on unreal, fanciful foundations.

As the fool thinks, so the bell clinks. A foolish person believes what he desires.

Every man hath a fool in his sleeve. No one is always wise; there is something of the fool about everyone.

At forty every man is a fool or his own physician. Said by Plutarch (Treatise on the Preservation of Health) to have been a saying of Tiberius. It implies that by the age of 40 a man ought to have learnt enough about his own constitution to be able to keep himself in health.

The Feast of Fools. A kind of Saturnalia popular in the Middle Ages. Its chief object was to honour the ass on which Our Lord made His triumphant entry into Jerusalem. This mummery was held on the Feast of the Circumcision (Jan. 1). The office of the day was chanted in travesty, then a procession was formed and all sorts of foolery was indulged in. An ass was an essential feature, and from time to time the whole procession imitated braying, especially in the place of “Amen.” It was put down only in the 15th century.

The wisest fool in Christendom. James I was so called by Henry IV of France, who learnt the phrase of Sully.

To be a fool for one’s pains. To have worked ineffectively; to have had no reward for one’s labours.

To be a fool to. Not to come up to; to be very inferior to; as, “baggatelle is a fool to billiards.”

To fool about or around. To play the fool; to hang around in an aimless way.

To fool away one’s time, money, etc. To squander it, fritter it away.

To make a fool of someone. To mislead him.

Young men think old men fools, old men know young men are. An old saying quoted by Camden in his Remains (1605, p. 228) as by a certain Dr. Metcalfe. It occurs also in Chapman’s All Fools, v, 2 (acted 1599).

Court fools. From mediæval times till the 17th century licensed fools or jesters were commonly kept at court, and frequently in the retinue of wealthy nobles. Thus we are told that the regent Morton had a fool, Patrick Bonny; Holbein painted Sir Thomas More’s jester, Patison, in his picture of the chancellor and as late as 1728 Swift wrote an epitaph on Dickie Pearce, the fool of the Earl of Suffolk, who died at the age of 63 and is buried in Berkeley Churchyard, Gloucestershire. Dagonet, the fool of King Arthur, is also remembered.

Among the most celebrated court fools are:

Rayère, of Henry I; Scogan, of Edward IV; Thomas Killigrew, called “King Charles’ jester” (1611-82); Archie Armstrong (d. 1672); and Thomas Derrie, jesters in the court of James I.

James Geddes, to Mary Queen of Scots; his predecessor was Jenny Colquhoun.

Patch, the court fool of Elizabeth, wife of Henry VII.

Will Somers (d. 1560), Henry VIII’s jester and Patche, presented to that monarch by Cardinal Wolsey; and Robert Grene, jester in the court of Queen Elizabeth.

The fools of Charles V of France were Mitton and Thévenin de St. Léger; Haincein Coc belonged to Charles VI, and Guillaume Loue to Charles VII. Triboulet was the jester of Louis XII and François I (1487-1536); Brusquet, of whom Brantôme says “he never had his equal in repartee,” of Henri II; Sibileo and Chicot, of Henri III and IV; and l’Angély of Louis XIII.
In chess the French name for the "bishop" is fou (i.e. fool), and they used to represent it in a fool's dress: hence, Regnier says: Les fous sont aux échecs les plus proches des Rois (14 Sart.). Fou is said to be a corruption of an early word for an elephant (see Thomas Hyde's De Ludis Orientalium, i, 4, 1689), and on old boards the places occupied by our "bishops" were occupied by elephants.

Foolscap. A standard size of printing paper measuring \( \frac{13}{8} \times 17 \) in. and of writing paper measuring \( \frac{13}{8} \times 16\frac{1}{2} \) in. The name is derived from an ancient watermark, of which the first known specimen occurs in 1540.

Foot. The foot as a measure of length (\( "bsh \) is pronounced "foots") was occupied of measuring from an old specimen of which the first known occurs in 1540.

Foot. The foot as a measure of length (\( = 12 \) in., \( \frac{1}{3} \) of a yard, or \( 3047075 \) of a metre) is common to practically all nations and periods, and has never varied much more than does the length of men's feet, from which the name was taken. In prosody, the term denotes a division in verse which consists of a certain number of syllables (or pauses) one of which is stressed. Here the term, which comes from Greece, refers to beating time with the foot.

At one's feet. "To cast oneself at someone's feet" is to be entirely submissive to him, to throw oneself on his mercy.

Best foot foremost. Use all possible dispatch.

To foot. To set going.

To show the cloven foot. To betray an evil intention. The devil is represented with a cloven hoof.

To trample under foot. To oppress, or outrage; to treat with the greatest contempt and discourtesy.

With one foot in the grave. In a dying state.

You have put your foot in it nicely. You have got yourself into a pretty mess. As the famous Irish bull has it, "Every time I open my mouth I put my foot in it."

Footloose. Unfettered, a 17th-century expression. It survives to-day in the phrase "footloose and fancy free."

He is on good footing with the world. He stands well with the world.

To pay your footing. To give money for drink when you first enter on a trade. Entry money for being allowed to put your foot in the premises occupied by fellow-craftsmen. Cp. Garnish.

Footmen. See Running Footmen.

Footnotes. Notes placed at the bottom of a page.

Foot-pound. The unit of result in estimating work done by machinery. Thus, if we take 1 lb. as the unit of weight and 1 ft. as the unit of distance, a foot-pound would be 1 lb. weight raised 1 ft.

Football Association Cup. See Association.

Footlights. To appear before the footlights. To appear on the stage, where a row of lights is placed in front along the floor to lighten it up.

Fop's Alley. An old name for a promenade in a theatre, especially the central passage between the stalls, right and left in the opera-house.

Forbidden Fruit. The. Figuratively, unlawful sexual indulgence. According to Mohammedan tradition the forbidden fruit partaken of by Eve and Adam was the banyan or Indian fig. See Fig leaf.

Forcible Feeble. See Feeble.

Fore. A cry of warning used by golfers before driving.

To the fore. In the front rank; eminent.

To come to the fore. To stand out prominently; to distinguish oneself; to stand forth.

Fore-and-aft. All over the ship; lengthwise, in opposition to "athwartships" or across the line of the keel.

Forecastle (usually printed—and pronounced —fo'c'sle). So called because anciently this part of a vessel was raised and protected like a castle, so that it could command the enemy's deck. Dana's Seaman's Manual defines it as:— That part of the upper deck forward of the forecastle. In merchant ships, the forward part of the vessel under the deck, where the sailors live.
Foreclose. To put an end to. A legal term, meaning to close before the time specified.

When a mortgager has failed to pay a debt the mortgagee may bring an action to foreclose, and the court will then hold that if the mortgager does not redeem within a certain time the mortgagee shall become owner of the property.

Forefather's Day. See Pilgrim Fathers.

Forehand. In the 17th century forehanded meant provident, thrifty. To-day it survives only in games, denoting a stroke in which the player takes a ball on his natural side—i.e., right side for a right-handed player, as opposed to backhand.

Foreshortening. This is a technical term in perspective drawing. In a portrait, for example, an arm represented as pointing at full length towards the observer occupies less space than if it were shown as pointing to one side; yet the perspective must clearly indicate that the full length of the arm is the same.

He forbids the fore-shortenings, because they make the parts appear little.—DRYDEN Forestick. The faggot laid in the front of a log fire, which holds all the others in; its opposite is backlog.

Foreign correspondent. A newspaper correspondent living in foreign parts, not a correspondent who is a foreigner. Until The Times newspaper originated the system of sending specially equipped men to reside abroad and send news regularly, all foreign news was sent by casual and amateur correspondents whose own political views gave a distinctive colour to the news—or the presentation of it—they transmitted.

Foreign Office. The department presided over by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. It was instituted in 1782, in place of the old Secretarieship for the Northern Department of Europe, as it had been called since 1688. The Foreign Secretary appoints, sends out, and supervises ambassadors, consuls, and other diplomatic agents and keeps himself acquainted with affairs abroad; he represents the British government to foreign ambassadors, etc., who represent their governments in this country, and represents his Government abroad at important international conferences, etc. The Foreign Secretary is assisted by a minister of state and three under-secretaries, one of whom is the permanent under-secretary and executive of the Foreign Office.

Forest City. Cleveland, Ohio.

Forgery. Broadly speaking, a forgery is an attempt to pass off as genuine some piece of spurious work or writing. It is not always easy to distinguish a forgery and an imposture; strictly, perhaps, the Rowley poems are impostures rather than forgeries.

Billy and Charley Antiques. In 1857 two men known as Billy and Charley, living in Rosemary Lane, Tower Hill, began to make mediaeval "antiquities" on a large scale. These were mostly plaques and other objects of no apparent use, cast in lead or an alloy of lead and copper known as cock-metal, and artificially aged by pitting with acids. These objects bore strange and enigmatic devices, usually surrounded by a scroll bearing characters resembling letters, though wholly unintelligible. A great number of simple folk and naive collectors were taken in, though the nature of these forgeries was so obvious, and they were full of such anachronisms that but little knowledge was needful to discern their nature. The whole business was exposed at a meeting of the British Archæological Association in 1858.

The Ireland Forgeries. One of the most famous of literary forgers was William Henry Ireland (1777-1835), the son of a bookseller and amateur antiquarian. When only 17 years old Ireland produced a number of seemingly ancient leases and other documents purporting to be in the handwriting of William Shakespeare, among them being a love-letter to Anne Hathaway, enclosing a lock of hair. Embraced by the credulity with which his impostures were accepted, he next came out with two new "Shakespeare" plays—Vortigern and Henry II. Ignoring the protests of Kemble, who was suspicious from the outset, Sheridan produced Vortigern at Drury Lane in 1796. During the rehearsals Mrs. Siddons and Mrs. Palmer resigned their roles and refused to be associated with so palpable a fraud. On the opening night the theatre was packed with an audience that grew increasingly critical as the play went on; and when Kemble spoke in his part, "When this solemn mockery is o'er," the house yelled and hissed until the curtain fell—on the first and last performance of Vortigern.

Meanwhile Malone and other critics had studied the Miscellaneous Papers said to be Shakespeare's and had declared them forgeries—eventually extorting a confession from Ireland late in that same year, 1796.

The Rowley Poems. Certain poems written by Thomas Chatterton (1752-70), and said by him to have been the work of a 15th-century priest of Bristol named Thomas Rowley, who, in fact, was purely fictitious. Chatterton began to write them before he was 15, and after having been refused by Doddsley, they were published in 1769. Many prominent connoisseurs and literateurs, including Horace Walpole, were hoaxed by them.

Fork. Old thieves' slang for a finger; hence to fork out, to produce and hand over, to pay up.

A forked cap. A bishop's mitre; so called because the full length of the arm is the same as it would be for a right-handed player, as opposed to the natural side.

Fingers were made before forks. See Fingers.

The forks. The gallows (Lat. furca). The word also meant a kind of yoke, with two arms stretching over the shoulders, to which the criminal's hands were tied. The punishment was of three degrees of severity: (1) The furca ignominiosa; (2) the furca pandal; and (3) the furca capitatis. The first was for slight offences, and consisted in carrying the furca on the shoulders, more or less weighted. The second consisted in carrying the furca and being scourged to death. The word furcifer meant what we call a gallows-bird or vile fellow.

The Ca~dine Forks. See Caudine.

Forlorn Hope. This phrase is the Dutch verloren hoop, the lost squad or troop, and is due to a misunderstanding, as the words are not connected with our forlorn or hope. The French equivalent is enfants perdus, the lost ones. The forlorn hope was originally a picked body of men sent in front to begin an attack; this Cromwell says, "Our forlorn of horse marched within a mile of the enemy," i.e. our horse picked sent forward to reconnoitre approached within a mile of the enemy's camp. It is now usually applied to a body of men specially selected for some desperate or very dangerous enterprise.

Form. Good or bad form is conformity—or otherwise—with the unwritten laws and conventions of society.

We'll eat the dinner and have a dance together, or we shall transgress all form.—Steele: Tender Husband. v. 1.

For~na pauperis (för 'ma paw' pèr is) (Lat., plea of poverty). To sue in forma pauperis. When a person has just cause of a suit, but is so poor that he cannot raise the money necessary to enter it, the judge will assign him lawyers and counsel without the usual fees.

Fortiter in re (för'ti tèr in rè) (Lat.). Firmness in doing what is to be done; an unflinching resolution to persevere to the end. See SCUTTLE IN MODO.

Fortunatus (för tō ná' tūs). A hero of mediaval legend (from Eastern sources) who possessed an inexhaustible purse, a wishing cap, etc. He appears in a German Volksbuch of 1509, Hans Sachs dramatized the story in 1553, and at Christmas, 1599, Dekker's Pleasant Comedy of Old Fortunatus was played before Queen Elizabeth.

You have found Fortunatus's purse. Are in luck's way.

Fortune. Fortune favours the brave. The expression is found in Terence—Fortes fortuna adjuvat (Phormio, i, 4); also in Virgil—Audentes fortuna juvat (Aen. x, 284), and many other classic writers.

Fortunate Islands. An ancient name for the Canary Islands; also, for any imaginary lands set in distant seas, like the "Islands of the Blest."

Their place of birth alone is mute To sounds that echo farther west Than your sire's Islands of the Blest. Byron: The Isles of Greece (Don Juan, iii).

Forty. A number of frequent occurrence in scripture, and hence formerly treated as, in a manner, sacrosanct. Moses was forty days in the mount; Elijah was forty days fed by ravens; the rain of the flood fell forty days, and another forty days expired before Noah opened the window of the ark; forty days was the period of embalming; Nineveh had forty days to repent; Our Lord fasted forty days; He was seen forty days after His resurrection, etc.

St. Swithin betokens forty days' rain or dry weather; a quarantine extends to forty days; forty days, in the Old English law, was the limit for the payment of the fine for manslaughter; the privilege of sanctuary was for forty days; the widow was allowed to remain in her husband's house for forty days after his decease; a knight enjoined forty days' service of his tenant; a stranger, at the expiration of forty days, was compelled to be enrolled in some tithing; Members of Parliament were protected from arrest forty days after the prorogation of the House, and forty days before the House was convened; a new-made burgess had to forfeit forty pence unless he built a house within forty days, etc. etc.

Fool or physician at forty. See FOOL.

Forty stripes save one. The Jews were forbidden by the Mosaic law to inflict more than forty stripes on an offender, and for fear of breaking the law they stopped short of the number. If the scourge contained three lashes, thirteen strokes would equal "forty save one."

The Thirty-nine Articles of the Anglican Church used sometimes to be called "the forty stripes save one" by theological students.

Forty winks. A short nap.

The Forty Immortals (or simply the Forty). The members of the French Academy, who number forty.

The Hungry Forties. See HUNGRY.

The roaring forties. The Atlantic Ocean between 40° and 50° north latitude; well known for its rough and stormy character.

Forty-five, The. The name given to the rebellion of 1745 led by Charles Edward Stuart, the Young Pretender. On July 25th, accompanied by seven followers, he landed in Scotland and raised the banner of his father, "James III," the Old Pretender. A large army of clansmen gathered round him, he defeated Sir John Cope at Preston Pans (Sept. 20th) and began his march down into England. On December 4th the Young Pretender reached Derby, but the massing forces of Wade and Cumberland obliged him to retreat to Scotland where, on April 16th, he was utterly defeated on Culloden Moor by the Duke of Cumberland.

"Number 45" is the celebrated number of Wilkes's North Briton (April 23rd, 1763), in which Cabinet Ministers were accused of putting a lie into the king's mouth.

Forty-niners. Prospectors for gold, who rushed to California following the discovery of gold there in 1848. Best remembered to-day, perhaps, in the song Clementine.

Forty-two Line Bible, The. See BIBLE, SPECIALLY NAMED.

Forwards, Marshal. Blücher (1742-1819) was called Marschall Vorwärts, from his constant exhortation to his soldiers in the campaigns preceding Waterloo. Vorwärts! always Vorwärts!

Fosse, The, or Fosse-way. One of the four principal highways made by the Romans in England. It leads from Axminster through Bath, Cirencester, Leicester, and Lincoln, and had a fosse or ditch on each side of it. Cp. Ermine Street.

Fossick. An old English verb used in Australia in the sense of "to search." In World War II it came widely into use in the British forces in an unfavourable sense—to fossick around was to move about aimlessly.

Fou. Scots expression for drunk. It is a variant of full.

The clachan yill had made me canty.
I was na fou, but just had plenty.

_Burns: Death and Dr. Hornbook._

Foul-weather Jack. Admiral John Byron (1723-180), said to have been as notorious for foul weather as Queen Victoria was for fine.

Fount of type. See Font; Letter; Type.

Fountain pen. This apparently modern invention is really of considerable antiquity. In the anonymous "Diary of a Journey to Paris in 1657-58" under date July 11th, 1657 there is reference to a man who "makes pens of silver in which he puts ink, which does not get dry, and without having to take any, one can write a half-quire of paper at a sitting." In 1721 there is an advertisement in a Welsh almanac, "Ink horns. Fountain pens, the best sort of Holman's ink powder, and red and black led pencils."

Fountain of Youth. In popular folk-tales, a fountain supposed to possess the power of restoring youth. Expeditions were fitted out in search of it, and at one time it was supposed to be in one of the Bahama Islands.

Four. Four Freedoms. Franklin Roosevelt, during World War II, declared as one of the aims of the democratic nations that when the war was over all the peoples of earth might live in freedom from fear, and from want, and with freedom of speech and of worship.

The History of the Four Kings (Livre des Quatre Rois). A pack of cards. In a French pack the four kings are Charlemagne, David, Alexander, and Cæsar.

Four Letters, The. See Tetragrammaton.

The Annals of the Four Masters is the name usually given to a collection of old Irish chronicles published in 1632-36 as Annals of the Kingdom of Ireland. The Four Masters (authors or compilers) were Michael Ó'Cléry (1575-1643), Conaire his brother, his cousin Cúcoigcrche Ó'Cléry (d. 1664), with Fearfeusa O'Mulconry.

Four Sons of Aymon. See AYMOn.

Fourth dimension. The three dimensions of space universally recognized are length, breadth, and height; three in number because we can draw three lines, but no more, all at right angles to one another. A piece of line has only one dimension—length; a region of a surface has two—length and breadth; a solid body in space has three. After the mathematician has applied Algebra to Geometry he can increase the number of his variables without altering the character of his equations; and retaining for convenience his geometrical vocabulary he constructs what he calls an algebraic geometry of as many dimensions as he pleases. A four-dimensional body may be thought of as bearing the same relation to one in the three-dimensional space which we perceive as volume does to area, or area to length. The measurement of time introduces a fourth variable into everyday life; but to say that for that reason time is the fourth dimension of space, and is somehow at right angles to every line that we can draw is a confusion of language. It is safe to say that in mathematical operations time is sometimes found to be behaving very like a fourth spatial dimension.

Fourth Estate of the Realm. The daily Press. The most powerful of all, the others (see Estates) being the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons. Burke, referring to the Reporters' Gallery, is credited with having said, "Yonder sits the Fourth Estate more important than them all," but it does not appear in his published works.

Fourth of July. See Independence Day.

Fourierism. A communistic system, so called from François Marie Charles Fourier (1772-1837), of Besançon. Population was to be grouped into "phalanstères," consisting each of 400 families or 1,800 individuals, who were to live in a common edifice, furnished with workshops, studios, and all sources of amusement. The several groups were at the same time to be associated together under a unitary government like the cantons of Switzerland or the United States. Only one language was to be admitted; all profits were to go to the common purse; talent and industry were to be rewarded; and no one was to be suffered to remain indigent, or without the enjoyment of certain luxuries and public amusement.

Fourteen, in its connexion with Henri IV and Louis XIV. The following are curious and strange coincidences:

Henri IV:

14 letters in the name Henri-de-Bourbon. He was the 14th king of France and Navarre on the extinction of the family of Navarre. He was born on Dec. 14, 1553, the sum of which year amounts to 14; he was assassinated on May 14, 1610, and lived 4 times 14 years, 14 weeks, and 4 times 14 days.

14 May, 1552, was born Marguerite de Valois his first wife.

14 May, 1588, the Parisians rose in revolt against him because he was a "heretic."

14 March, 1590, he won the great battle of Ivry.

14 May, 1590, was organized a grand ecclesiastical and military demonstration against him, which drove him from the faubourgs of Paris.

14 Nov., 1590, the Sixteen took an oath to die rather than submit to a "heretic" king.

It was Gregory XIV who issued a Bull excluding Henry from the throne.

14 Nov., 1592, the Paris parlement registered the papal Bull.

14 Dec., 1599, the Duke of Savoy was reconciled to Henri IV.

14 Sept., 1606, was baptized the dauphin (afterwards Louis XIII) son of Henri IV.

14 May, 1610, Henry was assassinated by Ravailliacs.

Louis XIV:

14th of the name. He mounted the throne 1643, the sum of which figures equals 14. He died 1715, the sum of which figures also equals 14. He reigned 77 years, the sum of which two figures equals 14.

He was born 1638, died 1715, which added together equals 3353, the sum of which figure comes to 14.
Fourteen Hundred. The cry raised on the Stock Exchange to give notice that a stranger has entered the "House." The term is said to have been in use in Defoe's time, and to have originated at a time when for a considerable period the number of members had remained stationary at 1399.

Fourteen Points. Conditions laid down by President Woodrow Wilson (1856-1924) as those on which the Allies were prepared to make peace with Germany. He outlined them in a speech to Congress on January 11th, 1918, and at the end of the war they were accepted as the basis for the peace. They included the evacuation by Germany of all allied territory, the restoration of Poland, freedom of the seas, reduction of armaments, and open diplomacy.

Fowler. The. Henry I (876-936), son of Otto, Duke of Saxony, and King of Germany from 919 to 936, was, according to an 11th century chronicle, so called because when the deputies announced to him his election to the throne, he found him fooling with a hawk on his fist.

Fox. As a name for the Old English broadsword, fox probably refers to a maker's mark of a dog, wolf, or fox. The swords were manufactured by Julian del Rei of Toledo, whose trade-mark was a little dog, mistaken for a fox.

O signeur Dew, thou diest on point of fox, except, O signeur, thou do give to me Egregious ransom.—Henry V, iv, 4.

I had a sword, ay, the flower of Smithfield for a word, a right fox v' faith.—PORTER: Two Angry Women of Abington (1599).

To fox. To steal or cheat; keep an eye on somebody without seeming so to do. A dog, fox, and a weasel sleep, as they say, "with one eye open."

Foxed. A print or page of a book stained with reddish brown marks is said to be "foxed," because of its colour.

Foxed was also an expression widely used in military parlance during World War I for bewildered.

Fox-hole. A small slit trench for one or more men.

A fox's sleep. A sleep with one eye. Assumed difference to what is going on. See above.

A wise fox will never rob his neighbour's hen-nest. It would soon be found out, so he goes rather from home where he is not known.

Every fox must pay his skin to the furrier. He crafty shall be taken in their own wiliness.

I gave him a flap with a fox-tail. I cajoled him into making a fool of him. The fox-tail was one of the badges of the motley, and to flap with a fox-tail is to treat one like a fool.

Reynard the Fox. See Reynard.

The fox and the grapes. "It's a case of the fox and the grapes" is said of one who wants something badly but cannot obtain it, and so lies to create the impression that he doesn't want it at all. The allusion is to one of Aesop's fables. See FABLES.

The Old Fox. Marshal Soulis (1769-1851) as so nicknamed, from his strategic talents in fertility of resources.

To set a fox to keep the geese (Lat. Omen lupi committere). Said of one who entrusts his money to sharpers.

Fox-fire. The phosphoric light, without heat, which plays round decaying matter. It is the Fr. faux, or "false fire," and was first found in 1485.

Foxglove. The flower is named from the animal and the glove. The reason for the second half is obvious from the finger-stall appearance of the flower, but it is not known how the fox came to be associated with it. It belongs to the botanical genus Digitalis, or finger-shaped. The leaves of this genus contain several powerful principles which are highly valuable in the treatment of heart disease.

Fox-trot. A modern ball-room dance. It was introduced from America in the first half of the 20th century. A horse's fox-trot is the short steps it takes when changing from a trot to a walk.

Fra Diavolo (fra de av' ò lô). Auber's opera of this name (1830) is founded on the exploits of Michele Pozza (1760-1806), a celebrated brigand and renegade monk, who evaded pursuit for many years amidst the mountains of Calabria.

France. See FRANK.

Francesca da Rimini (fràn chës' kà da rim' i ni). Daughter of Guido da Polenta, Lord of Ravenna. Her story is told in Dante's Inferno (canto vi). She was married to Giovanni Malatesta, Lord of Rimini, but her guilty love for his younger brother, Paolo, was discovered, and both were put to death by him about 1289. Stephen Phillips has a play (1900), and Silvio Pellico a tragedy, on the subject.

Franche Comté. Territory in upper Burgundy, which was made a county in 915 by Hugh the Black. It got its name of the free county by being taken from Reynaud III (1127-48) and later restored to him.

Franciscans (fràn sis' kànz). The friars minor founded by St. Francis of Assisi in 1209. They form one Order of Friars Minor, divided into three distinct and independent branches, of which one is known simply as Friars Minor, another as Friars Minor Conventual and the third as Friars Minor Capuchin. The Order had 64 houses in England at the time of the Reformation, being known as Grey Friars, from the indeterminate colour of their habit; which is now brown. The Friars Minor observe the unmitigated rule of St. Francis, with its insistence on poverty, abstinence, and preaching; Friars Minor Conventual have a modified rule with regard to the holding of property, and wear a black tunic with a white cord. The Capuchins, initiated in 1525, have the strictest rules of any, subsisting largely on the begging of the lay brothers. The Recollects, or Cordeliers, and Observants were formerly divisions of the Order, and were amalgamated with the Friars Minor by Leo XIII in 1897.

The Order of Franciscan Nuns was founded in 1212 by St. Clare; they are hence known as the CLARES or POOR CLARES; also MINORESSES. Various re-formations have taken place in the Order, giving rise to the Colettines, Grey Sisters, Capuchin Nuns, Sisters of the Annunciation, Concepcionists, and the Urbanists, the last named observing a modified rule and being permitted to hold property.

Frangipane, frangipani (frâ’ni pân, frâ’ni pa’ni). The name is supposed to come from the Marquis Frangipani, a soldier under Louis XIV. It is applied to a kind of pastry cake filled with cream, almonds, and sugar; also to a perfume made from, or imitating the smell of, the flower of a West Indian tree Plumeria rubra, or red jasmine.

Frangipani pudding. Pudding made of broken bread (Lat. frangere, to break; panis, bread).

Frank. One belonging to the Teutonic nations that conquered Gaul in the 6th century (whence the name France). By the Turks, Arabs, etc., of the Levant the name is given to any of the inhabitants of the western parts of Europe, as the English, Germans, Spaniards, French, etc.

Frankaloine, frankaloigne (frângk‘ âl moin) is an old legal term composed of frank, free, and almain, an alms-chest, or alms. The term was applied to land held by religious bodies in perpetuity free of all encumbrances or dues on condition that the religious and their successors prayed for the soul of the donor.

Frankelin's Tale (Chaucer). See Dorigen.

Frankenstein (frâng k‘en stin). The young student in Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley’s romance of that name (1818). He made a soulless monster out of corpses from churchyards and dissecting-rooms, and endued it with life by galvanism. The tale shows how the creature longed for sympathy, but was shunned by everyone and became the instrument of dreadful retribution on the student who usurped the prerogative of the Creator.

Frankfurter. A small smoked sausage of beef and pork, somewhat akin to the saveloy.

Frankincense (frangk‘ in sens). The literal meaning of this is pure, or true incense. It is a fragrant gum exuded from several trees of the genus Boswellia, abundant on the Somali coast and in South Arabia. The ceremonial use of frankincense was practised by the Egyptians, Persians, Babylonians, Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans, and the gum is an ingredient of modern incense used liturgically.

Frank-pledge. The system by which, in Anglo-Saxon times, the freemen in a tithing were pledged for each other's good behaviour. Hallam says every ten men in a village were answerable for each other, and if one of them committed an offence the other nine were bound to make reparation, or to see that it was made.

Frater (frá‘ter). The refectory or dining-room of a monastery, where the brothers (Lat. fratres) met together for meals. Also called the fraternity.

In old vagabonds' slang a frater was much the same as an Abram-man (q.v.).

A Frater goeth with a Licence to beg for some Spittlehouse or Hospital. Their pray is commonly upon poor women as they go and come to the markets.—AWELEY: Fraternity of Vagabondes (1575).

Frateretto (frâť‘er et‘ô). A fiend mentioned in Edgar in King Lear; this is another of the names that Shakespeare obtained from Harriet's Declaration. See Flibbertigibbet.

Frateretto calls me, and tells me Nero is an angel in the lake of darkness. Pray, innocent, and beware the foul fiend.—King Lear iii. 6.

Fraternization in war-time parlance means soldiers occupying an enemy country holding communication with the civil inhabitants.

Fratricelli (frâti chel‘ô) (Little Brethren), a sect of renegade and licentious monks which appeared about the close of the 13th century and threw off all subjection to the Pope, whom they denounced as an apostate. They have wholly disappeared by the 15th century.

Frazzle (U.S.A.). A frayed edge, hence worn a frazzle, reduced to a state of nervousness.

Fren. See Freya.

Free. A free and easy. A social gathering where persons meet together without formality to chat and smoke. In a free and easy way; with an entire absence of ceremony.

A free fight. A fight in which all engagement rules being disregarded.

Free on board. Said of goods delivered on board ship, or into the conveyance, at the seller's expense; generally contracted to F.O.B.

I'm free to confess. There's nothing to prevent me admitting. . . .

To have a free hand. See Hand.

To make free with. To take liberties with; to treat whatever it is as one's own.

Free Bench (francus bancus). A legal term denoting a widow's right to a copyhold in certain English manors. It is not a dower gift, but a free right independent of the will of the husband. Called bench because, upon inheriting the estate, she becomes a tenant of the manor, and entitled to sit on the bench at manorial courts.

Free coup (in Scotland) means a piece of waste land where rubbish may be deposited free of charge; also the right of doing so.

Free French. See Fighting French.

Free lance. See Lance.

Free Trade. The system by which goods are allowed to enter one country from another country without paying customs duty for the protection of home producers. For many years it was held that the prosperity of Britain depended upon leaving the ports open to the shipping and goods of all the world. In 1933 Great Britain abandoned Free Trade by imposing a general tariff on imported goods.

The Apostle of Free Trade. Richard Cobden (1804-65), who established the Anti-Corn Law League in 1838.

Freebooter. A pirate, an adventurer who makes his living by plundering; literally, one who obtains his booty free (Dut. vrije, free, buit, booty).

Frehold. An estate held in fee-simple or free tail; one on which no duty or service is owed to any lord but the sovereign. Cp. Copyhold.
Freeman, Mrs. The name assumed by the Duchess of Marlborough in her correspondence with Queen Anne. The queen called herself Mrs. Morley.

Freeman of Bucks. A cuckold. The allusion is to the buck's horn. See Horns.

Freemasonry. In its curious and characteristic ritual Freemasonry traces its origins to the building of Solomon's Temple. Without accepting or rejecting this theory, however, it can be taken as a fact that it has existed for many centuries as a secret society. In mediæval days operative, i.e. actual stone-masons, banded together with secret pass-words, signs and tests. and Masonic students find material for research in the marks engraved on fashioned stones in cathedrals and certain ancient buildings. Freemasonry as we know it was already flourishing in the 17th century, and although Sir Christopher Wren's association with the Craft has not been established, it is likely. Elias Ashmole describes his own initiation in 1682. The mother Grand Lodge of England was founded in London in 1717 and took under its aegis the many small lodges that were working up and down the country. Even the ancient York lodge, which has given its name to most of the Masonic rites of the Continent and U.S.A., acknowledged its authority. From this first Grand Lodge of England derive all Masonic lodges of whatever kind throughout the world.

In Britain Masonry has three degrees, the first is called Entered Apprentice; the second Fellow Craft, the third, Master Mason. Royal Arch masonry is an adjunct to these, and is peculiar to Britain. Mark Masonry is a comparatively modern addition to the fraternity. In the U.S.A. the first regular lodge was founded at Boston in 1733, though there are minutes extant of a lodge in Philadelphia in 1730. The ritual side of Freemasonry has appealed to American more than it has to British Masons, and many degrees are worked in U.S.A. with elaborate ritual and mysteries. In addition to the three degrees of British masonry there are the Cryptic Degrees of Royal and Select Masters; the Chivalric Rite, with three degrees of Knights Red Cross, Temple and of Malta; and the 33 degrees of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite. The various Grand Orient of the Continent (all disowned by the Grand Lodge of England on account of their political activities) were founded at different times and work modifications of the Scottish Rite. The part played by masonic lodges in the French Revolution is still obscure; Philippe Egalite was head of the Grand Orient and supported it during the Terror. Napoleon was reported to have been initiated at Malta in 1798; he certainly favoured masonry and during the Empire Cambacérès, Murat, and Joseph Bonaparte were successive Grand Masters. Freemasonry has been condemned by the Holy See not only for being a secret society but for its alleged subversive aims—aims that may be cherished by Continental Masons but which are quite unknown to their British and American brethren.

The Lady Freemason. Women are not admitted into Freemasonry, but the story goes that a lady was initiated in the early 18th century. She was the Hon. Elizabeth St. Leger, daughter of Lord Donegall, who hid herself in an empty clock-case when the lodge was held in her father’s house, and witnessed the proceedings. She was discovered, and compelled to submit to initiation as a member of the craft.

Freezing-point. The temperature at which a liquid becomes solid; if mentioned without qualification, 32° Fahrenheit (0° Centigrade), the freezing-point of water is meant. For other liquids the name is added as the freezing-point of milk, sulphuric ether, quicksilver, and so on. In Centigrade and Réamur's instruments zero marks the freezing-point. The zero of Fahrenheit's thermometer is 32° below the freezing-point of water, being the lowest temperature observed by him in the winter of 1709.

Freischutz (frist' shutz) (the free-shooter). A legendary German archer in league with the devil, who gave him seven balls, six of which were to hit infallibly whatever the mason aimed at, and the seventh was to be directed as the devil wished. F. Kind wrote the libretto, and Weber set to music, the opera based on the legend, called Der Freischutz (1820).

French. French Cream. Brandy; from the custom (which came from France) of taking a cup of coffee with brandy in it instead of cream after dinner.

To take French leave. To take without asking leave or giving any equivalent; also, to leave a party, house, or neighbourhood without bidding good-bye to anyone; to slip away unnoticed. This kind of backhanded compliment to our neighbours used to be very common (cp. "French gout" for venereal disease), and many objectionable things or practices have been called "French."

It is only fair to say that the French have returned the compliment in many ways. The equivalent of "to take French leave" is S'en aller (or filer) à l'anglaise; in the 16th century a creditor used to be called un Anglais, a term used by Clement Marot.

French of Stratford at Bow. This has been taken to mean French as spoken by an Englishman, and a Cockney at that, but it has no such ironical connotation. Stratford and Bromley were fashionable suburbs in those days, and at Bromley was the convent of St. Leonard's where the daughters of well-to-do citizens and others were taught French by the nuns. French was a common acquirement of the time and freely used at Court and in society; but it was a somewhat archaic French, descending from Norman days, and not such as was current in Paris.

And French, she [the nun] spak ful faire and fetisly, After the scole of Stratford atte Bowe, For French of Paris was to hir unknawe.

Chaucer: Canterbury Tales; Prologue, 124.

Frenchman. Nicknames of a Frenchman are "Crapaud" (q.v.), "Jean," "Mossoo," "Robert Macaire" (q.v.); but of a Parisian "Grenouille" (frog).

French Canadian, "Jean Baptiste."

French peasantry, "Jacques Bonhomme."
Done like a Frenchman, turn and turn again (1 Henry VI, iii, 4). The French were frequently ridiculed as a fickle, wavering nation. Dr. Johnson says he once read a treatise the object of which was to show that a weathercock is a satire on the word Gallus (a Gaul or cock).

Fresco (fres' kō). A method of painting upon fresh mortar. The plaster must be fresh to absorb the colour, and since it dries rapidly, the artist must work with great dexterity and speed. The wall must be free of saltpetre, and only such colours can be used as are not affected by lime—many brilliant greens, reds and yellow being thus ruled out. Frescoes should not be confused with wall paintings such as Leonardo's famous Last Supper at Santa Maria delle Grazie, Milan.

Freshman. An undergraduate of a university in his first term.

Freyja (frá' yá). In Scandinavian mythology the sister of Freyr and wife of Odin, who deserted her because she loved finery better than her husband. She is the fairest of the goddesses, goddess of love and also of the dead. She presides over marriages, and besides being the Venus, may be called the Juno of Asgard. She is also known as Frea, Frija, Frigg, Frige, etc., and it is from her that our Friday is named.

Friar. (L. frater, a brother). A religious, especially one belonging to one of the four great orders, i.e. Franciscans, Dominicans, Augustinians, and Carmelites. See these names.

In printer's slang a friar is a part of the sheet which has failed to receive the ink properly, and is therefore paler than the rest. As Caxton set up his press in Westminster Abbey, it is but natural that monks and friars should give foundation to some of the printer's slang. Cp. Monk.

Curtal Friar. See Curtal.

Friar Bungay (bung' gā). A famous necromancer of the 15th century, whose story is much overlaid with legend. It is said that he "raised mists and vapours which befriended Edward IV at the battle of Barnet." In the old prose romance The Famous History of Friar Bacon, and in Greene's Honourable History of Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay (acted 1591), he appears as the assistant to Roger Bacon (d. 1292).

In the original he is called "Friar John des Entommeures"; Urquhart mistakenly translated this as "of the Funnels"; "of the Trenchermen" is the best equivalent (entamer, to broach, to carve, with reference to a hearty appetite). Entonnoirs are "funnels"; and as this word has been used as slang for the throat perhaps that accounts for the mistake.

Friar Tuck. Chaplain and steward of Robin Hood.

In this our spacious isle I think there is not one But he hath heard some talk of Hood and Little John; Of Tuck, the merry friar, which many a sermon made In praise of Robin Hood, his outlaws, and their trade. Drayton: Polyolbion, xxvi, 311-16.

Friar's Heel. The outstanding upright stone at Stonehenge, formerly supposed by some to stand in the central axis of the avenue, is so called. Geoffrey of Monmouth says the devil wrapped them up in a ywth, and brought them to Salisbury Plain. Just before he got to Mount Ambre the ywth broke, and one of the stones fell into the Avon, the rest were carried to the plain. After the fiend had fixed them in the ground, he cried out, "No man will ever find out how these stones came here." A friar replied, "That's more than thou canst tell," whereupon the foul fiend threw one of the stones at him and struck him on the heel. The stone stuck in the ground and remains so to the present hour.

Friar's Lantern. One of the many names given to the Wif o' the Wisp.

Friars Major (Fratres majores), The Dominicans.

Friars Minor (Fratres minores), The Franciscans.

Friar's Tale. In the Canterbury Tales a tale throwing discredit on Summoners. Chaucer obtained it from the Latin collection, Promptuarium Exemplorum.

Friday. The sixth day of the week was the dies Veneris in ancient Rome, i.e. the day dedicated to Venus. The northern nations adopted the Roman system of nomenclature, and the sixth day was dedicated to their nearest equivalent to Venus, who was Frigg or Freyja (q.v.). Hence the name Friday (A.S. frige-deg). In France the Latin name was kept, and Friday is Vendredi.

Friday was regarded by the Norsemen as the luckiest day of the week: among Christians generally it has been regarded as the unluckiest, because it was the day of Our Lord's crucifixion, and is a fast-day in the Catholic Church. Mohammedans (among whom Friday is the Sabbath) say that Adam was created on Friday, and legen has it that it was on a Friday that Adam and Eve tasted the forbidden fruit, and on a Friday that they died. Among the Buddhists and Brahmins it is also held to be unlucky; and the old Romans called it nefastus, from the utter overthrow of their army at Gallia Narbonensis. In England the proverb is that "a Friday moon brings foul weather," but it is not, apparently, unlucky to be born on this day, for, according to the old rhyme, "Friday's child is loving and giving."

Black Friday. See Black.

Good Friday. See Good.

He who laughs on Friday will weep on Sunday. Sorrow follows in the wake of joy. The line is taken from Racine's comedy, Les Plaideurs.
Long Friday. Good Friday was so called by the Saxons, probably because of the long fasts and offices used on that day.

Man Friday. The young savage found by Robinson Crusoe on a Friday, and kept as his servant and companion on the desert island; hence, a faithful and willing attendant, ready to turn his hand to anything.

Never cut your nails on a Friday. "Cut them on Friday you cut them for sorrow." See NAIL-PARING.

Friend. A Quaker (q.r.), i.e. a member of the Society of Friends; also, one's second in a duel, as "Captain B. acted as his friend." In the law courts counsel refer to each other as "my learned friend," though they may be entire strangers, just as in the House of Commons one member speaks of another as "my honourable friend."

A friend at court. Properly, a friend in a court of law who watches the trial and tells the judge if he can discover an error (see AMicus CURIE). The term is generally applied to a friend who is in a position to help one by influencing those in power.

A friend in need is a friend indeed. The Latin saying (from Ennius) is, Amicus certus in re uncerta certitor, a sure friend is made known when (one is) in difficulty.

A friendly suit, or action. An action at law brought, not with the object of obtaining a conviction or damages, but to discover the law on some debatable point, to get a legal and authoritative decision putting some fact on record.

Better kinder friend than fremd kinder. This is the motto of the Waterton family, and it means "better kind friend (i.e. neighbour) than a kinsman who dwells in foreign parts" (cp. Prov. xxvii, 10, "Better is a neighbour that is near, than a brother far off"). Friend is an Old English word (from Old Teutonic) meaning foreign, strange, outlandish.

The Friend of Man. The name given to the Marquis de Mirabeau (1715-89), father of Mirabeau, the French revolutionary orator. His great work was L'Ami des Hommes, hence the nickname.

The soldier's friend. An official appointed by the authorities at the various pension boards to assist soldiers in making out and presenting their claims to pensions, etc.

Friendship. The classical examples of lasting friendship between man and man are Achilles and Patroclus, Pyllades and Orestes, Damon and Pythias, and Nisus and Euryalus. See these names. To these should be added David and Jonathan.

Frigg, or Frigga. See FREYJA.

Frills. "Air and graces"; as, to put on frills, to give oneself airs.

Fringe. The fringes on the garments of the Jewish priests were accounted sacred, and were touched by the common people as a charm. Hence the desire of the woman who had the issue of blood to touch the fringe of Our Lord's garment. (Matt. ix, 20-22.)

Frippery. Rubbish of a tawdry character; worthless finery; foolish levity. A friperer or friprerer was one who dealt in old clothes (cp. Fr. friperie, old clothes, cast-off furniture, etc.). Old clothes, cast dresses, tattered rag—Whose works are 'en the frippery of wit.

Also, a shop where odds and ends, old clothes, and so on are dealt in. Hence Shakespeare's:—

We know what belongs to a frippery.

Fritz. By frith and fell. By wold and wild, wood and common. Frithi means ground covered with scrub or underwood; fell is a common.

Frothiop (frit' yof). A hero of Icelandic myth who married Ingiborg, daughter of a petty king of Norway, and widow of Hring, to whose dominions he succeeded. His adventures are recorded in the saga which bears his name, and which was written about the close of the 13th century. The name signifies "the peacemaker."

Froebel (frer' bél). The name given to a system of teaching young children devised by F. W. A. Froebel (1782-1852), a German schoolmaster. The main part of his system has been put into practice in kindergartens where children's senses are developed by means of clay-modelling, work with colour-brushes, mat-plaiting, etc., as well as the care of animals, flowers, and suchlike.

Frog. A frog and mouse agreed to settle by single combat their claims to a marsh; but, while they fought, a kite carried them both off. (Aésop: Fables, clxviii.)

Old Aésop's fable, where he told What fate unto the mouse and frog befel. (CARY: Dante, cxxiii.)

In Ovid's Metamorphoses (vi, 4) we are told that the Lycian shepherds were changed into frogs for mocking Latona. As when those hinds that were transformed to frogs Railed at Latona's twin-born progeny.

MILTON: Sonnet, vii.

Frenchmen, properly Parisians, have been nicknamed Frogs or Froggies (grenouille) from their ancient heraldic device (see FLEUR-DE-LIS), which was three frogs or three toads. Qu'en disent les grenouilles?—What do the frogs (people of Paris) say?—was in 1791 a common court phrase at Versailles. There was a point in the pleasantness when Paris was a quagmire, called Lutetia (mud-land). See CRAPAUD. Further point is given to the nickname by the fact that the back legs of the edible frog (Rana esculenta) form a delicacy in French cuisine that awakened much contemptuous humour in the less exquisite English.

Frogmen. In World War II strong swimmers dressed in rubber suits with paddles on their feet resembling frogs legs, who entered enemy harbours by night and attached explosives to shipping and installations. Since the war they have sometimes been used in salvage operations.
Frog's march. Carrying an obstreperous prisoner, face downwards, by his four limbs.

It may be fun to you, but it is death to the frogs. A caution, telling one that one's sport should not be at the expense of other people's happiness. The allusion is to Aesop's fable of a boy stoning frogs for his amusement.

Nie Frog. The Dutchman in Arbuthnot's History of John Bull (1712). Frogs are called "Dutch nightingales."

A frog in the throat. A temporary loss of voice.

Fronde (fronde). A political party during the ministry of Cardinal Mazarin, in the minority of Louis XIV (1648-53). Its members, who were opposed to the court party, were called Frondeurs from fronde, a sling, they being likened to boys who sling stones about the streets and scamper away the moment anyone in authority approaches.

Frost Saints. See Ice Saints.

Frozen Words. Everyone knows the incident of the "frozen horn" related by Munchhausen, also how Pantagruel and his friends, on the confines of the Frozen Sea, heard the uproar of a battle, which had been frozen the preceding winter, released by a thaw (Rabelais: Bk. iv, ch. 56). The joke appears to have been well known to the ancient Greeks, for Antiphanes applies it to the discourses of Plato: "As the cold of certain cities is so intense that it freezes the very words we utter, which remain congealed till the heat of summer thaws them, so the mind of youth is so thoughtless that the wisdom of Plato lies there frozen, as it were, till it is thawed by the ripened judgment of mature age" (Plutarch's Morals).

"Truth in person doth appear Like words congealed in northern air."

Butler: Hudibras, Pt. i, l. lines 147-8.

Frying-pan. Out of the frying-pan into the fire. In trying to extricate yourself from one evil, you fall into a greater. The Greeks used to say, "Out of the smoke into the flame"; and the French say, "Tomber de la poële dans la braise."

Frying-pan brand. An Australian term of the mid-19th century to describe the large brand superimposed by cattle thieves to blot out the rightful owner's brand.

Fub. To hoax, impose upon, swindle. "You are trying to fub me off with a cock-and-bull story." Connected with Ger. foppen, to hoax. Fob is another form of the same word.

Fuchsia (fú'sha). A genus of highly ornamental shrubs coming from Mexico and the Andes, though two species are found in New Zealand. They were so named in 1703, in honour of the German botanist Leonhard Fuchs (1501-66). The best-known varieties in this country are derived from the Chilian species Fuchsia macrostemma.

Fudge. A word of contempt bestowed on one who says what is absurd or untrue. A favourite expression of Mr. Burchell in the Vicar of Wakefield.

A sort of soft candy is known as fudge.

Fudge-box. An attachment on newspaper printing machines to allow of late news being added on the machine while running. This news appears in the "Stop-press" column, which is, consequently, called the fudge-box. In this sense the word is another form of fudge (q.v.).

Fuel. Adding fuel to fire. Saying or doing something to increase the anger of a person already angry.

Fugger (füg'ér). A noted family of German merchant-bankers, famous in the 15th and 16th centuries and proverbial for their great wealth, their newspaper, and fine library. "Rich as a Fugger" is common in Elizabethan dramatists. Charles V introduced some of the family into Spain, where they superintended the mines.

I am neither an Indian merchant, nor yet a Fugger, but a poor boy like yourself. — But L. de Alfarache (1599).

Fugleman. Originally a leader of a wing (Ger. flugel, wing), file, now applied to a soldier who stands in front of men at drill to show them what to do.

Führer (fü'rér). The title, meaning in German "leader," assumed by Adolf Hitler when he ascended to the supreme power in Germany on the death of Hindenburg in 1934.

Fulhams, or Fullams. An Elizabethan name for loaded dice. Dice made with a cavity were called gourds; those made to throw the high numbers were high fulhams or gourds, and those made to throw the low numbers were low fulhams or gourds.

For gourd and fullam holds
And "high" and "low" beguile the rich and poor.

Merry Wives of Windsor, i, 3.

Have their fulhams at command,
Brought up to do their feats at hand.

Butler: Upon Gaming.

The name was probably from Fulham, which was notorious as the resort of crooks and rogues of every description.

Full. Full dress. The dress worn on occasions of ceremony; court dress, uniform, academicals, evening dress, etc., as the case may be. A full-dress debate is one for which preparation and arrangements have been made, as opposed to one arising casually.

Full house. A term in the game of poker for a hand holding three of one kind and two of another, e.g. 3 tens and 2 eights.

Full moon, or the full of the moon. The period when the whole disk of the moon is illuminated and it presents a perfect orb to the earth.

Full of beans. See Bean.

Full up. Quite full, occupied to its utmost capacity. Said also of one who is drunk. Cp. Fou.

In full cry. Said of hounds that have caught the scent, and give tongue in chorus; hence, hurrying in full pursuit.

In full fig. See Fig.

In full swing. Fully at work; very busy; in full operation.

Fum, or Fung-hwang. The phoenix (q.v.) of Chinese legend, one of the four symbolical animals presiding over the destinies of China.
It originated from fire, was born in the Hill of the Sun’s Halo, and has its body inscribed with the five cardinal virtues. It is this curious creature that is embroidered on the dresses of certain cardinals.

Fum. See George, St.

Fumage. Another name for Hearth-money or Chimney-money (q.v.) (Lat. fumus, smoke).

Fume. In a fume. In ill temper, especially from impatience.

Fun. To make fun of. To make a butt of; to ridicule; to play pranks on one.

Like fun. Thoroughly, energetically, with delight.

On’y look at the dimmestars, see what they’ve done, Jest simply by stickin’ together like fun.

Lowell: Biglow Papers (First series, iv, st. 5).

Fund. The Funds, or The Public Funds. Money lent at interest to Government on Government security.

The sinking fund. Money set aside by the Government for paying off a part of the national debt. This money is “sunk,” or withdrawn from circulation, for the bonds purchased by it are destroyed.

To be out of funds, out of money.

Fundamentalism. A religious movement that arose in the U.S.A. about 1919. It opposed all theories of evolution and anthropology, teaching that God transcends all the laws of nature, and that He manifests Himself by exceptional and extraordinary activities. Belief in the literal meaning of the Scriptures is an essential tenet. In 1925 a professor of science was convicted of violating the State laws of Tennessee by teaching evolution, and this incident aroused interest and controversy far beyond the religious circles of U.S.A. The Fundamentalist attitude was largely set forth by William Jennings Bryan, who insisted that the theory of evolution was a denial of Bible teaching and hence a doctrine inimical to Christianity.

Funeral (Late Lat. funeris, adj. from funus, a burial). Funus is connected with fenum (Sanskrit duke-mas), smoke, and the word seems to have referred to the ancient practice of disposing of the dead by cremation. Funerals among the Romans took place at night by torchlight, that magistrates and priests might not be made ceremonially unclean by seeing a corpse, and so be prevented from performing their sacred duties.
